Caldwell's Dancing Rooms. Explanation as to the suspension of license to Caldwell's dancing rooms, Pownall 448. 733–735.

Cambridge Music Hall. Large portion of artizans, with their wives, who attend the Cambridge music hall, this place being very well conducted, Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby 106–112.

Canterbury Hall. Reference to Canterbury Hall as an exceedingly well conducted place, Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby 96–98. 106——Belief that there are no private rooms at Canterbury Hall, Sir T. Henry 914.

Testimony to the interesting and unobjectionable character of the performances at Canterbury Hall, to the excellence of the management, and the good behaviour of the people who attend, Hon. G. C. Norton 1219 et seq.——Witness does not recollect a single case of drunkenness or disorder being brought before him from Canterbury Hall, ib. 1233. 1284——Witness never heard of any private rooms, ib. 1237, 1238——Approval of the plan of paying separately for admission and for refreshment, ib. 1238–1243. 1247–1250.

Refusal of a theatrical license to Canterbury Hall on the same ground that it was refused to the Alhambra and similar places, Donne 2538–2541.

Sundry particulars relative to Canterbury Hall, in Paper submitted to the Committee by Mr. Stanley, App. 306–308——Total of 25,000*l.* as the cost of buildings and fittings, there being accommodation for 1,500 persons, ib. 313.

each play by the examiner of plays, by whom anything objectionable is reported to witness who brings it before the Lord Chamberlain, Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby 186–189 ——Practice generally of the examiner to strike out objectionable passages from plays, his alterations being then adopted by the managers, ib. 306.

Duty of witness as examiner of plays to examine the manuscripts of all plays in Great Britain, with a view to the removal of matter immoral or profane, or objectionable politically, Donne 2068——Reference made to the Lord Chamberlain before any play is refused a license altogether, the reason for refusing the license being always given, ib. 2068, 2069. 2249–2251——Refusal of licenses to only seven plays since 1857, ib. 2117, 2118——Numerous plays and pantomimes read through by witness just before boxing night every year, ib. 2123. 2128–2130——Very few plays which require correction at witness's hands, ib. 2236, 2237. 2258–2261——Due notice taken of any non-compliance with witness's directions for the omission of objectionable passages, ib. 2262–2269—— Important difference in regard to the question of rejection whether a piece is read or sung, ib. 2284, 2285.

Several instances of witness having excluded political allusions, Donne 2408—— Practice also to cut out religious allusions, if objectionable; examination on this point, ib. 2409, 2410. 2438 et seq.——Extent to which witness would interfere with the manuscript of the "Hypocrite" if it had now to be licensed for the first time, ib. 2438–2455 ——Supervision by witness over the manuscripts in the country, ib. 2549–2551.

Instances of capricious action of the Lord Chamberlain in refusing licenses to plays on religious and political grounds, Boucicault 4147. 4151–4157. 4295–4297. 4471–4477 —— Further statement as to the liability to capricious decisions under the present licensing system; the witness has no fault to find either with Lord Sydney or Mr. Donne, ib. 4441–4452——Instance in witness's experience of capricious censorship on the part of the Lord Chamberlain in the licensing of plays, Brooks 4480–4482.

Very considerate and satisfactory manner in which the licensing of plays for witness's theatre has been carried out by the Lord Chamberlain, Lee 4949–4951. 5018——Considerate and judicious manner in which Mr. Donne has administered the censorship, Coyne 5815. 5832, 5833——Frequent interference of the Lord Chamberlain with plays after the Restoration, Tomlins 6908.

Very few plays rejected, Viscount Sydney 7615, 7616——Particulars as to the way in which the censorship is and has been exercised with reference more especially to certain plays which have been objected to, such as "Ruy Blas," "Jack Sheppard," "La Traviata," "Robert le Diable," &c., ib. 7618–7633, 7708–7713. 7788.

Total of 2,816 plays submitted for licenes from the beginning of 1852 to the end of 1865, of which only 19 were rejected, App. 282——List of the plays refused to be licensed in the years 1852-65, ib. 294——Total number of manuscripts licensed, and number refused licenses, in the years 1857-65; titles of the plays refused a license, ib. 297.

2. Approval of the Censorship as a Check upon objectionable Matter.

Salutary effect of the power of withholding a license; check thereby upon the production of objectionable plays, Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby 38–41. 170–174. 389–392—— Increased check contemplated on the part of the licensing officer in regard to the suppression of objectionable matter in plays, Sir T. Henry, 794–803——Belief that more immoral plays would be produced but for the censorship, and that the license is very salutary on this score, Donne 2404, 2405. 2412–2417——Inadequacy of public opinion as a check upon objectionable matter, Donne 2536. Webster 2898–2901.

Necessity of the censorship of the Lord Chamberlain in order to prevent immorality and objectionable political matter in dramatic literature, Webster 2894–2901. Buckstone 3564–3574——Belief that exceedingly objectionable plays would be produced but for the Lord Chamberlain's censorship, Smith 3651–3659——Witness considers that the censorship of the Lord Chamberlain is extremely beneficial, Wigan 4566–4577——Illustration of the importance of the Lord Chamberlain's license as a check upon immorality, ib. 4627–4630.

Witness, as a dramatic author of some experience, considers that the censorship of the Lord Chamberlain has not practically any appreciable effect either for good or evil as regards the west end theatres, Taylor 4751–4757. 4760. 4854–4866——Belief that a check is, however, very necessary upon the character of the plays in small theatres and in penny gaffs, ib. 4758–4761——Doubt as to the necessity for the censorship with regard to political allusions, ib. 4762–4767. 4826–4834. 4860–4866——Doubt as to any increased adoption of immoral pieces from the French if the Lord Chamberlain's censorship were withdrawn, ib. 4854–4859——Approval, on the whole, of the retention of the censorship, ib. 4873–4877.

Conclusion as to the supervision of the Lord Chamberlain being positively necessary,

Lee

2. Approval of the Censorship as a Check upon objectionable Matter—continued.

Lee 4953-4958. 5019——Approval of a censorship of dramatic pieces, if exercised by an officer wholly independent of the Crown, and if limited to points of morality and religion, Coyne 5815-5821. 5834-5836——Approval of the censorship of plays, public opinion not being a sufficient check, Viscount Sydney 7613, 7614.

3. Absence of Check upon Dramatic Authorship:

Opinion that the censorship is not any practical check upon dramatic authorship, Donne 2398-2403. 2438 et seq. Smith 3655. Wigan 4566-4577 —— Belief that the Lord Chamberlain's supervision does not at all interfere with the freedom of authorship, Buckstone 3571.

4. Suggestions for an Extension of the Censorship to the Performances in Music Halls.

Approval of the same rule for checking the character of each light piece at a music hall, and each play at a theatre, Sir T. Henry 947-949——Expediency of a similar supervision and control over the performances in music halls as in theatres, Sir R. Mayne 1175. 1179-1184——Belief as to the ability of witness to undertake the reading of all plays to be performed at music halls as well as at theatres, Donne 2122, 2123. 2137, 2138——Willingness of witness to undertake the reading of the pieces to be produced at music halls, ib. 2359-2361. 2372-2376. 2396, 2397 —— Opportunity for witness's supervision over the pieces in provincial music halls, if placed under the Lord Chamberlain, ib. 2553.

Advantage if there were a censorship over the songs at the music halls, Webster 3132; Smith 3624——Expediency of the performances in music halls being subjected to censorship, Wigan 4600, 4601——Suggested extension of the power of the censor to the provincial theatres; he should in fact be responsible for the character of all dramatic performances, Coyne 5818, 5819, 5954-5957——Suggested censorship of music halls as well as of theatres; objectionable character of the songs in the former adverted to, Knowles 6227-6231, 6259-6262, 6271-6275.

5. Evidence opposed to a Censorship either as regards Music Halls or Theatres:

Witness does not see any necessity for licensing the pieces at music halls, as anything immoral or indecent would be disallowed by the audience: immense difficulty moreover in submitting all the songs, &c. for approval, Stanley 2567, 2568. 2595-2605——Nor does witness see any necessity for the licensing of theatrical pieces, ib. 2567, 2568.

Adequacy of the check of the public upon the character of plays; instances of this, Boucicault 4059-4069, 4143-4146, 4213-4216—— Opinion that the present censorship should be abolished altogether, though there might be a public officer to be appealed to if the check of public opinion were found inadequate; belief that the audience would however be a sufficient check, Brooks 4483-4492——Argument that the censorship of the press and the opinion of the public are a sufficient check upon immoral plays, and that the censorship of the Lord Chamberlain is ineffectual and unnecessary, Hollingshead 5244-5247, 5254, 5330-5332. 5342-5350.

6. Question of an Appeal from the Decisions of the Censor:

Conclusion that an appeal to the Secretary of State is desirable, on account of capricious decisions having occurred in the licensing of plays, Boucicault 4041-4044. 4072-4075-4151-4157. 4295-4297, 4391, 4392, 4453, 4454, 4471-4477——Suggested appeal from the licensing officer to the Home Secretary, Coyne 5961-5968——Approval of plays being subject to a limited censorship; there should however be an appeal against the decision of the licenser, Reade 6742-6765, 6861-6863.

Conclusion that it is not necessary to have any appeal (except to public opinion) from the decision of the Lord Chamberlain in the rejection of plays, Viscount Sydney 7620-7622. 7634, 7635, 7714-7718.

7. Objection to the Lord Chamberlain as the Licensing Officer:

Objection to the Lord Chamberlain as the licenser of plays, as having other duties to perform, and as being a changeable officer, so that the grants of licenses is uncertain, and they are sometimes withdrawn years afterwards, Boucicault 4041-4044, 4072-4075. 4147, 4151-4157, 4295-4297. 4441-4452——The jurisdiction should in fact be in a permanent officer, with an appeal to the Home Secretary for the time being, ib. 4453, 4454, 4471-4477.

8. Approval of the Censorship by the Committee, with Suggestions for its Extension:

Resolution of the Committee that the censorship of plays has worked satisfactorily, that it is not desirable that it should be discontinued, and that it should be extended as far as practicable to the performances in music halls and other places of public entertainment in the metropolis, Rep. iv.

Resolution by the Committee that the 12th section of the Act 6 & 7 Vict. c. 68, relative to the censorship of plays intended to be produced or acted for hire in any theatre in Great Britain continue in force, and that such censorship be extended, as far as practicable, to music halls, and other places of public entertainment throughout Great Britain, Rep. iv.

Cider Cellars. Immoral character of the performances at the Cider Cellars, formerly, so that the police were obliged to interfere, Bodkin 1856–1861. 1943–1946——Places like the Cider Cellars would not pay now, as indecent songs would not be attractive, Hollingshead 5254.

City of London Theatre. Character of the pieces brought out by witness at the City of London Theatre; difficulty recently in obtaining attractive pieces, Lee 4944–4948——Injury to the theatre through the competition of neighbouring music halls, ib. 4959–4964, 5024–5026——Very little drinking in the theatre as compared with music halls, ib. 4965–4968.

Closing of Theatres. Probability of the Lord Chamberlain assuming, if necessary, the power of shutting up a theatre, and revoking the license, though this step has never been requisite, Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby 146–153——Power and practice of the Lord Chamberlain in regard to closing the theatres on Good Friday, and on days of humiliation, &c., ib. 352–357.

Provisions in the Act 6 & 7 Vict. in regard to the closing of theatres by the Lord Chamberlain, App. 289.

COMPETITION:

1. Between Theatres.
2. Between Music Halls.
3. Between Music Halls and Theatres.

1. Between Theatres:

Requirements of the Lord Chamberlain adverted to, as not in any way implying that there should be a monopoly of theatres, Donne 2147–2158, 2175–2220——Witness contends that, subject to police regulations as to safety and decency there should be free trade in theatres, Boucicault 4079–4085. 4149, 4150, 4435, 4436——Conclusion that there is practically free trade in theatres at the present time, as the license would be sure to be given to a new theatre unless the building were unsatisfactory, Wigan 4584–4587, 4649–4651, 4721, 4723.

Opinion favourable to free trade in theatres, there being room for several more good theatres in London, Coyne 5837–5841——Approval of the principle of free trade in theatres; that is, if the buildings are erected and conducted as theatres, Knowles 6319, 6333, 6334——Expediency of every one being free to build a theatre, and being secure of obtaining a license, Reade 6741.

Approval of the principle of free trade in the theatres, subject to proper regulations for the safety of the public; this is, in fact, the guiding principle of witness, Viscount Sydney 7574–7579. 7665–7671.

Resolution of the Committee that under certain conditions as to site, &c., the license should be granted without reference to any question of competition with other establishments, Rep. iv.

2. Between Music Halls:

Constant opposition made to the licensing of new music halls by places already licensed, Pownall 460–462.

Objection to open competition between music halls, as tending to degenerate the performances; expediency of regard being had to the wants of the neighbourhood and to other considerations before the grant of new licenses, Stanley 2569–2594. 2803–2806, 2833 et seq.——Belief that under open competition the music halls would not pay, and would be closed or turned into theatres, ib. 2644. 2650–2652. 2674–2684. 2852–2875——Expected deterioration of the performances, as a consequence of open competition, ib. 2852–2875.

3. Between

COMPETITION—continued.

3. Between Music Halls and Theatres:

Disapproval of open competition between the music halls and theatres, it being left rather to the licensing officer, under the guidance of the Act of Parliament, to define the performances to be allowed in each music hall, Sir T. Henry 915–939——Witness can conceive that many theatres under a new system may find it convenient, if not necessary, to become music halls; he is not so sure of the converse, Donne 2380——Doubt as to the proposed extension of the powers of the music halls having the effect of drawing many people away from the theatres, Stanley 2887–2890.

Pecuniary injury to witness, who has the freehold of his theatre, if the music halls could compete with him, Webster 3128, 3129——Non-objection to legitimate competition with the theatres, whereas the competition of music halls would be unfair, they being in no way under the control of the Lord Chamberlain, Buckstone 3367–3370.

Witness has heard several music hall proprietors say they do not wish to meddle with the theatres, Lee 4977–4991——Undue advantage over the theatres if music halls could produce dramas in addition to their profits on drink, ib. 4993–5000. 5040.

Approval of an increased number of theatres, though if all the music halls were theatres the competition would be ruinous, Turner 5111, 5112. 5141–5145——Mistake in dealing with the present question as one merely between music halls and theatres, Hollingshead 5221.

See also Drama, The. Foreign Countries. France. Music Halls. New York. Number of Theatres. Paris. Refreshments. United States.

Compromise. Suggested arrangement between the managers and lessees of theatres and music halls as to the compromise to be carried out, Donne 2386. 2500–2503.

See also Music Halls, 2–5.

Concert Rooms. Particulars relative to the grant of licenses by the Lord Chamberlain for morning or afternoon performances in certain concert rooms, Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby 156–169.

Conflict of Jurisdiction. Objectionable conflict of jurisdiction through the theatres and music halls being licensed by different authorities, Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby 234–238; Donne 2350, 2351.

Resolution of the Committee that the present system of double jurisdiction under which theatres are licensed by the Lord Chamberlain, and music halls and other places of public entertainments by the magistrates, is inconvenient and unsatisfactory, Rep. iii.

See also Lord Chamberlain's Department. Magistrates' Licenses. Music Halls, 6.

Construction of Theatres. Suggestions by Capt. Shaw with reference to the construction of theatres and other places of public entertainment, App. 325, 326. 330, 331.

Copyright. Objection to abolishing the law protecting dramatic property in England; want rather of readier facilities of protection, Boucicault 4332–4334——With regard to the law of copyright, witness has no objection to it, but understands that many authors have reason to complain of it, Brooks 4561, 4562.——See also Piracy of French Plays.

COUNTRY THEATRES:

1. As to the Number and Condition of the Theatres in Country Towns.
2. As to the Licensing and Supervision of the Country Theatres.
3. As to the Effect upon Country Theatres of licensing Music Halls for the Drama.

1. As to the Number and Condition of the Theatres in Country Towns:

Doubt as to any decrease of theatres in country towns, Webster 3308–3317. 3335–3348——Statement to the effect that country theatres have decreased in small towns, and have increased in the large ones; causes of such decrease, Buckstone 3460–3489. 3513–3515——Very flourishing state of the drama in the larger provincial towns, Boucicault 4365–4369.

Prosperous condition of the theatres in large towns, whilst in small towns they are decaying, Coyne 5899——Particulars relative to the theatres at Rochdale, Bolton, Wigan, Preston, and Oldham, Knowles 6344–6373——In most country towns pantomime is the chief attraction, ib. 6372.

2. As to the Licensing and Supervision of the Country Theatres:

Statement as to the system of licensing country theatres by the magistrates being in an unsatisfactory state; instances at Glasgow and Ramsgate, Wigan 4912-4919——Opinion that it would be an improvement if the theatres in the country were licensed by the central office, Turner 5189-5198.

Great uncertainty of obtaining licenses from the magistrates for theatres in the country; impediment thereby to the erection or increase of country theatres, Simpson 5388 et seq. ——Anticipated large increase in the number of country theatres, if the difficulty as to the license were removed; instances at Kingston, Croydon, &c., ib. 5413-5416. 5449-5454. 5469-5478. 5511, 5512——Expediency of the license being granted by some authority more free from prejudice than many of the country magistrates are, ib. 5454. 5457-5465 ——Suggestion that theatres in the country as well as in London should be licensed by the Lord Chamberlain with an appeal to the judges in equity, Reade 6857-6860.

Doubt whether, in addition to the theatres and music halls in London, the country theatres could properly be superintended by witness's department, Viscount Sydney 7675-7686. 7777-7782——Opinion that in the country the municipal authorities rather than the magistrates should have the supervision of the theatres, ib. 7754-7757, 7778, 7779.

Recommendation by the Committee that the licensing of a new theatre in the country should be by the Lord Chamberlain instead of as heretofore by the magistrates; but that the powers now exercised by the magistrates, both as regards the renewal of licenses and as regards regulations, should continue in force, Rep. iv.

3. As to the Effect upon Country Theatres of Licensing Music Halls for the Drama:

Misgiving in witness's mind lest the interests of provincial managers should be prejudicially affected if music halls were allowed to perform what they pleased, Reade 6760-6774. 6854-6856. 6864, 6865.

Coyne, J. Stirling. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a dramatic author, and secretary to the Dramatic Authors' Society, 5813——Approval of a censorship of dramatic pieces, if exercised by an officer wholly independent of the Crown, and if limited to points of morality and religion, 5815-5821. 5834-5836——Considerate and judicious manner in which Mr. Donne has administered the censorship, 5815. 5832, 5833——Suggested extension of the power of the censor to the provincial theatres; he should in fact be responsible for the character of all dramatic performances, 5818, 5819. 5954-5957—— Statement relative to the suspension by the Lord Chamberlain of a piece called "Lola Montes," written by witness in 1848, and passed in the first instance by the censor, 5822-5831. 5941-5948.

Opinion favourable to free trade in theatres, there being room for several more good theatres in London, 5837-5841——Scarcity of actors for the theatres on account of the operation of the music halls, 5842——Evidence strongly opposed to throwing open the music halls for theatrical performances; belief that it would greatly lower the drama, and would be injurious to authors and actors, 5843-5870. 5916 et seq.——Opposition of actors to opening the music halls, 5849-5851——Increase in the salaries of actors adverted to as not being owing to the music halls, 5852-5854.

Objection even to light theatrical pieces at music halls, 5855, 5856. 5862-5870. 5949-5951——Incompatibility of the drama with eating, drinking, and smoking, 5857-7862. 5916-5940. 5970-5983——Disapproval, on the score of morality, of men and women eating and drinking together whilst the drama is being represented; morals of Parisian society adverted to hereon, 5857-5859. 5868-5870. 5975-5978.

Much larger profits of dramatic authors than some years ago, 5871. 5872——Details relative to the system of payment of dramatic authors for the performances of their pieces in London and the provinces respectively; way in which the Dramatic Author's Society operates in the matter, 5872-5898——Prosperous condition of theatres in the large towns, whilst in the small towns they are decaying, 5899——Fees paid to dramatic authors when their plays are rendered in literary institutes, 5900-5903——Approval of a permission to institutes to perform stage pieces, it being now illegal in them to have anything more than reading or recitation by one individual, 5903-5912.

Further opinion that in addition to a general censorship of the performances in theatres, &c., there should still be a prohibition upon dramatic performances where smoking, eating, and drinking are allowed in the auditorium, 5913-5940. 5949-5957. 5970-5983——Expediency of its being clearly laid down what the music halls may do, 5949-5953——Contemplated creation of an independent officer for licensing and controlling both theatres and music halls, 5954-5969——Suggested appeal from the licensing officer to the Home Secretary, 5961-5968——Dialogue should be prohibited in music halls, 5970.

Cremorne Gardens. Good order now preserved at Cremorne Gardens, Bodkin 1947–1950——Information as to the class of entertainment usually given by witness at the theatre at Cremorne; approval of similar representations at the Alhambra, if smoking, eating, and drinking are disallowed, Smith 3626-3650——Details relative to the entertainments and performances generally at Cremorne, the regulations as to refreshments and smoking, and as to the use of small private rooms or boxes from which to witness the dancing, &c., ib. 3727–3789. 3947–3957. 3975–3978.

Criticism. Difficulty in regard to the exercise of proper professional criticism of the drama, Brooks 4552. 4556–4560——The critics of the present day are quite equal to those of former days, if not superior, ib. 4552.

D.

Dancing Licenses. Point in dispute under the Act 25 Geo. 2, in regard to the grant of "dancing" licences, with reference to the performance of ballets, Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby 373–375——Especial care taken by the Middlesex magistrates before licensing any rooms as suitable for public dancing, Pownall 398–400——Licenses are granted for music only, but not for dancing, except conjointly with music, ib. 402, 403——In the proposal by witness for the retention of dancing licenses by the magistrates, dancing by the public is alone contemplated, ib. 422–424. 450.

Suggestion that places licensed for dancing must be rated at a certain rent, Pownall 450. 607. 745——Defence of the practice of the magistrates in giving licenses for music rather than for dancing, and in interpreting the dancing as confined to the visitors, ib. 531–552——Evidence in favour of preventing at the same place the supply of spirits, and the giving of scenic representations, or professional dancing, ib. 594–609. 638–644. 693–709——Check contemplated in order to secure that where dancing licenses are granted, the accommodation is safe and ample, ib. 607, 608——Discretion exercised by the magistrates as to the renewal of licenses, where the dancing has not been confined to the visitors, ib. 765–767.

Frequent refusal by the Middlesex magistrates of applications for licenses including dancing, though willing to grant separate licenses for music, Bodkin 1777–1781. 1786——Objection to dancing in public houses in which the audience take part, Jackson 7221, 7222. 7236.

Dangerous Performances. Reference to the prohibition by the Lord Chamberlain of dangerous performances, such as those of Blondin, or the exhibition of wild beasts in theatres, Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby 349–351——Discontinuance, through the action of the police, of dangerous performances at the Alhambra and Cremorne, Sir R. Mayne 1054.

Disorderly Assemblages. Powers and practice of the police under the Act 2 & 3 Vict., c. 47, in regard to assemblages of disorderly characters, or of women of the town; penalties in such cases, Sir R. Mayne 1056–1068. 1194, 1195.

Divine Service in Theatres. Illegality of Divine Services and preachings in theatres on Sundays, if money were taken at the doors, Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby 358-360.

Donne, William Bodham. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has been examiner of plays since 1857; had for some years previously done the work for Mr. Kemble, the former examiner, 2040–2044. 2065–2067——Belief as to witness's appointment being for life, 2042, 2043——Creation of the office of examiner of plays by Act in 1737; 2045–2047. 2063, 2064——Origin of the Act of 1737, on account of the political allusions in the "Beggar's Opera," and in a certain play called the "Golden Rump," 2047–2062.

Duty of witness to examine the manuscripts of all plays in Great Britain, with a view to the removal of matter, immoral or profane, or objectionable politically, 2068——Reference made to the Lord Chamberlain before any play is refused a license altogether, the reason for refusing the license being always given, 2068, 2069. 2249–2251——Duty also of witness, as inspector of theatres, to see that the exits and entrances, and the building arrangements generally, are sufficient for the public safety before theatres are licensed, 2071–2076——Instances of wider passages and other improvements being carried out in existing theatres; difficulty in enforcing these alterations after the theatres have been built, 2076–2080. 2103–2106.

Means of egress at the Haymarket, Drury Lane, and Covent Garden, respectively, 2081–2084. 2103——Particulars as to the requirements in regard to modes of egress, fire-proof passages, &c., at the new theatre proposed to be built in Holborn, 2085–2102——Submission of the plans of all new theatres to the Lord Chamberlain, when the width of the passages and other points are regulated according to the circumstances of each case; advantage of this practice over a system of fixed rules as to the size of the passages, &c., 2105–2116.

Refusal of licenses to only seven plays since 1857; 2117, 2118——Very few plays brought out, except in London, 2119–2121——Belief as to the ability of witness to undertake the reading of all plays to be performed at music halls as well as at theatres, 2122, 2123. 2137, 2138——Numerous plays and pantomimes read through by witness just before Boxing Night every year, 2123. 2128–2130——Check upon the matter in pantomimes since witness has required the comic business to be written down; impossibility of preventing "gag" by the clown or pantaloon, 2124–2127. 2270–2279——Great difficulty in comprehending the meaning or story of ballets, 2131–2135.

Refusal of a theatrical license to St. James's Hall, on the ground that the building was not fit for the purposes of a theatre, 2140–2148——Objection also to a Lord Chamberlain's license being given to the Beaumont Institution, as not constructed for theatrical entertainments, 2142–2154. 2177——Opinion that music halls should be restricted to that class of entertainments for which they were built, just in the same way that theatres are the proper places for dramatic performances, 2142 et seq.——Requirement of the Lord Chamberlain merely that the building is adapted to theatrical purposes, without at all desiring that there should be any monopoly of licensed theatres, 2147–2158. 2175–2220.

Practice as to the supply of refreshments in theatres under excise license; restrictions hereon, through the check of the Lord Chamberlain, 2159–2174——Explanation as to a theatrical license having been granted to Mr. and Mrs. German Reed, 2175–2184——Refusal of a Lord Chamberlain's license to the Alhambra, as not sufficiently safe for theatrical representations, 2185–2195——Circumstances connected with an application by Mr. Boucicault for a license to a theatre which he contemplated building in the Haymarket; the plans not being before the Lord Chamberlain, the license could not absolutely be granted, 2196–2211——Practice of considering the feeling in the neighbourhood before licensing a new theatre in any locality, 2199–2208.

Further particulars relative to witness's appointment, the extent and character of his duties, and the remuneration, 2221–2248——Very few plays which require correction at witness's hands, 2236, 2237. 2258–2261——Receipt by witness of fees in addition to his salary, such fees being paid by the managers, who submit the plays; regular payment of these, 2239–2248. 2252, 2253——Perceptible improvement in the tone and style of the plays within the last six or seven years, 2254–2257——Due notice taken of any non-compliance with witness's directions for the omission of objectionable passages, 2262–2269.

With regard to the refusal of a license for "La Dame aux Camelias," this does not proceed from the same examiner who sanctioned "La Traviata," 2280, 2281——Important difference in regard to the question of rejection whether a piece is said or sung, 2284, 2285——The only plays stopped after having been licensed, were "Jack Sheppard" and "Oliver Twist," 2286, 2287.

[Second Examination.] Similar principle adopted by witness in the licensing of operas and of plays, 2289–2306. 2392–2395. 2489–2496——Inspection by witness of the site before approving of the plans of a new theatre, 2307, 2308——Business of those applying for a license for a new theatre to show that the neighbourhood is not averse, 2309–2311——Strict enforcement of the regulations of the Lord Chamberlain affecting the public safety, 2312——Exceptional practice of allowing a bar or drinking place at the back of the pit, 2313–2320.

Reference to Mr. Woodin's entertainment as not coming within the interpretation of a dramatic performance, though he considered it advisable to apply for a license, 2321, 2322. 2418–2435——Conclusion as to "duologue" being within the meaning of the interpretation clause, 2323–2325——Doubt whether the Lord Chamberlain would have refused a license to the Alhambra, if witness had reported that the place was safe for theatrical performances, 2326–2334. 2387, 2388——Approval generally of the system of licensing, as a salutary check upon places of amusement, 2335–2339——Opinion as to the satisfactory character of the appeal from witness to the Lord Chamberlain, 2340–2349.

Occasional conflict of jurisdiction through the theatres and music halls being licensed by different authorities, 2350, 2351——Necessary increase of staff and of expense if the music halls were under the Lord Chamberlain, and if the buildings had to be inspected, 2352–2358. 2529–2533——Willingness of witness to undertake the reading of the pieces to be produced at music halls, 2359–2361. 2372–2376. 2396, 2397——Contemplated difference in the license to music halls and theatres, if the former be placed under the Lord Chamberlain; apprehended depreciation of the drama and of art if the music halls had the same license as theatres, 2362–2386——Suggested arrangement between the managers and lessees of theatres and music halls, as to the compromise to be carried out, 2386. 2500–2503.

Security

Security given by the managers of theatres against transgression of the Lord Chamberlain's regulations, 2389-2391——Opinion that the censorship is not any practical check upon dramatic authorship, 2398-2403. 2438 et seq.——Belief that more immoral plays would be produced but for the censorship, and that the license is very salutary on this score, 2404, 2405, 2412-2417——Severity of the censorship in France in political matters, 2406, 2407——Several instances of witness having excluded political allusions, 2408——Practice also to cut out religious allusions if objectionable; examination on this point, 2409, 2410. 2438 et seq.

Statement on the question of monologue not requiring a license from the Lord Chamberlain, 2418-2437——Explanation as to Mr. David Fisher having had a license for a monologue, 2436, 2437. 2547, 2548——Extent to which witness would interfere with the manuscript of the "Hypocrite," if it had now to be licensed for the first time, 2438-2455——Explanation of witness's principle of action in objecting to matter as immoral, 2439-2449. 2495, 2496. 2522-2526. 2534, 2535——Severe censorship of the Master of the Revels in the time of Shakspeare, 2451——Dissent from the view that dramatic authorship is greatly inferior to what it was a century ago, 2456-2460——Difficulty of defining what a vaudeville is, 2474-2479——Considerable number of pieces which are adaptations from the French, 2480-2488.

Absence of detriment to public morals if the music halls were converted into theatres, and thus came under the same inspection as the theatres, 2497-2499——Necessity of plans being sent in to the Lord Chamberlain before the buildings of a new theatre are commenced, 2504-2506——Requirement that the stage lights are guarded, 2507——Obstacle to any permanent arrangement for keeping the streets clear close to the theatres, so as to facilitate the egress into the streets, in case of accident, 2508-2514——Belief that in theatres men are never permitted to enter the room where the ballet girls dress, 2514-2516.

Propriety of some consultation of the neighbourhood before the erection of a new theatre is sanctioned, 2519-2521——Denial that there would be any partiality in the Lord Chamberlain's Department in favour of theatres, if the music halls were placed under the Department, 2527, 2528——Inadequacy of public opinion for the entire prevention of immoral matter in plays, 2536——Removal of distinction between music halls and theatres, if five or six persons were allowed to perform small pieces in the former, 2537.

Refusal of a theatrical license to Canterbury Hall, on the same ground that it was refused to the Alhambra, and similar places, 2538-2541——Instances of the Lord Chamberlain having exercised the power of withdrawing plays already licensed, 2542-2546——Supervision by witness over the manuscripts in the country, 2549-2551——Control over the buildings in the country by the local magistrates, 2552——Opportunity for witness's supervision over the pieces in provincial music halls, if placed under the Lord Chamberlain, 2553.

Distinguished position of many of the dramatic authors who have signed a certain petition against the existing legislation concerning theatres, 2554-2556.

[Third Examination.] Further statement as regards duologue, to the effect that it does come within the meaning of the Act of Parliament, 3581——Explanation that the Lord Chamberlain has not given a theatrical license to the Alhambra for morning performances, and has only subscribed to the magistrates' license, 3582-3594.

theatres at the West End, but is loth to stand in the way of his fellow authors, Boucicault 4180–4184. 4195–4197——More room for good dramatic authors if the music halls could give improved performances, ib. 4280——Great facility of witness in the production of plays adverted to, as not being a very exceptional case, ib. 4298–4303.

Causes other than the censorship of the Lord Chamberlain, or the limited number of theatres, which account for the low state of the drama at the present time, Brooks 4493–4503——The drama is now so low, that opening the music halls to the drama is not likely to do the least injury, ib. 4536——Belief that the performance of stage plays in music halls would not tend to the decline of the drama, Tomlins 6872.

Apprehension lest a low and objectionable class of drama should be the result of empowering the music halls to give theatrical representations, Taylor 4780–4793. 4835–4853. 4879–4186——Dissent from the views submitted to the Committee in a certain petition from members of the Dramatic Authors' Society, ib. 4890–4896——Opinion that the present regulations concerning theatres does not operate as any prejudice to dramatic writers capable of producing good pieces, ib. 4896.

Conclusion as to the restrictive and injurious effect produced upon the industry of dramatic authors by the existing legislation concerning theatres, Hollingshead 5215–5220——Increased demand for dramatic writers if the music halls were thrown open, ib. 5312–5317. 5320–5322——Dissent from the views of Mr. Tom Taylor and other witnesses as to the drama requiring protection, ib. 5334, 5335.

Evidence strongly opposed to throwing open the music halls for theatrical performances; belief that it would greatly lower the drama, and would be injurious to authors and actors, Coyne 5843–5870. 5849–5851——Improbability of dramatic authors benefiting much by the music halls being thrown open, Reade 6834, 6835.

2. System of Payment of Dramatic Authors:

Large pecuniary interest of witness in the drama, as he receives half the profits wherever his productions are acted, Boucicault 4171–4178. 4410–4316 —— Option exercised by witness as to the number of theatres at which any one of his pieces may be acted at the same time, ib. 4421–4432——Large remuneration made by a few dramatic writers, whose success is established, and who make it a condition to share the profits with the managers, Brooks 4507–4514——Statement as to Mr. Boucicault having asked very exorbitant terms from witness for a play; very large sums made by Mr. Boucicault upon the principle of sharing the profits with the managers who produce his pieces, Wigan 4613–4618——Details relative to the system of payment of dramatic authors for the performances of their pieces in London and the provinces respectively; way in which the Dramatic Authors' Society operates in this matter, Coyne 5872–5898.

3. State of the Drama at the present time, and Character of the Supply of Plays:

Perceptible improvement in the tone and style of the plays submitted to witness within the last six or seven years, Donne 2254–2257——Dissent from the view that dramatic authorship is greatly inferior to what it was a century ago, ib. 2456–2460——Considerable number of pieces which are adaptations from the French, ib. 2480–2488——Attractiveness of old plays and legitimate dramas at the present time, Webster 3181–3186. 3225–3233. 3259, 3260——Character of the plays of the present time as compared with those produced in former years, ib. 3238–3244——Definition of the legitimate drama, ib. 3289——Fair supply of pieces at the disposal of managers, though frequently wanting in plot, ib. 3303–3307.

Production of equally good plays as in former years, though of a different class, Smith 3704–3706——Evidence in support of the conclusion as to the decline of the drama and of actors, ib. 3831–3851. 3864, 3865. 3891–3925——Consideration whether the change of public taste and habits, and the increased variety of amusement, may not account, to some extent, for the decline of the drama, irrespectively of the want of first-class actors, ib. 3904–3920——Causes of the long run of some pieces at the present time, ib. 3968–3997.

Dearth of good or rising actors, the drama in all its forms having declined, or stooped to meet the taste and demand of the lower classes, Boucicault 4274–4277. 4344—— Want of taste on the part of the public for a high order of drama; very little real criticism by the public, Brooks 4494–4498. 4504–4506. 4547–4551. 4553–4555——Effect of dramas which have very long runs in excluding dramatic authors generally, ib. 4501–4503——Belief that the legitimate drama is not popular at all, ib. 4505.

Dissent from certain opinions as to the declining state of the drama, Wigan 4608, 4609. 4625, 4626——Very few dramatic authors in England; large proportion of the pieces which are of foreign origin, ib. 4620——Great difficulty in writing successful plays, ib. 4620–4624——Belief that the drama has suffered from free trade in theatres, Taylor 4794–4799——Much larger profits of dramatic authors than some years ago,

3. State of the Drama at the present time, &c.—continued.

Coyne 5871, 5872——Absence of benefit to dramatic authors by the music-halls being thrown owen, Knowles 6249, 6250.

Argument that the present low state of the drama, and the paucity of good actors, are due mainly to the abolition of the privileges of the patent theatres, and the want of a school for acting, Kean 6607, et seq.; 6685-6689——Great difficulty in obtaining good plays, ib. 6636-6640——Belief that no good author would write a play for a music-hall, ib. 6641.

Dissent from the view of some witnesses before the Committee as to the drama having desperately declined, Reade 6823. 6836, 6837——Change of public taste, so that the high tragic drama is probably gone out for ever, Tomlins 6895-6906.

4. Character of the Demand for Good Plays:

Adequate competition at present for legitimate dramas; exceptional instances of pieces having such a long run as to prejudice the demand for a fresh supply, Webster 2903-2906. 3009-3048. 3115-3118——Ample demand among the twenty-five theatres in London for good pieces, ib. 3115-3119——Further statement that authors have every facility for getting good plays acted, though the supply of legitimate dramas is very limited, ib. 3225-3244——Large sums paid by witness for good plays, ib. 3191-3196——Appreciation of the legitimate drama by the public, if the supply were forthcoming, ib. 3228-3233. 3256-3260.

Attraction of the legitimate drama, when properly acted, whether in the larger provincial towns or at the Haymarket, Buckstone 3487. 3490-3492. 3506——Adequate demand for good plays at the present time, Smith 3660-3672——Grounds for the statement that the demand for good dramas is much greater than the supply, Wigan 4606-4620——Difficulty in getting good plays; failure recently of a new piece by Mr. Boucicault, Knowles 6251-6254——Rare instances of large sums being given for theatrical pieces, Reade 6731-6737.

5. Objections to the Performance of the Drama in the presence of Eating, Drinking, and Smoking:

Apprehended degradation of the drama, as an art, if mixed up with drinking and refreshments, Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby 183——Concurrence of opinion in strong disapproval of the representation of the drama in the presence of eating, drinking, and smoking, Webster 2902 et seq.; 3270-3280. 3318-3326; Buckstone 3367-3377. 3399-3407; Smith 3602 et seq.; 3790-3805; Francis 6076-6086; Kean 6603-6605. 6641-6658.

Main ground of witness's objection that the drama would be degraded, where drinking and smoking are such prominent attractions, Webster 2967-2969. 2977-2979. 3059-3067. 3217——Non-objection to music-halls having theatrical licenses, and giving dramatic performances, if they comply with the same conditions as theatres, and exclude drinking, eating, and smoking, ib. 2977. 3095-3104. 3133, 3134. 3216-3219. 3263-3278——Lowering of the drama if enacted in music-halls as at present conducted, Smith 3612-3622——Exclusion of the more respectable classes from the drama, if eating, drinking, and smoking, were allowed in the auditorium, Wigan 4658-4660.

Probability of no injury arising to the interests of literature by opening music-halls to theatrical representations; conclusion, nevertheless, that the combination of the drama with eating, drinking, and smoking, would have generally a lowering tendency, and is undesirable, Taylor 4780-4793. 4835-4853. 4879-4889——Indirect rather than direct injury apprehended from licensing music-halls for dramatic representations, ib. 4879-4885——Degradation of the drama if acted in the presence of eating, drinking, and smoking Lee 4980-4983. 5002.

Incompatibility of the performance of the drama with the practice of eating, drinking, and smoking, as in music-halls, Turner 5083-5092. 5129-5137——Injurious effect upon the theatres and the drama, if dramatic entertainments were given in places where eating, drinking, and smoking were going on at the same time, ib. 5101. 5105 et seq.——In addition to a general censorship of the performances in theatres, &c., there should still be a prohibition upon dramatic performances where smoking, eating, and drinking are allowed in the auditorium, Coyne 5857-5862. 5913-5940. 5949-5957. 5970-5983——Objection to dramatic performances in the presence of eating, drinking, and smoking, as tending to degrade the drama still lower than it is at present, Knowles 6177-6179. 6217-6226. 6256-6262. 6294-6303.

6. Improbability of any Successful Representation of the Drama in Music Halls:

Belief that the acting of the drama in music-halls, would not eventually be profitable, Webster 2955-2966——Impracticability of any satisfactory or successful performance of the legitimate drama in music-halls, Boucicault 4281, 4282. 4291-4294——Improbability of dramatic performances being attempted at music-halls, if empowered to Drunkenness (Music Halls). Very few cases of drunkenness from the music halls, Sir T. Henry 777, 780. 915. 956–959——Advantage in the men going with their wives to music-halls and having some drink and refreshment, rather than in frequenting public houses alone and drinking to excess, ib. 855, 856. 955–959——Effect of the music-halls in lessening drunkenness, as men constantly attend them with their wives and children, Hon. G. C. Norton 1296–1298——Opinion as to the tendency of music-halls to encourage drunkenness, Smith 3621, 3622. 3876, 3877.

Drury Lane Theatre. Opinion that the drama is not answering at Drury Lane, Smith 3865——Reduction made by witness in the prices of admission at Drury Lane, when lessee there, ib. 4000–4002——Considerable increase in the letting value of the theatre, Hollingshead 5217.

Dudley Theatre. Complaint as to a license having been withheld from a theatre at Dudley, Simpson 5404–5408.

Duologue (Music Halls). Conclusion as to "duologue" being within the meaning of the Interpretation Clause, and being illegal in music-halls, Donne 2323–2325——The music-halls should, at all events, be able to represent duologues, Stanley 2648——Further statement as regards duologue, to the effect that it does come within the meaning of the Act of Parliament, Donne 3581——The music-halls at the east end of London give duologues, Lee 4972–4974. 5029——Opinion that music-halls should only be further empowered to have dancing and duologue, these being illegal under the present system, Green 5637——Duologue, where there is scenery or properties, should be prohibited in music-halls, Coyne 5970.

Eagle Tavern. Unobjectionable character of the performances which used to take place at the Eagle Tavern, City Road, Sir R. Mayne 1085–1091——Grant, in the first instance, of a music license only to the Eagle Tavern, though under it dramatic pieces were performed, Bodkin 1793–1801.

East End of London. Very low class of people frequenting the music halls in the east end, their behaviour, however, being exceedingly good, Sir R. Mayne 1123–1125——Facility for the lower classes, as in the east of London, to attend cheap theatres, and to see dramatic performances without going to music-halls, Bodkin 2000–2003. 2015.

Fees for Licenses. Proposal that there be a small fee upon each license granted by the magistrates, Pownall 450. 741–744——Advantage of making the music-halls, &c., pay for their licenses, Hon. G. C. Norton 1290.

Provisions in the Act 6 & 7 Vict., in regard to the fees for Lord Chamberlain's license and for justices' license, App. 288, 289.

Fire. Absence of any special arrangements, or of any system, with regard to danger from fire in theatres, Shaw 6410*–6413——Great improvements feasible for the prevention of fire, more especially in the case of new theatres, ib. 6414, 6415——Want of proper arrangements in music-halls, as well as in theatres, against the occurrence of fire, ib. 6416–6420.

Suggestion that there be a high-pressure water service at all the theatres, by means of fire-proof towers and cisterns above the top of the buildings; considerable expense of such towers, Shaw 6419, 6420. 6465–6478. 6494–6503——There have not been many cases of fire at music-halls, ib. 6424——Difficulty in regard to the Lord Chamberlain compelling the adoption of all that is required, ib. 6434–6439——Approval of the precautions proposed by the Bill of Mr. Locke, though still further precautions are desirable, ib. 6440–6446. 6533——Functions of witness to extinguish fires, but not to take any precautions against them, ib. 6524–6527.

Great risk at present in the case of the numerous music-halls, dancing rooms, &c., so that systematic precautions should be enforced in all places holding upwards of 500 people, Shaw 6528–6533——Total of fifty fires at theatres in London within the last thirty-three years, only seven theatres having been seriously injured, ib. 6533——Very little loss of life through fires, ib. 6534–6542——Increasing number of firemen under witness; next year he will have 300 or 350, ib. 6552–6554.

Character of the precautions in regard to the prevention of fires in the Liverpool theatres, Gray 7017–7028——Precautions required in regard to prevention of fire before a theatrical license so granted at Sheffield or Oldham, Jackson 7371–7374.

Further suggestions by Captain Shaw upon the subject of the prevention of fires, App. 325, 326. 330, 331——List of fires which have taken place in the London theatres during the thirty-three years ending 1st January 1866, ib. 327–329.

Foot-Lights. Requirement of the Lord Chamberlain that the stage lights are properly regarded, Donne 2507——Effectual interference of witness for the adoption of precautions in the matter of the foot-lights in theatres, Viscount Sydney 7602, 7603. 7739–7742.

Foreign Countries. Expediency of the same system of free trade in theatres and theatrical representations in this country as in France and other countries, Boucicault 4465–4470.

Forms of License. Suggested granting of a different class of license according to the different class of entertainment, Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby 260–262——Approval of different licenses for different entertainments, according to the nature of the building, &c., Sir R. Mayne 1191–1201——Contemplated difference in the license to music-halls and theatres, if the former be placed under the Lord Chamberlain; apprehended depreciation of the drama and of art if the music-halls had the same license as theatres, Donne 2362–2386——Suggestion that there be separate licenses for the theatres and music-halls, as in Paris, Viscount Sydney 7556, 7557. 7582.

Form of Lord Chamberlain's license for theatres, App. 291.

Recommendation by the Committee that there be different forms of licenses; one where intoxicating drinks, refreshments, and tobacco may be consumed in the auditorium of the building; the second where intoxicating drinks, refreshments, and tobacco may not be so consumed, Rep. iii.

France. Strict censorship of plays in France, especially in political matters, Donne 2406, 2407; Boucicault 4139–4142——Decline of acting in France, though there are more first class actors than in England; probable cause of such decline, Webster 3082–3094. 3105, 3106——Probability of the decline of acting talent in France being owing to the freer style of drama there than in England, ib. 3292–3294.

Abolition about two years ago of the privileges of certain theatres in France, since which time there has been free trade in theatres, and in dramatic performances, Boucicault 4086–4137——Witness lays before the Committee a copy of the edict or decree of the Emperor of the French, dated 6th January 1864, concerning the liberty of the theatres; several articles therein cited, ib. 4249. 4258; App. 315, 316——Explanation that the sixth Article of the decree leaves such public entertainments as are not theatres to the regulations of the district police authorities, Boucicault 4249–4251——Abolition by this decree of all preceding laws with regard to theatres and places of amusement, ib. 4250.

Examination as to the grounds for witness's conclusion that the French law or edict of January 1864 had abolished all previous laws of the theatres, Boucicault 4304–4331——With regard to smoking in the French theatres, witness was not aware there was a regulation prohibiting it, ib. 4335–4341.

Opinion that the French actors are incomparably superior to the English, Wigan 4905.

Regulations in regard to the supervision of the theatres, App. 316, 317. 322–324——Ordonnance of 1st July 1864 concerning the provisions for public safety in the theatres and other places of entertainment, ib. 317–321.

to refuse a renewal of license, adverted to as the chief restraint upon the proprietors of the music-halls, 781, 782. 930.——Very slight supervision of these places by the police, 781.

Suggestion that there should be one officer for the licensing of music-halls and theatres in the metropolis, who should be aided by a proper staff, so as to secure a more complete supervision, 783 et seq——Advantage in the theatres and music-halls being under the same officer, 787–789. 798——Contemplated power in this officer at once to rescind any license, as well as to refuse renewals, 787. 790–803——Contemplated control of the Secretary of State over the proposed officer, 787. 797. 826. 891–893——Advantage of the uniformity to be obtained by the action of a single officer, 787——Increased check contemplated on the part of this officer in regard to the suppression of objectionable matter in plays, 794–803——Necessity of the proposed officer being a person of considerable ability and position, on account of the enlarged and magisterial powers to be vested in him, 797–803. 825–828. 889–893.

Means of laying down by Act of Parliament certain police regulations as a check upon the conduct of places of amusement, irrespectively of license from the magistrates, 804–807——Want of staff for an inspection of the places to be used as music and dancing halls, before a licensed is granted, 808–813——Considerable improvement in the conduct of theatres, since the removal of the saloons, 814–819——Discretion to be exercised by the licensing officer as to the number and class of places to be licensed, some restriction being desirable, 820–828——Advantage under the former practice in Paris of licensing particular theatres for particular descriptions of performances, 829–835.

Approval of the music-halls being empowered to produce light pieces, such as vaudevilles and burlettas, in addition to the ballet, 836–854. 902——Infringement of the privileges of the theatres if the music-halls were licensed for operas and for ordinary dramatic representations, 844–849—Difficulty in drawing a clear line of distinction between the performances to be allowed at music-halls and at theatres, 849. 900, 901——Increasing taste of the public for amusements where refreshments can also be had; propriety of this taste being yielded to and guided, 850. 916, 917. 952–959.

Advantage in men going with their wives to music-halls and having some drink and refreshment, rather than in frequenting public-houses alone and drinking to excess, 855, 856. 955–959——Respectable character of the great majority of the visitors at the Alhambra, whilst there is nothing more objectionable in the ballet there than at the Opera, 856–863——Proposal that a license for certain performances at any music-hall should be sufficient authority for obtaining a spirit license from the Excise, 864–877——Supervision suggested in regard to the conduct of the refreshment department, 876, 877.

Limited supervision now exercised by the police, who are for the time the servants of the proprietors, being paid by them; objection to this arrangement, 878–881. 885–888. 940–946——Expediency of the Act 25 Geo. 2 being repealed, and of a new Act being passed, 882–884——Want of an efficient supervision of the performances at music-halls, more especially as these places are increasing in number, 898, 899.

Dissent from the evidence of Mr. Spencer Ponsonby and Mr. Pownall as to the classes of people at the Alhambra, and their behaviour; witness saw no impropriety, 903–914——Belief that there are no private rooms at the Alhambra, 911. 914——Nor at Canterbury Hall, 914—— Disapproval of open competition between the music-halls and theatres, it being left rather to the licensing officer, under the guidance of the Act of Parliament, to define the performances to be allowed in each music-hall, 915–939.

Approval of the same rule for checking the character of each light piece at a music-hall, and each play at a theatre, 947–949——Importance of an altered form of construction of music-halls if licensed for the performance of light pieces, 950, 951——Non-objection to an enlargement of the Lord Chamberlain's Office as the means of securing an efficient licensing system, 960–962——Necessity of still employing police for the preservation of order, whilst the duties of the staff under the licensing officer should be confined to a supervision of the performances, 963–965.

Highbury Barn. Personal inspection by witness before licensing Highbury Barn as a theatre, Viscount Sydney 7578.

Holborn Casino. Excellent conduct of the Holborn Casino, Sir T. Henry 881.

Holborn Theatre. Particulars as to the requirements in regard to modes of egress, fire-proof passages, &c., at the new theatre proposed to be built in Holborn, Donne 2085–2102——Probability of the new theatre in Holborn being properly constructed, Hollingshead, 5240–5243.

cerning theatres, 5215–5220——Great rise in the rents of the London theatres during the last 25 years, 5217——Mistake in dealing with the present question as one merely between music-halls and theatres, 5221——Statement that there are in this country 5000 places in which dramatic representations are given without license, irrespectively of music-halls, 5221. 5351–5356.

Approval of dramatic performances being permitted in music-halls, literary institutes, &c., if the buildings are suitable, 5222, 5223. 5238—— Performance of stage plays in literary institutes without prosecutions often taking place, 5223, 5224——Particulars relative to the prosecution of Mr. Elliot Galer for certain performances in Leicester Temperance Hall, 5225–5237—— Resolution adopted by the St. James's Hall Company in support of Mr. Locke's Bill, 5231——Faulty and unfit character of many of the London theatres for dramatic representations, 5238, 5239——Probability of the new theatre in Holborn being properly constructed, 5240–5243.

Argument that the censorship of the press and the opinion of the public are a sufficient check upon immoral plays, and that the censorship of the Lord Chamberlain is ineffectual and unnecessary, 5244–5247. 5254. 5330–5332. 5342–5350——Increased taste of the public for intellectual amusement, 5248, 5249——Insufficiency of the accommodation in theatres, if several of them had attractive pieces at the same time, 5250–5253——Witness has never noticed anything more indecent in music-halls than in theatres, 5254—— Absence of impropriety in the songs at Evans's, or at the music-halls generally, 5254–5262.

Statement as to the Alhambra being much more a theatre than a music-hall; costly ballets produced there, 5263–5268——Proceedings taken against Mr. Strange adverted to, as not having been followed up since the decision of the judges in October last, 5269–5272—— Probability of music-halls performing light pieces, such as farces, vaudevilles, comic operas, &c., if licensed by the Lord Chamberlain, whilst the theatres would provide the more legitimate drama and the more intellectual forms of entertainment, 5273–5287. 5312–5317. 5362–5368.

Good musical entertainment at the Alhambra; improvement if comic operas could be rendered, 5281–5287——Conduct of the canteen at the Alhambra adverted to; doubt as to its being open to any serious objection, 5288–5297. 5336–5341——Illegal performance of stage plays at present throughout the country, so that it is the more expedient to legalise them, 5298, 5299——Statement showing that good actors and singers have been produced by the music-halls, 5300–5311——Efficiency of Mr. Robson as an actor when at the Grecian Saloon or music-hall, 5300–5307.

Increased demand for dramatic writers if the music-halls were thrown open, 5312–5317. 5320–5322——Effect of opening the music-halls to the drama in increasing the salaries of actors, 5317, 5318——Impracticability of a fixed limit as to the number of performers to be allowed in music-halls, 5319–5322——Expediency of a careful survey of theatres and music-halls with a view to the public safety, 5323–5329——Different practice in Liverpool and Birmingham as to dramatic performances in music-halls, 5333——Dissent from the views of Mr. Tom Taylor and other witnesses as to the drama requiring protection, 5334, 5335.

Practice as to dramatic representations in literary institutes in London contrary to law; number of such places, 5357–5361——Anticipated improvement in the entertainments at music-halls, and in the taste of the public, if the present restrictions were withdrawn, 5362–5368—— Grounds for concluding that theatres in London are now very prosperous if well managed, 5369–5378——Adequate supply of actors for all the theatres, 5379, 5380——Statement as to actors themselves having, in many instances, an antipathy to music-halls, whereas witness fully believes their salaries would be greatly increased under a system of free trade in the drama, 5381–5386.

Hours of Opening of Music-halls, &c. Suggestion that the restriction as to the opening of licensed music-halls be limited to the period between midnight and six o'clock in the morning, Pownall 450. 631. 634, 635——Explanation as to places of entertainment being sometimes allowed to be kept open after one o'clock in the morning, Sir R. Mayne 1041–1044. 1186.

I.

Illegal Performances. Claim now made by the music-halls to the privilege of performing operas, &c, whilst the theatres oppose such claim under the Act of 1843, Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby 28——Present state of the law, that no place which is not really a theatre can give a theatrical representation, ib. 367–369——Unsettled state of the law as to the performances legal at music-halls, Bodkin 1807, 1808. 1952.

Conclusion

Conclusion as to the entire illegality of the performances at music-halls generally in London, Boucicault 4278. 4347-4350——Illegal performance of stage plays at present throughout the country, so that it is the more expedient to legalise them, Hollingshead 5298, 5299. 5351-5361.

Statement as to its not being considered the business of witness's department to interfere with the performances in music-halls; even though illegal performances may be given, Viscount Sydney 7585-7596, 7644, 7645——Importance of removing the present uncertainty of the law as to the performances legal at music-halls; difficulty of a clear definition on the subject, ib. 7639. 7701-7706. 7770, 7771. 7789-7794——Interference of witness's department if a regular theatre were to give performances without a license, ib. 7644-7647.

Immorality:

1. Music-halls.
2. Theatres.

1. Music-halls:

Statement as to the more objectionable character of music-halls than of theatres, in regard to the presence of women of the town, Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby 178-182. 195-199. 309-314; Buckstone 3410-3421——Belief as to the prevalence of much immorality in connection with music-halls and other licensed places; objection especially to the private rooms, Pownall 418, 419. 494-519——Instances of immoral results from attendance at music-halls, ib. 517-519. 602-606——Great difficulty in preventing mischievous consequences if the public could witness theatrical representations in music-halls and public houses, whilst they were at the same time probably indulging in drink, ib. 564-583.

Occurrence of immoral practices at music-halls chiefly late in the evening, it being impossible, or extremely difficult, to prevent mischief through the police, Pownall 578-583——Improvement in the state of the streets at night by the attractions at music-halls, &c., ib. 721-723——Opinion further expressed as to the music and dancing rooms engendering vice, ib. 727-731——Belief that the magistrates are not now made cognisant of any gross improprieties at the places in respect of which licenses are applied for, ib. 770.

Apprehended impetus to immorality and juvenile crime if music-halls were not restricted in the performance of ballets, dramatic pieces, &c., Bodkin 1825-1837. 1856-1866. 1908. 1923-1928. 1974——Statement as to the absence of police, complaints being no proof that there is nothing objectionable going on at the music-halls, ib. 2004, 2005——Absence of detriment to public morals if the music-halls were converted into theatres, and thus came under the same inspection as the theatres, Donne 2497-2499——Prohibition upon the public at music-halls going behind the stage, or into any places at all private, Stanley 2776.

Immoral atmosphere of music-halls as compared with theatres; grounds for this statement, Webster 2991-3008. 3122-3127. 3135-3140. 3165-3170. 3249——Expediency of a strict check upon the songs in music-halls, so as to prevent coarseness or immorality, Webster 3132; Smith 3624; Green 5639-5669; Coyne 5818, 5819; Knowles 6227-6231. 6259-6262. 6271-6275——Very indecent and objectionable songs, &c., at some of the music-halls, there being a great want of supervision over many of these places, Smith 3606-3610. 3623, 3624. 3874, 3875; Lee 5011, 5012. 5023. 5035-5037.

Belief as to the absence of any improprieties in the conduct of the music-halls, Boucicault 4246, 4247——Absence of impropriety in the songs at Evans's, or at the music-halls generally, Hollingshead 5254-5262——Witness has never noticed anything more indecent in music-halls than in theatres, ib. 5254.

Objectionable operation of many of the music-halls in London, where the sexes meet together, in the presence of eating, drinking and smoking, Green 5579. 5604-5611. 5618-5628——Immense power for good or evil of the music-halls and other places of public entertainment in London, ib. 5593——Disapproval, on the score of morality, of men and women eating and drinking together while the drama is being represented; morals of Parisian society adverted to hereon, Coyne 5857-5859. 5868-5870. 5975-5978.

2. Theatres:

Impossibility of any immorality in the private boxes in theatres, Webster 3002-3008. 3249; Wigan 4724-4726——Witness has never seen any curtains drawn across the front of the boxes in respectable theatres, Webster 3004-3008; Smith 4018-4021——Explanation that witness does not adopt the former practice of allowing gentlemen to go behind the scenes; nor is it the custom of other managers to do so, Webster 3165-3170. 3209-3215; Buckstone 3558-3560; Smith 3706-3721.

Inability of witness to deny that at some theatres ladies may have been allowed to act without salary, or may have paid for permission to appear on the stage, Wigan 4736-4739——Explanation that witness has no positive knowledge that managers have received sums of money to allow ladies to appear on the stage, ib. 4898.

Inspection of Buildings. Particulars as to the inspection of the plans and buildings before theatres are licensed, Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby 291–301; Donne 2071–2076. 2105–2116——Want of staff for an inspection of the places to be used as music and dancing halls before a license is granted, Sir T. Henry 808–813——Expediency of a strong staff of inspectors if the music-halls, &c., were placed under the Lord Chamberlain, Hon. G. C. Norton 1290, 1291——Necessity of a central licensing officer being aided by a proper inspecting staff, Wigan 4925–4927.

Regulations in regard to the inspection of theatres by the examiner of plays, App. 296.

Italian Operas. Impression as to the two Italian Operas not being damaging to the national drama, Buckstone 3517, 3518.

J.

Jackson, John. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is head constable of Sheffield, 7200, 7201——There is but one licensed theatre in Sheffield, the Theatre Royal, 7202–7204——Rules drawn up by the magistrates in licensing the theatre, by which they may close the theatre if the rules are infringed, 7205–7211——The theatre is very well conducted, 7212, 7213——Large music-hall at Sheffield, called the Alexandra Music-hall, not licensed as a theatre, and having only a beer license; this place also is exceedingly well conducted, and all improper characters are excluded, 7215–7218. 7271–7274. 7281. 7292–7295. 7305, 7306——There is a second music-hall in which concerts and other entertainments are given, 7218–7220. 7281.

Information relative to certain public houses at Sheffield, in which character dancing and singing are the chief entertainments, and which are largely attended by artizans and their wives; these places are unobjectionable and well conducted, 7221–7228. 7235, 7236. 7245–7257. 7309 et seq.—— Necessity of Local Acts in order to give music and dancing licenses in provincial towns, 7229–7234——Oldham has recently obtained an Act by which these licenses may be granted by the magistrates, 7233. 7241–7244——Suppression of two places where the audience joined in the dancing, 7236. 7268–7270.

Suggestion that young persons up to the age of fourteen should be excluded from the public houses when character dancing, and singing, and smoking take place, 7258–7267——Advantage if the magistrates could make rules for places having music and dancing, as well as for the theatre; it should, in fact, be necessary to obtain a license for music and dancing in the same way as a spirit license, 7275. 7347–7353——Important difference between casinos or music-halls in London and music-halls, such as the Alexandra, in Sheffield, 7276–7281. 7292–7302. 7307, 7308.

There is no place at Sheffield where theatrical performances are given whilst the audience are eating, drinking, and smoking, 7283, 7284——Interference of witness if anything like theatrical performances were given in the public houses or concert rooms, or in any place not licensed as a theatre, 7285–7291. 7354–7369——Reference to Evans's in London as being exceedingly well conducted, 7303, 7304——Character of the performances in public houses at Sheffield, whilst drinking and smoking are going on; particulars hereon as to the supervision exercised over these places by the police, 7309–7346.

Difficulty as to witness's interference on account of the uncertainty as to what constitutes a theatrical performance; instance of this, 7354–7369——Dismissal of an information laid by the theatre at Sheffield against a sort of pantomime in a circus, the magistrates not considering it a theatrical performance, 7370——Precautions required in regard to prevention of fire before a theatrical license is granted at Sheffield or Oldham, 7371–7374.

K.

Kean, Charles. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has had considerable experience of theatres in the United States, 6558–6561——Great difference between the habits of the Americans and the English, the former dining early and being thus more at liberty to frequent the theatres, 6562, 6563. 6571——Relative proportion of theatres to population in New York and London respectively; free trade in theatres in the former place, 6564–6567——Crowded state of the New York theatres since the civil war adverted to as only temporary, 6568–6570. 6578——Performance in America chiefly of the sensational drama, the legitimate drama not being acted as a general rule, 6572–6577.

Impression that in Australia there is no restriction upon the building of theatres, 6579–9581——Absence of music-halls in the United States, 6582, 6583——Prohibition of smoking in the theatres in America and Australia, 6584–6586——Practice not to supply drink or refreshment in the auditorium of American theatres, 6587–6592——Particulars relative to the theatres in Australia; absence of any legislative or police restrictions, 6593–6602.

Strong objection to the performance of stage plays in music-halls, or in the presence of smoking, eating and drinking; great deterioration of the drama thereby, 6603–6605. 6641–6658——Argument that the present low state of the drama, and the paucity of good actors, are due mainly to the abolition of the privileges of the patent theatres and the want of a school for acting 6607 et seq. 6685–6689——Necessity of limiting the number of theatres in order to obtain a supply of trained and good actors, the present system tending directly to create a large supply of untrained and inefficient men, 6608 et seq.

Great difficulty in obtaining good plays, 6636–6640——Belief that no good author would write a play for a music-hall, 6641——Objection of the better class of actors to perform in music-halls, 6642–6645. 6656–6658——Disapproval of the music-halls being permitted to perform light pieces, though they might be allowed to perform ballet and pantomine, 6646–6659. 6717, 6718——Doubt as to any increase in the salaries of actors if the music-halls could employ them in light pieces, 6656–6658.

Examination as to the theatres not having always confined themselves to the representation of the legitimate drama in former years, 6659–6683——Illustration, in the case of witness, of a successful career commenced at one of the patent theatres, 6685–6687——Limited supply of rising actors who come to London from country towns as compared with former years, 6689–6705——Prejudicial effect of the very general abolition of the office of stage manager, since the theatres have been thrown open, 6705–6711——Increase in the number of theatres in Liverpool adverted to, 6712–6716.

Knowles, John. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is proprietor of the Theatre Royal at Manchester; purchased the patent from the proprietor of the former theatre, 6122–6127——Nominal value of witness's patent, except as dispensing with a license from the magistrates; the fees on renewal of the license are, however, much more expensive than an annual license, 6128–6133. 6285–6293. 6398–6407——Total of four theatres now in Manchester; these are more than are necessary, 6134–6147. 6195–6204——Much worse supply of good actors than in former years, there being an abundant supply of bad actors, 6148–6151. 6320–6326——Slight improvement in the salaries of actors in the provinces, 6152–6154. 6322——System of annual licenses granted by the magistrates to the Manchester theatres, without any difficulties being experienced, 6155–6170.

Details relative to the music-halls in Manchester, and the performances given in them, 6171–6194. 6205–6216. 6276–6284. 6373–6381——Objection to dramatic performances in the presence of eating, drinking and smoking, as tending to degrade the drama still lower than it is at present, 6177–6179. 6217–6226. 6256–6262. 6294–6303——Statement as to the Manchester music-halls possessing only an excise license; check upon them thereby, 6180–6194. 6281, 6282——Impression as to these places being conducted with propriety, 6183–6185. 6233. 6327, 6328.

Suggested censorship of music-halls as well as of theatres; objectionable character of the songs in the former adverted to hereon, 6227–6231. 6259–6262. 6271–6275——Circumstance of witness not choosing to have a wine and spirit license for his theatre, 6236–6244——Absence of benefit to dramatic authors by the music-halls being thrown open, 6249, 6250——Difficulty in getting good plays; failure recently of a new piece of Mr. Boucicault, 6251–6254——Objection to a ballet or character dancing in music-halls, 6294–6303. 6382–6389——Injurious effect of the music-halls upon the theatres, 6304–6307——Less value of witness's patent than formerly when there was a monopoly, 6308–6318.

Approval of the principle of free trade in theatres, that is, if the buildings are erected and conducted as theatres, 6319. 6333, 6334——Witness is on the whole satisfied with the present system, and does not ask for legislative interference, 6327–6332——Particulars relative to the theatres at Rochdale, Bolton, Wigan, Preston and Oldham, 6344–6373——In most country towns pantomime is the chief attraction, 6372——Character of the entertainments at the Belle Vue Gardens in Manchester, which are like Cremorne, 6390-6395——Impression that there are no penny gaffs at Manchester, and that the police would not permit them, 6396, 6397——Expediency of proper supervision over all places of public entertainment, 6408.

L.

"La Traviata." Circumstances of an English version of "La Traviata" having been refused a license at Drury Lane; opinion that the original opera in Italian should not have been sanctioned at the Italian Opera, Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby 193, 194. 227–233. 347, 348——With regard to the refusal of a license for "La Dame aux Camelias," this does not proceed from the same examiner who sanctioned "La Traviata," Donne 2280, 2281.

Leclercq, Miss Carlotta. Belief that Miss Carlotta Leclercq did not spring from a music-hall, Turner 5076, 5077——Miss Carlotta Leclercq came out at the Grecian, Hollingshead 5300. 5308.

Lee, Nelson. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is manager of the City of London Theatre; has been manager or lessee of several other theatres in the metropolis, and had formerly a travelling theatre, 4930–4932——Facility with which witness used to obtain permission from the local magistrates to perform in country towns when he travelled about with a company, 4934-4942——Character of the pieces brought out at the City of London Theatre; difficulty recently in obtaining attractive pieces, 4944–4948.

Very considerate and satisfactory manner in which the licensing of plays for witness's theatre has been carried out by the Lord Chamberlain, 4949–4951. 5018——Conclusion as to the supervision of the Lord Chamberlain being positively necessary, 4953–4958. 5019——Injury to witness's theatre through the competition of neighbouring music-halls, 4959–4964. 5024–5026——Very little drinking in the theatre as compared with the music-halls, 4965–4968——Much less attentive audiences at music-halls than at theatres, whilst the former would be much more objectionable if they combined the drama with eating, drinking and smoking, 4968 et seq.

Injury to the music-halls themselves, as well as to the theatres, if the former were to give dramatic performances, 4975–4983. 4987–5001. 5021–5026——Degradation of the drama if acted in the presence of eating, drinking and smoking, 4980–4983. 5002——Undue advantage over the theatres, if music-halls could produce dramas in addition to their profits on drink, 4993-5000. 5040——Non-objection to the music-halls having ballets and pantomime sketches, 5004–5009. 5022. 5027–5029. 5032. 5038——Objection to farces or burlesques at music-halls, or to a permission to employ as many as four actors, 5010–5017. 5028–5031.

Belief as to indecent songs being sung at some music-halls, 5011, 3012. 5023. 5035–5037——Dissent from the opinion of Mr. Boucicault as to the music-halls having led to increased audiences at the theatres, 5033, 5034——Opinion as to its being feasible to define the time up to which music-halls might go in the way of performances, 5038. 5041, 5042——Decided objection to the music-halls giving operas in full, 5039.

Legal Proceedings. General attack on the part of the theatres against the music-halls in 1860; further combination against them after the lapse of a few years, Stanley 2738–2752——Reference to the proceedings against Canterbury Hall in respect of "Hodge Podge"; subsequent suggestion by Mr. Norton to apply to the Lord Chamberlain to license this piece, ib. 2752–2762——Performance at present of a ballet at Canterbury Hall, for which, in witness's opinion, a penalty might be inflicted; the managers of the theatres have not, however, taken any legal proceedings lately, ib. 2763–2771——Exclusion of complaint by the theatres, if the music-halls were legally empowered to employ six actors, and kept within this limitation, ib. 2836–2842.

Suggestion that the Lord Chamberlain should have funds at his disposal for the prosecution of those who infringe the laws, Webster 3223, 3224——Constant litigation by attempting to define any line between music-halls and theatres, Boucicault 4433, 4434——Explanations as to the prosecutions against the music-halls having been undertaken in witness's name, Wigan 4631, 4632——Proceedings taken against Mr. Strange adverted to, as not having been followed up since the decision of the judges in October last, Hollingshead 5269–5272.

Particulars relative to the music or concert halls in Liverpool, five in number, the character of the entertainments, amount of accommodation, &c. in each; absence of any eating, drinking, or smoking amongst the audiences, Greig 6944, 6945. 6974–6981. 6992, 6993. 7085, 7086. 7098–7100. 7159–7167——The Liverpool magistrates license St. James's Hall which is used by the Christy Minstrels, ib. 6944, 6945. 6947, 6948——Unobjectionable manner in which the Rotunda is conducted; character of the entertainments given, ib. 6988–6991. 7104–7111. 7169–7173.

Examination upon the question of the Philharmonic Court Hall having only an occasional license from the magistrates for the sale of wine and spirits, Greig 7053–7087——Very good conduct of the St. James's Hall, ib. 7098–7100. 7159–7161——Large accommodation in the Coliseum, the place being well conducted, ib. 7193–7198.

3. Public Houses:

Total of 33 public houses which have singing and dancing, Greig 6982, 6983——Opinion as to the mischievous effects arising from the combination of music and dancing with spirit licenses in the Liverpool public-houses; examination herein as to the comparatively few informations against these places, ib. 6984–7017. 7029–7038. 7112–7143. 7174–7183——Check by the theatres on the representation of stage plays in the public-houses, ib. 6987–6991——Opinion that it would be better if public-houses giving music and singing had to obtain licenses for the latter from the magistrates, ib. 6995–7010. 7029–7038.

3. Public Houses—continued.

Information relative to the course pursued by the Liverpool magistrates in dealing with applications from public houses for licenses; different views of the bench in different years as to the expediency of granting licenses freely, Greig 7031–7033. 7088–7097—— Limitation of the performance at the public-houses to music and dancing, including character dancing, ib. 7101, 7102. 7112–7116——Objectionable conduct of many of these public-houses further adverted to, ib. 7117–7143. 7177–7181——Nature of the check as to the means of egress provided in the public-houses where there is music and dancing, ib. 7184, 7185.

4. Literary Institutions:

There are no theatrical performances ever given in the literary or scientific institutions, Greig 7186–7192.

Local Acts. Necessity of local acts, in order to give music and dancing licenses in provincial towns, Jackson 7229–7234.

"Lola Montes." Statement relative to the suspension by the Lord Chamberlain of a piece called "Lola Montes," written by witness in 1848, and passed in the first instance by the censor, Coyne 5822–5831. 5941–5948.

Lord Chamberlain's Department (Licensing System):

1. Powers and Practice of the Lord Chamberlain in the Licensing of Theatres.
2. Question of Licensing a New Theatre contemplated by Mr. Boucicault.
3. Evidence in Approval, generally, of the present System.
4. Exception taken to the Lord Chamberlain as the Licensing Officer.
5. Question of an Appeal to the Home Secretary.
6. Suggestions for largely extending the Jurisdiction of the Lord Chamberlain, and for the Licensing by him of both Music Halls and Theatres.
7. Increase of Staff to be required if the Jurisdiction be extended.
8. Conclusions and Recommendations of the Committee.

1. Powers and Practice of the Lord Chamberlain in the Licensing of Theatres:

Sole power of the Lord Chamberlain in regard to the licensing of theatres within the metropolitan boroughs, Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby 29–33——Refusal almost invariably of applications, there being, in fact, no applications from new places as bonâ fide theatres, ib. 256, 257.

Requirement of the Lord Chamberlain, merely, that the building is adapted to theatrical purposes, without at all desiring that there should be any monopoly of licensed theatres, Donne 2147–2158. 2175–2220——Practice of considering the feeling in the neighbourhood before licensing a new theatre in any locality, ib. 2199–2208——Business of those applying for a license for a new theatre to show that the neighbourhood is not averse, ib. 2309–2311——Propriety of some consultation of the neighbourhood before the erection of a new theatre is sanctioned, ib. 2519–2521.

Willingness always evinced by witness to license new theatres if the locality and site were satisfactory, and if the plans showed that the public safety was properly provided for, Viscount Sydney 7574–7579. 7665–7671——Expediency of some consideration being given to any local objections to the erection of new theatres, ib. 7759, 7760.

Explanatory statement as to the course pursued, generally, by the Lord Chamberlain's department in the licensing of theatres, App. 279–283.

List of the various entertainments licensed by the Lord Chamberlain from 1628 to 1866, App. 286, 287.

Provisions of the Act 6 & 7 Vict., in regard to the grant of licenses by the Lord Chamberlain, and the justices respectively, App. 288–291.

2. Question of Licensing a New Theatre contemplated by Mr. Boucicault:

Circumstances connected with an application, by Mr. Boucicault, for a license to a theatre which he contemplated building in the Haymarket; the plans not being before the Lord Chamberlain, the license could not absolutely be granted, Donne 2196–2211.

Statement as to witness having been told he might experience some difficulty in obtaining a license for a new theatre, Boucicault 4149, 4150——Explanation that witness was not deterred by any intimation from the Lord Chamberlain's Office from proceeding with a new theatre in the Haymarket, ib. 4402–4409——Objection raised on the part of the Office of Woods and Forests, as ground-landlords of the site whereon the new theatre was to be built, ib. 4406–4408.

Inaccuracy of any statement that it was through any difficulties raised in witness's department, that Mr. Boucicault was prevented from building a new theatre, Viscount Sydney 7578. 7758. 7783–7787.

3. Evidence in Approval, generally, of the present System:

Approval, generally, of the system of licensing, as a salutary check upon places of amusement, Donne 2335-2339——Very salutary operation of the present system of licensing theatres, Webster 2893——Entire satisfaction expressed with the present system of theatrical licensing, ib. 3130-3132. 3301, 3302——Very fair way in which the licensing powers of the Lord Chamberlain are exercised, Buckstone 3561-3563. 3570-3572——Approval, generally, of the present system of theatrical licenses, Smith 3601——Witness is, on the whole, satisfied with the present system, and does not ask for legislative interference, Knowles 6327-6332.

4. Exception taken to the Lord Chamberlain as the Licensing Officer:

Special officer required for the licensing of theatres, in lieu of a changeable official, Boucicault 4079——Different views of different Lord Chamberlains, as to the propriety of licensing more theatres, ib. 4148.

5. Question of an Appeal to the Home Secretary:

Contemplated control of the Secretary of State over the proposed licensing officer, Sir T. Henry 787. 797. 826. 891-893——Suggested appeal from the Lord Chamberlain to the Home Secretary, in the matter of licenses to theatres, &c., Hon. G. C. Norton, 1292-1295——Opinion as to the satisfactory character of the appeal from witness to the Lord Chamberlain, Donne 2340-2349.

6. Suggestions for largely extending the Jurisdiction of the Lord Chamberlain, and for the Licensing by him of both Music Halls and Theatres:

Very objectionable result of the conflicting jurisdiction between the Lord Chamberlain and the magistrates, as to the licensing of theatres and music halls, Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby 234-238——Advantage if there were one responsible officer to license for the whole metropolis, ib. 238. 259. 263. 334. 380——Approval of all semi-theatrical and scenic entertainments being under license from the Lord Chamberlain, Pownall 418-421. 424-442. 464-468. 490-493. 724-726——Contemplated licensing by the Lord Chamberlain, exclusively, of all theatrical entertainments in their widest sense, ib. 450.

Suggestion that there should be one officer for the licensing of music-halls and theatres in the metropolis, who should be aided by a proper staff so as to secure a more complete supervision, Sir T. Henry 787. 789. 798——Advantage of the uniformity to be obtained by the action of a single licensing officer for theatres and music-halls, Sir T. Henry 787; Hon. G. C. Norton 1348——Necessity of the proposed officer being a person of considerable ability and position on account of the enlarged and magisterial powers to be vested in him, Sir T. Henry 797-803. 825-828. 889-893——Discretion to be exercised by the licensing officer as to the number and class of places to be licensed, some restriction being desirable, ib. 820-828.

Concurrence in the opinion that there should be only one authority for licensing music-halls and theatres, Sir R. Mayne 1158-1165. 1171-1175——Advantage if the music-halls as well as the theatres were under license from the Lord Chamberlain, aided by a proper inspecting staff, Hon. G. C. Norton 1251 et seq. 1345-1348——Extensive district over which it is proposed to give jurisdiction to the Lord Chamberlain, that is, if aided by a suitable staff, ib. 1276-1282. 1290, 1291. 1345-1347.

Recommendation that all theatrical representations be under the license and control of the Lord Chamberlain, who might in his discretion license such places as the Alhambra, and class them as theatres, Bodkin 1845 et seq.——Approval of the jurisdiction of the Lord Chamberlain being extended to the whole metropolitan district, ib. 1927-1931.

Denial that there would be any partiality in the Lord Chamberlain's Department in favour of theatres if the music-halls were placed under the department, Donne 2527, 2528——Improvement if the licenses in town and country were all under one officer, and were given as a matter of course if the buildings were proved to be safe, Wigan 4920-4929.

Advantage of placing country theatres under the license of the Lord Chamberlain, Turner 5189-5198; Simpson 5388 et seq.; Reade 6857-6860——Contemplated creation of an independent officer for licensing and controlling both theatres and music-halls, Coyne 5954-5969——Reason for preferring the Lord Chamberlain to the magistrates as the licensing authority, Reade 6857, 6858.

Witness has for some time been strongly of opinion that the theatres and music-halls should all be under one jurisdiction, Viscount Sydney 7556. 7568——The Lord Chamberlain's department could undertake the licensing of music-halls in the metropolis, and would probably be a more fit department for the purpose than the Home Office, ib. 7556. 7568-7571.

7. Increase of Staff to be required if the Jurisdiction be extended:

Additional staff required in the Lord Chamberlain's office if he were to carry out an extended system of licensing, including the music-halls, Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby 263–268——Non-objection to an enlargement of the Lord Chamberlain's office as the means of securing an efficient licensing system, Sir T. Henry 960–962——Necessary increase of staff and of expense if the music-halls were under the Lord Chamberlain, and if the buildings had to be inspected, Donne 2352–2358. 2529–2533.

An additional staff would be necessary, the expense of which might be met by the fees for the licenses, Viscount Sydney 7556. 7561–7568. 7746–7553——Difficulty at present in stating the staff to be required in witness's office if entrusted with the licensing and supervision of music-halls, ib. 7636–7638. 7746–7753. 7761——Necessity of obtaining the Queen's consent to any increase of witness's department, as the staff is paid for out of the Civil List, ib. 7673, 7674. 7746–7753.

8. Conclusions and Recommendations of the Committee:

Opinion of the Committee as to the present system of double jurisdiction, that is, of the Lord Chamberlain and of the magistrates, being inconvenient and unsatisfactory, Rep. iii——Recommendation that the power of licensing hitherto vested in the magistrates by Act 25 Geo. 2, c. 36, s. 2 & 3, be transferred to the same authority, which may be empowered to grant licenses to theatres, so that the entire regulation of theatres, music-halls, and other places of public entertainment, be placed under one authority, ib.

Further resolution of the Committee that the power of licensing music-halls, theatres, &c., could not be efficiently exercised by a subordinate authority, and that it is therefore desirable that it should be placed in the hands of an officer of high position and dignity, Rep. iii——Also that it is desirable that the department of the Lord Chamberlain be so organised as to be able to deal with all such places of public entertainment within the metropolis, ib.——Also that the control which the Lord Chamberlain now exercises over the performances in theatres should be extended to other places of entertainment for which licenses may be required, ib.

Recommendation that subject to certain conditions as to site and public safety licenses be granted to new theatres irrespectively of competition, Rep. iii——Also that the decisions of the Lord Chamberlain should be subject to an appeal to the Home Secretary, as far as the original granting of licenses is concerned, ib. iv——Also that the grant of licenses to new theatres in the country should, in the first instance, rest with the Lord Chamberlain, ib.

Lyceum Theatre. Great increase in the rent of the theatre since 1844, Hollingshead 5217.

M.

Magistrates' Licenses:

Separation of the jurisdiction of the Lord Chamberlain from that of the magistrates by the refusal of the former to grant licenses to the music halls, whilst the latter can only license them for music and dancing, Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby 240–249——Grant of music and dancing licenses by the magistrates under authority of the Act 25 Geo. 2, ib. 364–366.

Explanation as to the Middlesex magistrates having, since 1851, when granting licenses specified in all cases the particular entertainment which may be given, Pownall 395–414——Great increase in the number of magistrates' licenses, there being in 1865 a total of 291 music licenses and of 60 licenses for dancing and music, ib. 397——Practice since 1851 to omit from the license the words "or any entertainment of the like kind," and to specify merely whether the license is for music or for music and dancing, ib. 397. 401–414. 689–692.

Considerations as to the mode of distinction desirable in order clearly to separate the matters to be licensed by the Lord Chamberlain and by the magistrates respectively, Pownall 418 et seq.; 476–481. 592–594. 619–621. 663–665. 724–726——Advantage of keeping the magistrates' license distinct, and of requiring separate buildings in the event of a license from the Lord Chamberlain for dramatic performances, ib. 434–442——Sundry conditions suggested in connection with the grant of music or dancing licenses by the magistrates, ib. 450.

Circumstances by which the magistrates are guided in granting or withholding music and dancing licenses in any locality; demand for these more in the east end than the west end, Pownall 452-455. 609, 610——Steps taken by witness individually to see that the licenses are not abused, ib. 470, 471. 475——Large increase of music licenses granted since 1845, ib. 522-530——Several instances of the magistrates' license being used as a means of obtaining a theatrical license from the Lord Chamberlain, ib. 584-586.

Instances of private influence being brought to bear on the magistrates in the granting of licenses, Pownall 587-590——Refusal of the Lord Lieutenant of the county to appoint brewers as magistrates, ib. 611, 612——Reasons for not licensing the same house for music and dancing and for theatrical representations, ib. 613-618——Justification of the course pursued by the magistrates in refusing to license more than one music hall or dancing room in the same street or neighbourhood, ib. 732. 736-738——Amendments suggested in the forms required in the granting of licenses, much unnecessary time being now occupied, ib. 746, 747.

Advantage of the local knowledge of the magistrates, and of the checks exercised by them in regard to the buildings sought to be licensed, Bodkin 1846-1855. 1973——Contemplated appeal to the quarter sessions against either the grant or the refusal of a music license, ib. 1846.

Objection to the magistrates as the licensing tribunal for music halls, inasmuch as they are a constantly changing body, and sometimes exercise private influence in the consideration of applications: grounds for this statement, Stanley 2787-2802. 2812-2820——Several objections to the magistrates as the licensing body in the country, Wigan 4920-4924——Very unsatisfactory system at present in regard to the licensing of music halls in the metropolis by the magistrates, Viscount Sydney 7558-7560. 7572, 7573. 7640-7643. 7778.

Power given to justices of the peace, under the Act 28 Geo. 3, to license theatrical representations occasionally, under certain restrictions, App. 287——Provisions in the Act 6 & 7 Vict. as to licensing by the magistrates, ib. 288, 289.

Paper containing particulars on the subject of music and dancing licenses, and the action of the Middlesex magistrates in the matter, App. 300-304.

See also Act 25 Geo. 2, c. 36. Alhambra 1. Country Theatres. Dancing Licenses. Fees for Licenses. Liverpool. Lord Chamberlain's Department. Music Halls. Sheffield. Travelling Theatres.

Maidstone Theatre. Great difficulty experienced by witness in getting a theatre at Maidstone licensed by the magistrates, Simpson 5395-5398.

Managers of Theatres. Willingness of the managers of the theatres to accede to the rules made conditional upon the license, Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby 335-338——Readiness of managers to consent to alterations in the plays, when suggested by the Lord Chamberlain's department, ib. 383-388——Great willingness shown by the managers to follow the Lord Chamberlain's directions and advice in all matters connected with the inspection of theatres, Viscount Sydney 7579, 7580. 7607, 7608; App. 282.

Manchester. Nominal value of witness's patent of the Theatre Royal, Manchester, except as dispensing with a license from the magistrates; the fees on removal of the license are, however, much more expensive than an annual license, Knowles 6128-6133. 6285-6293. 6398-6407——Total of four theatres now in Manchester; these are more than are necessary, ib. 6134-6147. 6195-6204——System of annual licenses granted by the magistrates to the theatres, without any difficulty being experienced, ib. 6155-6170.

Details relative to the music halls in Manchester, and the performances given in them, Knowles 6171-6194. 6205-6216. 6276-6284. 6373-6381——Statement as to the music halls possessing only an excise license; check upon them thereby, ib. 6180-6194. 6281, 6282——Impression as to those places being conducted with propriety, ib. 6183. 6185. 6233. 6327, 6328——Injurious effect of the music halls upon the theatres, ib. 6304-6307——Less value of witness's patent than formerly, when there was a monopoly, ib. 6308-6318——Character of the entertainments at the Belle Vue Gardens, which are like Cremorne, ib. 6390-6395.

Master of the Revels. Impression as to the Lord Chamberlain, as Master of the Revels, having exercised considerable control over the copyrights of plays previously to the Act 10 Geo. 2, Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby 2-7——Severe censorship of the Master of the Revels in the time of Shakspeare, Donne 2451——Practice as to the censorship of the stage under the old office of the Master of the Revels; considerable powers of interference possessed by this office, Reade 6746-6759——Absolute power vested formerly in the Master of the Revels, Tomlins 6942.

Paper relative to the authority of the Master of the Revels over play-makers, plays, and players, in the year 1581, App. 298, 299.

Mayne, Sir Richard. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—As Chief Commissioner of Police sees no objection to the present system of licensing music halls, 966–968——Considers that music halls and dancing rooms are, generally, well conducted, 969——Employment of police at the music halls, upon application from the managers, for the preservation of order, 969——Report by the police in the event of dramatic performances in unlicensed places, witness frequently taking steps for the infliction of penalties on the managers, and on the people attending, 970. 979–996——Practice of the police at music halls, &c., not to interfere with or report upon the performances, unless grossly improper or immoral; approval of this course, 971–978. 1009–1012.

Large discretion exercised by witness as to the class of performance to be interfered with, 988–990. 1024 et seq.——Indirect and limited power of the police in the case of unlicensed places where only music and dancing go on, 991–1008——Check by means of the spirit license upon music and dancing where there is no license for the purpose, there being no such check if the place is only a beer house, 1000–1008——Absence generally of cause for police interference at penny gaffs and low dancing rooms, either as regards the performances or the behaviour of the people, 1009–1018. 1039, 1040. 1072, 1073——Existence of private rooms in connection with beer houses rather than with music halls, 1019–1023. 1069. 1152–1155.

Frequent difficulty of witness in deciding whether performances in music halls are of a theatrical character and call for his interference, 1024–1031——Refusal of witness to interfere with the performance of ballets in music halls, 1031–1039——Approval generally of the operation of music halls and dancing rooms, so long as the people conduct themselves properly, as is usually the case, 1039–1044. 1072–1091——Explanation as to places of entertainment being sometimes allowed to be kept open after one o'clock in the morning, 1041–1044. 1186——Considerable difficulty under the law as to police interference in the event of any indecent stage exhibitions, 1045–1054.

Discontinuance, through the action of the police, of dangerous performances at the Alhambra and Cremorne, 1054——Powers and practice of the police under the Act 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47, in regard to assemblages of disorderly characters or of women of the town; penalties in such cases, 1056–1068. 1194, 1195——Larger proportion of women of the town at music halls than at theatres, 1070–1072——Decorous behaviour of women of the town at music halls and dancing rooms, so that witness, as a police functionary, sees no cause for interference with such places, but, on the contrary, approves of them, 1072–1080. 1127.

Opinion in favour of licenses for dramatic performances being granted to music halls, 1079–1084. 1161–1175——Unobjectionable character of performances which used to take place at the Eagle Tavern, City-road, 1085–1091——Employment of policemen in theatres as well as in music halls, their power to interfere in preserving order being, however, very restricted, 1092–1100——Probable report by the police to witness if any music hall were conducted in a specially objectionable manner, 1101–1108. 1115–1121. 1187–1193——Belief that women of the town are not admitted free to the music halls, 1122.

Explanation that it is no part of the duties of the police to inquire into the construction of music halls, &c., and the provision made for the public safety, 1109–1114——Very low class of people frequenting the music halls in the east end, their behaviour, however, being exceedingly good, 1123–1125——Further statement as to the restricted power of the police in regard to the prevention of indecencies; report to witness and to the magistrates in the event of any gross violation of decency, 1126. 1179–1193. 1201–1212.

Beneficial result of the greater power of the police in Paris than in London, 1128——Very few complaints which come before witness as to the conduct of the music halls, 1129, 1130. 1176–1178——Explanation that the police at music halls are not paid directly by, and are not under the influence of, the managers, 1131–1134——Expediency of all places for public entertainment being licensed, and being under the police, 1135–1138. 1196–1200——Further disapproval of police control being exercised over the performances, save in special cases of abuse, 1139, 1140. 1148–1151. 1201–1203.

Considerations as to the entertainment at music halls involving drinking and refreshments; circumstance of the theatres also being licensed to sell drink, 1141–1147. 1156, 1157. 1166–1170——Belief that in very exceptional instances only are private rooms attached to music halls, 1152–1155. 1213–1217——Opinion that there should be only one authority for licensing music halls and theatres, 1158–1165. 1171–1175——Expediency of a similar supervision and control over the performances in music halls, as in theatres, 1175. 1179–1184——Approval of different licenses for different entertainments, according to the nature of the building, &c., 1199–1201.

Metropolitan Music Hall. Class of entertainment now given at the Metropolitan Music Hall, Edgware-road; advantage if it were permitted to produce operettas, burlesques, &c., Poole 5728–5774. 5795–5798——Dissent of Mr. Meacock, the proprietor of the hall, from the proposition submitted to the Committee by Mr. Stanley, ib. 5740–5748——Large ——Large capital represented by this music hall, Poole 5759, 5760——Prices of admission and average expenditure by each visitor upon refreshments, 5761–5769. 5792–5794——Great improvement in the class of music now given at the hall, ib. 5799–5807.

Metropolitan Police Act. Restrictions under the Metropolitan Police Act as to theatrical licenses within twenty miles round London, Simpson 5455, 5456. 5515, 5516. 5525–5529. 5332.

Middlesex Magistrates. See Magistrates' Licenses.

Minor Theatres. Complaints on the part of the minor theatres which led to the passing of the Act 6 & 7 Vict., Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby 15–27——Refusal of licenses to plays in the case chiefly of the minor theatres, ib. 193——Anomalous position of the smaller theatres until the passing of the Act 6 & 7 Vict., Bodkin 1782–1791.

Monologue. Statement on the question of monologue not requiring a license from the Lord Chamberlain; explanation as to Mr. David Fisher having had a license for a monologue, Donne 2418–2437.

9. Conclusions of the Committee.

1. Objections to Dramatic Representations in Music Halls:

Broad distinction between music halls and theatres; opinion that the sale of drinks and refreshments is the chief object of the former, whilst the exhibition of the drama is the chief object of the latter, Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby 52–78. 99, 100——Approval of music halls if kept under proper restrictions, though, as regards the question of their being licensed by the Lord Chamberlain, witness is in favour of maintaining the distinction drawn between places for drinking and places for the drama, ib. 113–126.

Concurrence of objections on the score of the incompatibility of the drama with eating, drinking, and smoking, Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby 183; Webster 2902 et seq.; Buckstone 3364 et seq.; Smith 3602 et seq.; Wigan 4594–4599. 4658–4660; Taylor 4780–4793. 4835–4853. 4879–4889; Lee 4980–4983. 5002; Turner 5083–5092. 5129–5137; Coyne 5913 et seq.; Francis 6076–6086; Knowles 6177 et seq.; Kean 6641–6658.

Approval of the restriction upon music halls as to the non-performance of Shakspeare, &c., there being already more fitting places for such performances, Pownall 553–581——Infringement of the privileges of the theatres if the music halls were licensed for operas and for ordinary dramatic representations, Sir T. Henry 844–849——Departure from the original object of music halls, if licensed for theatrical performances, Bodkin 1896–1901. 1953–1955——Examination to the effect that witness is desirous to see an improved class of entertainments for the people, though he objects to music halls being empowered to give dramatic and operatic representations, ib. 1960 et seq.

Opinion that music halls should be restricted to that class of entertainments for which they were built, just in the same way that theatres are the proper places for dramatic performances, Donne 2142 et seq.——Witness is strongly opposed to the music halls being allowed to give theatrical performances, on the ground mainly that the drama would be vulgarised and degraded thereby, Webster 2902 et seq.; Buckstone 3364 et seq.; Wigan 4594–4599——Non-objection to music halls so long as they keep to their legitimate business, and leave theatrical representations to the theatres, Webster 3197–3202.

Approval of music halls having theatrical representations if they conform to the same regulations as theatres, but not otherwise, Wigan 4652 et seq.——Non-objection to music halls giving theatrical performances if they come under the same restrictions as theatres; disapproval otherwise, Turner 5092. 5139–5145. 5172–5177——Belief that music halls in the provinces are not permitted to give dramatic entertainments any more than the London music halls, ib. 5199–5209.

2. Proposition by Mr. Stanley for permission to employ Five or Six Performers:

Witness considers that music halls should still be subject to license, but that they should be enabled to produce light pieces, employing five or six actors on the stage, Stanley 2563–2566. 2613–2616. 2639 et seq.—— Enumeration of the music halls represented by witness in making the foregoing proposition, ib. 2625–2627.

2. Proposition by Mr. Stanley for permission, &c.—continued.

Desire of the music hall proprietors merely to employ six, or even four performers, without wishing for a license to produce heavy pieces suitable only to the regular theatres: grounds for advocating this limited permission rather than a system of free trade in acting, Stanley 2639 et seq.——Circumstances under which the music hall managers came to the resolution in favour of being allowed to produce any entertainment where not more than five or six persons are engaged, ib. 2655–2659. 2668–2673——Adoption of the foregoing resolution as comprising all the music halls really wanted, and not as a compromise with the theatrical managers, ib. 2668–2673. 2701–2720.

Recent interview of witness with the music hall proprietors, when he was authorised to submit to the Committee the proposed limit of five or six persons, and other points, Stanley 2709–2720——Limitation of the number of performers adverted to as the only definition which the music hall proprietors could arrive at in regard to the prices proper for music halls, ib. 2772–2775. 2833–2851.

Further statement as to the music hall proprietors preferring to be without open competition, and wanting merely to have six actors on the stage at once, Stanley 2833 et seq.

Paper submitted to the Committee by Mr. Stanley, on behalf of music hall proprietors, containing sundry suggestions for an amendment of the present law as to licenses, &c., App. 306–312——Suggestions for a partial removal of the present restriction on the performance of stage plays, ib. 310. 312.

3. Suggestions as to the Class of Pieces to be Permitted, and likely to be Produced:

Approval of the music halls being empowered to produce light pieces, such as vaudevilles and burlettas, in addition to the ballet, Sir T. Henry 836–854. 902——Opinion in favour of licenses for dramatic performances being granted to music halls, Sir R. Mayne 1079–1084. 1161–1175——Distinction still desirable to be maintained between the performances at music halls and the legitimate drama, as at theatres; approval, however, of the former being allowed to enact vaudevilles, &c., Hon. G. C. Norton 1253–1275. 1287–1290. 1306–1314.

Advantage if the music halls had power to perform what is termed dress opera, and anything in the way of farce or pantomime, Strange 1434–1450——Unfitness of Shakspeare for the music halls, ib. 1434. 1481–1484——Short performances required in music halls, a play of Shakspeare being quite unsuitable, ib. 1648–1652. 1732–1741.

Contemplated performance of burlesques, ballets, and small operas in the music halls, Boucicault 4280. 4291–4293——Non-objections to music halls having ballets and pantomimic sketches, Lee 5004–5009. 5022. 5027–5029. 5032. 5038——Objection to farces or burlesques at music halls, or to a permission to employ as many as four actors, ib. 5010–5017. 5028–5031.

Approval of dramatic performances being permitted in music halls, literary institutes, &c., if the buildings are suitable, Hollingshead 5222, 5223. 5238——Probability of music halls performing light pieces, such as farces, vaudevilles, comic operas, &c., if licensed by the Lord Chamberlain, whilst the theatres would provide the more legitimate drama and the more intellectual form of entertainment, ib. 5273–5287. 5312–5317. 5362–5368.

Heavy pieces or tragedy would not answer at the music halls, Poole 5772–5774——Expediency of introducing operattas and improved musical entertainments at the music halls, rather than farces or theatrical representations, even though empowered by law to give the latter also, ib. 5799–5812——Approval of singing and dancing in music halls, just as in France, Knowles 6382.

Approval in any case of the Dramatic Licensing Act being altered, and of the London music halls being empowered to produce ballets and pantomimes, Reade 6760–6766. 6766. 6774——Admission that on the principle of free trade, it may be only right to permit music halls to perform what they please, ib. 6767–6774. 6853–6856. 6864, 6865——Opinion that the music halls would still confine themselves chiefly to music, and would not cause any degradation of the drama if empowered to enact plays, ib. 6866.

Expediency of the music halls being empowered to produce theatrical pieces and light operas; grounds for concluding that they would be sure to go on in an intellectual direction, Tomlins 6873–6885. 6926–6941——Great improbability of the music halls attempting anything but music and dancing, and light pieces, ib. 6925–6930——Necessity of a variety of pieces, including ballets, good operatic selections and pantomimic sketches, in order to please the audiences at music halls; any long or heavy pieces are not suitable, Saunders 7440–7446. 7456–7458. 7463——Insufficiency of a permission to employ four or even six performers on the stage at the same time, ib. 7472–7494.

Question considered as to the expediency of licensing the music halls for theatrical performances; approval of a permission to perform light pieces, if a clear definition can legally be drawn up on the subject, Viscount Sydney 7583, 7584. 7695–7707. 7789–7794.

Difficulty

4. Question of defining by Act the Performances to be allowed:

Difficulty in drawing a clear line of distinction between the performances to be allowed at music halls and at theatres, Sir T. Henry 849. 900, 901——Obstacle to defining by Act the performances proper for music halls and theatres respectively, so that it should be left to the Lord Chamberlain, who should be guided chiefly by the building, and what it was adapted for, Hon. G. C. Norton 1253. 1256-1295. 1314-1320——Difficulty of drawing the line where music ends and dramatic representation begins, Bodkin 1919. 1932-1937——Conclusion as to the impossibility of defining the pieces to which music halls might be restricted; definition of a vaudeville adverted to hereon, Boucicault 4217-4236.

Opinion as to its being feasible to define the line up to which music halls might go in the way of performances, Lee 5038. 5041, 5042——Impracticability of a fixed limit as to the number of performers to be allowed in music halls, Hollingshead, 5319-5322——Expediency of its being clearly laid down what the music halls may do, Coyne 5949-5953——Further privileges required by the music halls as to the class of entertainments provided; difficulty of any legal definition or line of demarcation so that the better plan would be to let them perform what they please, Saunders 7440 et seq. 7534-7537.

5. Disapproval of Permission to produce Light Pieces, or to employ Five or Six Performers:

Opinion that music halls should be restricted to music, and that ballets or dramatic representations of any kind should not take place under a magistrate's license, Bodkin 1809 et seq., 1902 et seq.——Removal of distinction between music halls and theatre, if five or six persons were allowed to perform small pieces in the former, Donne 2537——Objection to the music halls being allowed to enact select portions of dramas, or small pieces requiring only a few performers, Webster 3271-3275. 3278-3280. 3318-3322——Expediency of prohibiting small pieces as well as all costume, scenery, and ballet, at the music halls, and of restricting them to musical entertainments, Buckstone 3546-3550. 3575-3580.

Objection to any attempted definition of light pieces to be allowed at music halls, or to a permission to employ a limited number of performers, Smith 3884-3886. 3943-3946. 3958-3961——Objection to any scenery or costume at music halls, but not to songs in character, ib. 3962-3967——Disapproval of any dramatic performance in a a music hall, even though the number of performers were limited to three or four, Turner 5151-5162——Objection to light theatrical pieces at music halls, Coyne 5855, 5856. 5862-5870. 5949-5951——Disapproval of the music halls being permitted to perform light pieces, though they might be allowed to perform ballet and pantomime, Kean 6646-6659. 6717, 6718.

6. Generally as to the Licensing and Supervision of Music Halls:

Absence of connection between the Lord Chamberlain's Office and the music halls, Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby 42-45——Guidance of the Lord Chamberlain by the recommendations of the Select Committees of 1832, and of 1853 and 1854, as regards the distinction drawn between theatres and music halls, ib. 89-92——Expediency of some restriction in the magistrates or Lord Chamberlain as to the performances at music halls, if placed on the same footing as theatres, ib. 175——Great difficulty anticipated in the exercise of a proper supervision over the performances in, and the conduct of, all the music halls in the metropolis if licensed like the theatres, ib. 225, 226.

Details in connection with the present system of magistrates' licenses for music halls, the precautions taken, and the amendments required, Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby 234-249. 364-366; Pownall 395 et seq.; Stanley 2787-2802. 2812-2820; Viscount Sydney 7558-7560. 7640-7643; App. 300-304.

Concurrence of opinion in favour of the music halls in the metropolis being licensed by the Lord Chamberlain, or the same authority intrusted with the licensing of theatres, Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby 238. 259. 263. 334. 380; Sir T. Henry 787-789. 797-803; Sir R. Mayne 1158-1165. 1171-1175; Hon G. C. Norton 1251 et seq.; Bodkin 1845 et seq.; Donne 2527, 2528; Reade 6857, 6858; Viscount Sydney 7556. 7568-7571.

Several considerations by which the Lord Chamberlain would probably be guided upon the question of a license to a new music hall, if the matter rested with him, Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby 269-280——Absence of power in the justices to license a music hall for stage plays, ib. 361-363——Constant objection by the inhabitants to the licensing of music halls, Pownall 739.

Want of an efficient supervision of the performances at music halls, more especially as these places are increasing in number, Sir T. Henry 898, 899——Importance of an altered form of construction of music halls if licensed for the performance of light pieces, ib. 950, 951——Expediency of a licensing system, as a means of securing an efficient control over the pieces or plays at music halls, Hon. G. C. Norton 1333-1344.

6. Generally as to the Licensing and Supervision of Music Halls—continued.

Origin of music halls through the practice of obtaining music and dancing licenses in connection with public-houses, Bodkin 1792——Witness contends that the best plan is to leave the licensing of the music halls to the discretion of the magistrates, and to confine them entirely to music, ib. 1809 et seq., 1902 et seq.——Importance of the Lord Chamberlain exercising through his staff a proper supervision over the performances at music halls if classed and licensed as theatres, ib. 2023–2028.

Witness delivers in a paper explanatory of his views on the question of theatrical licenses, and the amendments required in the existing law with reference to music halls, Stanley 2561, 2562; App. 306–312——Explanatory statement with reference to a Bill prepared by witness in 1861 (App. 312), the principle of which was approved by Sir Cornewall Lewis, for amending the acts relating to places of amusement, Stanley 2721–2736——Opinion that there should be distinct authorities for licensing theatres and music halls, ib. 2606–2612.

Approval of the music halls being licensed for dramatic representations, but only upon condition that there is a strict supervision of the performances in the interests of public education and morality; great importance attached to such condition, Green 5593 et seq.

7. Conduct of the Music Halls; their Effect upon the Theatres:

Very good class of music at the Oxford and at Canterbury Hall; doubt as to its being equally select at the Alhambra, Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby 206—219——Result of witness's experience that very few cases are brought before him from the music and dancing halls, and that these places are well conducted, and are, on the whole, doing good, Sir T. Henry 774–780. 894–897. 915, 916. 929–931. 940–944——The music halls and dancing rooms are, generally, well conducted, Sir R. Mayne 969——Approval generally of the operation of music halls and dancing rooms, so long as people conduct themselves properly, as is usually the case, ib. 1039–1044. 1072–1091——Very few complaints which come before witness as to the conduct of the music halls, ib. 1129, 1130. 1176–1178.

Good results anticipated from the music halls if obliged to close at eleven o'clock and placed under other desirable regulations, Hon. G. C. Norton 1231. 1245——Practice at all the music halls to charge for admission, irrespectively of refreshments, Stanley 2779–2781.——Necessity of the admission money in addition to the profit from refreshments in order to make the places pay, ib. 2782–2786.

Injurious effect of the music-halls upon the half price at the theatres, Webster 3129, Buckstone 3408. 3409. 3543–3547——Beneficial effect of the music halls upon the theatres, to which they act as stepping-stones by encouraging a taste for intellectual amusement, Boucicault 4237, 4238. 4244–4248——Benefit to the theatres by the taste of the people being raised if the music halls could improve their entertainments; great gain already of the theatres from this source, ib. 4278, 4279. 4342–4346——Conclusion as to the music not being the chief attraction to the public who frequent music halls, Wigan 4666–4674. 4740–4748.

Dissent from the opinion of Mr. Boucicault as to the music halls having led to increased audiences at the theatres, Lee 5033. 5034——Very objectionable character of the singing rooms or music halls in country places, as in Staffordshire and Shropshire, Simpson 5388–5391. 5520–5530——Conclusion as to the very beneficial effect of the music-halls, and as to the constant improvement in the class and tone of the performances at them, Tomlins 6873. 6887–6891. 6936–6941.

8. Cost and Accommodation:

Statement of the cost of buildings and fittings of each music hall and concert hall in the metropolis. App. 313——Number of persons accommodated in each of the music halls, ib.

9. Conclusions of the Committee:

Resolutions of the Committee in favour of the music-halls in London being placed under license from the Lord Chamberlain instead of from the magistrates, there being thus but one licensing body for the metropolis, Rep. iii. iv.

Recommendation that apart from the question whether an identical form of license should or should not be given to theatres and music halls, it is not desirable to continue the existing restrictions which prevent music halls from giving theatrical entertainments, Rep. iii.

Different forms of licenses suggested accordingly as refreshments are or are not consumed in the auditorium of any place of public entertainment, Rep. iii.

Recommendation that the proprietors of music-halls, and other similar places of entertainment in the country, should be required to apply to the magistrates for a license under Norton, The Hon. George Chapple. (Analysis of his Evidence.)——Magistrate at Lambeth police court, 1218——Testifies to the interesting and unobjectionable character of the performances at Canterbury Hall, to the excellence of the management, and the good behaviour of the people who attend, 1219 et seq.——Good results anticipated from the music halls if obliged to close at eleven o'clock and placed under other desirable regulations, 1231. 1245——Suggestion that admission and refreshment be charged for separately, 1238-1243——Advantage if the music halls as well as the theatres were under license from the Lord Chamberlain, aided by a proper inspecting staff, 1251 et seq. 1345-1348.

Distinction still desirable to be maintained between the performances at music-halls and the legitimate drama as at theatres: approval, however, of the former being allowed to enact vaudevilles, &c., 1253-1275. 1287-1290. 1306-1314——Difficulty of defining by Act the performances proper for music halls and theatres respectively, so that it should be left to the Lord Chamberlain, who should be guided chiefly by the building and what it was adapted for, 1253. 1256-1265. 1314-1320——Suggestions as to the distinction desirable in regard to the refreshments allowed in theatres and in music halls, 1253-1255. 1300-1332.

Contemplated power in the Lord Chamberlain to stop any play or performance, 1267-1272——Anticipated elevation of the taste of the people by means of the music halls, under proper regulations, 1273-1275. 1287. 1290. 1299, 1299*. 1333-1344——Extensive district over which it is proposed to give jurisdiction to the Lord Chamberlain; that is, if aided by a suitable staff, 1276-1282. 1290, 1291. 1345-1347——Advantage of making the places pay for their licenses, 1290——Suggested appeal from the Lord Chamberlain to the Home Secretary, 1292-1295——Effect of the music halls in lessening drunkenness, as men constantly attend them with their wives and children, 1296-1298——Expediency of a licensing system as a means of securing an efficient control over the pieces or plays at music halls, 1333-1344.

Norwich Theatre. Decision by the magistrates at Norwich, that certain dramatic performances were not stage plays in a legal sense, Simpson 5499-5508——The Norwich theatre is still open and doing well, and there are three or four other theatres under the same management, Poole 5698-5703.

Number of Theatres. Doubt as to the non-increase of theatres in the metropolis being owing to any change of public taste, or to the spread of music halls, Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby 323-330——Non-objection to an increased number of places for dramatic entertainment, so long as the buildings are suitable for the purpose, and refreshments and smoking are prohibited, Smith 3926-3930. 3943.

Opinion that so long as the building is suitable and the public safety satisfactorily provided for, the license should follow as a matter of course, Boucicault 4079–4085. 4149–4150. 4435, 4436——Scope to be given to dramatic authors by increasing or doubling the present number of theatres; illustration in witness's case, ib. 4180–4184. 4195–4197. 4410–4416——Opinion as to the unduly limited number of theatres in the west end of London, ib. 4271——Room in London for double the present number of theatres; question of their succeeding considered, ib. 4370–4373. 4455–4464——Ill success of the drama at Astley's and at the St. James's Theatre adverted to, in connection with the view that there is room for a great increase in the number of metropolitan theatres, ib. 4455–4464.

Opinion as to the sufficiency of the number of theatres in London, though an increased number might probably widen the taste for theatrical performances, Wigan 4578–4582. 4717–4722——Opinion that there are sufficient theatres in London to ensure an adequate competition for good and attractive dramas, Taylor 4768–4779. 4896——Approval of licenses to additional theatres, if the accommodations be suitable, and if the public-house element be not introduced, ib. 4787–4793.

There are sufficient theatres in London already, without giving the music halls the privileges of theatres, Lee 4992——Room for an increased number of theatres, Coyne 5837–5841——Doubt as to the necessity of any increase in the number of theatres, Francis 6018, 6019.

Room for more theatres in London but for the legislative restrictions on the subject, Reade 6727–6730——Circumstance of there having been seventeen theatres in London in the time of Shakespeare, Tomlins 6909–6911——Further statement as to the numerous theatres and the freedom which existed in the days of Shakespeare, ib. 6942.

Paris. Satisfactory working of the system in Paris, where the places of public amusement are all under one officer, Sir T. Henry 789. 798——Advantage under the former practice in Paris of licensing particular theatres for particular descriptions of performances, ib. 829–835——Beneficial result of the greater power of the police in Paris than in London, Sir R. Mayne 1128.

Much less liberty of the theatre in Paris than in London; grounds for this statement, Webster 2930–2934. 3068–3094——Prohibition upon singers at the cafés chantants in Paris appearing in costume, ib. 3074–3076——Practice in regard to drinking at the cafés chantants; it is of a very harmless kind, and there is no eating, ib. 3140–3150——Distinction between cafés chantants, as in Paris, and the London theatres or music halls, ib. 3281–3284.

System of Government supervision of certain theatres in Paris, whereby a school of acting is maintained, Boucicault 4090–4112——Right of the Théâtre Français to compel other theatres to give up actors, if the latter are willing to go to the former, ib. 4106–4112——Circumstance of none of the music halls or cafés chantants in Paris having availed themselves of the privilege of giving dramatic performances; conclusion as to their having such privilege, ib. 4124–4137——The cafés chantants are now permitted to give dramatic entertainments under police regulations, ib. 4250–4259——Statement as to the subsidised theatres in Paris not being able to compete pecuniarily with the others, ib. 4396–4401.

Inaccuracy of certain evidence in regard to cafés-chantants in Paris being empowered to give dramatic performances; nor are they fitly constructed for the purpose, Wigan 4641–4649——Information relative to the system of subsidies in Paris to the Théâtre Français and the Odéon, whereby those places operate as nurseries of art, and are constantly turning out well-qualified actors, ib. 4898–4905.

Means of egress in the case of theatres in Paris, Shaw 6450–6457—— Systematic precautions taken against fire in the theatres in Paris, each theatre being under the control of the chief of the Sapeurs et Pompiers; details hereon as to the functions and constitution of this body, ib. 6504–6523. 6543–6547——Less risk of large fires in Paris than in London, the fire-engines and water supply in Paris being, however, very inadequate, ib. 6548–6551.

Strict supervision and restriction in Paris over the performances in the cafés chantants and salles de danse, Viscount Sydney 7180. 7206——System of censorship in Paris, ib. 7617.

Patent Theatres. Witness took an active part in opening the drama to the minor theatres, but experience has shown him his error, Webster 2926. 2971–2973——Examination as to the patent theatres not having always confined themselves to the representations of the legitimate drama in former years, Kean 6659–6683——Part taken by witness in helping the movement for doing away with the privileges of the patent theatres, Tomlins 6885, 6886——Mixed class of performances in former years at the patent theatres, ib. 6887–6894.——See also Actors. Drama, The. France. Paris.

Penalties (Act 25 Geo. 2). Unduly high penalty (100 l.) for every offence under the Act of Geo. 2, Pownall 632, 633——Effect of the severity of the penalty in preventing informations being laid, ib. 764.

Penny Gaffs. Frequent complaints made of the penny theatres in Shoreditch and Whitechapel, Pownall 600——Expediency of the police exercising supervision of the penny gaffs, and cheap unlicensed entertainments, ib. 666–674——Absence generally of cause for police interference at penny gaffs and low dancing rooms, either as regards the performances or the behaviour of the people, Sir R. Mayne 1009–1018. 1039, 1040. 1072, 1073.

Information relative to the cheap theatres or penny gaffs, in the east of London; the chief evil of these places is the large attendance of young children, Reason 7807—— The police would doubtless report any impropriety or misconduct of which they were cognisant in connection with the dancing rooms or penny gaffs, ib. 7819–7828. 7845. 7859–7862. 7883–7885.

Piracy of French Plays. Witness was driven from writing for the stage partly by the narrowness of the market, but chiefly by the competition of pieces stolen from the French, Reade 6724–6740——Way in which the piracy of French plays operates in excluding English inventions, ib. 6726. 6738–6740——Argument as to the necessity of putting down piracy of French plays, in order that a great national drama may be restored in England, ib. 6775–6785.

Proposition for striking out that clause of the Copyright Act which permits "fair imitation or adaptation" of works from the French; conviction that if this be done, a great drama will arise in this country, Reade 6785 et seq. 6847–6852——Entire absence at present of any protection to Frenchmen or Englishmen against the piracy of their inventions; instance of this, ib. 6787. 6792–6810——Efficiency of the Act of William the Third for the protection of authors from piracy, ib. 6789–6791. 6850–6852——Statement as to the English drama having been always piratical to some extent, Tomlins 6907.

Plans of Theatres. Necessity of plans being sent into the Lord Chamberlain before the buildings of a new theatre are commenced: supervision thus exercised, Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby 291–301; Donne 2105–2116. 2504–2506.——See also Public Safety.

Police Supervision:

Opportunity by means of the police of preserving good order and regulation in the music halls if the whole licensing system were abolished, Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby 225, 226——Exceedingly rare instances of misconduct in the management of the theatres, calling for the interference or report of the police, ib. 315–319.

Importance of an efficient control over music halls by the police, Pownall 418, 419 ——Provision suggested as to the visitation of music and dancing halls by the police, ib. 450——Advantage of a more complete inspection of licensed houses by the police, and of reports by the latter to the licensing magistrates, ib. 463. 469–475. 482–489. 675-982.

Limited supervision now exercised over music halls by the police, who are for the time the servants of the proprietors, being paid by them; objection to this arrangement, Sir T. Henry 781. 878–881. 885–888. 940–946——Means of laying down by Act of Parliament certain police regulations as a check upon the conduct of places of amusements, irrespectively of license from the magistrate, ib. 804–807——The managers might pay an annual sum to the Commissioners of Police, but should not pay the policeman directly, ib. 942–945——Necessity of still employing police for the preservation of order, whilst the duties of the staff under the licensing officer should be confined to a supervision of the performances, ib. 963–965.

As chief Commissioner of Police witness sees no objection to the present system of licensing music halls, Sir R. Mayne 966–968——Employment of police at the music halls upon application from the managers, for the preservation of order, ib. 969——Practice of the police at music halls, &c., not to interfere with, or report upon, the performances, unless grossly improper or immoral: approval of this course, ib. 971–978. 1009–1012 ——Large discretion exercised by witness as to the class of performance to be interfered with, ib. 988–990. 1024 et seq.

Frequent difficulty of witness in deciding whether performances in music halls are of a theatrical character and call for his interference, Sir R. Mayne 1024–1031——Considerable difficulty under the law as to police interference in the event of any indecent stage exhibitions, ib. 1045–1054——Employment of policemen in theatres as well as in music halls, their power to interfere in procuring order being, however, very restricted, ib. 1092–1100——Probable report by the police to witness if any music hall were conducted in a specially objectionable manner, ib. 1101–1108. 1115–1121. 1187–1193.

Explanation that it is no part of the duties of the police to enquire into the construction of music halls, &c., and the provision made for the public safety, Sir R. Mayne 1109–1114——Further statement as to the restricted power of the police in regard to the prevention of indecencies; report to witness and to the magistrates in the event of any gross violation of decency, ib. 1126. 1179–1193. 1201–1212——Explanation that the police at music halls are not paid directly by, and are not under the influence of the managers, ib. 1131–1134——Further disapproval of police control being exercised over the performances, save in special cases of abuse, ib. 1139. 1140. 1148–1151. 1201–1203.

Indirect and inadequate control through the police, over the songs, &c., at music halls, Bodkin 2037, 2038.

Inference from the excellent order at the Oxford and Canterbury Hall that police supervision is not necessary in music halls, Stanley 2823–2832——Further objections by Mr. Stanley to any further police supervision of music halls, App. 311.

Ponsonby, The Honourable Spencer Cecil Brabazon (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Delivers in a "Memorandum on Theatres," drawn up at the Lord Chamberlain's Office; 1. Impression as to the Lord Chamberlain or Master of the Revels having exercised considerable control over the copyrights of plays previously to the Act 10 Geo. 2; 2–7——Origin of the Act 10 Geo. 2, on account of passages held to be objectionable in the "Beggar's Opera," and as a check upon the representation of plays of a political character, 5–13—— Regulation of theatres by the Act 10 Geo. 2, from the year 1737 till the passing of the Act 6 & 7 Vict. in 1843; 14.

Constant complaints on the part of the minor theatres, and litigation with the patent theatres, which led to Sir Edward Bulwer's Committee in 1832, to a subsequent Bill in 1833, and to the passing eventually of the Act 6 & 7 Vict in 1843; 15–27——Claim now made by the music halls to the privilege of preparing operas, &c., whilst the theatres oppose such claim under the Act of 1843; 28——Sole power of the Lord Chamberlain in regard to the licensing of theatres within the metropolitan boroughs, 29–33——Discontinuance since last year of the licensing of the Richmond Theatre by the Lord Chamberlain, Richmond being no longer a Royal residence, 34–36.

Very few plays which are refused licenses; total of only nineteen in thirteen years, 37. 171——Salutary effect of the power of withholding a license; check thereby upon the production of objectionable plays, 38–41. 170–174——Absence of connection between the Lord Chamberlain's office and the music halls, 42–45——Doubt as to the number of persons which each of the theatres will hold, 46–51.

Broad distinction between music halls and theatres; opinion that the sale of drinks and refreshments is the chief object of the former, whilst the exhibition of the drama is the chief object of the latter, 52–78. 99, 100——Consideration of the extent to which drink is now sold in theatres under excise license; regulation as to the place of sale being removed from the audience part of the theatre, 54–78——Explanation as to the Lord Chamberlain having refused a license to Mr. Strange for certain performances at the Alhambra, 79–92——Guidance of the Lord Chamberlain by the recommendations of the Select Committees of 1832, and of 1853 and 1854, as regards the distinction drawn between theatres and music halls, 89–92.

Absence generally of any impropriety of conduct on the part of the public who attend music halls, 93–108——Reference to Canterbury Hall as an exceedingly well-conducted place, 96–98. 106——Exceptionable class frequenting the Alhambra; the witness has not observed any great impropriety of behaviour there, 101–106——Large portion of artizans, with their wives, who attend the Cambridge Music Hall, the place being very well conducted, 106–112.

Approval of the music halls if kept under proper restrictions, though as regards the question of their being licensed by the Lord Chamberlain, witness is in favour of maintaining the distinction drawn between places for drinking and places for the drama, 113–126——Suggestion that theatres should apply to the magistrates for their spirit licenses, and that the provisions on this score in the Act of Will. 4 should be repealed, 127, 128. 131–138. 281, 282——Practice of the Lord Chamberlain as to framing rules for the theatres, though the Act 6 & 7 Vict. is very defective on this score, 129, 130. 147.

Statement as to the music halls being under the double check of a music and dancing license and a spirit license, both granted by the magistrates, 139–145——Probability of the Lord Chancellor assuming the necessary power of shutting up a theatre, and revoking the license, though this step has never been requisite, 146–153——Explanation as to the circumstances and the authority under which the Lord Chamberlain has lately granted licenses to the Hanover Square Rooms, &c., for performances before five o'clock, 154–169.

Expediency of some restriction in the magistrates or Lord Chamberlain as to the performances at music halls, if placed on the same footing as theatres, 175——Much larger number of women of the town at the Alhambra and Strand Music Hall than at the theatres, 178–182——Apprehended degradation of the drama as an art, if mixed up with drinking and refreshments, 183——Refusal of license to any play, irrespectively of the question of withdrawing the license from the theatre, 184–188——Investigation of each play by the Examiner of Plays, by whom anything objectionable is reported to witness, who brings it before the Lord Chamberlain, 186–189.

Great difficulty anticipated in the exercise of a proper supervision over the performances in and the conduct of all the music halls in the metropolis, if licensed like the theatres, 190–192. 225, 226——Refusal of licenses to plays in the case chiefly of the minor theatres, 193——Circumstance of an English version of "La Traviata" having been refused a license at Drury Lane; opinion that the same opera in Italian should not have been sanctioned at the Italian Opera, 193, 194. 227–233. 347, 348——Further statement as to the more objectionable character of music halls than of theatres in regard to the presence of women of the town, 195–199. 309–314——Very good ballet performances at the Alhambra, &c., 200.

Practice of smoking in the Irish theatres adverted to; belief as to this being a breach of rule, 201–205——Very good class of music at the Oxford and at the Canterbury Hall; doubt as to its being equally select at the Alhambra, 206–219——Class of performance at the Strand Music Hall adverted to in connection with the insolvency of that establishment, 220–224——Opportunity, by means of the police, of preserving good order and regulation in the music halls, if the whole licensing system were abolished, 225, 226.

Very objectionable result of the conflicting jurisdiction between the Lord Chamberlain and the magistrates as to the licensing of theatres, and music halls, 234–238——Advantage if there were one responsible officer to license for the whole metropolis, 238. 259. 263. 334. 380——Separation of the jurisdiction of the Lord Chamberlain from that of the magistrates by the refusal of the former to grant licenses to the music halls, whilst the latter can only license them for music and dancing, 240–249——Fault of the Act 6 & 7 Vict. that no one is appointed to carry out its provisions, or to prevent the operation of unlicensed places, 250–255.

Refusal almost invariably of applications, there being in fact no applications from new places as bonâ fide theatres, 256, 257. 330——Importance of the question of the construction and safety of the building in guiding the Lord Chamberlain in licensing, 258——Suggested granting of a different class of license according to the different class of entertainment, 260–262——Additional staff required in the Lord Chamberlain's office if he were to carry out an extended system of licensing, including the music halls, 263–268.

Several considerations by which the Lord Chamberlain would probably be guided upon the question of a license to a new music hall, if the matter rested with him, 269–280—— Information as to the former licensing of saloons by the Lord Chamberlain, 285–287—— Want of authority for the sale of spirits in theatres previously to the Excise license, 288–290——Character of the supervision exercised by the Lord Chamberlain over the site and plan of any new theatre, as well as over the subsequent arrangements for the public safety, 291–301——Non-interference of the Lord Chamberlain with any places save those licensed by him; there are no funds for such interference, 302–305.

Practice generally of the Examiner to strike out objectionable passages from plays, his alterations being then adopted by the managers, 306——Check by means of the license, when the renewal is applied for, upon any improper arrangement as to refreshments, 307, 308——Exceedingly rare instances of misconduct in the management of the theatres, calling for the interference or report of the police, 315–319——Doubt as to the non-increase of theatres in the metropolis being owing to any change of public taste, or to the spread of music halls, 323–330——Willingness of the managers to accede to the rules made conditional upon the license, 335–338.

Different class of entertainment and of audience at music halls when first established, as compared with the present time, 339–346——Reference to the prohibition by the Lord Chamberlain of dangerous performances, such as those of Blondin, or the exhibition of wild beasts in theatres, 349–351——Power and practice of the Lord Chamberlain in regard to closing of theatres on Good Friday, and on days of humiliation, &c., 352–357——Illegality of Divine Services and preachings in theatres on Sundays if money were taken at the doors, 358–360.

Absence of power in the justices to license a music hall for stage plays, 361–303—— Defects of the Act 25 Geo. 2, by which the justices are guided in granting licenses for music and dancing, 364–366——Present state of the law that no place which is not really a theatre can give a theatrical representation, 367–369——Illegality of private theatricals if money be taken, the place not being licensed, 370–372——Particular point in litigation under the Act 25 Geo 2, between the theatres and music halls, 373–375.

Opinion that if the justices had sole charge of the licensing, they should look primarily to the safety of the public, and also exercise a censorship in regard to the morality of the entertainment; convenience in having a single officer for these purposes, 376–380——Readiness of managers to consent to alterations in the plays, when suggested by the Lord Chamberlain's Department, 383–388——Check upon the production of objectionable plays on account of the censorship, 389–392——Legal definition of a stage play in the 23rd section of the Act 6 & 7 Vict., 393.

Poole, John. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is manager and musical director of the Metropolitan Music Hall in the Edgeware-road; held for some years a similar position at a music hall in Birmingham, and was also engaged at the theatres in Norwich, Ipswich, &c., 5685–5697——The Norwich theatre is still open and doing well, and there are three or four other theatres under the same management, 5698–5703——Particulars in connection with Holder's Music Hall at Birmingham, and the character of the performances there; stoppage of a ballet on one occasion, at the instance of the manager of the theatre, 5704–5727.

Class of entertainment now given at the Metropolitan Music Hall; advantage if it were permitted to produce operettas, burlesques, &c., 5728–5774. 5795–5798——Dissent of Mr. Meacock, the proprietor of the Metropolitan Music Hall, from the proposition submitted to the Committee by Mr. Stanley, 5740–5758——Large capital represented by this music hall, 5759, 5760——Prices of admission, and average expenditure by each visitor upon refreshments, 5761–5769. 5692–5794——Statement as to the ghost illusion having been produced for several months at the Birmingham Music Hall, notwithstanding that proceedings were threatened, 5775–5791——Expediency of introducing operettas and improved musical entertainments at the music halls rather than farces or theatrical representations, even though empowered by law to give the latter also, 5799–5812.

Pownall, Henry. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has been chairman of the Middlesex Bench of Magistrates for many years, 394——Explanation as to the Middlesex magistrates having, since 1851, when granting licenses, specified in all cases the particular entertainment which may be given, 395–414——Great increase in the number of magistrates' licenses, there being, in 1865, a total of 291 music licenses, and of 60 licenses for dancing and music, 397——Practice, since 1851, to omit from the license the words "or any entertainment of the like kind," and to specify merely whether the license is for music or music and dancing, 397. 401–414. 689–692.

Especial care taken by the magistrates before licensing any rooms as suitable for public dancing, 398–400——Licenses are granted for music only, but not for dancing except conjointly with music, 402, 403—— Practice of giving scenic entertainments and scenic-theatrical performances in rooms licensed only for music and dancing; impropriety thereof, thereof, 410-418——Injurious conflict of the jurisdiction of the Lord Chamberlain and of the magistrates under the Act 25 Geo. 2,c. 36; 418. 630-632——Expediency of this Act being entirely remodelled or repealed, 418.

Importance of an efficient control over the music halls by the police, 418, 419——Belief as to the prevalence of much immorality in connection with music halls and other licensed places; objection especially to the private rooms, 418, 419. 494-519——Advantage in all semi-theatrical entertainments being under license from the Lord Chamberlain, 418-421——In the proposed retention of dancing licenses by the magistrates, dancing by the public is alone contemplated, 422-424. 450——Opinion that the use of scenic representations should necessitate a license from the Lord Chamberlain, 424-442. 724-726.

Advantage of keeping the magistrates' license distinct, and of requiring separate buildings in the event of a license from the Lord Chamberlain for dramatic performances, 434-442——Salutary check in the spirit licenses and the licenses for music and dancing being granted at different times of the year, 443-449——Suggestion that all licenses for spirits be granted by the magistrates exclusively, 448-450——Explanation as to the suspension of license to Caldwell's Dancing Rooms, 448. 733-735——Contemplated licensing by the Lord Chamberlain, exclusively, of all theatrical entertainments in their widest sense, 450.

Sundry conditions suggested in connection with the grant of music or dancing licenses by the magistrates, 450——Suggestion that the restriction as to the opening of licensed music halls be limited to the period between midnight and six o'clock in the morning, 450. 631. 634, 635——Recommended power in the magistrates to grant temporary special licenses, 450——Suggestion that places licensed for dancing must be rated at a certain rent, 450. 607. 745——Provision suggested as to the visitation of music and dancing halls by the police, 450——Proposal that there be a small fee upon each license granted by the magistrates, 450. 741-744——Circumstances by which the magistrates are guided in granting or withholding music and dancing licenses in any locality: demand for them more in the east end than the west end, 452-455. 609, 610.

Inexpediency of allowing public houses to provide music without the check of a license, 456-459——Constant opposition made to the licensing of new music halls by places already licensed, 460-462——Want of an organized supervision of the licensed places, that is, by means of the police, 463. 469-475. 482-489——Reasons for recommending that the control of all theatrical or semi-theatrical entertainments should rest entirely with the Lord Chamberlain, 464-468. 490-493——Steps taken by witness individually to see that the licenses are not abused, 470, 471. 475——Further considerations as to the mode of distinction desirable in order clearly to separate the matters to be licensed by the Lord Chamberlain and magistrates respectively, 476-481. 592-594. 619-621. 663-665. 724-726.

Conclusion as to the Alhambra not being a very moral place late in the evening, or after ten o'clock: numerous private rooms there, adverted to as a source of immorality, 494-511. 601-606——Understanding as to there being private apartments or supper rooms at the Oxford, 512-514——Also at Weston's, 515-519——Instances of immoral results from attendance at music halls, 517-519. 602-606——Large increase in the number of music licenses granted since 1845; 522-530——Defence of the practice of the magistrates in giving licenses for music rather than for music and dancing, and in interpreting the dancing as confined to the visitors, 531-552——Very few music halls having scenic performances, 551, 552.

Approval of the restriction upon music halls as to the non-performance of Shakspeare, &c., there being already more fitting places for such performances, 553-581——Great difficulty in preventing mischievous consequences if the public could witness theatrical representations in music halls and public houses, whilst they were at the same time probably indulging in drink, 564-583——Occurrence of immoral practices at music halls chiefly late in the evening, it being impossible or extremely difficult to prevent the mischief through the police, 578-583.

Several instances of the magistrates' license being used as a means of obtaining a theatrical license from the Lord Chamberlain, 584-586——Instances of private influence being brought to bear on the magistrates in the granting of licenses, 587-590——Contemplated prohibition on the supply of spirituous liquors in semi-theatrical places, 594-599. 638-644——Frequent complaint made of the penny theatres in Shoreditch and Whitechapel, 600——Check contemplated in order to secure that, where dancing licenses are granted, the accommodation is safe and ample, 607, 608.

Refusal of the Lord Lieutenant of the county to appoint brewers as magistrates, 611, 612——Reasons for not licensing the same house for music and dancing, and for theatrical representation, 613-618——Great mischief if all the public houses having music and dancing licenses were turned into theatres, 617, 618——Unduly high penalty (100 l.) for every offence under the Act of Geo. 2; 632, 633——Approval of the provision of ample amusements for the people, the only restriction proposed by witness being that theatrical entertainments should be entirely under the Lord Chamberlain, and confined to suitable places, not having spirit licenses, 636–665. 740.

Expediency of the police exercising a supervision over the "Penny Gaffs" and cheap unlicensed entertainments, 666-674——Advantage of a more complete inspection of licensed houses by the police, and of reports by the latter to the licensing magistrates, 675-682——Want of some organized inquiry in regard to the size and safety of dancing and music rooms, the magistrates having at present no machinery for this purpose, 683-688. 710——Further evidence in favour of preventing at the same place the supply of spirits and the giving of scenic representations, or professional dancing, 693–709.

Inexpediency of open competition, without licensing, in the supply of popular amusements, 711-718——Advantage if, as in France, Government could supply some refined amusements for the people, 719, 720——Improvement in the state of the streets at night by the attractions at music halls, &c., 721–723——Opinion further expressed as to the music and dancing rooms engendering vice, 727–731——Justification of the course pursued by the magistrates, in refusing to license more than one music hall or dancing room in the same street or neighbourhood, 732. 736–738.

Constant objection by the inhabitants to the licensing of music halls, 739——Amendments suggested in the forms required in the granting of licenses, much unnecessary time being now occupied, 746, 747——Explanation as to the part taken by the Middlesex magistrates with reference to the license to the Hanover Square Rooms, and Egyptian Hall: petition on the subject adverted to, 748–760——License for music and dancing after five o'clock, in the case of St. James's Hall: duty of the magistrates not to renew such license if there has been music before that hour, 761–763——Effect of the severity of the penalty in preventing informations being laid, 764.

Discretion exercised by the magistrates as to the renewal of licenses, where the dancing has not been confined to the visitors, 765–767——Very large attendance at the leading music and dancing halls, 768, 769——Belief that the magistrates are not now made cognisant of any gross improprieties at the places in respect of which licenses are applied for, 770.

Pownall, Mr. Paper submitted to the Committee by Mr. Pownall, containing suggestions for an amendment of the present system of licenses, App. 300.

Preston Theatre. Amount of accommodation and character of the performances at the Preston Theatre, Knowles 6364–6368.

Prices of Admission. Much lower prices of admission to theatres than in former years, Boucicault 4212.

Princess's Theatre. Great increase in the rent of the theatre, Hollingshead 5217.

Private Boxes. Obstacle to any immoral occurrences in the private boxes in theatres, Webster 3002–3008. 3249; Wigan 4724–4726.

Private Rooms (Music Halls). Belief as to there being much immorality in connection with private rooms in music halls, Pownall, 418, 419. 494–519.

Understanding that there are no private rooms at the Alhambra, or Canterbury Hall, Sir T. Henry 911. 914——Belief that in very exceptional instances only, are private rooms attached to music halls, Sir R. Mayne 1019–1023. 1069. 1152–1155. 1213–1217——Positive denial that there are any private rooms at the Alhambra, Strange 1385–1391——In accuracy of the statement that there are private rooms at the music halls; there are none at Canterbury Hall, or the Oxford, App. 309.

Private Theatricals. Illegality of private theatricals if money be taken, the place not being licensed, Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby 370–372.

Profits of Theatres. Less remunerative result from the theatres than in former years; grounds for this statement, Smith 3680–3686. 3841–3851. 3891–3900.

The large fortunes made by managers within the last ten years have been largely owing to the pits and galleries being recruited from the music halls, Boucicault 4238. 4278. 4344——Numerous instances of theatrical managers having realised fortunes in recent years, ib. 4357–4365——Profitable operation of the theatres in recent years, so that witness concludes the music halls have not interfered with them, Wigan 4588–4592——Grounds for concluding that theatres in London are now very prosperous if well managed, Hollingshead 5369–5378.

Public Houses. Inexpediency of allowing public houses to provide music without the check of a license, Pownall 456-459——Great mischief if all the public houses in the metropolis having music and dancing licenses were turned into theatres, ib. 617, 618——Suggestion that young persons under the age of fourteen should be excluded from the public houses, as at Sheffield, when character dancing and singing and smoking take place, Jackson 7258–7267.——See also Liverpool, 3. Sheffield.

Public Safety. Importance of the question of the construction and safety of the building in guiding the Lord Chamberlain in licensing, Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby 258——Character of the supervision exercised by the Lord Chamberlain over the site and plan of any new theatre, as well as over the subsequent arrangements for the public safety, ib. 291–301——Opinion that if the justices had sole charge of the licensing, they should look primarily to the safety of the public, and also exercise a censorship in regard to the morality of the entertainment; convenience in having a single officer for these purposes, ib. 376–380.

Want of some organized inquiry in regard to the size and safety of dancing and music rooms, the magistrates having at present no machinery for this purpose, Pownall 683–688. 710——Explanation that the magistrates pay considerable attention to the question of public safety before licensing any music hall, Bodkin 2006, 2007. 2011–2014.

Duty of witness, as inspector of theatres, to see that the exits and entrances, and the building arrangements generally, are sufficient for the public safety, before theatres are licensed, Donne 2071–2076——Instances of wider passages and other improvements being carried out in existing theatres; difficulty in enforcing these alterations after the theatres are built, ib. 2076–2080. 2103–2106——Submission of the plans of all new theatres to the Lord Chamberlain when the width of the passages and other points are regulated according to the circumstances of each case; advantage of this practice over a system of fixed rules as to the size of the passages, &c., ib. 2105–2116——Strict enforcement of the regulations of the Lord Chamberlain affecting the public safety, ib. 2312——Control of the buildings in the country by the local magistrates, ib. 2552.

Sufficiency of the regulations of the Lord Chamberlain's department for the public safety in theatres, Webster 3220–3222——Faulty and unfit character of many of the London theatres for dramatic representations, Hollingshead 5238, 5239——Expediency of a careful survey of theatres and music halls with a view to the public safety, ib. 5323–5329.

Sufficient powers of witness by withholding or suspending the license to any theatre, for compelling the adoption of improvements suggested by the Surveyor of the Department, Viscount Sydney 7597–7606.

Explanatory statement of the measures adopted by the Lord Chamberlain of late years in regard to the security and convenience of the public, App. 281, 282.

Resolution of the Committee that it is desirable that any Act of Parliament dealing with the licensing of theatres, music halls, and other places of entertainment, should render compulsory the inspection and survey of such places, as regards the stability of structure, due security against fire, ventilation, and facility of ingress and egress, Rep. iii——Also that the authority to whom the licensing may be entrusted, be required to frame regulations from time to time for ensuring the safety and accommodation of the public, which regulations should receive the sanction of the Secretary of State, and be laid upon the table of the House of Commons, ib.

Ramsgate Theatre. Difficulty experienced some time ago in obtaining a license for the theatre at Ramsgate, Wigan 4915–4918.

Reade, Charles. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a Dramatist and Novelist; has not written for the stage for some years, 6719-6723——Was driven from writing for the stage partly by the narrowness of the market, but chiefly by the competition of pieces stolen from the French, 6724-6740——Way in which the piracy of French plays operates in excluding English invention, 6726. 6738-6740——Room for more theatres in London, but for the legislative restrictions on the subject, 6727-6730——Rare instances of large sums being given for theatrical pieces, 6731-6737.

Expediency of every one being free to build a theatre, and being secure of obtaining a license, 6741——Approval of plays being subject to a limited censorship; there should, however, be an appeal against the decision of the licenser, 6742-6745. 6861-6863——Practice as to the censorship of the stage under the old office of Master of the Revels; considerable powers of interference possessed by this officer, 6746-6759——Misgiving in witness's mind, lest the interests of provincial managers should be prejudicially affected if music halls were allowed to perform what they pleased, 6760-6774. 6854. 6856. 6864, 6865——Approval in any case of the Dramatic Licensing Act being altered, and of the London music halls being empowered to produce ballets and pantomimes, 6760-6766. 6774——Admission that on the principle of free trade, it may be only right to permit music halls to perform what they please, 6767-6774. 6853-6856. 6864, 6865.

Argument as to the necessity of putting down piracy of French plays, in order that a great national drama may be restored in England, 6775-6785——Proposition for striking out that clause of the Copyright Act which permits "fair imitation or adaptation" of works from the French; conviction that if this be done, a great drama will arise in this country, 6875 et seq. 6847-6852——Entire absence at present of any protection to Frenchmen or to Englishmen against the piracy of their inventions; instance of this, 6787. 6792-6810——Efficiency of the Act of William the Third for the protection of authors from piracy, 6789-6791. 6850-6852.

Dissent from the view of some witnesses before the Committee as to the drama having desperately declined, 6823——Explanation as regards the play of "Never too Late to Mend," that the crank scene was not altered through any display of public opinion on the subject, 6824-6827——Probability of there being better employment for some actors if the music halls were thrown open, 6828, 6829——Orderly conduct of the audience at the Alhambra; doubt, however, as to their being sufficiently attentive for stage plays, 6831-6833. 6842-6846——Improbability of dramatic authors benefiting much by the music halls being opened, 6834, 6835.

Opinion that the style of acting on the whole is higher than it used to be in former years, 6836, 6837——Value of the patent theatres in training actors, 6838, 6839——Belief that the music halls have had no effect upon the style of acting, 6840, 6841.

Suggestion that theatres in the country as well as in London should be licensed by the Lord Chamberlain, with an appeal to the judges in equity, 6857-6860——Reason for preferring the Lord Chamberlain to the magistrates as the licensing authority, 6857, 6858——Opinion that the music halls would still confine themselves chiefly to music, and would not cause any degradation of the drama, if empowered to enact plays, 6866.

Reason, Richard. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is Chief Inspector of Common Lodging Houses; has visited some music halls, &c. at the east end of London, but it is no part of his duty to inspect those places, 7796-7800—— Supplies sundry particulars relative to the music rooms and dancing places attached to public houses in Whitechapel; is not aware of any special complaints against these places, 7801 et seq.——Information also, relative to the cheap theatres, or penny gaffs in the east of London; the chief evil of these places is the large attendance of young children, 7807 et seq.——The police would doubtless report any impropriety or misconduct of which they were cognisant in connection with the dancing rooms or penny gaffs, 7819-7828. 7845. 7859-7862. 7883-7885.

Reed, Mr. and Mrs. German. Explanation as to a theatrical license having been granted to Mr. and Mrs. German Reed, Donne 2175-2184——Approval of the theatrical license to Mr. and Mrs. German Reed's entertainment, Turner 5163, 5164.

Refreshments (Theatres and Music Halls). Consideration of the extent to which drink is now sold in theatres, under Excise license; regulation as to the place of sale being removed from the audience part of the theatre, Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby 54-78——Check by means of the Lord Chamberlain's license, when renewal is applied for, upon any improper arrangement as to refreshments, ib. 307, 308——Approval of the system of refreshment at music halls, as a check upon the public houses, Sir T. Henry 855, 856. 916, 917. 955-959——Supervision suggested in regard to the conduct of the refreshment department at music halls, ib. 876, 877.

Considerations as to the entertainment at music halls involving drinking and refreshments; circumstance of the theatres also being licensed to sell drink, Sir R. Mayne 1141-1147. 1156, 1157. 1166-1170——Suggestion that admission and refreshment be charged for separately in music halls, Hon. G. C. Norton 1238-1243——Suggestions as to the distinction desirable in regard to the refreshments allowed in theatres and for the prevention of fire, more especially in the case of new theatres, 6414-6415——Want of proper arrangements in music halls, as well as in theatres, against the occurrence of fire, 6416-6420——Suggestion that there be a constant high-pressure water service at all the theatres by means of fire-proof towers and cisterns above the top of the buildings; considerable expense of such towers, 6419, 6420. 6465-6478. 6494-6503.

Expediency of a special survey with regard to fire before a license is granted to any new theatre or music hall, 6422——There have not been many cases of fire at music halls, 6424——Great importance of adequate provision for the egress of the public from theatres and music halls, in the event of fire; suggestions as to the improved arrangements required, 6426-6429. 6449-6464. 6528-6533——Absence of any survey after licenses are granted, 6430-6433——Difficulty in regard to the Lord Chamberlain compelling the adoption of all that is required, 6434-6439.

Approval of the precautions proposed by the Bill of Mr. Locke, though further precautions are desirable, 6440-6446. 6533——Expediency of requiring ample means of egress before the plans of any new theatres are sanctioned, 6450——Means of egress in the case of the theatres in Paris, 6450-6457——Importance of all the modes of egress at Covent Garden, Drury Lane, &c., being in constant use, 6458-6459——Consideration of the arrangements at the Alhambra for the prevention or stoppage of fires, 6477-6482.

Systematic precautions taken in the theatres in Paris, each theatre being under the control of the Chief of the Sapeurs et Pompiers: details hereon as to the functions and constitution of this body, 6504-6523. 6543-6547——Functions of witness to extinguish fires, but not to take any precautions against them, 6524-6527——Great risk at present in the case of the numerous music halls, dancing rooms, &c., so that systematic precautions should be enforced in all places holding upwards of 500 people, 6528-6533.

Total of fifty fires at theatres in London within the last thirty-three years, only seven theatres having been seriously injured, 6533——Very little loss of life through fire, 6534-6542——Less risk of large fires in Paris than in London, the fire-engines and water supply in Paris being, however, very inadequate, 6548-6551——Increasing number of firemen under witness; next year he will have 300 or 350; 6552-6554.

Shaw, Captain. Further suggestions by Captain Shaw, with reference to the prevention of fire, and the building arrangements generally, App. 325, 326. 330, 531.

Sheffield. There is but one licensed theatre in Sheffield, the Theatre Royal, Jackson 7202-7204——Rules drawn up by the magistrates, in licensing the theatre, by which they may close the theatre if the rules are infringed, ib. 7205-7211——The theatre is very well conducted, ib. 7212, 7213.

Large music-hall at Sheffield, called the Alexandra Music Hall, not licensed as a theatre, and having only a beer license; this place is also exceedingly well constructed, and all improper characters are excluded, Jackson 7215-7218. 7271-7274. 7281. 7292-7295. 7305, 7306——Beer is sold in refreshment rooms attached to the music hall, but not in the place where the people sit, ib. 7217, 7218. 7382——There is a second music hall in which concerts and other entertainments are given, ib. 7218-7220. 7281.

Information relative to certain public-houses at Sheffield, in which character dancing and singing are the chief entertainments, and which are largely attended by artisans and their wives; these places are unobjectionable and well conducted. Jackson 7221-7228, 7235, 7236. 7245-7257. 7309 et seq.——Suppression of two places where the audience joined in dancing, ib. 7236, 7268-7270——Advantage if the magistrates could make rules for places having music and dancing, as well as for the theatre; it should, in fact, be necessary to obtain a license for music and dancing in the same way as a spirit license, ib. 7275, 7347-7353.

Important difference between casinos or music halls in London, and music halls, such as the Alexandra, in Sheffield, Jackson 7276-7281. 7292-7302. 7307, 7308——There is no place at Sheffield where theatrical performances are given whilst the audiene are eating, drinking, and smoking, ib. 7283, 7284——Interference by witness, on the part of the police, if anything like theatrical performances were given in the public houses or concert rooms, or in any place not licensed as a theatre, ib. 7285-7291. 7354-7369.

Character of the performances in public houses in Sheffield, whilst drinking and smoking are going on; particulars hereon as to the supervision exercised over these places by the police, Jackson 7309-7346——Difficulty as to witness's interference, on account of the uncertainty as to what constitutes theatrical performances; instance of this, ib. 7354-7369——Dismissal of an information laid by the theatre at Sheffield, against a sort of pantomime in a circus, the magistrates not considering it a theatrical performance, ib. 7370.

Simpson, William Thomas. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has for nearly thirty years been playing in, or connected with, different theatres throughout the kingdom: is now manager of a travelling theatre, 5387, 5388. 5391–5393——Great uncertainty of obtaining licenses from the magistrates for theatres in the country: impediment thereby to the erection or increase of country theatres, 5388 et seq.—Very objectionable character of the singing rooms or music halls in country places, as in Staffordshire and Shropshire, 5388–5391. 5520–5530——Complaint as to the uncertainty of the law, as interpreted by different magistrates, upon the question of licenses being required for travelling theatres: illustration in witness's case of the inconvenience and injury arising from this source, 5393 et seq.

Anticipated large increase in the number of country theatres, if the difficulty as to the license were removed: instances at Kingston, Croydon, &c., 5413–5416. 5449–5454. 5469–5478. 5511, 5512——Numerous travelling theatres, many of which would be changed into permanent theatres, but for the legal obstacles, 5449–5454——Expediency of the license being granted by some authority more free from prejudice than many of the country magistrates are, 5454. 5457–5465.

Restrictions under the Metropolitan Police Act, as to licenses within twenty miles round London, 5455, 5456. 5515, 5516. 5525–5529. 5532——Way in which witness carries out theatrical performances without rendering himself liable to prosecution under the Act, 5482–5488——Statement as to country magistrates having decided that ballets and certain dramatic representations were not stage plays within the meaning of the Act, 5488–5508——Practice as to refreshments being allowed in witness's theatre, 5517–5519.

Sites of Theatres. Inspection by witness of the site before approving of the plans of a new theatre, Donne 2307, 2308——Difficulty in getting proper sites, but for which there would be more theatres, Viscount Sydney 7669–7672——See also Public Safety.

Smith, Edward Tyrrell. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is lessee of Astley's Theatre: has also been connected with Drury Lane, Cremorne Gardens, the Alhambra, &c., 3595–3600——Approval generally of the present system of theatrical licenses, 3601——Strong objection to the granting of theatrical licenses to music halls, or to the drama being performed simultaneously with eating, drinking, and smoking, 3602 et seq.——Reference to the Alhambra as well adapted for dramatic performances, and as being entitled to a theatrical license, if smoking, eating, and drinking are abolished in the auditorium, 3603. 3606. 3633–3650. 3885.

Very indecent and objectionable songs, &c, at some of the music halls, there being a great want of supervision over many of these places, 3606–3610. 3623, 3624. 3874, 3875——Lowering of the drama if enacted in music halls as at present conducted, 3612–3622——Tendency of the music halls to encourage drunkenness, 3621, 3622. 3876, 3877——Information as to the class of entertainment usually given by witness at the theatre at Cremorne: approval of similar representations at the Alhambra, if smoking, drinking, and eating, are disallowed, 3626–3650——Belief that exceedingly objectionable plays would be produced but for the Lord Chamberlain's censorship, 3651–3659——The censorship is no hindrance to dramatic authorship, 3655.

Adequate demand for good plays at the present time, 3660–3672——Great falling off in the supply of good actors, owing to all the theatres being thrown open to the drama, and to young men not making a study of the art as they used to do, 3672–3703. 3831–3840. 3972–3974——Better school for the drama if there were only two or three patent theatres as formerly, 3672–3674. 3677. 3972–3974——Less remunerative result from the theatres than in former years: grounds for this statement, 3680. 3686. 3841–3851. 3891–3900——High salaries commanded by good actors, if they were only forthcoming, 3691–3696.

Production of equally good plays, as in former years, though of a different class, 3704–3706——Explanation that witness does not adopt the former practice of allowing gentlemen to go behind the scenes: nor is it the custom of other managers to do so, 3706–3721——With regard to the admission of gentlemen to the canteen at the Alhambra, there was no canteen when witness was there, 3722–3726——Details relative to the entertainments and performances generally at Cremorne, the regulations as to the refreshments and smoking, and as to the use of small private rooms or boxes from which to witness the dancing, &c., 3727–3789. 3947–3957. 3975–3978.

Further statement as to the prejudicial effect of allowing smoking and drinking simultaneously with dramatic performances, 3790–3805——Restriction of smoking and drinking in the auditorium of the Bower Saloon as being under a theatrical license, 3805–3807. 3887——Regulations at Astley's in regard to the supply of refreshments: receipts derived from this source, 3807–3830. 3933, 3934——Evidence in support of the conclusion as to the decline of the drama, and of actors, 3831–3851. 3864, 3865. 3891–3925——Opinion as to the orderly conduct of the Alhambra, and as to the audience being much the same as at theatres, 3852–3861.

Inferior class of actors at music halls as compared with theatres, even if the former had theatrical licenses, 3862, 3863. 3871–3873——Opinion that the drama is not answering at Drury Lane, 3865——Attraction of sensation pieces, rather than of legitimate dramas, 3865. 3895–3907——Great difficulty of getting any very good actors, there not being, indeed, any first-class actor before the public, 3865. 3892. 3908–3920——Approval of good burlesques, as being beneficial rather than injurious to the drama, 3866–3870.

Statement as to witness not taking any steps for excluding women of the town from Astley's, 3878–3883. 3940–3942——Objection to any attempted definition of light pieces to be allowed at music halls, or to a permission to employ a limited number of performers, 3884–3886. 3943–3946. 3958–3961——Consideration whether the change of public taste and habits, and the increased variety of amusements may not account to some extent for the decline of the drama, irrespectively of the want of first-class actors, 3904–3920——Success of the drama at Sadler's Wells, 3921–3925.

Non-objection to an increased number of places for dramatic entertainment, so long as the buildings are suitable for the purpose, and refreshments and smoking are prohibited, 3926–3930. 3943——Probable amount of the profit per head on the sale of refreshments at the Alhambra, 3935——Considerable number of women of the town probably to be seen at the Alhambra, 3936–3939——Objection to any scenery or costume at music halls, but not to songs in character, 3962–3967——Causes of the long run of some pieces at the present time, 3968–3971.

Particulars as to the performances produced by witness at Astley's, 3987–3997——Prices of admission to Astley's; discontinuance of half-price, 3998, 3999——Reduction made by witness in the prices at Drury Lane when lessee there, 4000–4002——Absence of any injury to the theatres by the introduction of stalls, and the increase of private boxes, 4003–4017——Witness has never seen any curtains drawn right across private boxes, 4018–4021.

Smoking. Practice of smoking in the Irish theatres adverted to; belief as to this being a breach of rule, Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby, 201–205——Prohibition of smoking in the London theatres, under the regulations of the Lord Chamberlain, Donne 2319——Importance as regards licenses of distinguishing between places where smoking is and is not allowed, Stanley 2607–2612. 2619–2624——Contemplated prohibition of smoking in the Alhambra and similar places, if licensed for theatrical representations, ib. 2878–2887——Approval of smoking being prohibited in theatres, Boucicault 4437–4440——Prohibition of smoking in the theatres in America and Australia, Kean 6584–6586——Evidence as to the practice of smoking in theatres in Shakespeare's time, Tomlins 6942

Recommendation by the Committee that there be different forms of licenses for places where tobacco, refreshments, &c., may be consumed in the auditorium, and for places where they may not be so consumed, Rep. iii.

Songs (Music Halls). Great benefit if the songs at music halls were subject to censorship, Webster 3132; Smith 3606–3610. 3624; Green 5639–5669; Coyne 5818, 5819; Knowles 6227–6231. 6259–6262. 6271–6275——Belief as to indecent songs being sung at some music halls, Smith 3606–3610. 3623, 3624; Lee 5011, 5012. 5023. 5035–5037——Indecent songs at music halls would not be attractive at the present time, Hollingshead 5254–5262——Part taken by witness in excluding indecent and coarse songs from music halls, Green 5642–5645.

Stage Managers. Prejudicial effect of the very general abolition of the office of stage manager since the theatres have been thrown open, Kean 6705–6711.

Stage Plays. Legal definition of a stage play in the 23rd section of the Act 6 & 7 Vict., Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby 393.——See also Drama, The, 5. Music Halls, 3–5.

Stalls. Absence of any injury to the theatres by the introduction of stalls and the increase of private boxes, Smith 4003–4017.

Stanley, Frederick. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is solicitor for the London Music Halls Association; has personally been interested in the Oxford and Canterbury Halls, 2559, 2560——Delivers in a paper explanatory of his views on the question of theatrical licenses, 2561, 2562——Considers that music halls should still be subject to license, but that they should be enabled to produce light pieces, employing five or six actors on the stage, 2563–2566. 2613–2616. 2639 et seq.——Does not see any necessity for licensing the pieces at music halls, as anything immoral or indecent would be disallowed by the audience; immense difficulty moreover in submitting all the songs, &c. for approval, 2567, 2568. 2595–2605.

Objection to open competition between music halls as tending to degenerate the performances; expediency of regard being had to the wants of the neighbourhood and to other considerations before the grant of new licenses, 2569–2594. 2803–2806——Witness does not represent the Alhambra, 2581——Opinion that there should be distinct authorities for licensing theatres and music halls, 2606–2612——Importance of distinguishing between places where smoking is and is not allowed, 2607–2612. 2619–2624——Willingness of the managers of music halls to give pecuniary security for good conduct, 2617, 2618.

Enumeration of the music halls represented by witness, 2625–2627——Production of ballets both at the Oxford and Canterbury Hall, there being one now at the latter, 2628–2638——Desire of the music hall proprietors merely to employ six, or even four performers, without wishing for a license to produce heavy pieces suitable only to the regular theatres; grounds for advocating this limited permission, rather than a system of free trade in acting, 2639 et seq.——Belief that under open competition the music halls would not pay, and would be closed or turned into theatres, 2644. 2650–2652. 2674–2684. 2852–2875——The Alhambra is a theatre rather than a music hall, and should have a theatrical license, 2645. 2878–2880.

Circumstances under which the music hall managers came to the resolution in favour of being allowed to produce any entertainment where not more than five or six persons are engaged, 2655–2659. 2668–2673——Statement as to the music halls requiring permission also to provide "all Ethiopian entertainments," 2659–2667. 2737——Adoption of the foregoing resolution as comprising all the music halls really wanted, and not as a compromise with the theatrical managers, 2668–2673. 2701–2720.

Increased attendance at music halls adverted to in connexion with the improved class of entertainments given, 2689–2700——Recent interview of witness with the music hall proprietors when he was authorised to submit to the Committee the proposed limit of five or six persons, and other points, 2709–2720——Explanatory statement with reference to a Bill prepared by witness in 1861, the principle of which was approved by Sir Cornewall Lewis, for amending the Acts relating to places of amusement, 2721–2736.

General attack on the part of the theatres against the music halls in 1860; further combination against them after the lapse of a few years, 2738–2752——Reference to the proceedings against Canterbury Hall in respect of "Hodge Podge"; subsequent suggestion by Mr. Norton to apply to the Lord Chamberlain to license this piece, 2752–2762——Performance at present of a ballet at Canterbury Hall, for which, in witness's opinion, a penalty might be inflicted; the managers of the theatres have not, however, taken any legal proceedings lately, 2763–2771.

Limitation of the number of performers adverted to as the only definition which the music hall proprietors could arrive at in regard to the pieces proper for music halls, 2772–2775. 2833–2851——Prohibition upon the public at music halls going behind the stage, or into any places at all private, 2776——Reference to the admission of gentlemen to the canteen at the Alhambra as not leading to any immorality; Mr. Strange, however, is perfectly willing to abolish this practice if against public opinion, 2776–2778. 2807–2811——Practice at all the music halls to charge for admission, irrespectively of refreshments, 2779–2781——Necessity of the admission money in addition to the profit from refreshments, in order to make the places pay, 2782–2786.

Objection to the magistrates as the licensing tribunal for music halls, inasmuch as they are a constantly changing body, and sometimes exercise private influence in the consideration of applications; grounds for this statement, 2787–2802. 2812–2820——Comment on the refusal of a dancing license to the Oxford, 2792. 2796–2799——Inference from the excellent order at the Oxford and Canterbury Hall that police supervision is not necessary in music halls, 2823–2832.

Further statement as to the music hall proprietors preferring to be without open competition, and wanting merely to have six actors on the stage at once, 2833 et seq.——Exclusion of complaint by the theatres, if the music halls were legally empowered to employ six actors, and kept within this limitation, 2836–2842——Contemplated right of the music halls to employ choruses, and to provide not only selections of good music, but light operas, 2845–2851.

Expected deterioration of the performances, as a consequence of open competition, further adverted to, 2852–2875——Contemplated prohibition of smoking in the Alhambra and similar places if licensed for theatrical representations, 2878–2887——Doubt as to the proposed extension of the powers of the music halls having the effect of drawing many people away from the theatres, 2887–2890.

[Second Examination.]—Witness delivers in an estimate of the cost of the several music halls in London, 2891.

Stanley, Mr. Paper submitted to the Committee by Mr. Stanley, on behalf of the London Music Halls Proprietors' Protection Association, App. 306–313.

Strand Music Hall. Class of performance at the Strand Music Hall adverted to in connection with the insolvency of that establishment, Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby 220–224——Information as to the Strand Music Hall being no longer licensed for dancing, nor for the sale of spirits, Bodkin 2016–2022.

Strange,

Strange, Frederick. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is Managing Director of the Alhambra Music Hall, now owned by a Limited Liability Company, 1349–1351——Particulars as to the expenditure upon the Alhambra, and the several kinds of entertainment, from time to time, 1352–1368——Information relative to the present performances, consisting chiefly of ballets and operatic selections, 1366–1378. 1422–1433, 1491–1494——Several licenses under which the place is now conducted; addition recently of morning performances under license from the Lord Chamberlain, 1370–1383.

Entire absence of complaint as to improper conduct at the Alhambra, 1384——Positive denial that there are any private rooms, 1385–1391——Classes of refreshment used by the public, and relative amount received from this source and from admission money, 1392–1399. 1451–1453——Employment of three policemen every evening, in addition to six private policemen, there being also about twenty-four waiters, 1400–1408, 1526, 1527——About 300 persons are employed on the stage, 1409–1411.

Improved position of the young ladies employed in the ballet through their salaries at the Alhambra, in addition to their earnings during the day as dressmakers, tailoresses, &c., 1412–1418——Propriety of conduct of these ladies, so far as the Alhambra is concerned, 1419–1421——Advantage if the music halls had power to perform what is termed dress opera, and anything in the way of farce or pantomime, 1434–1450——Unfitness of Shakespeare for the music halls, 1434. 1481–1484.

Average of more than 3,000 visitors every evening, 1454——About three per cent. of the visitors are women of the town, there being an average of 100 or so every evening, 1455, 1456——Mixed character of the audience generally, about half consisting of persons with their wives and families, 1457–1460, 1529, 1530——Good order kept, 1461, 1462. 1531.

More economical and efficient conduct of the Alhambra, if not restricted as to the nature of the performances, whilst the effect would be that the tone of the performances would decidedly be raised, 1463 et seq.——Tendency under witness's management to raise the general tone and character of the entertainment, 1491–1500. 1532–1540.

Information relative to the canteen at the Alhambra frequented by the ladies of the ballet, if they please, and attended by such gentleman of the audience as may have special permission from witness for the purpose, 1501–1509. 1513, 1514. 1541–1553——Impossibility of anything immoral taking place in the canteen; large number of persons generally in it, 1504——There is no admission to the canteen by payment, 1507–1509. 1514——Improved class of people at the morning performances, the number being about one-third of that in the evening, 1515–1522——There is no free admission of women of the town, 1522–1525.

[Second Examination.]—Further details on the subject of the canteen, the admission of visitors to it without payment, the attendance of the ballet girls there, &c.; checks upon any immoral occurrences, 1554–1594. 1654–1662. 1668–1688. 1711–1714——Number of police further adverted to; there is no gratuity given to them, 1595–1598. 1665–1667——Occupation of the body of the hall by respectable people, there being no women of the town there, 1599–1601——Practice not to allow re-admission, nor to give free admissions, 1602–1612. 1663, 1664.

Employment at present of about 360 persons at the Alhambra, the weekly pay being 490 l., 1613–1615——Grievance in witness being subject to prosecution by the theatres, though he has gained his cause three times, 1616–1620——Benefit to witness's employés, as well as to the public, if operettas, vaudevilles, &c., could be produced at the Alhambra, 1621–1652——Absurdity of the restrictions under the Act 6 & 7 Vict., 1635——Short performances required in music halls, a play of Shakspeare being quite unsuitable, 1648–1652. 1732–1741.

Further denial that payment is ever made for admission to the canteen, 1661, 1662. 1711–1714——Practice in theatres of allowing gentlemen to go behind the scenes, 1668–1674. 1720——Dismissal of the ballet girls at the Alhambra if it were known that they were loose characters; instances of such dismissal, 1689–1700——Witness has no reason to believe the females who attend at the bars are an ill-conducted class, 1701–1705——Belief as to ballet girls geing generally considered to be very much worse as a class than they really are, 1707–1710.

Objection to a turntable at the Alhambra as a check upon the admissions, 1715–1718——The closing of the canteen would not injure the place in the slightest degree, 1719——Desire of witness to be empowered to produce everything the theatres can produce, and to be subject to the same license and supervision, 1721–1750——More modest costume of the ballet girls at the Alhambra than at the theatres, 1729, 1730——Closing of the place every night before twelve o'clock, 1751–1754——Especially full attendance of the labouring classes on Saturday, 1755–1757.

Sydney, the Right Honourable Viscount, G.C.B. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has for some time been strongly of opinion that the theatres and music halls should be under one jurisdiction, 7556. 7568——The Lord Chamberlain's department could undertake the licensing of music halls in the metropolis, and would probably be a more fit department for the purpose than the Home Office, 7556. 7568–7571——An additional staff would be necessary, the expense of which might be met by the fees charged for the licenses, 7556. 7561–7568, 7746–7753.

Suggestion that there be separate licenses for the theatres and music halls, as in Paris, 7556, 7557. 7582——Very unsatisfactory system at present in regard to the licensing of music halls by the magistrates, 7558–7560. 7572. 7573. 7640–7643——Willingness always evinced by witness to license new theatres, if the locality and site were satisfactory, and if the plans showed that the public safety was properly provided for, 7574–7579——Inaccuracy of any statement that it was through any difficulties raised in witness's department, that Mr. Boucicault was prevented from building a new theatre, 7578. 7758. 7783–7787.

Considerable improvements effected in the interiors of many of the theatres, at the instance of witness's department, 7579, 7580. 7597–7603——Great willingness shown by the managers to fall in with the views and directions of the department, 7579. 7598. 7607, 7608. 7769—— Question considered as to the expediency of licensing the music halls for theatrical performances; approval of a permission to perform light pieces, if a clear definition can legally be drawn up on the subject, 7583, 7584. 7695–7707. 7789–7794——Statement as to its not being considered the business of witness's department to interfere with the performances in music halls, even though illegal performances may be given, 7585–7596. 7644, 7645.

Sufficient powers of witness, by withholding or suspending the license to any theatre, for compelling the adoption of improvements suggested by the surveyor of the deparment, 7597–7606——Effectual interference of witness for the adoption of precautions in the matter of the foot-lights, &c., 7602, 7603. 7739–7742——Interference of the department in the event of improprieties in the dresses of the ballet dancers, 7606, 7607——Refusal of witness to interfere in preventing gentlemen going behind the scenes, as being rather the duty of the managers, 7608–7610——Conclusion as to the necessity of supervision over both theatres and music halls, 7611, 7612.

Approval of the censorship of plays, public opinion not being a sufficient check, 7613, 7614——Very few plays rejected, 7615, 7616——System of censorship in Paris, 7617——Particulars as to the way in which the censorship is and has been exercised, with reference more especially to certain plays which have been objected to, such as "Ruy Blas," "Jack Sheppard," "La Traviata," "Robert Le Diable," &c., 7618–7633. 7708–7713. 7788——Conclusion as to its not being necessary to have any appeal (except to public opinion) from the decision of the Lord Chamberlain in the rejection of plays, 7620–7622. 7634, 7635. 7714–7718.

Difficulty at present in stating the staff to be required in witness's office, if entrusted with the licensing and supervision of the music halls, 7636–7638. 7761——Importance of removing the present uncertainty of the law as to the performances legal at music halls; difficulty of a clear definition on the subject, 7639. 7701–7706. 7770, 7771, 7789–7794——Interference of witness's department if a regular theatre were to give performances without a license, 7644–7647——Explanation in justification of the refusal of occasional theatrical licenses to literary institutions and other places, that is, on the ground of public safety, 7648–7665.

Approval of the principle of free trade in theatres, subject to proper regulations for the safety of the public; this is in fact the guiding principle of witness's department, 7665–7671——Difficulty in getting proper sites, but for which there would be more theatres, 7669–7672——Necessity of obtaining the Queen's consent to any increase of witness's department, as the staff is paid for out of the civil list, 7673, 7674. 7746–7753——Doubt

Doubt whether, in addition to the theatres and music halls in London, the country theatres could properly be superintended by witness's department, 7675–7686. 7777–7782.

Explanation as to the regulation required in the case of theatres, that eating and drinking must not take place in the auditorium, 7687–7699——Considerations as to the provisions made in regard to egress in the existing theatres generally, and as to the requirements desirable in this respect in all new theatres: arrangements in the Paris theatres adverted to hereon, 7719–7738——Opinion that in the country the municipal authorities rather than the magistrates, should have the supervision of the theatres, 7754–7757. 7778, 7779.

Expediency of some consideration being given to any local objections to the erection of new theatres, 7759, 7760——Character of the supervision to be exercised by witness's staff over the performances in music halls and other places if licensed by the department, 7761–7776——Inconvenience of the licensing by magistrates in the neighbourhood of the metropolis further adverted to, 7778——Objection to any extension of central supervision to the country, 7779–7782.

Taylor, Tom. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—As a dramatic author of some experience considers that the censorship of the Lord Chamberlain has not practically any appreciable effect either for good or evil, as regards the west-end theatres, 4751–4757. 4760. 4854–4866——Belief that a check is, however, very necessary upon the character of the plays in small theatres in the east of London and in penny gaffs, 4758–4761——Doubt as to the necessity for the censorship with regard to political allusions, 4762–4767. 4826–4834. 4860–4866——Opinion that there are sufficient theatres in London to ensure an adequate competition for good and attractive dramas, 4768–4779. 4896

Apprehension lest a low and objectionable class of drama should be the result of empowering the music halls to give theatrical representations, 4780–4793. 4835–4853. 4879–4886——Probability of actors degenerating through the production of a lower class of pieces at music halls, 4782. 4841, 4842——Very inadequate supply of good actors at the present time, 4783, 4784——Opinion that actors are not suffering in any way from the monopoly of certain theatres, 4785, 4786——Approval of licenses to additional theatres, if the accommodation be suitable, and if the public-house element be not introduced, 4787–4793.

Probability of no injury arising to the interests of literature by opening the music halls to theatrical representations; conclusion, nevertheless, that the combination of the drama with eating, drinking, and smoking, would have generally a lowering tendency, and is undesirable, 4787–4793. 4835–4853. 4879–4889——Belief that the drama has suffered from free trade in theatres, 4794–4799——Way in which the patents of the royal theatres used to operate in producing a superior class of actors, 4798, 4799. 4878——Proposition for the establishment and subsidising of a model theatre, to be maintained as a school of dramatic art, 4798–4825——Insufficient supply of good plays and good actors for the theatres, irrespectively of the music halls, 4841. 4878.

Doubt as to any increased adaptation of immoral pieces from the French, if the Lord Chamberlain's censorship were withdrawn, 4854–4859——Tendency of acting in burlesque to introduce a lower class of actors, and to injure the demand for superior plays, 4867–4871——Approval on the whole of the retention of the censorship, 4873–4877——Indirect rather than direct injury apprehended from licensing music halls for dramatic representations, 4879–4885——Importance attached to the objection that ladies would not go to music halls, 4882.

Dissent from the views submitted to the Committee in a certain petition from Members of the Dramatic Authors' Society, 4890–4896——Opinion that the present regulations concerning theatres do not operate as any prejudice to dramatic writers capable of producing good pieces, 4896.

Temporary Special Licenses. Recommended power in the magistrates to grant temporary special licenses to music halls, &c., Pownall 450.

Theatres and Theatrical Licenses. See the Headings generally throughout the Index.

"Ticket of Leave Man." Reference to the "Ticket of Leave Man" as not legitimate drama; even acting of all the parts adverted to as the chief cause of success, Webster 3328–3334.

Tomlins, Frederick Guest. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is an author and journalist; has occupied himself with theatrical matters for nearly forty years, 6867–6870——Belief that the performance of stage plays in music halls would not tend to decline of the drama, 6872——Conclusion as to the very beneficial effect of the music halls, and as to the constant improvement in the class and tone of the performances at them, 6873. 6887–6891. 6936–6941——Expediency of the music halls being empowered to produce theatrical pieces and light operas; grounds for concluding that they would be sure to go on in an intellectual direction, 6873–6885. 6926–6941——Satisfactory attendance of artisans and their wives and families at the Alhambra, Canterbury Hall, &c., 6881–6814.

Part taken by witness in helping the movement for doing away with the privileges of the patent theatres, 6885, 6886——Mixed class of performances in former years at the patent theatres, 6887–6894——Change of public taste, so that the high tragic drama is probably gone out for ever, 6895–6906——Statement as to the English drama having been always piratical to some extent, 6907——Frequent interference of the Lord Chamberlain with plays after the Restoration, 6908——Circumstance of there having been seventeen theatres in London in the time of Shakspeare, 6909–6911——Very good actors at the present time, there being an inferiority in the pieces rather than in the performers, 6912–6917.

Strong feeling among actors against the music halls, though there would be an additional demand for both actors and actresses if the music halls could perform light pieces, 6918–6925——Great improbability of the music halls attempting anything but music and dancing and light pieces, 6925–6930——Statement as to the amusements of the people still being of an inferior class, though the music halls have greatly improved in moral tone, 6931–6941.

[Second Examination.] Evidence as to the practice of smoking in theatres in Shakspeare's time, 6942—— Further statement as to the numerous theatres and the freedom which existed in the days of Shakspeare, ib.——Absolute power vested formerly in the Master of the Revels, ib.——Advantage of the system of refreshments in music halls, as enabling the visitors to go home earlier than if they adjourned to public houses, &c. for refreshment, ib.

Toole, Mr. Circumstance of Mr. Toole having first appeared at the Beaumont and other institutions, Francis 5995–5998

Travelling Theatres. Facility with which witness used to obtain permission from the local magistrates to perform in country towns when he travelled about with a company, Lee 4934–4942.

Complaint as to the uncertainty of the law, as interpreted by different magistrates, upon the question of licenses being required for travelling theatres; illustration in witness's case of the inconvenience and injury arising from this source, Simpson 5393 et seq. —— Views of the magistrates that it is only on particular occasions, such as fairs, that they have power to license travelling theatres, Simpson 5400. 5417–5447.

Numerous travelling theatres, many of which would be changed into permanent theatres but for the legal obstacles, Simpson 5449–5454——Way in which witness carries out theatrical performances without rendering himself liable to prosecutions under the Act, ib. 5482–5488——Practice as to refreshments being allowed in witness's theatre, ib. 5517–5519.

Turner, H. J. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has had considerable experience as a theatrical agent, that is, in furnishing managers with the actors and actresses required, 5044–5050——Large increase in the salaries of actors in the provinces within the last few years; in London there has not been much alteration, 5051. 5102–5104——Great demand for good actors and actresses, the supply being very inadequate; increased difficulty if there were more theatres in London, 5052–5055. 5092–5096. 5111–5128. 5210–5212——Employment of many subordinate actors in music halls, where they get better salaries; belief that this is an injury rather than a benefit to the profession generally, and to the theatres, 5056–5072.

With regard to Mr. Robson having commenced his career at the Grecian Saloon, it was really a theatre in which he performed, 5073–5075——Belief that Miss Carlotta Leclercq did not spring from a music hall, 5076, 5077——Nor Miss Marie Wilton, 5078, 5079——Conviction that music halls spoil actors, 5080–5082——Incompatibility of the performance of the drama with the practice of eating, drinking, and smoking, as in music halls, 5083–5092. 5129–5137——Non-objection to music halls giving theatrical performances, if they come under the same restrictions as theatres, 5092. 5139–5145. 5172–5177.

Difficulty for some years in providing an adequate supply of actors, if the music halls were to give dramatic performances, even though the salaries might be increased, 5092, 5093. 5105–5128. 5138. 5178–5183——Much better social position of actors than in former years, 5094–5100——Injurious effect upon the theatres and the drama if dramatic entertainments were given in places where eating, drinking, and smoking were going on at the same time, 5101. 5105 et seq.——Approval of an increased number of theatres, though if all the music halls were theatres, the competition would be ruinous, 5111, 5112. 5141–5145.

Higher salaries in music halls than in theatres, the probable tendency of the music halls being to increase theatrical salaries, 5146–5150——Objection to any dramatic performance in a music hall, even though the number of performers were limited to three or four, 5151–5162——Approval of the theatrical license to Mr. and Mrs. German Reed's entertainment, entertainment, 5163, 5164——Way in which theatrical performances in music halls would not only injure the theatres, but would probably deteriorate the public taste, 5165–5188.

Opinion that it would be an improvement if the theatres in the country were licensed by the central office, 5189–5198——Belief that music halls in the provinces are not permitted to give dramatic entertainments, any more than the London music halls, 5199–5209.

U.

Uniformity. Wholesome uniformity of administration to be secured by putting all places of public entertainment in the metropolis under the Lord Chamberlain's Department, Sir T. Henry 787. Hon. G. C. Norton 1348.

See also Lord Chamberlain's Department.

United States. High standard of the drama in the United States, where public opinion is the only check upon the plays, there being no licenser; several of witness's plays originally produced there, Boucicault 4045–4058—— Power of the theatres or music halls in the United States to combine eating, drinking, and smoking with the representation of the drama, whereas such combination never takes place, and the theatres and music halls are kept quite distinct, ib. 4163–4170.

Performance generally of English plays on the American stage; doubt as to any pieces being acted there which would be rejected here on the score of immorality, Boucicault 4260–4262. 4266–4270. 4283–4287. 4394, 4395——Very good actors produced in America, ib. 4263–4265. 4378 —— Structual advantages of the American theatres as compared with the London theatres, ib. 4272–4273——Opinion as to the public taste in America being purer than in this country, and more in favour of the legitimate drama, ib. 4379–4390. 4393–4395.

Practice not to supply drink or refreshment in the auditorium of American theatres, Kean 6587–6592——Great difference between the habits of the Americans and the English, the former dining early, and being thus more at liberty to frequent the theatres, ib. 6562, 6563. 6571 —— Performance generally in America of the sensational drama, the legitimate drama not being acted as a general rule, ib. 6572–6577——Absence of music halls in the United States, ib. 6582, 6583.

See also New York.

Unlicensed Places. Want of the appointment of some authority for preventing the operation of unlicensed places, Hon. S. C. B. Ponsonby 250–255——Non-interference of the Lord Chamberlain with any places save those licensed by him; there are no funds for such interference, ib. 302–305.

Report by the police in the event of dramatic performances in unlicensed places, witness frequently taking steps for the infliction of penalties on the managers, and on the people attending, Sir R. Mayne 970–979. 996——Indirect and limited power of the police in the case of unlicensed places where only music and dancing go on, ib. 991–1008—— Expediency of all places for public entertainment being licensed, and being under the police, ib. 1135–1138. 1196–1200.

Statement that there are in this country 5,000 places in which dramatic representations are given without license, irrespectively of music halls, Hollingshead 5221. 5351–5356.

Penalty under the Act 6 & 7 Vict. for performances in unlicensed places, App. 289.

Resolution of the Committee that the provisions for enforcing the proper working of the Act of 25 Geo. 2, c. 36, relative to the licensing of music halls, are insufficient and unsatisfactory, as there is no legal authority under which the police can take direct proceedings against unlicensed houses in which music and dancing are going on, although they are empowered to deal summarily with cases of unlicensed theatrical entertainments, Rep. iv.

W.

Webster, Benjamin. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is sole proprietor and manager of the Adelphi Theatre, 2892——Very salutary operation of the present system of licensing theatres, 2893——Necessity of the censorship of the Lord Chamberlain in order to prevent immorality and objectionable political matter in dramatic literature, 2894–2901 —— Destruction of the art of acting and great injury to the drama generally, if the music halls were allowed to represent stage pieces, 2902 et seq.

Adequate competition at present for legitimate dramas; exceptional instances of pieces having such a long run as to prejudice the demand for a fresh supply, 2903–2906. 3009–3048. 3115–3118——Particular instances at the Adelphi of pieces being acted for long consecutive periods, it being, however, necessary to supplement these with new pieces from time to time, 2905. 3009–3022. 3035–3048. 3243, 3244——Great difficulty now experienced in supplying the stage with good actors, owing very much to the vitiating operation of the music halls upon the style of acting, 2908, 2909. 2928–2937. 3262——Salaries of actors at theatres and music halls respectively; denial that on the score of remuneration it is any undue interference of the Legislature to confine actors to theatres, 2910–2919. 3049–3058. 3120–3121.

Adverse feeling of all actors of the higher class to music halls, 2920–2922——Result of witness's experience that the school of acting has been destroyed by the removal of the privileges of the patent theatres, and by the present free trade in the drama, 2923–2947. 2970–2976——Witness took an active part in opening the drama to the minor theatres, but experience has shown him his error, 2926. 2971–2973——Much less liberty of the theatre in Paris than in London; grounds for this statement, 2930–2934. 3068–3094.

Different class of audiences at music halls and at theatres on account of the temptation of smoking and drinking in the former case, 2934–2937. 2948–2954——Special legislation required for the protection of the drama and of acting, as being a special art, 2938–2947——Very limited drinking in the theatres, whereas it is a chief source of the profits of music halls, 2948–2954——Belief that the acting of the drama in music halls would not eventually be profitable, 2955–2966——Main ground of witness's objection that the drama would be degraded where drinking and smoking are such prominent attractions, 2967–2969. 2977–2979. 3059–3067. 3217.

Non-objection to music halls having theatrical licenses, and giving dramatic performances, if they comply with the same conditions as theatres, and exclude drinking, eating, and smoking, 2977. 3095–3104. 3133, 3134. 3216–3219. 3263–3278——Eminence of the late Mr. Robson adverted to; belief that though he commenced his career at the Grecian, he did not become an actor there, 2980–2990. 3113, 3114. 3245–3248——Immoral atmosphere of music halls as compared with theatres; grounds for this statement, 2991–3008. 3122–3127. 3135–3140. 3165–3170. 3249——Prohibition upon singers at the cafés chantants in Paris appearing in costume, 3074–3079——Decline of acting in France, though there are more first-class actors than in England; probable cause of such decline, 3082–3094. 3105, 3106.

Stage acting at some of the music halls, whereas none of them have ever turned out a good actor, 3107–3112——Ample demand among the twenty-five theatres in London for good pieces, 3115–3119——Pecuniary injury to witness, who has the freehold of his theatre, if the music halls could compete with him, 3128, 3129——Effect of the music halls in destroying the half-price at some of the theatres, 3129——Entire satisfaction expressed with the present system of theatrical licensing, 3130–3132. 3301, 3302——Advantage if there were a censorship over the songs at the music halls, 3132.

Practice in regard to drinking at the cafés chantants in Paris; it is of a very harmless kind, and there is no eating, 3140–3150——Further statement as to the limited amount of drinking or refreshment at the London theatres, 3151–3164. 3205–3208. 3285–3288. 3291——Prohibition upon visitors going behind the scenes, 3165–3170. 3209–3215——Great difficulty in getting together a really efficient company at any one theatre, since the system of free trade in the legitimate drama among the twenty-five theatres in London, 3171–3180. 3250–3255.

Attractiveness of old plays and legitimate dramas at the present time, 3181–3186. 3225–3233. 3259, 3260——A nightly receipt of 150 l. at the Adelphi would be a very fair business, 3187——The nightly expenses may be taken at about 100 l.; 3188–3190——Large sums paid by witness for good plays, 3191–3196——Non-objection to music halls so long as they keep to their legitimate business, and leave theatrical representations to the theatres, 3197–3202——Objection to ballets being performed at the music halls, 3203, 3204.

Sufficiency of the regulations of the Lord Chamberlain's department for the public safety in theatres, 3220–3222——Suggestion that the Lord Chamberlain should have funds at his disposal for the prosecutions of those who infringe the law, 3223, 3224.

Further statement that authors have every facility for getting good plays acted, though the supply of legitimate drama is very limited, 3225–3244——Appreciation of the legitimate drama by the public, if the supply were forthcoming, 3228–3233. 3256–3260——Insufficient supply of acting talent adverted to as the chief cause of the non-production of good plays, 3233–3237. 3250–3262——Character of the plays of the present time as compared with those produced in former years, 3238–3244——Deterioration of acting talent further adverted to as arising from free trade in the drama, and from many good actors being spoilt at music halls, 3250–3262.

Witness further contends that the practice of eating, drinking, and smoking, is inconsistent

sistent with the legitimate drama, and that the two must be kept distinct, 3270–3280. 3318–3326——Objection to the music halls being allowed to enact select portions of dramas or small pieces requiring only a few performers, 3271–3275. 3278–3280. 3318–3322——Distinction between cafés chantants as in Paris, and the London theatres or music halls, 3281–3284——Definition of the legitimate drama, 3289——Injurious effect of burlesques upon the legitimate drama, more especially the inferior class of burlesque produced of late years, 3290. 3350–3357——Probability of the decline of acting talent in France being owing to the freer style of drama there than in England, 3292–3294.

Absence practically of any school of acting in England since the theatres have been thrown open, 3295–3300——Fair supply of pieces at the disposal of managers though frequently wanting in plot, 3303–3307——Doubt as to any decrease of theatres in country towns, 3308–3317. 3335–3348——Approval of so-called sensation dramas at the theatres rather than of scenes from such plays as the "School for Scandal" at music halls, 3318–3327——Reference to the "Ticket of Leave Man," as not legitimate drama; even acting of all the parts adverted to as the chief cause of its success, 3328–3334.

Weston's Music Hall. It is understood that there are private apartments or supper rooms at Weston's Music Hall, Pownall 515–519.

Whitechapel. Witness (as police inspector) supplies sundry particulars relative to the music rooms and dancing places attached to public houses in Whitechapel; is not aware of any special complaint against these places, Reason 7801 et seq.

Wigan, Horace. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is manager of the Olympic Theatre; has written several successful pieces, 4564–4566——Considers that the censorship of the Lord Chamberlain is extremely beneficial, and that it does not operate as any bar upon dramatic authorship, 4566–4577——Opinion as to the sufficiency of the number of theatres in London, though an increased number might probably widen the taste for theatrical performances, 4578–4582. 4717–4722——Large increase in the salaries of actors, particularly in the country, 4583. 4625——Conclusion that there is practically free trade in theatres at the present time, as the license would be sure to be given to a new theatre unless the building were unsatisfactory, 4584–4587. 4649–4651. 4721. 4723.

Profitable operation of the theatres in recent years, so that witness concludes the music halls have not interfered with them, 4588–4592——Belief that if the music halls could act stage plays, they would bring the drama and the professors of the stage into great disrepute, 4594–4599. 4658 et seq.——Expediency of the performances in music halls being subjected to censorship, 4600, 4601——Supervision exercised by the Lord Chamberlain over ballets; instance at Her Majesty's Theatre, 4602–4605. 4700–4705——Grounds for the statement that the demand for good dramas is much greater than the supply, 4606–4620.

Dissent from certain opinions as to the declining state of the drama, 4608, 4609. 4625, 4626——Statement as to Mr. Boucicault having asked very exorbitant terms from witness for a play; very large sums made by Mr. Boucicault upon the principle of sharing the profits with the managers who produce his pieces, 4613–4618——Very few dramatic authors in England; large proportion of the pieces which are of foreign origin, 4620——Great difficulty in writing successful plays, 4620–4624——Good prospect of an improved supply of actors, 4625——Opinion that actors have not fallen off within the last thirty years, but that the public are more critical than they used to be, 4626. 4706–4716.

Illustration of the importance of the Lord Chamberlain's license as a check upon immorality, 4627–4630——Explanation as to the prosecutions against the music halls having been undertaken in witness's name, 4631, 4632——Very small returns from the sale of drink in theatres as compared with music halls, 4633–4637. 4749, 4750——Willingness of witness to see the sale of spirits, &c. prohibited in theatres, 4638, 4639——Statement showing that theatres cannot sell drink and refreshment in the same way as the music halls, 4639, 4640——Inaccuracy of certain evidence in regard to the cafés chantants in Paris being empowered to give dramatic performances; nor are they fitly constructed for the purpose, 4641–4649.

Approval of music halls having theatrical representations, if they conform to the same regulations as theatres, but not otherwise 4652 et seq.——Exclusion of the more respectable classes from the drama, if eating, drinking, and smoking were allowed in the auditorium, 4658–4660——Conclusion as to the music not being the chief attraction to the public who go to music halls, 4666–4674. 4740–4748——Witness would be glad to see the ballet excluded from theatres, and only objects to it at music halls as being a stepping-stone to further infringement of the law, 4675–4682. 4727, 4728——Inaccuracy of the statement that Mr. Robson learnt his art or commenced his career in a music hall, 4693–4699.

Obstacle to any immoral occurrences in the private boxes in theatres, 4724–4726——Approval of burlesques in theatres, though they have deteriorated greatly of late years, 4729——Doubt as to the music halls having tended to cause any increase in the salaries at theatres, 4731–4735——Inability of witness to deny that at some theatres ladies may have been allowed to act without salary, or may have paid for permission to appear on the stage, 4736–4739.

[Second Examination.] Explanation that witness has no positive knowledge that managers have received sums of money to allow ladies to appear on the stage, 4898—— Information relative to the system of subsidies in Paris, to the Théâtre Français and the Odéon, whereby those places operate as nurseries of art, and are constantly turning out well qualified actors, 4898–4905——Opinion as to its being the duty of a Government to foster art in every way, 4906——Impression that there is a State theatre in Austria as in France, 4909–4911.

Statement as to the system of licensing country theatres by the magistrates being in an unsatisfactory state; instances at Glasgow and Ramsgate, 4912–4919——Improvement if the licenses in town and country were all under one officer, and were given as a matter of course if the buildings were proved to be safe, 4920–4929——Several objections to the magistrates as the licensing body in the country, 4920–4924——Necessity of a central licensing officer being aided by a proper inspecting staff, 4925–4927.

Wilton, Miss Marie. Belief that Miss Marie Wilton did not commence her career in a music-hall, Turner 5078, 5079.

Withdrawal of Licenses. Suggested power in the magistrates to withdraw the license in the interval between the October Sessions and the period of renewal, Pownall 659—— Contemplated power in the licensing officer at once to rescind any license, as well as to refuse renewals, Sir T. Henry 787. 790–803.

Withdrawal of Plays. Contemplated power in the Lord Chamberlain to stop any play or performance, Honourable G. C. Norton 1267–1272——The only plays stopped after having been licensed, were "Jack Shepherd" and "Oliver Twist," Donne 2286, 2287 ——Instances of the Lord Chamberlain having exercised the power of withdrawing plays already licensed, ib. 2542–2546.

Women of the Town. Much larger number of women of the town at the Alhambra and Strand Music Halls, &c., than at the theatres, Honourable S. C. B. Ponsonby 178–182. 195–196. 304–314——Larger proportion of women of the town at music halls than at theatres, Sir R. Mayne 1070–1072——Decorous behaviour of women of the town at music halls and dancing rooms, so that witness, as a police functionary, sees no cause for interference with such places, but on the contrary, approves of them, ib. 1072–1080. 1127——Belief that women of the town are not admitted free to the music halls, ib. 1104. 1122——Discontinuance many years ago of the practice of admitting women of the town to theatres, whereas the music halls are now extremely objectionable on this score, Buckstone 3410–3421.

See also Alhambra, 4.

Woodin, Mr. Reference to Mr. Woodin's entertainment as not coming within the interpretation of a dramatic performance, though he considered it advisable to apply for a license, Donne 2321, 2322. 2418–2435.

REPORT.

THE SELECT COMMITTEE appointed to inquire into the manner in which the HOME and FOREIGN TRADE in ANIMALS by SEA and RAILROAD is conducted, and to Report what REGULATIONS, if any, should be enforced, with a view of improving the Treatment of Animals in transit, and to prevent any introduction and spreading of Infectious or Contagious Diseases amongst them, and who were instructed to inquire how far it is desirable to prevent, restrict, or regulate the Slaughter of Animals in the Metropolis, and other populous places;——HAVE considered the Matters referred to them, and have agreed to the following REPORT:

TRANSIT.

FOREIGN cattle and sheep are imported into England and Scotland from Spain, Portugal, France, Belgium, Holland, Schleswig, Denmark, and Sweden, and various parts of Europe.

Cattle and sheep are also carried by sea from Orkney and Shetland to various ports in Scotland, and from Scotland and Ireland to England.

At present, cattle can only be landed at ports approved of by the Customs authorities. The chief ports for foreign cattle are, Liverpool, London, Harwich, Hull, Newcastle, Leith, and Granton; for Irish cattle, Glasgow, Silloth, Morecambe Bay, Liverpool, and Bristol. The Scotch cattle are chiefly taken to Liverpool and London.

The sea-borne cattle arrive generally in good condition. The vessels are, with some exceptions, specially fitted up for the purpose, and have divisions for every four or six animals, windsails or other means to secure ventilation, and in some cases shelter for the cattle on deck. The cattle, however, in well-ventilated vessels appear to suffer from the want of a free current of air when the vessels are coming up the Thames or are waiting for the tide to discharge their cargo, as at Newcastle, Hull, Bristol, and Leith, where the cattle cannot be landed at all states of the tide.

The animals carried between decks are usually tied with their heads to the sides of the vessel, though the best mode is to tie them with their heads to the centre, because this latter method affords greater facility for feeding and watering, and for good ventilation; the Irish store cattle are brought over loose.

There is no rule respecting the numbers put on board, but with the exception of some cases in the Irish and Bremen trade, the vessels do not appear to be overcrowded.

It is in evidence that in Ireland much injury arises to cattle from bad treatment received from drovers, and that cattle landed from Oporto and Spain arrive in a better state than those from Ireland.

In the voyage from Oporto, each animal is allowed space to lie down, and is fed with compressed food, and watered; in other cases the animals are packed close to one another, so as to prevent their lying or being shaken down, and sometimes are neither fed nor watered until landed.

The animals are chiefly made to walk on and off board, and the practice of slinging is nearly abandoned.

It has always been the practice to cleanse the ships, more or less, after each voyage and recently disinfectants have been used.

On the railways cattle are often overcrowded and badly treated, especially in Ireland, and are carried for 36 to 48 hours without being fed or watered.

It is bad for the cattle and troublesome to untruck them, while there is some difficulty in watering them while in a truck, a difficulty, however, which is not insuperable.

A journey, whether by sea or rail, causes cattle to deteriorate in value, and makes them feverish, and tends to produce, if it does not actually cause, the foot and mouth disease. These evils are very much increased if cattle are ill-treated, or not properly watered.

Since the recent Orders in Council, the cattle trucks appear to have been properly cleansed as far as is possible. Possibly the floors might be constructed so as to admit of a more thorough cleansing than is at present practicable.

Your Committee are of opinion that it should be made imperative upon all railway companies or steamboat proprietors who are engaged in the carriage of animals, to thoroughly cleanse and disinfect the trucks, steamboats, and pens used by them after every journey or voyage; and that provision should be made under Government superintendence for the proper ventilation of all vessels employed in carrying cattle by sea; and also that similar provision should be made with respect to the vessels employed in carrying cattle from Ireland and Scotland.

The laws relating to cruelty to animals might be often enforced with advantage in the case of both vessels and railways.

Home Trade.

If London and other large towns could be supplied entirely with meat killed in the country, a great deal of the traffic in cattle, and consequently a great deal of the chance of spreading infectious diseases, would be avoided.

London and other large towns can, except in hot weather, be supplied, to a great extent, with dead meat from a distance; and frequently country-killed meat, though not so good looking, is better and keeps longer than town-killed meat.

At present, the cost of sending carcases by rail is larger than that of sending live cattle; but, with proper arrangements, the cost of carriage might be diminished.

If animals are slaughtered in districts which are thinly peopled, there is great difficulty in disposing of the offal, which does not bear the expense of carriage. It would be a loss to the farmer in such districts to be obliged to send his cattle to distant markets, dead instead of alive, and to the poor of London and large towns, who are great consumers of offal, and who would be deprived of it if those places were supplied by dead meat only.

The trade generally object to a dead-meat system; they say that the supply is very irregular, and that prices are only kept from violent fluctuations by the live-meat market.

Moreover, while admitting that the general demand is tolerably uniform, they say that their individual demand varies, that they can only meet this irregularity by buying cattle and keeping them alive in their own lairs to slaughter when required.

Many butchers and contractors who supply the suburbs of London are dependent for their meat on the metropolitan markets. If they could only obtain dead meat at these markets, it would be impossible to supply meat in as good a condition as they do at present.

Your Committee are of opinion that it is not possible at present to dispense with a live-meat market in the metropolis and other large towns.

Both

Both in London and in the provincial towns, butchers of the suburbs or neighbouring places have been in the habit of purchasing cattle in the live markets, and removing them to their own premises, and keeping them there until required for slaughter. These persons have suffered great inconvenience, and extra expense by the recent prohibition of such removal, by the Orders in Council made in consequence of the cattle plague.

There does not seem to be any general desire permanently to restrain the general home traffic in cattle, but your Committee recommend that the Metropolitan Market should be confined to animals intended for immediate slaughter; and that all animals exhibited therein should be branded, and not allowed to be exhibited for sale in any other market, but should be slaughtered within 10 days, and that, subject to this regulation, the animals might be moved so as to allow butchers to take them to their own places and slaughter them.

Your Committee do not recommend that any permanent restrictions, other than those above suggested, should be placed on the home traffic in cattle. That they are of opinion that the wilful exposure for sale in a public market of animals suffering from infectious disorders, such as rinderpest, sheep pox, pleuro-pneumonia, or glanders, or the knowingly driving such animals upon the public highways, or conveying them upon railway or boat, should be rendered an offence punishable in a summary manner; and, if necessary, a Bill to effect this should be introduced into Parliament.

The great inconvenience of cattle driving in the streets of London and other towns arises partly from cattle being driven to the live-meat markets, and partly from cattle being driven from those markets to private slaughter-houses.

The live markets are not unhealthy in themselves, nor are slaughter-houses, if properly kept, though they usually attract several trades which, in crowded localities, are injurious to public health.

The private slaughter-houses are occupied by two classes, carcase butchers and retail butchers.

The carcase butchers kill animals for the purpose of selling them wholesale in the dead-meat market. This slaughtering could be carried on at a public slaughter-house adjoining the live market as well as at private slaughter-houses; and if this were done the number of cattle driven through the streets would be very much reduced, and the noxious trades which are connected with them would be removed.

The slaughter-houses of the retail butchers stand on a different footing. Their abolition would cause great hardship to many butchers who have slaughter-houses adjoining their shops, and can slaughter animals as they require them under their own superintendence.

For the public interest it would be advisable as far as practicable to adopt a system of public slaughter-houses, and in all cases slaughter-houses should be placed under regulations and proper inspection, as is the case at present in some of the provincial towns; and your Committee are of opinion that power should be given by a general Act to local authorities to acquire land for the erection of slaughter-houses, and to make regulations respecting them.

That the system of inspection at present existing in the City of London should be extended to the whole metropolitan district, although no entirely satisfactory inspection of meat can be carried out until all meat is killed in specified public slaughter-houses.

Foreign Trade.

The importation of foreign cattle is very important, for, as the home supply of cattle is reduced, the importation tends to keep down the price of meat, and it appears impossible to supply dead meat from foreign ports, to any but a very small extent.

The introduction of disease is, to a great extent, prevented by the system of inspection, which makes importers careful to send sound animals. The inspection is at present carried out effectually, though the accommodation at some wharves is deficient.

Diseased animals are slaughtered, but the rest of the cargo is sold, except in cases of rinderpest, when the whole cargo is slaughtered. Store stock affected with foot and mouth disease are, in some cases, detained until cured.

Inspectors cannot discover undeveloped seeds of disease in an animal, and therefore with the view of preventing the importation of disease from abroad, many persons are desirous of placing store cattle in quarantine, and of maintaining the present regulation as to slaughtering fat cattle at the port of discharge within four days from their arrival.

The compulsory slaughter of all foreign cattle at the port of discharge, under the recent Orders in Council, has prevented the importation of any store cattle or sheep (which was an increasing trade), much to the detriment of the Scotch farmers who have been unable to stock their lands, and has diminished the importation of fat cattle, a trade which would otherwise have increased.

The temporary inconvenience of insufficient accommodation for slaughtering at the wharves could no doubt be removed, but the evil of causing a large amount of additional slaughtering in large towns, as Liverpool and Hull, is more difficult to deal with.

Compulsory slaughter at a port, like compulsory slaughter at a market, is more expensive to the butcher, hampers the trade, and will diminish the importation, and raise the price to the consumer.

Your Committee recommend that all imported fat cattle should be subject to the same rule as English fat cattle when exposed in a market.

That the Privy Council shall declare any country, in which they have reason to believe the cattle plague is existing, to be an infected country, and to prohibit the importation altogether of animals therefrom, or to declare that such importation shall only take place at certain ports, and that animals so imported shall not be taken into any market, but be slaughtered at the port of entry within four days of their being landed.

Besides the general question of slaughtering at the port of discharge, it was suggested that there might be a separate market for foreign fat stock in London close to the wharves, and that foreign stock might be excluded from the metropolitan market, or on the banks of the Thames.

The plan would prevent the chance of introducing infection from foreign cattle into the Metropolitan Market, and would stop the inconvenience of driving cattle through the streets from Blackwall to Copenhagen Fields, many of which are brought back to Whitechapel.

It is objected to by Dr. Letheby, by several inspectors, and by nearly all the butchers and salesmen who alleged that the separation of the home and foreign markets would be inconvenient, would decrease the competition, and tend to diminish the importation; while by giving additional trouble to the butchers it would increase the price and would "give an unfair advantage to owners of English stock."

Although to some extent one class of butchers purchase foreign, and another class, English fat cattle, yet there are many who purchase both. The separation of the markets would exclude these men from one or the other market.

Such a separation of the two markets seems therefore undesirable. The evil of the cattle driving in the streets might be much diminished if the cattle were landed lower down the river than at present, and brought up by rail, while this course would also bring the cattle in better condition, and allow of better accommodation at the wharves.

The chance of infection will also be much diminished if the Metropolitan market were made exclusively a fat meat market, as in that case all the cattle would be, according to our previous recommendations, killed within 10 days.

It

It seems desirable, where practicable, in large towns to separate the fat and store cattle markets.

Any system of quarantine will require extensive accommodation at the port of arrival, and in some cases (as Liverpool and London) there will be great difficulty in providing this.

The objections urged to any system of quarantine are the expense, the interference with trade, and the deterioration of the animal during the quarantine, while it is said that the animal might catch the disease from the place where it is quarantined. A quarantine would, no doubt, act as a tax on importation, and if it did not stop importation altogether, would diminish it, and raise the price to the purchaser.

It is alleged on the other hand that a purchaser would gladly pay an increased price, as he would have a kind of warranty of the soundness of the animal; but it may be doubted whether the quarantine furnishes an adequate security that the animal is free from disease.

The only disease for which quarantine appears to be at all reasonable, is the rinderpest.

Where countries like Spain or Denmark are not only free from rinderpest, but are not a channel for the exportation of cattle from infected inland countries, there seems to be no reason for a quarantine for cattle exported from them.

Your Committee are of opinion that a permanent department of the Council Office should be appointed to keep up communications with the Board of Customs and Her Majesty's Consuls abroad, in order to have accurate accounts as to the existence or otherwise of the cattle plague, upon whose recommendation the Council could, if they thought fit, order a quarantine, or impose such restrictions upon the trade in animals as circumstances might appear to them to justify.

Draft Report proposed by the Chairman, read a first time, as follows:

" TRANSIT

"TRANSIT.

"1. Foreign cattle and sheep are imported into England and Scotland from Spain, France, Belgium, Holland, Schleswig, Denmark, and Sweden.

"2. Cattle and sheep are also carried by sea from Orkney and Shetland to various ports in Scotland, and from Scotland and Ireland to England.

"3. Under the present restrictions, cattle can only be landed at ports allowed by the Customs' authorities. The chief ports for foreign cattle are Liverpool, London, Harwich, Hull, Newcastle, Leith, and Granton; for Irish cattle, Glasgow, Silloth, Morecambe Bay, Liverpool, and Bristol. The Scotch cattle are chiefly taken to Liverpool and London.

"4. The sea-borne cattle arrive generally in good condition. The vessels are, with some exceptions, specially fitted up for the purpose, and have divisions for every four or six animals, windsails or other means to secure ventilation, and in some cases shelter for the cattle on deck. The cattle, however, in well-ventilated vessels appear to suffer from the want of a free current of air when the vessels are waiting for the tide to discharge their cargo, as at Newcastle, Hull, Bristol, and Leith, where the cattle cannot be landed at all states of the tide.

"5. The animals are usually tied with their heads to the sides of the vessel, though the best mode is to tie them with their heads to the centre; the Irish store cattle are brought over loose.

"6. There is no rule respecting the numbers put on board, but with the exception of some cases in the Irish and Bremen trade, they do not appear to be overcrowded.

"7. In the voyage from Oporto, each animal is allowed space to lie down, and is fed with compressed food, and watered; in other cases the animals are packed close to one another, so as to prevent their lying or being shaken down, and generally are neither fed nor watered until landed.

"8. The animals are chiefly walked on and off board, and the practice of slinging is nearly abandoned.

"9. It has always been the practice to cleanse the ships, more or less, after each voyage, and recently disinfectants have been used.

"10. On the railways cattle are often overcrowded and badly treated, especially in Ireland, and are carried for 36 to 48 hours without being fed or watered.

"11. It is bad for the cattle and troublesome to untruck them, while there is some difficulty in watering them while in a truck, a difficulty, however, which is not insuperable.

"12. A journey, whether by sea or rail, causes cattle to deteriorate in value, and makes them feverish, and tends to produce, if it does not actually cause, the foot and mouth disease. These evils are very much increased if cattle are ill-treated, or not properly watered.

"13. Since the recent Orders in Council, the cattle trucks appear to have been properly cleansed as far as is possible. The form of truck admits of great improvement, and possibly the floor might be also constructed so as to admit of a more thorough cleansing than is possible with the present construction.

"14. Several salesmen and inspectors have recommended that the vessels which carry cattle should be subjected to some Government superintendence. Legal restrictions on the carriage of cattle by sea do not appear from the evidence to be needed; regulations, especially with regard to watering and disinfecting, would be very difficult to enforce; and as it is the direct interest of the shipowner as well as of the shipper to carry the cattle in as good a condition as possible, your Committee think that the expected advantages are not sufficient to outweigh the general objections to Government interference.

"15. In the case of the railways, it may be worthy of consideration whether some regulations might not advantageously be made respecting the treatment of cattle and sheep in transit by railway in the United Kingdom.

"16. The laws relating to cruelty to animals might be often enforced with advantage in the case of both vessels and railways.

"HOME TRADE.

"17. If London and other large towns could be supplied entirely with meat killed in the country, a great deal of the traffic in cattle, and consequently a great deal of the chance of spreading infectious diseases, would be avoided, while the other evils, viz., the driving cattle through the streets and the town slaughter-houses, would be avoided.

"18. London and other large towns can, in the absence of hot weather, be supplied with dead meat from a distance; and frequently country-killed meat, though not so good looking, is better and keeps longer than town-killed meat.

"19. At present, the cost of sending meat by rail is larger than that of sending live meat, and the actual charge made by the railway must always be higher, as the carriage of dead meat involves more labour and risk to the railway company; but with proper organisation and arrangements, such as are carried out by the Bristol and Exeter Railway Company, the cost of carriage might be so diminished as not to affect the price.

"20. If animals are slaughtered in districts which are not in the neighbourhood of large towns, or which are thinly peopled, there is great difficulty in disposing of the offal, which, though valuable in London, does not bear the expense of carriage. It would be a loss to the farmer in such districts to be obliged to send up his cattle dead instead of alive.

"21. The offal also is largely consumed by the poor in London and the large towns, who would be deprived of it if those places are supplied by dead meat only.

"22. The trade generally object to a dead-meat system; they say that the supply is very irregular, and that prices are only kept from violent fluctuations by the live-meat market.

"23. Moreover, while admitting that the general demand is tolerably uniform, they say that their individual demand varies, that they can only meet this irregularity by buying cattle and keeping them alive in their own fairs to slaughter when required.

"24. Many butchers and contractors who supply the suburbs of London are dependent for their meat on the metropolitan meat market. If they could only obtain dead meat at this market, it would be impossible to supply meat in as good a condition as they do at present.

"25. In hot weather, at present, the supply of country-killed meat in London ceases almost entirely for a week, or more, at a time. In all cases there seems more risk, and less profit, in a dead meat trade, so that the price to the consumer would necessarily be raised.

"26. Your Committee are of opinion that it is not possible to dispense with a live-meat market in the metropolis and other large towns.

"27. Both in London and in the provincial towns, butchers of the suburbs or neighbouring places have been in the habit of purchasing cattle in the live-meat markets, and removing them to their own premises, and keeping them there until required for slaughter. These persons have suffered great inconvenience, and extra expense by the prohibition of such removal.

"28. There does not seem to be any general desire permanently to restrain the home traffic in cattle, or any reason for doing so; and your Committee recommend that English cattle, when exposed in the metropolitan or other markets, should be marked for slaughter, and should not be again exposed in any market, but should be slaughtered within a given time, not less than a week; but that, subject to this regulation, the cattle should be moved so as to allow butchers to take them to their own places and slaughter them as required.

"29. The question of the extent to which the regulations respecting the movement and slaughter of cattle have affected the price of meat, is complicated by so many considerations as to make it impossible to determine it with any certainty.

"30. Your Committee do not recommend that any permanent restrictions, other than those above suggested, should be placed on the home traffic in cattle; but they are of opinion that for any person knowingly to expose a diseased animal for sale should be made penal.

"31. The great inconvenience of cattle driving in the streets of London and other towns arises partly from cattle being driven to the live-meat markets, and partly from cattle being driven from those markets to private slaughter-houses.

"32. The live-meat markets are not unhealthy in themselves, and, for the reesons given above, appear indispensable. Slaughter-houses, if properly kept, are not necessarily unhealthy, though they usually attract several noxious trades.

"34. The carcase butchers kill animals for the purpose of selling them wholesale in the dead-meat market. This slaughtering could be carried on at a public slaughter-house adjoining the live-meat market as well as at private slaughter-houses; and if this were done the number of cattle driven through the streets would be very much reduced.

"35. The slaughter-houses of the retail butchers stand on a different footing. Their abolition would cause great hardship to many butchers who have slaughter-houses adjoining their shops, and can slaughter animals as they require them under their own superintendence; and it would be necessary, in any case, to have slaughter-houses in several parts of the town, so that the driving of cattle through the streets would be but slightly diminished.

"36. For the public interest it would be advisable as far as practicable to adopt a system of public slaughter-houses, and in all cases slaughter-houses should be placed under regulations and proper inspection, as is the case at present in some of the provincial towns.

"37. No proper inspection of meat can be carried out until all meat is killed in specified public slaughter-houses.

"Foreign Trade.

"38. The importation of foreign cattle is very important, for, as the home supply of cattle is reduced, the importation tends to keep down the price of meat, and it appears impossible to supply dead meat from foreign ports, to any but a very small extent.

"39. The introduction of disease is, to a great extent, prevented by the system of inspection, which makes importers careful to send sound animals. The inspection is at present carried out effectually, though the accommodation at some wharves is deficient.

"40. Diseased animals are slaughtered, but the rest of the cargo is sold, except in cases of pleuro-pneumonia and rinderpest, when the whole cargo is slaughtered. Store stock affected with foot and mouth disease are, in some cases, detained until cured.

"41. Inspectors

"41. Inspectors cannot discover undeveloped seeds of disease in an animal, and therefore, with the view of preventing the importation of disease from abroad, many persons are desirous of placing store cattle in quarantine, and of maintaining the present regulation as to slaughtering fat cattle at the port of discharge within four days from their arrival.

"42. The compulsory slaughter of all foreign cattle at the port of discharge, under the recent Orders in Council, has prevented the importation of any store cattle or sheep (which was an increasing trade), much to the detriment of the Scotch farmers who have been unable to stock their lands, and has diminished the importation of fat cattle, a trade which would otherwise have increased.

"43. The temporary inconvenience of insufficient accommodation for slaughtering at the wharves could no doubt be removed, but the evil of causing a large amount of additional slaughtering in large towns, as Liverpool and Hull, is more difficult to deal with.

"44. Compulsory slaughter at a port, like compulsory slaughter at a market, is more expensive to the butcher, hampers the trade, and will diminish the importation, and raise the price to the consumer. The foreign trade is uncertain in amount, and if a large cargo of animals comes in hot weather, it is impossible to dispose of them as dead meat, while it is impossible for a butcher to buy them and keep them alive until he requires them. Although, as a rule, fat cattle, when imported, are slaughtered in three or four days after their arrival, the obligation to slaughter places the importer in the hands of the butcher.

"45. Your Committee recommend that all imported fat cattle should be subject to the same rules as English fat cattle when exposed in a market; that is to say, marked for slaughter within a week, and not allowed to be exposed in any other market.

"46. The butchers would be satisfied with this, and coupled with an inspection at the port, it would probably afford a fair precaution against introduction of disease.

"47. The additional precaution of having special trucks for the conveyance of animals so marked might also be adopted.

"48. Besides the general question of slaughtering at the port of discharge, it was suggested that there might be a separate market for foreign fat stock in London close to the wharves, and that foreign stock might be excluded from the metropolitan market.

"49. The plan would prevent the chance of introducing infection from foreign cattle into the Metropolitan Meat Market, and would stop the inconvenience of driving cattle through the streets from Blackwall to Copenhagen Fields, many of which are brought back to Whitechapel.

"50. It is objected to by Dr. Letheby, by several inspectors, and by nearly all the butchers and salesmen, who alleged that the separation of the home and foreign markets would be inconvenient, would decrease the competition, and tend to diminish the importation; while by giving additional trouble to the butchers it would increase the price and would 'give an unfair advantage to owners of English stock.'

"51. Although to some extent one class of butchers purchase foreign, and another class, English fat cattle, yet there are many who purchase both. The separation of the markets would exclude these men from one or the other market.

"52. Such a separation of the two markets seems therefore undesirable. The evil of the cattle driving in the streets might be much diminished if the cattle were landed lower down the river and brought up by rail, while this course would also bring the cattle in better condition, and allow of better accommodation at the wharves.

"53. The chance of infection would also be much diminished if the Metropolitan Meat Market were made exclusively a fat meat market, as in that case all the cattle would be, according to our previous recommendations, killed within a week.

"54. It seems desirable throughout the country to separate the fat and store cattle markets. It is easy, by compulsory slaughter, to exclude store cattle from fat meat markets, but it seems difficult to prevent a store cattle market from becoming a fat cattle market also.

"55. Any system of quarantine will require extensive accommodation at the port of arrival, and in some cases (as Liverpool and London) there will be great difficulty in providing this.

"56. The objections urged to any system of quarantine are the expense, the interference with trade, and the deterioration of the animal during the quarantine, while it is said that the animal might catch the disease from the place where it is quarantined. A quarantine would, no doubt, act as a tax on importation, and if it did not stop importation altogether, would diminish it, and raise the price to the purchaser.

"57. It is alleged on the other hand that a purchaser would gladly pay an increased price, as he would have a kind of warranty of the soundness of the animal; but it may be doubted whether the quarantine furnishes an adequate security that the animal is free from disease.

"58. The only disease for which quarantine appears to be at all reasonable, is the rinderpest, and there appears no reason for a quarantine in the case of any other animals than store cattle.

"59. Where countries like Spain or Denmark are not only free from rinderpest, but are not a channel for the exportation of cattle from infected inland countries, there seems to be no reason for a quarantine for cattle exported from them.

"60. It might properly be left to the Privy Council to order a quarantine in cases where it appeared to be required, on account of the danger of an introduction of the rinderpest, but in all other cases your Committee recommend that no quarantine should be enforced except in the case of an animal actually diseased."

Draft Report proposed by Mr. Dent, read a first time, as follows:

"1. YOUR Committee have examined several witnesses connected with the home and foreign trade in animals, members of the medical profession, veterinary surgeons, graziers, butchers, railway managers, and steamboat proprietors; and are of opinion—

"2. That in ordinary times it is inexpedient to interfere with the movement or sale of live animals, the produce of the United Kingdom.

"3. At the same time they would suggest that it is desirable that the exposure for sale in a public market of animals suffering from infectious disorders, such as rinderpest, sheep pox, pleuro-pneumonia, foot and mouth disease, scab, or glanders, or the driving such animals upon the public highways, should be rendered an offence punishable in a summary manner; and, if necessary, a Bill to effect this should be introduced into Parliament.

"4. That it should be imperative upon all railway companies or steamboat proprietors who are engaged in the carriage of animals, to thoroughly cleanse and disinfect the trucks, steamboats, and pens used by them after every journey; and that the Board of Customs should regulate the number of cattle to be conveyed, and take care that proper provision be made for ventilation, in all vessels employed in the foreign trade in cattle; and also that similar provision should be made with respect to the vessels employed in carrying cattle from Ireland.

"5. That the Metropolitan Market should be confined to animals intended for immediate slaughter; and that all animals exhibited therein should be branded, and not allowed to be exhibited for sale in any other market, but be slaughtered within eight days of their exhibition in the Metropolitan Market.

"6. That in case of rinderpest appearing in the United Kingdom, the Privy Council should have power to declare any district in the United Kingdom an infected district, and by Order in Council to stop all fairs and markets therein, and to place such restrictions upon the movement of cattle within and from such districts as they may think necessary.

"7. That a special department of the Council Office should have charge of these duties, and should keep up communications with the Board of Customs and Her Majesty's Consuls abroad, in order to have accurate accounts as to the existence or otherwise of the cattle plague.

"8. With respect to the trade in foreign animals, your Committee are of opinion that generally the foreign cattle and sheep imported into this country are very healthy, and that it would be most undesirable to place upon them any restrictions which might check their free importation; but they recommend—

"9. That the Privy Council should have power to declare any country, in which they have reason to believe the cattle plague is existing, to be an infected country, and to prohibit the importation altogether of animals therefrom, or to declare that such importation shall only take place at certain ports, and that animals so imported shall not be taken into any market, but be slaughtered at the port of entry within four days of their being landed.

"10. With respect to foreign cattle or sheep arriving from all other countries, the Committee do not recommend that any restrictions shall be placed upon them other than those which are placed upon the cattle and sheep of the United Kingdom.

"11. The Committee have taken evidence on the subject of dead-meat markets, and the supply of large towns by such means. Much evidence has been adduced in favour of this trade, and the Committee recommend that every facility should be given to the local authorities to provide markets and other accommodation for it.

"12. They have also taken evidence as to the separation of the foreign and English cattle and sheep markets in the Metropolis, but are of opinion that the weight of evidence is against this course.

"13. With respect to the establishment of public slaughter-houses, the Committee are of opinion, that although in the Metropolis this could not be effected without great inconvenience and difficulty, both to the consumer and the butcher, in all other towns above a certain population the establishment of such slaughter-houses is to be recommended; and they are of opinion that power should be given to local authorities, if they think fit, to purchase land and erect the necessary buildings for these purposes."

Motion made, and Question, That the Draft Report proposed by the Chairman be now read a second time and considered paragraph by paragraph, put and agreed to.

Paragraph 1, amended, and agreed to.

Paragraph 2, agreed to.

Paragraphs 3 to 8, amended, and agreed to.

Paragraphs 9 to 12, agreed to.

Paragraph 13, amended, and agreed to.

Paragraphs 38 and 39, agreed to.

Paragraph 40 amended, and agreed to.

Paragraphs 41, 42, and 43, agreed to.

Paragraph 44 amended, and agreed to.

Paragraph 45—Amendment proposed in line 2, to leave out the words "in a market," in order to insert the words "in the Metropolitan Market"—(Mr. Stanhope)—instead thereof. —Question put, That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the paragraph:—The Committee divided:

Ayes (3.)	Noes (3.)
Mr. Carnegie.	Mr. Stanhope.
Mr. Dent.	Mr. Leader.
Sir M. W. Ridley.	Mr. Egerton.

Whereupon the Chairman declared himself with the Ayes.

Another amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "market" to the end of the paragraph—(Mr. Dent).—Question, That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the paragraph,—put and negatived.—Paragraph, as amended, agreed to.

Paragraph 46, disagreed to.

Paragraph 47, disagreed to.

Paragraphs 48 and 49, amended, and agreed to.

Paragraphs 50 and 51, agreed to.

Paragraphs 52 and 53, amended, and agreed to.

Paragraph 54, disagreed to.

Paragraph 55, 56, and 57, agreed to.

Paragraph 58, amended, and agreed to.

Paragraph 59, agreed to.

Paragraph 60, disagreed to.

Amendment proposed, to insert the following paragraph: "It is in evidence that in England much injury arises to cattle from bad treatment received from drovers, and that cattle landed from Oporto and Spain arrive in a better state than those from Ireland" —(Mr. Leader).—Question, That this paragraph be inserted in the proposed Report—put, and agreed to.

Question, That this Report, as amended, be the Report of the Committee to the House —put, and agreed to.

Ordered, To Report, together with the Minutes of Evidence, and an Appendix.

MINUTES OF EVIDENCE.

Monday, 30th April 1866.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Mr. Carnegie.	Mr. Graham.
Mr. Cogan.	Mr. Graves.
Mr. Dent.	Mr. Hunt.
Mr. Edward Egerton.	Sir M. W. Ridley.
Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.	Mr. Alderman Salomons.
Mr. James Fergusson.	Mr. Banks Stanhope.

THE RIGHT HON. MILNER GIBSON, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. PATRICK DANIELS, called in; and Examined.

Mr. P. Daniels. 30 April 1866.

1. Chairman.] WHAT are you?—A merchant and shipping agent at Harwich.

2. Are you connected with the Great Eastern line?—For two years I and my partner were agents for the company at the formation of their passenger and cattle traffic from Rotterdam and Antwerp to Harwich; we were agents from the time they commenced their traffic.

3. Are you employed at this time?—I am not.

4. Have you any knowledge of cattle traffic from Holland to Harwich?—I have been resident at Harwich for 27 or 28 years, and I have generally superintended the entire cattle traffic for two years.

5. Can you tell the Committee what quantity of cattle has been brought in the steamers from Holland to Harwich?—I can hardly give you that now, but generally speaking the boats are loaded as fully as they can be fairly loaded each voyage. It is very rarely that they come with light cargoes, but I cannot give the exact number from memory.

6. What kind of cattle?—All sorts of cattle; fat cattle, store cattle, sheep, pigs, and calves; sometimes about 300 or 400 calves. Some boats will bring 2,000 and odd sheep, 200 or 300 pigs, and 300 head of cattle.

7. Milch cows?—Yes; a large number of milch cows.

8. Mr. Hunt.] Are they fat calves?—Yes; and some store calves, about a year old, and two years old.

9. Chairman.] What has been the course of the trade; what has become of the cattle when they have been landed at Harwich?—The cattle principally went to London. Myself and partner established a market in Harwich, and at one time it bade fair to be a very prosperous one, and would have been of much benefit to the country, as we used to send beasts all over the country in fact, by railway; but we broke down rather for want of boat accommodation, and were obliged to give it up to a great extent, and afterwards to discontinue it; the traffic was more than the railway company were able to take, and they did not consider it desirable to give us a preference where others had not it, and the consequence was, that cattle that we had bought and had had bought for us on the other side, had to remain on the other side at great expense, in order to enable them to bring cattle for other parties; and that was the cause of the Harwich market being principally done away with.

10. It was for the London market?—Entirely.

11. Mr. Dent.] Yours were principally store cattle?—Yes, that was in connection with ourselves.

12. Chairman.] There was only an inconsiderable portion of all these that were disposed of in the neighbourhood of Harwich?—Not in a general way; we have had one entire cargo at one time disposed of at Harwich, but as a rule, they went to London.

13. What was the condition generally, of the cattle when they arrived at Harwich?—Very good indeed; there were two or three exceptions, when the ship encountered a very severe gale of wind coming over; then there were some few dead; but taking the general run of the two years I was connected with the company, I do not think the whole number brought dead into port amounted to 20.

14. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Winter and summer together?—Yes.

15. Chairman.] During the whole two years?—During the whole two years.

16. Used the boats to carry any cattle on deck?—Always on deck, and below as well; part of the hold was taken up for dead cargo, and part for cattle, and the decks were entirely filled.

30 April 1866.

17. Mr. Hunt.] Were these vessels constructed for carrying cattle alone?—Not for carrying cattle alone; cattle, goods, cargo, and passengers.

18. They were vessels belonging to the Great Eastern Railway Company?—They were vessels belonging to the Great Eastern Railway Company; and very fine vessels they are; better there cannot possibly be.

19. Do any vessels belonging to the Company trade between the ports you have mentioned with cattle?—There were some that the Company chartered.

20. No other Company or individual carried cattle between these ports?—No other.

21. Sir M. W. Ridley.] How many were there?—Five.

22. How many voyages did each make a week?—Two voyages.

23. Mr. Edward Egerton.] The cattle trade between those ports was the creation of the Great Eastern Railway Company?—Yes.

24. There was none existing there before?—None before; it commenced two years last August.

25. Chairman.] Were those cattle which were brought in dead, killed by the effect of the gale and bad weather, or did they die from other causes on board?—There were various causes; some had been very tired when they came on board, and could not stand the voyage, and would get down, and if the vessel rolled much in a heavy sea, that would have some effect on them; but it is very rare, indeed, to have a dead beast on board.

26. Mr. Hunt.] What was the average length of your voyage?—I think you may calculate the sea-voyage was eight to nine hours generally; doing it very comfortably indeed in 11 hours from quay to quay.

27. Has there been any dead meat traffic during those two years?—Yes; a great deal, more particularly in pigs, and sometimes in calves. At the present time there is not a heavy traffic, but there has been considerable traffic in calves.

28. Does the meat always arrive in good condition?—Very good.

29. Mr. Edward Egerton.] What is the largest number of animals you ever brought over in any one ship?—From 2,000 to 3,000 sheep, when they have brought sheep alone.

30. And other beasts?—About 300 beasts.

31. How many of those would be on deck?—Well, I can hardly tell. I should think they would take from 80 to 100 on deck. They are very large boats; very fine boats indeed.

32. Sir M. W. Ridley.] Have you ever heard of any of the cargo of beasts in the ship, being thrown overboard from stress of weather, to secure the safety of the vessel and of the cargo?—There has never been an instance in my time. One of the chartered boats got ashore on Brill Bar, and some of those cattle were put overboard.

33. Chairman.] Supposing a boat arrives with some dead beasts on board, who bears the loss?—The shipper on the other side; that is an arrangement made with the shipper and the consignee; sometimes the insurance clubs. There have been cases where they have been insured, and then they fall on the insurance club.

34. The freight is the same to the shipowner, whatever be the condition in which he delivers the cattle, is it not?—Yes; that is an arrangement. If there has been any great loss I think that sometimes the company have met the parties by allowing some part of the freight, but otherwise as soon as the steamer takes the animals on board they are subject to the freight.

35. Mr. Hunt.] Is there any restriction put on the number of animals taken on board each vessel?—No; they put on board what the ship can fairly stow.

36. Is there a fixed number, I mean beyond which they are not allowed to go?—There is no fixed number.

37. Who does it rest with; does it rest with the captain of each vessel?—The captain has liberty to refuse to take any more when he pleases; the captain has the entire control of the ship.

38. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Is there any fixed space allotted; so many cubic feet?—The boats are fitted up with stalls, which take about six beasts in one stall, so that they fill these stalls round and the shippers ship these; on deck they are the same.

39. Mr. Hunt.] Is the freight paid per head, or by cargo?—The freight is paid per head.

40. Mr. Graham.] Have you a lien on the living beasts for the freight for the dead ones in case there are any dead ones?—I cannot say that there is so, as a rule.

41. I mean could they refuse to receive the delivery of the cargo, and so save paying freight for it?—If the dead beasts are unfit for human food, the Custom House authorities order the beasts to be sent out to sea, and thrown overboard.

42. And then there is no freight paid?—Then there is no freight paid.

43. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Is there any officer on the shore to see that the vessel is not overloaded?—Only the company's agents.

44. Nobody on behalf of the public?—Nobody on behalf of the public except the parties themselves to whom the cattle belong.

45. There is no Custom-house agent?—I do not think the Custom-house agents have anything to do on the other side.

46. There is no Government officer to regulate it?—There is not.

47. Chairman.] If the steamship was so loaded that some of the cattle arrived in a state unfit for human food, then the steamship owners would suffer a loss?—Yes, they would lose the freight.

48. You say they would not receive the freight?—I think not. I think that is matter more for arrangement with the shippers and the owner of the vessels. I think strictly speaking by law they can claim their freight, but I do not think it is at all times done. I think they generally pay the freight for what they deliver.

49. Mr. Hunt.] Do you know what the arrangements are in the Dutch ports for the accommodation of cattle before they are shipped?—Yes. There are stables built close by the shipping places, and the beasts are put in there until the steamer is ready to take them on board. I suppose it takes about three hours to load a ship.

50. Do they keep them there for any number of days?—That depends entirely on circumstances. Some of the beasts come a long way by railway, then they are unloaded out of the trucks and put on board, and given a little hay and watered, perhaps they stay about three hours. Up the country some few miles there are large stables built expressly to relieve the beasts in the course of their railway transit.

51. Are the beasts untrucked and put into stables?—The beasts are untrucked and put into stables.

52. At what places?—I cannot really give you the exact name now, but it is about 60 miles up the country.

53. Is that under any State regulation?—I think that the beasts are not allowed to travel more than a certain distance by rail without being fed.

54. Under the law there?—Under the law there; and there are stables built to take them in, that would take as many as 500 or 1,000 of these beasts at a time. They are fed and watered by the peasants in the village, for which they have to pay a small toll.

55. Who are responsible for the untrucking of the animals?—If the railway company bring them by trucks, they are responsible on the other side. If the company bring the beasts by trucks, then the railway company by their own servants unload these trucks, and there are drovers there who drive them on board the ship, and then they are tied up.

56. Are drovers sent with the animals, so as to see that the animals are put into the same trucks again?—That I cannot say. When they are taken out at Rotterdam, close by the wharf where the Company's boats go, the Great Eastern Company's boats run direct up to the station of the Dutch-Rhenish Railway in Rotterdam, and they are driven from those trucks direct into the boats.

57. You say they only go 60 miles without being untrucked for the purpose of being fed and watered; what security is there that the drover does not get them mixed, and that the same lot is put into the truck as came out of it?—You would not get the same beasts into the same truck, perhaps, but they all come in the same herd.

58. But, supposing that half-a-dozen people send animals, and they are untrucked at one place for the purpose of being fed and watered, how do they arrange that the lots are not mixed?—That is a question I cannot answer.

59. Mr. Dent.] Who built these large stables, and to whom do they belong; the Company or the Government?—They belong to a private individual, and they take them in at a toll of so much a head.

60. Mr. Hunt.] By the law of the State, they cannot travel above a certain distance without being fed and watered; is not that so?—I cannot give you the detail of that matter.

61. Could you furnish the name of a person on the other side who could give it us?—I think I could.

62. Sir M. W. Ridley.] What you have said applies to those merely travelling from Holland; do any of those come from Germany?—I am speaking of the German beasts, not the Dutch beasts.

63. Which come to Holland from any part of Germany?—Yes.

64. Mr. Hunt.] You were speaking of the regulations in Holland with regard to these foreign cattle coming through?—Yes. Messrs. Hudigan and Peters, the agents to the Company, could give you every information as regards that.

65. Mr. Edward Egerton.] What were your particular duties?—To receive the cattle at Harwich, to forward them on to the railway, to attend to the passengers, and receive the goods outward bound as well. Any cattle being disabled, or not in a fit state to go out, were always left to ourselves, to order them to be slaughtered.

66. Did you conceive that you had the power of ordering any beasts to be slaughtered?—Entirely.

67. I think you said you had never exercised that power yourself?—We have had accidents, with broken legs and so on, when sheep have come, and calves and bullocks. We have had to do that in many instances.

68. When you say "we" who do you mean?—I am speaking of myself and my partner; there are two of us.

69. Were you employed exclusively by the Railway Company?—We were employed exclusively by the Railway Company.

70. Mr. Hunt.] There is a Government inspection at the port of Harwich, is there not?—Yes, every animal is inspected before it is allowed to leave the place, by daylight.

71. What accommodation is there for the animals during the inspection; are they on the quay?—About 100 yards from where they are landed they are driven into a yard which is well watered, foddered, and fed. That yard will afford accommodation for from 500 to 700 or 800 bullocks and 2,000 sheep.

72. Are they always watered on leaving the ship until they are sent on by rail?—Always.

73. What sort of inspection do they actually undergo?—There is a member of the college of veterinary surgeons who is always in attendance, and who examines every head of cattle.

74. What time does he give to each head of cattle on an average?—I cannot exactly tell you what time, it takes some little time: frequently he is there, and as each beast is unloaded, he looks at them as they come out of the ship; that is his general custom, and sometimes he is not there, but inspects them in the yard.

75. His usual practice is to inspect them as they come from the ship?—To inspect them as they come from the ship.

76. Do they merely pass before him?—They are tied up, so that he can mouth them.

77. So that he can mouth every single beast?—Yes.

78. Does he examine the sheep too?—He turns up a great many of the sheep, and examines their wool.

79. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Is that always the practice, or has it only been the practice since the cattle plague?—That has always been the practice since the commencement.

81. Mr. Graves.] Where there any animals suffocated in that case?—I think that they lost 6 or 10 sheep coming over, but sheep are things you can hardly account for. They lay down and get trodden on by the others, whether they are thick or thin. This was one occasion on one of the traffic boats, which was a screw boat, and not a boat at all adapted for the trade; it may have been in the cattle trade before. I forget whether it was or not, and she brought in several sheep dead.

82. Chairman.] Do you think it would be desirable to limit the number of cattle to be conveyed by any particular vessel under regulations by the Board of Trade?—I think not; I think if the beasts are properly made fast, they are rather a protection to each other by being stowed pretty closely on board, because in that case they support each other. There are only 6 in a compartment. If the beasts get down they are sure to be injured; but as long as they can stand on their feet, they are perfectly right.

83. Mr. Edward Egerton.] As a general rule, do cattle on the deck, or under the deck, come in the best order?—I do not know that I noticed any difference. I have seen them come in capital order on deck, quite warm and comfortable, and the same below.

84. Are the deaths greater below than on deck?—No; the cattle are put in as they happen to come on board; they finish loading below first, and then place them on deck, and sometimes there have been one or two on deck which have died. I do not think there is any difference at all.

85. Sir M. W. Ridley.] Is there any deck-covering or protection to these animals against the sun in very hot weather, tarpauling?—Not on deck, they have very high bulwarks. The bulwarks are at least six feet high, and sufficient to protect them. The voyages are made principally by night.

86. Mr. Graham.] Are the vessels loaded principally by slinging the cattle?—There are two of the ships which load them by slinging, and the others let them walk down.

87. Mr. Edward Egerton.] How many rows are there on deck?—Two rows, one on each side of the bulwarks.

88. Sir M. W. Ridley.] Do you consider there would be any difficulty in carrying an equal number of sheep in any cargo, if the space was properly subdivided in divisions for the sheep?—They are all divided.

89. Each sheep is separated from the other?—Not each sheep. Take a place about the size of this room; that would be divided into six compartments, the same as you would see them in a common market. It would never do to have the deck flush, so that they could go about; because then they would all get down to leeward.

90. But could not the sheep be divided sheep by sheep, and so make them perfectly comfortable without crushing each other, in the same way as you see sheep stall fed?—I think that will hardly do, and I do not think there would be any good arise from it. It is seldom indeed any accident happens. If you take a great number of sheep coming over, 2,500 in a ship, you may get the proportion; not above one or two die.

91. Mr. Dent.] Is there any regulation as to the cleaning the ship when the cargo is discharged?—The ships are all cleaned as soon as the cargo is out. A set of men are kept on purpose.

92. Is there any regulation by the Customs' Board, or the Government officers?—No.

93. There is no inspection of them?—No inspection.

94. Chairman.] What do they clean the hold of the ship with when the cattle have been discharged?—They are washed out with quick lime.

95. Lime water?—Yes; after every voyage. It has been so since the cattle plague.

96. What was the rule before?—The ships being new, the bottoms are all washed out perfectly clean, and sawdust put to them. There was a thick layer of sawdust put on the floor, and the decks are all washed out regularly with water.

97. But you did not use any lime before the cattle plague?—Not after every voyage.

98. Mr. Hunt.] I want to know, with regard to the accommodation of cattle at the port of Harwich, whether it will be advisable to keep cattle there in quarantine; is there space enough on the quay?—There is available room, at the present moment, of 50 acres, which could be had in two days.

99. Who does that belong to, a private individual?—Private individuals have it. It is principally the Government land, let to private individuals, and some of it is private land.

100. What is your opinion of the desirability of placing all animals in quarantine before they go inland, in order to prevent disease coming from abroad?—I think for store cattle that would be a very good thing, and a thing that ought to be done. I do not think any foreign beasts ought to be allowed to come into the country, without placing them under quarantine, at the present time.

101. What length of quarantine would you give them?—From 10 to 14 days.

102. Chairman.] You say "at the present time;" would you make that a permanent regulation?—We are always subject, more or less, to disease from foreign beasts more than from our own beasts. I should be almost inclined to say, we should. I think it would be a safeguard.

103. Most of the cattle disease we have suffered from (I am not speaking now of the cattle plague) has come from abroad. That is the general opinion among cattle dealers?—It is the general opinion among cattle dealers; but whether it is so, or not, I am hardly able to say.

104. Would there be any particular difficulty, at Harwich, in keeping all the animals in quarantine for a fortnight?—No.

105. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Have you any idea what expense it would be for a fortnight?—It would not be a heavy expense. The usual charge, in London, is 1*s.* a night. That is the charge at Rotterdam.

106. Mr. Graves.] Would that be at the expense of the consignee?—That would be at the expense of the company and the consignee or sender; it would be an arrangement between them.

107. Mr. Hunt.] It would enhance the value of the cattle if they had undergone quarantine; it would be like the warranty of a horse?—Decidedly; I think the cattle would fetch a considerable deal more money if the person buying them knew they were sound.

108. And the expense of that quarantine would be more than paid for by that?—Decidedly.

109. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Do you think people would refuse to send cattle on those terms?—I should say not.

110. Chairman.] You only apply it to store cattle?—Only to store cattle.

111. Mr. Hunt.] The effect would be that animals suspected to be diseased would not be sent, if there was once a regulation?—They would be more careful in sending them; I know sometimes they have stood over for a week, and nobody would credit the difference of the beasts after a week on our shores.

112. They

112. They had improved, I suppose?—Very much.

113. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Do they suffer much from the voyage?—Although the voyage to Harwich is considerable, I think they do not suffer so much as they do when they go up to London; the last three or four hours from Rotterdam to Harwich is worse than the first seven hours, because as soon as the beasts get tired, they get down on the floor, and get sea-sick.

114. Mr. Hunt.] Do you think fat animals can easily be slaughtered at Harwich, and forwarded as dead meat to the metropolis, and other places?—Oh, yes; cargoes of fat beasts coming into Harwich at six in the morning could be forwarded, slaughtered, to the number of 500 and upwards to London by the next day morning at 4 o'clock.

115. By the existing arrangement?—By the existing arrangement.

116. What conveniences have you for slaughtering them there?—There is a very large shed built there for an ice house; it has failed with the company in some respects, and this year there is no ice at all; this place could be made into a cattle slaughter-house, and there would be ample provision to slaughter 500 animals a-day.

117. When the railway traffic in animals was stopped, under the existing Act of Parliament, the stoppage afterwards continued by an Order in Council, were animals slaughtered at Harwich, for the purpose of being sent to London, in any considerable number?—Yes; there were 60 or 70 slaughtered.

118. Under your superintendence?—Not under my superintendence.

119. Slaughtered by local butchers?—The butchers come down from London, there have been as many as 600 or 700 head of sheep and calves and cattle slaughtered at a time. One boat came over which had a cargo not healthy, and the whole cargo was condemned.

120. I am speaking of the particular time when the railway traffic was stopped, and the slaughtermen came down from London to slaughter beasts at Harwich?—Yes.

121. Had they sufficient conveniences for that purpose there?—Yes, plenty.

122. They made no complaints?—They made no complaints. The meat that went up from Harwich to London was in considerably better order, and looked very much better than if it had been killed in London.

123. Chairman.] Compare the expense of carrying a beast, in the shape of dead meat instead of alive?—I should think that the same truck-weight that the Company could carry would be three times in dead meat what it is in live meat. As regards the carcass, they could take three carcasses to one live bullock.

124. Mr. Hunt.] How would that be packed; would it be packed or would it be swung?—I think that a truck could be made so that you could hang the meat up by quarters, the same as you see in a butcher's shop.

125. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Are the carriages in which they travel open to the dust?—They should have sliding curtains to keep the dust out; and the current of air passing through the carriages, by the rate at which the train goes, keeps the meat beautiful and cool.

126. Chairman.] Is it the opinion of the slaughtermen that the meat is better when it arrives at its destination carried in that way than it would be if it had been slaughtered in London?—It is better. If it was taken alive to London, it would be liable to be bruised by shunting, more or less. Then it would be driven to the market, and killed in a hot state; under those circumstances, it cannot possibly be so good for human food.

127. Mr. Hunt.] The bullock gets heated before it arrives at the slaughterhouse, and the meat is not fit to be kept so long as meat that is sent up dead?—It is calculated to make a difference of six hours in the keep of the meat.

128. In the case of these animals slaughtered at this time by the London slaughtermen, did they send the whole of the carcasses up, or keep the coarser pieces at Harwich, and send up only the prime?—The whole carcass is taken up.

129. What is done with the offal?—The head and tongue, and all those sort of things are sent up with the carcass in a basket together; there is no offal disposed of at Harwich.

130. What is done with the heart, and so on?—The heart is sent up with the carcass to London.

131. The skins, horns, and hoofs, were retained, I suppose, at Harwich for the purpose of manufacture?—I can hardly give you an answer to that, but I think they were disinfected and sent up; I will not be certain on that point.

132. In the event of a regulation being made for all fat animals to be slaughtered at Harwich, would there be conveniences there for converting the offal for the purposes for which they are used; have they space for tan pits, and so on?—Quite so. There is now before the House a Bill for enclosing a large piece of land of an area of 350 acres, and the Committee sit on the Bill to-morrow.

133. A private Bill?—Yes.

134. Is that to vest it in a corporation, or a company?—In a company.

135. What is the object of the company?—There is the part they propose to enclose (the Witness pointed out the place to the Committee).

136. With regard to the rate for conveying dead meat or living cattle, how do they stand in relation to one another on your line?—The arrangement is at present 10 s. a head from Rotterdam to London; that includes every thing.

137. That is for neat stock, is it?—That is for neat stock.

138. And for sheep?—Sheep from Antwerp, 1 s. 6 d. a head.

139. From Antwerp to London?—From Antwerp to London; pigs 1 s., calves 2 s. 6 d.

140. You say that a few weeks ago a great number of animals were slaughtered and sent up in the carcass to London. Do they transmit to London more slaughtered animals than if they had been sent up alive?—In that instance I think not. Mr. Moseley can better answer that question perhaps. I had nothing to do with the company then.

141. Do you think that any railway company will be able to carry meat in the carcass at as cheap a rate as if they carried the live animal?—I should think there would be very little difference. There would be more deterioration and more trouble in loading the carcasses than there would be in loading live animals, because the live animals load themselves.

142. That would depend on the arrangement, would it not. It would be possible if a slaughter-house was built for a truck to run into the slaughter-house and for the carcasses to be slid off the beam from which it was suspended into the the truck at once?—No, I do not think they could carry dead meat as they could live meat.

143. Mr. E. Egerton.] Do not you know as a fact that they charge double for dead meat what they do for live meat?—I have no doubt they do. There is a certain risk attaching to dead meat more than there is to live meat, which causes a difference.

144. Chairman.] Do you think it would diminish the import of cattle if the restriction was adopted that they must be slaughtered at the port of arrival?—I think not; they have the cattle, and a very large quantity of it, and it must come to some port, and there is no place better than England to which they can send it to get rid of that surplus stock.

145. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Have you ever heard it suggested that the animals should be killed on the other side at Rotterdam, and so be brought over by boats?—I do not think that could be done.

146. Do you mean that the meat could not be brought over?—You could not make a sufficient certainty. There are fogs to contend with; there is weather to contend with; and there is Brill bar to contend with if you get your meat killed. It would be impossible, as a rule.

147. Mr. Graves.] Are you acquainted with the difference in the price of dead meat, when delivered in London, as compared with the cost of live cattle when delivered?—I cannot say that I am.

148. In the rate charged for dead meat there is included, is there not, an allowance for the cost of delivery?—There is the cost of delivery, but I should say, comparing the value of the live cattle and the value of the meat being killed at the port of landing, the receiver would pay the difference that there would be in the cost of transit; the dead meat would be worth more, and there would not be so much risk of the beast being bruised and knocked about while going to London.

149. Chairman.] Sometimes it happens that beasts which are sent to the metropolitan markets are not sold, because the owners do not think the price is adequate, and therefore they keep them for a short time, do they not?—They keep them at a very heavy expense; if they were killed they would be obliged to take the best price they could get.

150. Would not that tend rather to lessen the trade?—I think not; I think that after the system is founded it would work; you can get telegraphic communications; you could get a telegraphic message very quick, that you are to get a lot of beasts killed; you could send to Harwich, and tell them to kill them; an order sent down at 12 o'clock in the day, would be quite sufficient to get a lot of beasts killed and sent up by 4 o'clock the next morning.

151. Mr. Hunt.] So that you would keep them alive till they were wanted?—Yes.

152. And by sending down a telegram you could get them slaughtered, and sent up at once?—Yes, whether 20 or 500; 500 could be slaughtered in a day, as easily as 20.

153. You talked of slaughtermen being sent down to kill the animals?—At Harwich there would not be sufficient slaughtermen to do it, and the people not being able to get slaughtermen, they would send slaughtermen down at once, they having a free pass by the railway.

154. Mr. Hunt.] With regard to sheep, would you recommend that they should undergo a quarantine?—No. I do not think sheep themselves have any disease but what you may detect at once; the only thing is that it is a question whether they would carry disease with them or not, and whether it would be worth while keeping them under quarantine. If they have only a smallpox disease, it is very easy to detect it, or any other skin disease.

155. Scale or small-pox is easily detected?—Yes, or foot-rot.

156. Chairman.] If cattle come from a country where there is no disease, with clean bills of health, would you still keep them in quarantine?—The difficult job is to tell what has been done with them on the opposite side. They come in large droves, and are all mixed with different cattle. If you can insure that the trucks on the other side have always been cleaned and purified, and they have never been over ground where disease has existed, it is all right; but that is a difficult matter.

157. Mr. Hunt.] Do you think by requiring animals to be quarantined, you would spread any of these diseases among them?—I should say not.

158. This is the evidence of Mr. Honck before the Committee, who sat here two years ago, "With regard to the quarantine arrangements that at present exist. The quarantine arrangements are very detrimental to cattle which have at all symptoms of foot or mouth complaint, by keeping them at the wharves, they invariably get it; in fact, they always get it." Have you any experience on that point?—It is a very different thing keeping them on the wharf, and keeping them on pasture-lands.

159. You would quarantine them by turning them out on pasture land?—Yes, on pasture land.

160. If there were stores?—Yes.

161. Sir M. W. Ridley.] What would you do if they were fat stock?—Slaughter them.

162. You do not propose to quarantine fat stock?—No, they would be slaughtered as required. The owners of that stock, if there is anything the matter with them in any way, if it is disease or anything that is catching at all, they would have them slaughtered at once.

163. Mr. Dent.] If you once get foot and mouth disease in your fields, every animal you bring in would be liable to take it?—There would be the risk as regards the store cattle, anyhow. It matters not, even if one lot of beasts walk over a wharf and another lot of beasts come on it the next day, or the day after, not knowing that those beasts are diseased, to be taken to another ship.

164. Mr. Graves.] A great deal may be done in the way of disinfecting the wharves, may it not?—Yes, a great deal might, but during this cattle plague; I think, that this is a matter one can hardly give an opinion upon.

165. But as to the liability to ordinary disease, a great deal may be done in relation to the cleansing of the wharves and roads?—Decidedly, and at Harwich, all the places where the beasts crossed, all are under the supervision of the corporation and the authorities of the town, and they will compel the Company to do it.

166. Sir M. W. Ridley.] You spoke of the cleansing of these vessels; were they cleaned within the port before they put to sea again, or was the process of cleansing left to be done at the opposite side?—As soon as the vessels had discharged the last head of cattle, they were cleansed cleansed and sawdust was put down the holds, so as to make them perfectly dry, always before any other cattle were put in.

167. Mr. Carnegie.] Is there any trade in cattle at any other of the ports in the immediate neighbourhood of Harwich, on that coast?—Not nearer than Thames Haven.

168. Mr. Graves.] Could you give me any idea of the number of cattle you would require accommodation for, to carry out your suggestion of 14 days' quarantine at Harwich, taking the average weekly imports of the place?—I should think you might calculate upon having 250 or 300 store boats, sometimes more and sometimes not so many.

169. That is a fortnight's import. How would you calculate that?—There is no particular rule to go by; the beasts come over; many that you take for store cattle are sold for contracts, and not sold for store cattle at all. Others are; but as a rule, two-thirds of them are cattle for slaughter.

170. Who has charge of those cattle on the passage from Holland on board the steamers?—The senders on the other side, each sending a drover with their own beasts; and then the captain has the sole charge.

171. There is a drover to each shipment?—Generally speaking, there is a drover to each lot of beasts, or perhaps three or four small senders have one drover between the three.

172. Do the duties of the drovers cease when they arrive at Harwich, or do they go on upon land with the cattle?—They go on with the cattle.

173. Then these men are continuously employed in going from London to Rotterdam?—They get free passages on ship and rail from Rotterdam to London.

174. Mr. Hunt.] What countries do the animals come from that are shipped at Rotterdam and Antwerp?—Those beasts which come by way of Antwerp, travel 700 miles by rail before they come on board the boats, so that it is impossible to know where they come from.

175. Do you not learn at all where they come from?—No, they are merely sent; there is no description at all; the agents know nothing as to where the beasts come from.

176. When the animals come 700 miles, where would you assume they come from?—Somewhere from the interior; but we have no idea where, that is not a rule. This is merely the German beasts I am speaking of.

177. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Is there nothing in the character of the animals to tell you whether they come from Poland or Hungary, or the north or south of Germany?—We have them from Germany and Holland. German beasts are easy to distinguish, and the Dutch beasts. The Dutch beasts are black and white, and the German beasts are very large, red, coarse-looking beasts.

178. Mr. Hunt.] You do not recommend that sheep should be put in quarantine, nor would you recommend that fat sheep should be slaughtered there?—I should say decidedly slaughter everything that comes from import for slaughter

179. Everything that is fit for the butcher you would slaughter?—Yes; that would be at the option of the party on this side, whether he would keep them for slaughter or whether he would keep them for store stock. Some would be sold at one time more advantageously for store cattle, and others for killing purposes.

180. You would not have any arrangements with regard to sheep if you did not subject them to quarantine?—No; some sheep would go to Manchester and others to Birmingham or elsewhere.

181. You would allow fat sheep to be sent inland alive?—Yes.

182. But not cattle?—Not cattle; store cattle, of course.

183. They would be submitted to the 10 or 14 days' quarantine, or they would be slaughtered?—Yes.

184. But you would make no such regulation with regard to sheep?—I hardly think that it would be necessary. I think it would more damage the trade, and there is not so much risk with sheep unless the sheep are diseased, and if the sheep are diseased, most decidedly I would have them slaughtered.

185. You make the distinction on the ground that disease in sheep is more easily detected by examination than disease in cattle?—Yes.

186. Mr. Graves.] Is the slaughtering of cattle at Harwich within the town or without the town?—Close by the water's edge; the width of this room from the water's edge.

187. You say you have a dead meat traffic from Holland; does that continue in summer, or is it confined to winter?—That has been more particularly since the restriction has been put on as to the importation.

188. Mr. Graham.] Would you propose that the sheep should be entitled to free egress if within a fortnight they were proved to be free from disease?—I think if sound on landing they might be sent away.

189. Suppose there were 50 beasts, and five of them were diseased, would you let the other 45 out?—No, certainly not.

190. What would you do with them?—I would have them slaughtered.

191. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Then you must have two places of quarantine?—They would be divided into four or five different places, quite apart from each other. There would be plenty of room to keep them separate and distinct.

192. Sir James Fergusson.] Would that not necessitate a very minute sub-division?—Two ships' cargo I should not put together.

193. You would put one whole ship's cargo together?—I should put one whole ship's cargo together. If there is any disease on board the ship, the sheep are likely to take the infection coming over as much as in quarantine.

194. If one sheep was diseased you would order the whole to be slaughtered?—Yes; there and then at once.

195. Is there a public cattle market at Harwich?—There are two market days by charter, but it has not been so much for cattle; we first started the cattle market two years ago.

196. When you started this cattle market had you to pay dues to the corporation?—No dues. As agents to the company we were allowed to use the lairs as the company did, and in consideration for that we paid an additional freight.

197. How did you settle it with the corporation. The corporation are entitled to dues for cattle coming into their chartered markets?—They have no chartered markets, not for live markets, but they have two chartered days for dead meat and vegetable markets.

198. But not for cattle?—Not for cattle.

199. There is no cattle market?—No.

30 April 1866.

200. They are generally sold by auction at Harwich, are they not?—Yes.

201. Mr. Hunt.] What is the population of Harwich?—Between 4,000 and 5,000.

202. Was there any effect on the price of meat in consequence of this Act of Parliament passing the other day, preventing the railway traffic in cattle?—In Harwich I cannot say that we did observe any. They are paying a high price, 11*d.* a pound, and they have been doing so all through the summer.

203. You did not see any appreciable difference?—No.

204. Chairman.] When a cargo of cattle arrives, if they are store cattle, you would put them in quarantine?—Yes.

205. And if, during this quarantine, one of them fell sick, you would have all the rest slaughtered?—If they were sick from disease.

206. That is the question I wanted to ask you. Is that regulation to be limited to this cattle plague?—Well, under quarantine they would still be under the inspection of the Government Inspector.

207. Would you propose that that power of slaughtering should be limited to this one disease; because cattle might have other contagious diseases besides the cattle plague?—I think, if there was simply one beast having the foot or lung disease, I should not slaughter the whole of the cargo for that.

208. Suppose it suffered from pleuro-pneumonia?—We get it in different forms; one beast will have it, and one will not, and you can hardly account for that, but as to this cattle plague, if there is one diseased beast, I should most decidedly slaughter the whole at once.

209. Would not that go to decrease the importation of cattle, if people knew that they were liable to that risk; supposing that cattle are sent by different owners in Holland and Germany, and form part of one cargo; and sound beasts might be slaughtered in consequence of having been put in quarantine, or being carried in a ship with unsound beasts, would not that be a risk tending to decrease the importation?—I think, as a rule, the cattle that are sent over to England would be much better, and more fit for immediate slaughter; but still there would be a large quantity of store stock sent over here, for this reason, because they could not winter them over there, and must send them.

210. Would not any owner of cattle on the Continent look rather unfavourably to the British market for cattle, if he could send them anywhere else, if he was liable to the risk of having them put in quarantine with other cattle that he did not know anything about, and slaughtered if they happened to be put in company with diseased cattle?—I think not more so than they are at the present time. They are under a similar risk now, for, if there are any diseased beasts, they are ordered in quarantine.

211. You would have a permanent regulation, without reference to the existence of disease in any particular country of this quarantine for store cattle; would it not act so as to decrease the importation of cattle into England, and make England an unfavourable market for foreign cattle?—There would be a little prejudice for a time, but I think it would only last for a time.

212. Mr. Hunt.] Are you acquainted with the regulation in foreign states?—I am not.

213. Sir M. W. Ridley.] I think you never told us the total number of cattle in any one year?—Mr. Moseley may have that, but I have not myself.

214. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Are you aware whether there is any inspection on the other side of the channel?—Yes, every beast is inspected before it is shipped.

215. By what inspector?—I am not certain, but I believe it is an inspector appointed by the Government.

216. A foreign surgeon, of course?—A foreign surgeon. I think a foreigner would not stand the risk of sending meat likely to be thrown up or condemned.

217. You said there was some dead meat. Did they inspect that?—Yes.

218. And all the live cattle?—Yes.

219. Two?—Yes.

220. Mr. Hunt.] Is anything done now towards disinfecting the quays where the animals are landed?—They are all cleaned down. I do not know that there is any particular disinfectant put on them; there would be in case any animals appeared to be diseased on landing. Then they would be lime washed.

221. Since the existence of the cattle plague in England, have the places where the animals have been landed at Harwich been constantly cleansed?—They are constantly cleansed and washed down; the piers and places are always swept up. I do not say that the roadways are always swept up, but the lairs and all those places are lime washed every few days, or a week, as it may be.

222. Were these vessels of the Great Eastern Railway's Company built especially for this trade?—Yes.

223. Mr. Graves.] Are the cattle that are landed at Harwich generally placed to foreign account, or to an English account?—They are consigned to English salesmen.

224. Have you steamers running to any other port besides Rotterdam, out of Harwich?—Antwerp.

225. You receive cattle through both channels?—Lately we have received no cattle from Antwerp, only sheep.

226. At the time you speak of, when you did receive cattle from Antwerp, did you notice any variance in the cattle that arrived from Antwerp and those that arrived from Rotterdam?—On account of the sea voyage, do you mean?

227. On account of bad weather?—Those coming from Rotterdam generally were the best, on account of its being the shorter passage. The last three or four hours always told more upon them than the first five or six.

228. What is the general length of passage from Antwerp?—From 12 to 14 hours.

229. With regard to disease, did you notice at all the animals that came from Antwerp had more or less disease than those which came from Rotterdam?—We have never had any disease but once from Rotterdam, only one cargo, in fact, in one.

230. Is there any obligation upon the owners of these steamers to report casualties arising from deaths, to the Custom House officers on arrival?—The captain always issues his report as soon as he arrives.

231. I do not mean to his owners, but to the authorities of the port?—If they die on board they are thrown overboard. I do not know that he gives in any written report.

232. When

232. When he is entering the ship at the Custom House, does he state the number of cattle that has died on board?—I cannot say as to the rule.

233. Mr. Hunt.] Would it be possible to water the animals on board ship?—I think not, but I do not think there is any occasion.

234. Why do you think the last four hours on board hurts them more than the previous six hours?—From the motion of the vessel, working the beasts backwards and forwards on their legs, they cannot stand up to it. Their heads are all to the side of the ship, and they get leg weary and lie down, and once they get down they are liable to be stamped upon by the others.

235. You think it is from fatigue more than from the want of food and water?—Yes.

236. Mr. Graham.] Would there be any difficulty in slinging them?—I should say there would be, and for a short voyage, such as it is to Harwich, I do not think there would be any necessity. If they come a long voyage, it would prevent their falling down; but coming a short voyage, there is no occasion for it, I think. All this being done would considerably enhance the price of the thing, on account of the expense and the time it would take to load and unload. It would take a considerable time to load and unload.

237. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Are the animals after being put on shore, watered directly?—Yes, watered and fed.

30 April 1866.

Mr. Robert Moseley, called in; and Examined.

238. Chairman.] You are connected with the Great Eastern Railway Company?—Yes.

239. You are traffic manager of that Company?—I am. I wish to remark in the onset that some questions having been asked the last witness in reference to the numbers of cattle imported at Harwich, I should be very glad if the Committee would give me an opportunity of having an account taken from the books of the company, showing the number from Antwerp and also from Rotterdam. We shall then have the correct data. Furthermore, I consider it is very important that our agents in Rotterdam and Antwerp should attend here; and I will summon them to answer questions put by Honourable Members to Captain Daniels in reference to where the cattle are sent from, the stable arrangements in Holland and Belgium, and to give any other information required. Looking at the importance of the inquiry, I think it is very necessary we should furnish this Committee with every information.

240. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Yours is a company that has carried by far the largest amount of cattle?—No; the General Steam Navigation Company bring by far the largest quantity.

241. That is up to the port of London?—Yes.

242. No other railway carries so many beasts?—No; taking our home traffic, Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambridge and Essex, we carry the largest quantity. Our receipts for cattle traffic are about 100,000 l. a year.

243. Mr. Hunt.] You supply many places on your line with store cattle?—Yes.

244. You do not bring many store cattle into London?—No.

245. Mostly fat cattle?—Yes.

246. Milch cows?—Yes, milch cows from Rotterdam.

247. There is a very large trade in Dutch cows?—Yes; the Dutch trade is large.

248. With the exception of those cows, you mostly bring fat stock into London?—Yes.

249. Do you bring many store sheep into London?—There are store sheep in the autumn of the year brought to London, and sent into Surrey and Sussex, and other counties.

250. Where do they come from principally?—They come from Fakenham, Wells, and Dereham, in West Norfolk.

251. With regard to the imported store cattle, where do you convey them to principally?—Principally to London; we have sent Dutch store cattle as far as Leicester. Cattle arriving at Harwich, say on the Tuesday morning, have been delivered in London on Tuesday night, and have been at Leicester the next day.

252. What countries are they principally from?—Holland.

253. Chairman.] You are the proprietors of the steam-boats that run from Rotterdam to Harwich, and from Antwerp to Harwich, are you not?—Yes.

254. Therefore, the transit by sea as well as by land of the cattle is entirely under your control?—Entirely.

255. Do you observe any sickening of the cattle, or any defect in their condition when they arrive at Harwich, before they are put on the railway?—That has come more immediately under the supervision of Captain Daniels, our Harwich agent; he has undertaken, or did undertake the management of the landing from the ship, and loading into trucks; that part of the business was entirely in his hands; I have not personally, myself, noticed the symptoms you have referred to.

256. Upon the land part of the transit has it been your practice to cleanse or disenfect the cattle trucks after they have been used for some time in carrying the cattle?—Yes, for several months; since we have had orders from the Privy Council, every truck, on its arrival with cattle, has been thoroughly cleansed; take Tottenham, which is our great cattle depôt, the trucks and the landing-stage have been thoroughly cleansed.

257. It was not a permanent rule to cleanse all these cattle pens and trucks, from time to time, before the cattle plague broke out in this country?—Previously to the appearance of the cattle plague, it was an invariable rule with us to cleanse the cattle waggons. We make use of them for the return journey (instead of going empty) to carry all descriptions of merchandize; and therefore, for our own protection, we took care that the trucks were perfectly cleansed.

258. You did not wash them with lime water, or use any disinfectant, did you?—No, we did not do so before the order from the Privy Council.

259. The cleansing before was a mere washing and scrubbing, I suppose?—Yes, with pure water.

260. Sir James Fergusson.] Is the scrubbing process possible to be carried out on every occasion, as defined by the Privy Council order?—I see no difficulty.

261. You see no difficulty in having the woodwork of the trucks scrubbed?—There is no difficulty culty whatever; so far as we are concerned. I refer to the Privy Council orders of the 17th March 1866.

Mr. R. Moseley.

262. Mr. Hunt.] Is it not very difficult to cleanse the bottom of the cattle trucks?—There is the rib of wood across the bottom of the waggon, in order to give the animal a hold in case the truck oscillates; there is never any difficulty in cleansing the truck.

263. But does not the filth get down into the joints, so that ordinary washing will not entirely remove it?—There is no difficulty. It is the first time I have ever heard the suggestion made to me: I have made it my business to look at many of the trucks myself since the orders have been issued, and they are perfectly cleansed.

264. Are you aware of a clause which the Duke of Buckingham inserted into the Cattle Plague Bill, in the Committee of the House of Lords, with regard to the treatment of the floors of the cattle trucks?—I do not remember it.

265. It was to the effect that they should be either tarred or covered with asphalte, so that water then would entirely cleanse the trucks?—That would entail very considerable inconvenience, and I dare say loss to the railway company.

266. It would be an expense?—It would be an expense in the first place, and highly objectionable for the railway company to be obliged to send trucks away empty, by reason of their not being able to load them with goods which would sustain damage if they were put in the trucks. Tarring the truck bottoms is very objectionable.

267. But asphalting would not be?—Not the same objection.

268. Supposing the floors of the trucks were asphalted, they could be cleansed more readily?—They could.

269. Then supposing there was a permanent regulation that the railway company should cleanse their trucks, they would not increase their expenses if they were required to asphalte them?—That would increase the expense. There is the cost of the asphalte in the first place; and the reparation, year by year.

270. Chairman.] It has been suggested that all fat cattle that are imported should be slaughtered at Harwich, and carried in the shape of dead meat to the London market. Now what would be the difference of carrying the beast in the form of dead meat, instead of carrying it as you now do, as a live animal?—I should think cent. per cent. double the charge. I think when the additional services are taken into consideration, there is a justification for it. This is the process: the meat has to be packed in hampers; as a rule the railway company provide the hampers. We have then to load in the trucks, when the meat arrives in London. We have a large staff on duty at one o'clock in the morning, perhaps 200 men and clerks; the meat is unloaded again by labour, put into a railway van, passes to Newgate market, and waits its turn, before it can be unloaded. You have then a body of men to pitch the hampers on to the stalls. That being done we send, during the day, vans and horses to collect the return hampers and cloths, which have to be loaded and carried by rail to the sending station in the district. Comparing those services with those appertaining to the live animal, there is this difference, the animal walks in and out of the truck, and we have done with it.

271. Mr. Hunt.] That is with the present arrangements?—With the present arrangements.

273. That is quite a proper question to deal with; but I am going to the question of expense, which, supposing it did answer, and it could be converted, would entirely do away with those additional causes of expense?—No. By putting the meat in the trucks at Harwich, we get rid of one porterage; and, supposing we had a proper apparatus to sling the meat in the trucks, there would be required manual labour to suspend it in the trucks.

274. I am supposing that the meat is hanging in the slaughter-house in the carcase, and that then it is slid on to a bar in the trucks by a mechanical contrivance, without being lifted by men, that would do away with all the expense of packing and loading, would it not?—It would at Harwich, certainly, if it was the wish of the owner of the meat for it to be sent without being packed in hampers.

275. I am supposing an entirely new arrangement of the slaughter-houses, built for the express purpose, with rails running into the slaughter-houses, and the whole of the machinery so converted as to transfer the meat from the places where it hangs into the trucks by which it is to go to London. Supposing that to be so, you would be able to take dead meat at a less rate than you can now, where you have to provide all this machinery?—That is a new state of things contemplated. I am imagining the present arrangements are got rid of altogether, and that the railway company have to provide new plant and new stock.

276. With regard to hanging the meat so as to be allowed to swing free in the trucks, what is your objection to that?—I think coming loose in railway trucks, it would be exposed to the dirt and dust on the line of railway; imagine for a moment the clouds of smoke from the engine; I think myself that the meat would get damaged by such an exposure. I remember on the Great Northern line some 10 or 15 years ago Captain Laws, the manager of the Great Northern, had horse-boxes fitted up for the purpose of having the Lincolnshire mutton suspended in horse-boxes; and it failed, by reason of the consignees objection to the scheme, and it was abandoned.

277. Mr. Edward Egerton.] It was found that there were no possible means of keeping out the dust?—No.

278. Mr. Hunt.] Have there not been carriages constructed which will do that?—I have heard that the Great Western have made experiments, but with what result I do not know; we have been carrying to London from the Great Eastern district upwards of 100 tons of meat, daily, all packed in hampers or cloths; there is the greatest hesitation on the part of the senders to forward it unless it is packed in hampers.

279. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Dead meat suffers very much if there is any pressure upon it?—Yes, it spoils the appearance.

280. Sir James Fergusson.] The establishment of a dead meat market close to a railway station in London might obviate the expense of delivery, might it not?—Yes, that would be the natural result to some extent.

281. With regard to the great additional expense you have described as attaching to the dead meat traffic, you might set off as against that a great deal of expense connected with the delivery, the slaughter, and the dressing of the live stock after its arrival in town?—Yes.

282. So that, in fact, is it not the case that the actual wholesale cost of meat when delivered in London is very little more than that of live cattle?—It is considerably more.

283. I mean of meat after being slaughtered in London?—Take a Norfolk ox of 15 cwt.; and when dressed take it at 10 cwt.; the carriage by the Great Eastern Railway from Norwich is 12 s. when alive; when carried as dead meat the charge is something like 25 s., and that arises from the additional duties and responsibilities cast upon us.

284. I meant the selling price to the public; the wholesale price of meat carried dead and delivered; I understand that that is not after all much greater than the cost of meat carried alive, but slaughtered and then delivered in town in the usual way?—I should think that the difference to the public is scarcely appreciable; take the animal arriving alive at Tottenham; it is there put in lairs; then walked to the cattle market; it is consigned to a salesman, and when sold, it is walked to the slaughter-house; it is taken thence to the market, such process involving a charge against the owner. But if sent from the country as dead meat, the various charges I have just enumerated are avoided.

285. Are you aware of the actual difference existing between the two comparative costs at the present time, by recent experience?—I cannot give you the exact figures at the moment, but I shall be prepared to do so when I put in the other returns.

266. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Do you know what the proportion of dead meat now brought into London is with reference to the living meat. Is there as much dead meat as living?—I should think the quantity of dead meat brought into London at the present time, by railways and steamboats, is 2,000 tons a week.

287. What is the consumption of London in a week?—I have heard it estimated at something like 20,000 tons per month.

288. But all the Scotch meat comes up, does it not?—Yes.

289. And a great deal of the Irish?—Yes, through Holyhead, Liverpool and Waterford.

290. Mr. Hunt.] What I understand you to say, is this; that although they have increased the rate for the carriage of dead meat by rail, that is compensated for by the omission of all these charges, which would be incurred if these animals were moved alive?—Yes.

291. So that the railway companies have a right to charge more, and the purchasers of the meat would not really pay any more for their meat by reason of the increased rates?—No.

292. Chairman.] They would not pay much more?—I do not think they would pay any more. If you take the value of an ox at 30 l., the price of that for the carriage to London alive is 12 s. That sum on the 30 l. is scarcely appreciable.

293. You have to supply, at an expense, certain motive power which you get for nothing; so long as you avail yourself of the motive power of the ox; there must be that in addition?—Yes, you get rid of the expense of cartage by reason of his locomotion; by his walking; but when you come to put all these units into the aggregate, taking the live ox itself, I do not think there would be much benefit to the public.

294. Mr. Hunt.] You have less weight to carry in the case of dead meat, because you have not got the offal?—We save one third in tonnage.

295. Chairman.] But before a fat beast gets to the consumer, there are a great many movements to be made?—No doubt.

296. To the extent of making those movements, that you avail yourself of the motive power of the live animal, you save the expense of supplying that motive power by other means, by carts and drovers and all the rest of it. It appears, therefore, that there must be some gain in using as long as possible the motive power of the animal, less of course the expense of directing that motive power, because the animal wants people to drive it and look after it?—Yes.

297. But you think the difference is not appreciable to the consumer?—I do. So far as the railway authorities are concerned, I have found by long experience that whatever reduction you give to the public the consumer, as a rule, never participates in it.

298. Then what becomes of the theory of competition?—Combination.

299. Mr. Hunt.] The Chairman has put a question to you about the motive power of the ox. Is it not the case when the ox uses his own motive power it loses weight. Is there not considerable loss of weight where an animal is driven for a long distance?—That is true; but I understood the Chairman's question to apply simply to the walking of the live animal to the landing-stage in the market. In the olden times when they walked an animal from Norfolk the loss was considerable.

300. Is there not a loss when the animals are driven to the railway and market, and spend a number of hours in considerable excitement and trepidation?—I have held this opinion for a long time, that when you take into consideration the walking of cattle from the homestead, say to Norwich station, forwarded thence by railway, subject to a journey of six or seven hours, and on arrival at Tottenham landed from the trucks, then driven into lairs, from the lairs to the market, from the market through the crowded streets of London to the slaughter-house, I have no hesitation in saying there is considerable loss by going through those processes; but if the animal was walked from the homestead in Norfolk to the slaughter-house there, and sent to London as dead meat, I say the public and the grazing interests would profit to a very large extent.

301. Chairman.] Does not the power of sending cattle by road on their legs act as a competition against your carriage by railway for short distances, at least so as to compel you to make more moderate charges than you otherwise would?—Yes, that is so for short distances. I think for 30 or 40 miles the road competes with us, adopting that distance as the maximum.

302. Is it not a beneficial thing to the public that there should be a competition, so that they should get the cattle at a more moderate rate?—It

—It is an instalment of benefit; but looking at the larger question, I certainly would recommend as strongly as language can convey it to this Committee, that the interests of the public would be best consulted by making them slaughter the cattle in the districts, and not having them carried to London alive.

303. If it were compulsory that the cattle should be carried only in the form of dead meat, the railway would have the entire monopoly of the carriage?—That would be so, and if the Government of the country found that the railways were abusing the power delegated to them, they would have the opportunity of correcting it.

304. No carts or vans could compete with the railways in carrying dead meat along the roads?—As I said just now, for 40 miles the road carrier can compete with you, and does at this moment. We have a meat carriage in our district at Kelvedon, though Chelmsford and Brentwood to London; and the carrier has this advantage, he collects at the butchers' shops as the waggon passes; he takes it straight to Newgate market, avoiding the collection by railway at Kelvedon, and the delivery by the railway company at Newgate market on arrival.

304.* They do in fact compete with you on the road with carts and waggons?—Yes.

305. For moderate distances?—Yes, from 30 to 40 miles. It is not so extensive as it was years ago; but there is a certain amount of traffic 30 or 40 miles off London, which will be carried by road so long as the old stage waggons continue. When they are worn out, I do not think it will be for the interest of the owners to replace them; but at this moment there is considerable traffic carried on by road, east, west, north, and south, in connexion with London.

306. Is the competition of the road such as you describe calculated to prevent your charges being raised unduly to the public?—No, I think not; and for this reason. If the carrier is driven off the road, we find in practice that three or four of the larger tradesmen in the district having large quantities of goods combine and start an establishment of their own.

307. Sir James Fergusson.] Then your answer to the question would be "Yes?"—My answer to the question is in the affirmative; and I say this, that within so short a distance of London, we find that if the carrier is drawn off for want of means to compete with the railway, there are men of the district, large traders, brewers, and others, who put on a conveyance to compete with the railway. The public have always the alternative either to submit to the railway company's prices, or to put on a conveyance of their own.

308. Chairman.] The competition of the drover with his live beasts walking along the road has a greater power over you than the competition of carts and vans carrying dead meat would have?—Yes, that is so for the distance I have described; but if a longer distance, the animal loses weight.

309. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Most of the cattle from South Wales still come up by road, from Pembrokeshire and Carmarthenshire, do they not?—I am not aware that is so.

310. Sir James Fergusson.] The competition of the various companies interested in the cattle traffic would in itself constitute a check upon the charges of anyone?—Yes, and will continue so.

311. Sir M. W. Ridley.] In the event of the dead meat traffic becoming a rule, the larger railway companies would at once set themselves to economise the working?—You may take it from me as a rule, that wherever railway companies can economise the expenditure without impairing the source, it is carried out.

312. But if a change in the law should lead you to expect a great increase of dead meat traffic and a comparative cessation of the live, you would then be able to make arrangements on a large scale, which probably would tend to a reduction in the rate?—Yes, that would be so.

313. Mr. Carnegie.] Do I understand, from your evidence, that you have practically no competition by road from the port of Harwich?—There is no competition between Harwich and London by road. My remarks have reference to the general system of 30 or 40 miles.

314. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Your remarks have reference to the country within 40 miles of London?—Yes, Harwich is 70 miles from London; but we have the General Steam Navigation Company running direct to London. There is also the Netherlands Company.

315. Is that another line of boats?—Yes, boats; likewise Phillips, Graves, & Co.; also Robinson & Co., all in competition for the foreign stock.

316. Sir M. W. Ridley.] As the competition rests between yourselves and these other companies, is it not likely, in your opinion, that a system could be devised for the conveyance of dead meat such as would be likely to reduce, on all lines of railway, or upon your own, the amount of charge now made. You say there is a very considerable difference between the dead meat price and the price of the live ox. Do you think that arrangements could not be made, or facilities given, for embarking, as it were, or boxing this dead meat, so as to reduce the price materially?—The present price between Rotterdam and London direct by steamboat, and viâ Harwich, and thence by railway, are alike; but the rates, at the present moment, are something like 50 per cent. below what they were three years ago. There is no doubt that this is the result of competition between the several companies; but it is a competition which, unless it subsides at a very early date, I think the companies cannot really maintain their ground. Railway companies, as well as steamboat companies, must be paid, of course, a fair remuneration for the expenditure and risk they incur.

317. Then, as far as you see, you would be inclined to say that the reduction of price is about a minimum of 3 s.?—Yes; I put it so.

318. It is down to zero?—Yes.

319. Mr. Edward Egerton.] What is the objection in your mind to killing the animals on the Dutch side?—I think, particularly in warm weather, you would find that the carriage of the meat by sea, and then unloading at Harwich, and sent thence by a railway to London, and carting, would have such a damaging effect that it could not come into competition with English meat in the same market.

320. Mr. Hunt.] What is the nearest point to the London market on your line?—By using the North London line of railway, I may say that we are within 500 yards of the Metropolitan Cattle Market, by utilising the North London.

321. That is by Islington?—Yes.

322. Do the cattle conveyed on your line use the North London Railway to go to the market?—Yes;

—Yes; there are some exceptions. There are some of the consignees who have lairs near Tottenham, and on the arrival of cattle from Holland they order delivery at Tottenham; but as a rule we take the bulk of the live stock to the market direct.

323. What I want to know is this: how near are you now to old Smithfield market?—Our goods station is perhaps about a mile.

324. It is intended to convert the old Smithfield market into a dead meat market; it has been intended for some years to do so?—Yes.

325. Are there any railways now laid out which would connect your line with that market?—No, not for goods traffic.

326. Supposing that that plan was carried out, and that there was a dead meat market for London established at Smithfield, and a line was laid from the Great Eastern Railway, right into the Smithfield market, that would get rid of all this conveyance from your station to the dead meat market, and run your train into the market itself?—That would be so, and it would be attended with very large saving to the public. I was going to add, there would be a very considerable saving, not only as far as the cartage is concerned, but in utilizing another company's railway also, a short distance.

327. What will be the nearest point to Smithfield on your line?—Our present Bishopsgate-street station is to be converted into a goods station, and that would be our nearest point; a mile from old Smithfield market.

328. It will be in your power to apply for an extension to Smithfield?—We are now making a line of railway into Liverpool-street, for passenger traffic, which will entail upon the Company two-and a-half millions expenditure.

329. Without reference to your own particular line, what I want to know is, supposing the principal lines of London could either by the use of their own future lines, which they could get, or by the use of other Company's lines, run right into the central dead meat market, that would do away with a great deal of the objection that now is felt of having animals slaughtered where they are at the ports of landing, or their respective farms?—It would be attended with very satistory results. Take the markets in London, Newgate, and Leadenhall; our waggons are there in the morning at three or four o'clock; but in consequence of the large increase of traffic, all the railways converging there, the meat is in the waggons for hours. Everybody loses money, and all arising from the want of elbow-room, which this new market will promote.

330. In consequence of the inconveniences of the present dead meat market for the supply of the metropolis?—Yes.

331. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Is it not the fact, that the City of London did give a promise that they would convert that live-meat market into a dead-meat market, seven years ago?—Yes; I believe they have begun it now.

332. They have only begun it, I believe, for the last few weeks?—Yes, I think so.

333. Can you give us the exact date when that Smithfield Bill passed?—I appeared before the Commission; the late Sir George Lewis was the Chairman, and I think it was eight years ago.

334. Not one single step has been taken during eight years, by the Corporation of London, to carry that out?—No; I think it is a reflection on those who have had the superintendence of it, so valuable a property not bringing in one iota for years.

335. Is there any accommodation for a dead-meat market in Islington?—There is the present cattle market.

336. But that is entirely a live market?—There are cattle slaughtered there, and taken to various parts of London. Foreign cattle, before the last prohibition, were allowed to be landed at the London wharves, and to walk through the Metropolitan Board of Works jurisdiction; the Cattle Market is within that jurisdiction, and it was incumbent on the consignees to slaughter the foreign cattle in the market, and then to distribute the meat about London.

337. Is there any other live market besides the Islington market?—No, there is no other in London of any importance.

338. Mr. Hunt.] At the present time they walk from Blackwall to the London market?—Yes.

339. That is only under the recent Order?—Yes.

340. Do you see any possibility of running trains into the Smithfield market?—We are above the level (pointing on the map); that would entail upon us mechanical contrivances, hoists, &c.; it never could be done.

341. Mr. Carnegie.] Smithfield market is at a much lower level than Bishopsgate-street?—The Honourable Member asked if we could form a physical junction with our new passenger line and the Metropolitan line. Inasmuch as the Metropolitan will be something like 20 feet below the level, it would entail upon us very considerable difficulties and expense to secure a junction.

342. Sir James Fergusson.] But it would be very convenient for the trade that there should be dead-meat markets in the various parts of London; and supposing your dead meat delivery was at Bishopsgate-street, the Great Western at Paddington, and the other companies in their own districts, that would be quite as convenient as having one central one?—I think you would find objections by the senders of meat and fish. Fish is a very important article.

343. Mr. Hunt.] That is a question rather for the trade, is it not?—Yes.

344. What is contemplating is this: a central meat market, such as Smithfield, to which there might be access by rail brought into the market?—No doubt that would be a great public advantage.

345. Mr. Edward Egerton.] But you do not see your way to connect your line?—I do not see my way.

346. Or any other line in England?—The Great Northern will be there.

347. Not at Smithfield?—Yes, out of the Metropolitan. The Great Northern have powers. There is to be a large goods depôt; if we can connect ourselves with the Great Northern, and very likely we may by means of the North London. The North London line and the Great Northern are connected near St. Pancras, and we might possibly get to the meat market; there is this to be borne in mind, that we should have to pay the North London Railway for the use of the line, the Great Northern and the Metropolitan; and putting those charges together we should be no better off. My own impression is that there will be a connection between the two companies in the course of a very few years. —(The Witness described the map to the Committee.)

30 April 1866.

348. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Supposing it to be made compulsory that all meat should be slaughtered, do not you think that some large slaughtering place out in this direction (pointing on the map) would be the best, and then they would convey it all over different parts of London in carts. There is no advantage in having it in the heart of the City?—I think not.

349. Mr. Hunt.] That we must inquire of the butchers?—Yes, of the trade.

350. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Do not you see great inconvenience in having a large market in the heart of the City?—Yes, I think it is very objectionable.

351. You get rid of that, supposing it is a railway traffic and not a street traffic?—Yes.

352. Do you think it possible to have a great traffic in such a crowded place as that in the neighbourhood of Smithfield?—I think myself that when the new market is made in Smithfield, certainly the bulk of the business will be conducted there. At the present time the Newgate market is quite insufficient.

353. Mr. Hunt.] It is quite a disgrace to the metropolis?—Yes; and you cannot acquire more property there.

354. Supposing the Smithfield market were completed, it would naturally be the object of your company to run your line into that market?—There would be every inducement.

355. Mr. Edward Egerton.] It is a very valuable property beyond Smithfield, is it not?—Yes, through Barbican and Finsbury.

356. And Little Britain, and all that crowded neighbourhood?—Yes.

357. At Antwerp there is very little traffic, is there not?—Five or six months ago the Belgium Government prohibited the exportation of cattle from Antwerp.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE MILNER GIBSON, IN THE CHAIR.

Dr. WILLIAM STEWART TRENCH, called in; and Examined.

Dr. W. S. Trench.

3 May 1866.

358. Mr. Hunt.] YOU are a Medical Officer of the Borough of Liverpool?—Yes.

359. How long have you held that office?—For three years.

360. You have a map there which shows the existing slaughter-houses in the borough of Liverpool?—Yes (producing it); those marked red are the private slaughter-houses under license; I may say the whole of them are under license, but there are exceptions of four which had a prescriptive right before the Act of Geo. III. was passed.

361. The Local Act?—No, the general Act. They have a right of license under some previous Act, and they retain it. There are four of them, and we should have to pay to remove them; but as to these private licenses we can with three months' notice abrogate them, and stop them from slaughtering. This place marked on the map is the public abattoir. The history of the public abattoir is this: in the year 1785 the corporation of Liverpool obtained an Act of Parliament to build this abattoir, and in consideration that they did that for the slaughter of animals in the borough, they have the full power to abrogate all, except the three or four above-mentioned slaughter-houses. They were either not able to do it, or unwilling to do it, and instead of building the abattoir they allowed the slaughter-houses to continue, and merely put them under regulations; but in 1835 the corporation entered into an agreement with a private person of the name of Etches, who represented the butchers' company, and, on a certain consideration given to Mr. Etches, Mr. Etches undertook to build this public abattoir, the council granting them a lease of the place and all the rights for 75 years, insuring them a return equal to 6½ per cent., in consideration of their doing that. That is the position in which we stand, and we cannot remove this public abattoir without satisfying the covenants which were then entered into, which are simply money covenants, and would not be any very great consideration on the part of so rich a corporation as the corporation of Liverpool.

362. You are assuming by that answer that it is desirable to remove this abattoir?—The best answer to it is this: I put before you my map of our unfortunate position. Each of those yellow marks, marks a fever district, and each of those red marks is a death from typhus fever. There is our abattoir, which is in the best ward of the town; each of those red marks is a death simply from typhus.

363. In what time?—In one year.

364. Mr. Dent.] Your mortality is excessive?—It is excessive.

365. Mr. Hunt.] Can you give us the mortality in proportion to the population?—Last year it was 36·4 in the 1,000.

366. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Are there not an enormous number of cellars in Liverpool in which people reside?—Yes.

367. Do not you think that mortality arises from the cellars as well as from the abattoir?—I do not say it all comes from the abattoir; we have returns of sickness, and this part of the map represents where we find the largest number of sick people.

368. In what part of Liverpool is this abattoir?—In Abercrombie Ward.

369. That is one of the best situations in Liverpool?—Yes.

370. Mr. Hunt.] What do you trace this mortality to?—I can have no hesitation in saying that I trace it to moral and physical causes, the chief of which is want.

371. Mr. Edward Egerton.] It is a large Irish population?—It is a large Irish population of unskilled labourers.

373. That typhus fever is very much owing to two dry hot summers, is it not?—No; typhus is worse in winter.

374. Mr. Hunt.] The people were in a great state of destitution, and were consequently more liable to sink under the attacks of fever?—Typhus is a disease of poverty and a disease of want. Typhoid is a disease consequent on bad emanations and stinks. We have very little typhoid; it is a purely typhus epidemic.

375. Mr. Dent.] Are not the returns of last week worse as regards Liverpool?—No, we are improving. The disease which attracted so much attention in the country a few months since was not typhus but bronchial affections. People caught colds, and being in such a weak state they died. What I want to show is this, that we are here in an overcrowded town.

376. Mr. Edward Egerton.] As you have put it here, these red marks seem to be all over the town?—Yes, they are.

377. Now you have come here to tell us that you think the illness arises principally from the situation of this abattoir, have you not?—No; what I want to state is this, we wish the whole of the abattoirs of the town removed out of it.

378. Mr. Hunt.] Do you think that the existence of these different slaughter-houses about the town at all contributes to the ill health of the people?—No doubt of it.

379. In what way?—From the emanations from sewers. However cleanly they are kept, the blood that runs into the sewers immediately decomposes. Then you have the emanations from these sewers, which affect and weaken the people. Everything that weakens conduces to ill health.

380. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Where is the outlet of the sewers in Liverpool?—In the north, and in the south.

381. Running into the water?—Yes.

382. Mr. Hunt.] In walking past these places do you not perceive foul emanations coming from the sewers?—You can, near the abattoir, from a large sewer that runs in this direction.

383. Sir M. W. Ridley.] Is not the offal, or rather manure from these slaughter-houses, daily removed and purchased under contract by people in the neighbourhood?—Yes.

384. Is it not daily carried off from these slaughter-houses?—Yes, and the slaughter-houses are kept very clean, notwithstanding which a great quantity of blood finds its way into the sewers.

385. Mr. Hunt.] You think in a sanitary point of view it is desirable to get rid of all these slaughter-houses out of the limits of the borough?—Yes; in this map is represented the situation of the Stanley Cattle Market; we should like to be able to remove the abattoir from the town, and build slaughter-houses near this cattle market on the land which belongs to the corporation, which is marked yellow on the map, in immediate vicinity to a branch railway, and to the London and North Western Railway.

386. Mr. Graham.] Is that up the river?—No.

387. Mr. Hunt.] The Stanley Market, coloured red here, is beyond the limits of the borough, is it not?—Yes, it is beyond the limits of the borough.

388. The borough have no power to erect slaughter-houses adjacent to that market?—No.

389. Will you show us on the map how far outside the borough the Stanley Market is?—This is the Stanley Market, and the Parliamentary boundary is marked here (describing it by the map).

390. Is the Parliamentary boundary the same as the municipal?—Yes; the municipal and Parliamentary are the same.

391. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Is there no cattle market within the borough jurisdiction?—None.

392. Mr. Hunt.] Tell us what you propose, if you please?—What I should like would be, first, the power of removing all these slaughter-houses in the town, and secondly, having the power of erecting a slaughter-house upon our own land, near the present cattle market at Stanley.

393. Is there any borough land immediately adjacent to the Stanley Market?—Yes, the yellow shows that.

394. That you have acquired outside the limits of the borough?—Yes, that belongs to the corporation.

395. Have they acquired it under an Act of Parliament?—Yes.

396. You have land immediately contiguous to the market where you could erect slaughter-houses?—Yes.

397. You propose to avail yourselves of that land for that purpose?—Yes.

398. Would you want any statutory powers to enable you to do so?—Yes; we have no power now. On the contrary, it was settled when the rinderpest first came in, that the committee who had the direction of this Stanley Market should erect a slaughter-house for diseased cattle. It is so convenient that, under present restrictions, they can use it for the slaughter of ordinary cattle. The health body of this sub-district, in which is the slaughter-house, have stopped them by an application to the magistrates, and had them fined.

399. That is, the West Derby Districts?—Yes; then I would also wish to call the Committee's attention to the position, that we have no possibility of erecting lairs for cattle, consistently with health and property in the borough of Liverpool. We are now oppressed with large numbers of cattle in the borough in unfit and improper places.

400. When cattle and sheep are bought in this market for consumption in the town, what becomes of them at the present time?—The sheep and oxen that are brought to this market must be brought back again to the different places in the borough, and killed within four days.

401. What is done with them between the time of leaving the Stanley Market and the time of slaughter?—They go principally to the yards attached, either to the present slaughter-houses, or they have found places under the railway arches down in the town, or yards which were employed by builders have been converted for their reception. For instance, in the railway arches there are between 400 and 600 cattle stored, that is, in the town. In yards, in Nelson-street, surrounded by houses, in a very populous district of the town, there are 100 cattle, which are just turned into the yards. There are different slaughter-houses in different parts, I need not repeat them, where the different cattle are kept.

402. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Are they driven there by drovers?—Yes.

403. Mr. Hunt.] Did they have to stand in the streets on some occasions?—I have never seen them; I do not know that they have; I have not remarked it.

404. Here is the statement, a true statement, "That under the present arrangements now in Liverpool some of the men have to stand in the streets adjacent to the slaughter-house, with their cattle, a whole day and night"?—I should think that is an exaggeration; it has not come under my notice, and I think if it had been done, the inspectors would have reported upon the fact.

405. Mr. Dent.] Is the four days' restriction for for slaughtering only consequent upon the cattle disease, or is it usual?—It is a temporary regulation.

406. Mr. Hunt.] You have not experienced that inconvenience before?—Before that time they never came back again to the borough. In the olden time, when they had been at Stanley market, they only came in as they were required to be slaughtered. The largest butcher in the town will tell you that when he bought his cattle there he moved them to his own farm, and brought them in just as he required them. We had none of the inconveniences we suffer from now, of thousands of cattle being in the borough, and thousands of sheep, which we do not know what to do with.

407. Mr. Dent.] This has particular application to the present case, then?—Yes. The only lairs for cattle under the old regulations were two or three just on the high road in the borough, but not near any houses. Those marked blue are the different fields let by gentlemen to the dealers. Some of the butchers had their own fields.

408. Then they conveyed them to Manchester alive, and now they are slaughtered?—They were until lately, but now the Irish cattle have been allowed to go on to Manchester.

409. Sir M. W. Ridley.] Did the old inspectors see as to these cattle standing under the railway arches, that those arches and the yards were regularly cleansed and the manure regularly carried off?—Yes, we see to that.

410. Therefore there was nothing of a character dangerous to health from the animals standing there?—It did not amount to danger to health, or else we should have stopped it; I may say prejudicial to health, that would be the better term.

411. Every protection was taken that could reasonably be taken?—Yes.

412. Mr. Hunt.] You have not explained what these patches coloured blue on the map are?—These patches coloured blue are the fields let by gentlemen to the cattle dealers; not to the butchers, but to the cattle dealers, and they are of no use now.

413. Chairman.] They are not allowed to take the cattle from the market to their fields now?—No.

414. If a man buys more cattle than he wants they kill immediately, and then he is obliged to keep them for two or three days in the town?—Yes. There is only one market at Stanley, on the Monday. He must kill them by Thursday, and must supply his customers and the shipping. This is a very important thing; he must supply with the meat killed on the Thursday, the ships having to go away on the next Monday, and that in the summer months. If this regulation continues, it will be a most perplexing thing to the trade. There is only one market. They might by-and-by have two markets or three markets.

415. How used they to do before?—They only required one market then; they took the cattle to their farms. All the large butchers had farms, and they bought from the Irish dealers.

416. Enough for the week?—They bought enough for the week and sent them up to their farms. We never knew what it was to have cattle stowed as they are now in Liverpool.

417. Mr. Hunt.] That is merely the result of these regulations; if these regulations cease the evil will cease?—Yes.

418. Mr. Dent.] They always kill at the slaughter-houses in the town of Liverpool at ordinary times, do they not?—Yes, the amount of slaughtering is important. Take the month of March; I have just calculated what it would be, and here is the return of the slaughtering in last year as compared with this, and there are the corresponding weeks as far as the 1st of April. (The return was handed in, and is as follows:—)

We have now nearly three times the amount of cattle in the abattoir, taken in round numbers, that we had this time last year, so that we are suffering from these badly placed abattoirs doing three times the work.

419. Chairman.] Why should they do three times the work?—It has been virtually made a dead-meat market for the manufacturing districts.

420. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] You supply Manchester and Salford?—Yes.

421. Mr. Hunt.] While the railway traffic was suspended?—Yes.

422. Chairman.] But in ordinary times there would be a considerable amount of slaughtering; all that was required for supplying the wants of the town and the shipping, all which is carried on in these abattoirs?—Yes.

423. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] You said there was one market; do you mean one market and one market-day only?—One market and one market-day.

424. You want more than one market-day in the week?—I do not understand the management of the trade; it depends upon Ireland so much. I said I fancied they might do with that.

425. Mr. Hunt.] In the event of its being thought desirable to place stock in quarantine which is disembarked at Liverpool, is there any place that would be suitable for that purpose?—No, not in the borough of Liverpool.

426. You would want an Act of Parliament to enable the parties to acquire land for that purpose?—Yes; and I cannot now tell where such land is to be found.

427. Chairman.] Has there been any marked increase in typhus fever since the additional amount of cattle in the town of Liverpool and the slaughtering there?—That I am not able to say; I have no data upon which I could venture to give an opinion upon that. The typhus fever is always worse in the cold weather. We have had this in the winter months, and therefore I might be attributing to one cause what was due to another, or attributing to an accidental cause what was due to a natural cause.

428. Should you say, from your professional experience, it is probable that the increased keep of cattle in Liverpool and slaughtering in Liverpool has increased the mortality of the town, and has increased the typhus fever?—I am perfectly certain that it would increase the sickness. What I should look for as being increased would not be typhus, but when the warm months came, and emanations are abundant, and diseases springing from emanations are prevalent, such as diarrhœa, we should then have an increase in sickness. We should have what the physicians call the pythogenic disease.

429. Mr. Edward Egerton.] You said a good deal of disease arises from the blood going into the sewers; are the sewers trapped in Liverpool?—Yes; but owing to the great population and extent of it, you would probably find one in every sixth or seventh house with its trap out of order, and in London probably more so.

430. Chairman.] What do they do with the manure in Liverpool?—They sell it to the farmers.

431. I mean now, since the cattle plague restrictions?—We send it out under certificate.

432. Where to?—To the farmers; the farmers send in for it, and the inspectors give a certificate for all manure where there has been no rinderpest; they certify that the manure is from a healthy cow-house, and it is allowed to pass by the county magistrate upon that certificate into the country.

433. Then you have no great accumulations of manure in the town?—As few as we can help; our contractors are bound to take it out; but I am sorry to say that the increased extent of the borough leaves us a little more than we want.

434. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Do not your bye-laws compel you to have it removed within a day?—The slaughter-house manure is, but not the general manure of the town; the cow-house manure is not bound to be removed every day.

435. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Is Stanley Market a private speculation?—Yes.

436. Mr. Hunt.] And belongs to a company?—It belongs to a company.

437. Is there any ground in that neighbourhood where animals could be placed in quarantine; I mean supposing there were powers to acquire ground?—I think not.

438. Mr. Dent.] Is the Stanley Market much of a store-stock market?—No, it is for fat stock; we have no store-stock market that I am aware of to any extent.

439. Mr. Hunt.] Is the land contiguous to the road which abuts on this property of the corporation built over, or in what state is it?—It is very free from buildings; where the council proposes to erect slaughter-houses would be at least a quarter of a mile from any present building.

440. Is there no land in a state of cultivation near there that could be acquired for the purpose?—No; it is all very valuable building land, except what is marked yellow, which cost a large sum of money to the corporation.

441. What is the rent of the land per acre on that map coloured blue?—That I do not know; the rental of that Mr. Cullen will give.

442. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] You might have land on the other side of the water, at Birkenhead?

Birkenhead?—I think that is probable, but I cannot speak to it.

443. Mr. Hunt.] It is merely a question of price with regard to this land near the part coloured yellow?—It would be a very heavy price; I should not think you would get land there under between 500*l.* to 1,000*l.* an acre.

444. Sir M. W. Ridley.] Have you had an opportunity of judging of the condition of the health of animals imported on their arrival?—I have not.

445. There is a Government officer who inspects all animals on their landing?—Yes; he inspects all foreign cattle, and there are inspectors under me, who are specially acquainted with the different sorts of Irish and Scotch cattle.

446. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Are you appointed by the corporation?—Yes.

447. Mr. Hunt.] There is a different inspector for the Irish, and Scotch, and foreign cattle?—Yes; the Government takes charge of what is called foreign stock.

448. Mr. Dent.] Is there a large importation of foreign cattle to Liverpool, as well as Irish and Scotch?—There are a great number of Spanish cattle; long-horned Spanish cattle.

449. There are not many cattle from the northern parts of Europe?—I think not.

450. Mr. Dent.] In ordinary times, and not merely now, under the cattle plague, you would like to have all the slaughter-houses removed out of the borough, and public slaughter-houses erected near Stanley Market?—Yes; another arrangement I should like the Committee to bear in mind is this: we have, speaking in round numbers, I should say between 400 and 500 small cow-houses; they are under no direction at all in ordinary times, and we have no power over them. We have no power to compel the parties even to keep them clean, to provide for their cattle, or to remove the manure. It is removed about every fortnight. What I think necessary, not only for the health of animals but for the health of the inhabitants is, that in future these cow-houses should be put under something like the regulation which exists in London, namely, that they should all be licensed, and that we should declare the number of cows that can be kept, and where it is improper to keep them at all. Without that I see a great difficulty in any regulation of the Government for preventing an accumulation of disease being maintained in a town like Liverpool. It is almost impossible to keep off disease from the cattle if the cow-houses are without any regulation, and are allowed to be overcrowded and bad in their other arrangements.

451. Chairman.] If the corporation of Liverpool thought fit to bring in a Bill to give effect to your recommendation, they could do so?—They might bring in a private Bill; they never have; it never attracted attention until the rinderpest.

452. The compensations and other expenses would be very large, I suppose, to get rid of all these private interests out of the town?—That I could not say; there are places that one would find it difficult to value, they are so bad.

453. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Has the health officer never reported on this state of things?—It never attracted my attention until the rinderpest came.

454. Mr. Edward Egerton.] The evil you have mentioned, namely, the blood, must have existed just the same for some time?—I have reported upon slaughter-houses certainly, and urged forward the recommendation of their removal.

455. Mr. Hunt.] In the event of your erecting a public slaughter-house in the neighbourhood of Stanley Market, should you propose that the use of such a slaughter-house should be given to the butchers and slaughtermen?—What I speak of is, of course, only my own impression, namely, that it should not be managed by corporation officials, but let off to a company, such as the Abattoir, or some company established by the butchers themselves, the corporation not building for a profitable investment, but simply for the public good.

456. You would allow individual persons in the trade to rent parts of it?—Yes; I do not think corporate officials could manage it as effectually as the butchers themselves would.

457. What are the arrangements now at the abattoirs that you speak of. I suppose the butchers pay so much for the use of them?—The butchers will mention what they do. I understand about 50 butchers in the town use it. I may mention that they were tied by our covenants to certain charges; when the corporation gave them the privileges belonging to the abattoir for so many years, and guaranteed them the 6½ per cent., they tied them to a certain charge, which they cannot exceed.

458. Sir M. W. Ridley.] Are you aware whether there have been many seizures of unwholesome meat for human food by the authorities of Liverpool. There is an inspector, naturally, of the markets to see whether the meat is diseased or not. Have there been many instances of individuals exposing meat unfit for human food in Liverpool of late?—Without a single exception, I may say every week, there is a very large quantity of unsound meat, but this is distinguished from seizure, for the butchers seldom require it to be seized. They generally give it up as soon as they find it out. The expression "seizure" will give a wrong impression to the operation of it in Liverpool; but there is a very vast quantity of unsound meat in ordinary times as well as in the rinderpest time.

459. Has there been any increase in the case of condemned meat since these cattle were removed to these railway arches, where they have stood, as has been asserted, for a considerable time waiting before they were slaughtered. Has there been a greater increase of cases of condemned meat latterly?—No, there has not; whether from jealousy on the part of the traders or not, the quantity of condemned meat as unfit for human food has been less since the time of the rinderpest than before it.

460. Would you ascribe that at all to these animals having remained a certain time before being slaughtered, so that their blood cooled, and they were in consequence fitter for slaughter?—No; the reason of it is this. The condemned meat is generally found to be sent in by land to the butchers of the town from a distance. A cow, for instance, dying of the milk fever. That is meat that ab initio should never have come, and it is not meat that has gone bad. Therefore, there has been more observation and more scrutiny, and therefore less condemned meat, for the butchers are just as quick as the inspectors. If they find it out they call on the inspector, and it is condemned. You do not find the local butchers are in fault. We seldom seize anything except pigs. I may say, as a general rule, we never require to seize from the killing butchers.

3 May 1866.

461. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Who is this bad meat consigned to?—Consigned to the selling butchers, from people in the different districts round. Our friends at Bolton sometimes send us some, and they come from Manchester sometimes.

462. Mr. Hunt.] And all over the country, a man who has a cow likely to die, of course wants to get as much as he can for it?—Yes; in fact, it is killed to prevent its dying.

463. Chairman.] Would there be a greater liability, do you think, to have bad meat sent into a town if all slaughtering in the town were stopped, and nothing but dead-meat supply allowed?—I am quite convinced that if all the slaughter-houses were centred in one common abattoir, as in France and as in Edinburgh, the supervision, if required, would be more perfect.

464. There would be a less chance of bad meat coming in?—Of course. Instead of having 41 places day by day to be looked after, we should have our officers constantly at the public slaughter-houses.

465. Mr. Hunt.] Are you acquainted with the public slaughter-houses of Paris?—Only by reading.

466. Of Edinburgh?—Very slightly. Merely just walking through them.

467. Mr. Goschen.] Are they all in one spot in Edinburgh?—Yes.

468. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Do you think that a town like Liverpool could be supplied during all seasons of the year by meat coming there ready killed?—No, I do not think that Liverpool could be supplied at all. Talking as a physiologist, I should think that most of the meat killed in Ireland in July and August would not bear the sea voyage without becoming bad, and that we should seize plenty of it.

469. For a large town, you think it is necessary to have an abattoir?—Yes, I think so. You see in Liverpool there is an immense amount of shipping to be supplied, and I do not think it would be possible to supply it with dead meat brought from Ireland.

470. Mr. Goschen.] You have to supply the ships now with live beasts?—Yes, with beasts killed fresh and fresh.

471. Viscount Cranborne.] Have you any knowledge of diseases caused by over-kept meat?—No; I have never seen any disease following from over-kept meat, either game or otherwise.

472. It is an opinion now prevailing among physiologists and physicians, that disease as a general rule, does not arise from over-kept meat?—I do not think it does. It is very nasty, but I do not know that I have ever traced any disease from it.

473. Therefore any difficulties arising on that head would simply arise out of the question of impediment to the trade, and could not be dealt with from a sanitary point of view?—It would be a sanitary point of view, because if you will allow me to say so, I do not think the people would eat it. The natural alchemy, or chemistry of the stomach, would counteract the putrifaction.

474. Some people think that decomposition assists the digestion?—It probably does to a certain extent. I have not seen it myself; but in the case of a person fed upon meat which was decomposed, I should expect that after a time, nature would not take up everything. I mean that in what is called the secondary assimilation there would be irregularities. The stomach would do its work pretty well as to the digestive part. Then comes the secondary assimilations, when it is turned into blood, in the different parts of the body, and I should expect to find boils and skin eruptions, showing disease of the blood. But I merely speak theoretically upon that. I have never tested it; for I have never known a person live constantly, or for any length of time, on putrid meat.

475. Decomposition, or putridity, are terms which are too strong to apply to anything that is likely to appear in the market at all?—I think we shall see a good deal of it coming from Ireland, caused by the sheep. I think so.

476. You cannot give any formula by which you could determine the length of time, with reference to the time of year and state of the animal approximately, during which meat is likely to keep?—No, I do not think there is any formula of the kind. It is not a question of temperature; much will depend on electricity, and no doubt a great deal also on the new form of gas, the ozone, and the amount of it.

477. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Do you think that the Manchester and Salford Market could be supplied by animals slaughtered in Liverpool throughout the summer?—If we had a proper slaughter-house. If we had six months to prepare for it, and if the London and North Western Company were to build such waggons as could be appropriated for carrying the meat, I think it could be done. I think the inland trade might be done from a place like Liverpool to Manchester and Salford.

478. Are you aware whether the slaughter-houses in Manchester and Salford are better or more numerous than those in Liverpool?—I do not know; I have always understood they are very bad; I think they are worse than ours. Considering that they are numerous, and belong to private people, ours are very well managed.

479. Chairman.] According to that proposal, you would have one great slaughter-house, or collection of slaughter-houses, for Manchester and Liverpool, and the district?—I think it is quite capable of doing it. If we had a slaughter-house near the Stanley Market, such as is proposed, with the railway running up past it, we could send to Salford and Manchester just as easily as we could send it to West Derby by the cart, and easier.

480. Mr. Norwood.] With reference to the question put by Lord Cranborne, when cholera is prevalent, is not over-kept meat supposed to be disposing to disease?—No doubt it is supposed to be so, but I do not think we have any facts to go upon. I think that as science advances upon the question of cholera, it will be found that the diet has very little to do with it. I think that is one of the errors that frightened us at first. We put it down that fruit was the cause of diarrhœa, because it came in the fruit season, and so on, but I think that is not the general opinion of the profession now. Of course, any indigestible stuff will produce diarrhœa, but I do not think over-kept meat will; for instance, I never saw it follow the eating of game.

481. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] I think the answer you gave the noble Lord with regard to over-kept meat was, that although it might not produce very serious illness, it was likely to produce boils, and so on?—Yes, I expect it would be be so, although I have no facts; it amounts merely to theory.

482. You consider it is unwholesome and indigestible?—Yes, decidedly.

483. Mr. Goschen.] Do you seize diseased meat that has been kept too long?—Yes; if mutton or beef is at all gamey, it is seized as unfit for human food.

484. But it is not your view of it, that it is really unfit?—I have no data from which to trace disease to that; for instance, we have no facts to prove that rinderpest meat has produced disease. We seize it, and leave the onus of proof to the parties from whom we seize it.

485. You think that is the proper course?—It is the course we are obliged to adopt. As to proof of being unfit for human food, if you come to an example, it would be almost impossible. I am quite convinced that I saw rinderpest meat, at the first commencement of the outbreak, sold in Newgate Market.

486. Mr. Graham.] Are you aware that there is a preserved meat trade in Liverpool?—Yes; I have understood that it is a very good trade.

487. Is not that preserved meat an outlet for any that would not be saleable in open market?—Yes; and it was sold to a very large extent lately; when the gentlemen of Cheshire were suffering so much, and stamping out the disease, it met an outlet there.

Dr. W. S. Trench.

3 May 1866.

488. Mr. Hunt.] They were diseased cows, were they not?—No, they were not diseased, they were stamped out.

489. Mr. Edward Egerton.] They were killed before they were taken ill; that is what you mean?—Yes.

490. Mr. Graham.] I meant to inquire whether you were not aware that it was an outlet for positively diseased meat?—No, I do not believe it; one of the duties of my office is to learn everything of that kind by inspectors; and I have never been able to trace it. Of course we hear rumours of every kind; we hear of diseased horses being put into such meat; I have had watchers, and was never able to trace anything of it.

491. Mr. Goschen.] What check have you to prevent diseased meat being potted and preserved?—Merely this: that every carcase that comes into the borough must pass in some way or other under the inspectors' hands. The great meat markets are the butchers' shops and the abattoir, which are constantly being visited daily, and all the slaughter-houses.

492. Mr. Hunt.] If it comes already potted, I suppose you have no control over it?—No.

Mr. Hugh Cullen, called in; and Examined.

493. Chairman.] What is your calling?—I am a Cattle Salesman, and I am also the Treasurer of the Cattle Market at Stanley, and deeply interested in the cattle trading in Ireland, as well.

494. Are you also a grazier?—Yes.

495. When you use the term "cattle salesman," you sell by commission cattle consigned to Liverpool?—Yes, precisely; we sell by commission cattle consigned to our care for sale; the cattle that we sell are principally Irish, nearly all the foreign cattle that come to Liverpool, a few Scotch, and very few English. It is nearly all the Irish and the foreign trade we are entrusted with; we have almost the entire foreign trade in our hands, and a large proportion of the Irish trade.

496. From whence come the consignments of foreign cattle that you have to sell?—Almost entirely from Oporto. We have had this year consignments of cattle from Buenos Ayres, but nearly all come from Oporto. The annual number for the last few years has been about 6,000.

497. What sort of cattle are those?—The best quality of cattle, almost as good cattle as come from any part of the world.

498. Fat cattle or store cattle?—Fat cattle; speaking as a cattle salesman I only refer to fat cattle. We have no interest in the store business except so far as our customers in Ireland are interested in the purchasing of cattle for them, and the grazing of cattle there.

499. As to these cattle that come from Oporto, are they brought in steamers?—They are brought in steamers from Oporto. Liverpool is exceptional in its circumstances. It is the great terminus for the trade with the East. Large steamers sailing up the Mediterranean, and returning with a short cargo, call at Gibraltar coming round, and are frequently directed by telegraph to drop in at Oporto and take a cargo of cattle home.

Mr. H. Cullen.

500. In what condition do the cattle generally arrive from Oporto?—They generally arrive at Liverpool in a very fine condition, because the importers of cattle from Oporto are both the owners of the vessels and the owners of the cattle, and consequently it is their interest to bring the cattle over in the best possible condition. The steamers that carry the cattle are very large steamers, and are better adapted for carrying cattle than smaller steamers, though built specially for the cattle trade. These vessels are all very large, and bring the cattle in excellent condition. Our best butchers give the highest prices for those cattle.

501. As a rule, what proportion of the arrivals do you condemn as unsaleable?—I should say practically none. The Oporto trade has come into existence within the last 10 years in Liverpool, and I should think one per cent. would be a great deal too high to set the actual loss; except on one occasion when there was a total loss—cargo and ship altogether went to the bottom.

502. Do the cattle sometimes suffer injury from bad weather at sea, and come in with broken limbs and so forth?—Seldom, if ever; I do not think we have had half a dozen broken limbed cattle from Oporto altogether the last few years.

503. Mr. Hunt.] What is the average passage?—A good deal depends on the wind, and a good deal depends upon the steamer. I should say four and a-half days is the average passage.

504. Chairman.] Have you heard any complaint of the treatment of those cattle during the transit of those cattle on shipboard from Oporto to Liverpool?—No.

505. You do not think it could be improved?—The greatest improvement that could be made would be the increase in the size of the steamers, but many of those steamers have already arrived at a length that it is almost impossible to increase them; some of them are nearly 300 feet long.

Mr. H. Cullen.

3 May 1866.

506. Do they carry the cattle on deck as well as below?—In the winter season they never do; in the summer season they do.

507. Mr. Hunt.] They are properly fed and watered?—They are properly fed and watered. They get compressed food on board the steamers, and cattle care-takers go out with the steamers and feed and water them on the voyage.

508. Chairman.] Have you ever heard of any cases of cattle plague or pleuro pneumonia, or anything breaking out among the cattle so imported?—No; the cattle coming from Spain and Portugal are singularly healthy; and with the exception of the foot and mouth disease, from being kept at Liverpool for a week, which almost all cattle are subject to, when the foot and mouth disease is prevalent, we have had scarcely any disease.

509. Mr. Hunt.] Do you think that they arrive with the foot and mouth disease, or do they contract it after landing?—They contract it after landing; occasionally, the steamer does not arrive in time for either the Liverpool or Manchester Market; this was before the regulations came into vogue.

510. Chairman.] Where have you to keep them till market day?—We have lairs prepared for the purpose.

511. Mr. Dent.] In ordinary times, I suppose?—Yes; our lairs are situated where this blue mark is (pointing on the map).

512. Chairman.] You are not allowed to use those lairs now, are you?—Yes, we have got a license from the county magistrates; the entrance to those lairs is within the borough, but we did not like exactly to test our position as regards the right of driving the cattle from the borough through our own land into our own lairs, because these latter are out of the borough.

513. Mr. Goschen.] You are on the confines, are you?—We are; there is a portion within, and a portion without.

514. Mr. Hunt.] Has anything happened with regard to the other spots marked blue?—Those spots marked blue represent folds and parks that we rent, for the purpose of keeping Irish cattle prior to the market.

515. Have you been able to use those since these regulations have been in force?—This last week we have been able to use them, but they are practically useless now, because the bulk of the cattle coming to market now are stall-fed cattle, which would perish in the open air; they are obliged to be housed and put in proper lairs. We have accommodation here for 600 or 700 cattle.

516. Chairman.] You do not keep any of them in the town of Liverpool?—No, we do not now; we were forced to do it until last week. For a couple of weeks, we got liberty to keep them close to the cattle market, at the sheds of the London and North Western Railway Company, which run into the market. This is the plan of Liverpool Cattle Market (producing a plan). On this side is the great high road running into Liverpool, and on the other is a branch of the London and North Western, adapted specially for the Cattle Market, and brought right up into the market; and along here, are extensive cattle pens, for the convenience of the trade.

517. Mr. Hunt.] Is that by Edge Hill?—Yes; it is a branch that is connected with Edge Hill, and also with the docks on the other side, here.

518. Show us the terminus of the railway at the docks?—Here is the railway (pointing on the map); it goes round here, and comes to the Huskisson Dock, about that point.

519. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] What is the distance?—I should think that the distance by railway is from three and a-half to four miles.

520. What is the scale of the map?—Six miles to an inch, but the new railway does not appear to be marked.

521. Chairman.] Before you were allowed to use that merely by license, and were obliged to keep them in the town, did the cattle deteriorate?—No, we requested our customers not to send their cattle till the Sunday, and the consequence was we only had them in the town during the Sunday; and tried to remedy the inconvenience as far as practicable in that way.

522. Mr. Dent.] Those were the Irish cattle?—Yes. With regard to the foreign cattle our correspondents would not attempt to bring cattle in the face of the orders in Council, and because we are obliged to sell all the foreign cattle at the present moment in Liverpool. If we got a surplus supply, we could get no means of disposing of them except at a ruinous loss.

523. How is that; cannot you keep them in that lair?—The present position of the law is this. Suppose the cattle arrive on the Saturday, they are inspected by the Government inspector and passed on their route, having been inspected by the local authority, the corporation of Liverpool; and thus, having passed two examinations, then they go to our lairs and afterwards to Stanley Market. When they come to Stanley Market there is an "S" put upon them, and all those cattle are obliged to be slaughtered within four days. I say, practically, this season of the year cattle will not be furnished in a dead state to the manufacturing districts except at a very enhanced price.

524. Do you mean at this time of the year a carcase is injured by travelling to a great extent?—Decidedly. There are plenty of gentlemen from Manchester whom I see here who will corroborate this statement.

525. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] If it were packed in hampers would that be so?—Decidedly; I should say so. The increased cost of that is very great, and would tend to increase the price of meat.

526. Chairman.] Have those restrictions lessened considerably the importation of foreign cattle from Spain and Portugal?—Yes, and I believe at the present moment our employers would be most anxious almost to double their trade if they could get encouragement from us.

527. Mr. Hunt.] That is owing to the peculiar circumstances of Liverpool, is it not; that is not the experience in London?—I am only speaking of Liverpool.

528. Mr. Dent.] Is it a fact that your importations of cattle from Oporto have fallen off?—It is a decided fact.

529. Could you give us any comparison of this time last year as to the importations from Oporto?—I could upon reference to figures, but I have not the figures here.

530. Sir M. W. Ridley.] Are these animals from Oporto always for immediate consumption?—Yes. No others are brought in. They are not adapted for store cattle at all. Not being acclimatised matised they are not suitable for this country, and any few of them that have been kept for store cattle have turned out very badly.

531. You are obliged to kill them immediately?—Yes, within four days.

532. In consequence of their physical state?—We are not obliged to kill them in consequence of that, but we are compelled by law to kill them within four days.

533. I am asking after a voyage of four days; on an average, if it were a rough voyage, would these fat animals be so much injured on the voyage as to require them to be slaughtered immediately?—Not at all, we have had them for three or four days.

534. Without much deterioration?—The first day or two they would look rather better; their blood would cool, and they would take some food and water.

535. Chairman.] Then the impediment to the trade arises from your being obliged to slaughter them in Liverpool?—Yes; we want to sell, we want competition, and as the competition is restricted to Liverpool, it is very easy to glut the market with a certain specific description of stock. The consumption is 800 a week. If we get 100 beasts more than that, we are compelled to kill within four days, and sell them at a reduced price.

536. You cannot forward the meat so killed within the four days advantageously to other parts?—Certainly not.

537. Why not?—Because we cannot get customers to purchase it on the same terms as we could sell it; no country butcher would buy meat in Liverpool except at a reduced price compared with the live animal.

538. Mr. Edward Egerton.] If they arrive in that good condition by the steamer, I do not see how the meat can deteriorate very much?—There is a variety of ways; the animal is first slaughtered; in order to render the animal in a proper state to be sent into the country, in ordinary weather it should remain for 24 hours in order that it should set; when it had set, then it should be shipped; in anything like muggy weather, or soft weather, or when the temperature is hot, it would never set at all.

539. What is the objection to these foreign cattle being kept in these sheds, which you say you have been using of late; why not keep them for two or three days in those sheds, and then slaughter them as they are wanted?—The objection to that is this, that we should not get competition to sell them at the proper price.

540. Is it not the fact that Liverpool supplies Manchester and the neighbouring towns?—Yes.

541. Then there is the competition with the town of Manchester, and the large towns in the neighbourhood of Manchester?—Yes; but it would be too expensive for a Manchester butcher to come to Liverpool to purchase one or two beasts on the chance.

542. It is well known to the buyers in Manchester that you have a large trade with these Spanish cattle. If they knew you were receiving 60, or 80, or 100 a week, certainly they would give you orders, and you could keep them in these sheds and sell them as they wanted them?—Perhaps so; but we could certainly not sell them except at greatly reduced prices.

543. Chairman.] As a matter of fact, you have stopped the consignments of cattle from Spain and Portugal to the extent that used to be carried on before?—I could not go so far as to say that we have stopped them, but we have not advised our friends to continue them in the same numbers that they would be disposed to do, or in the same numbers that they did formerly.

544. I do not mean that you have stopped them, but you have not advised the trade to the same extent as it was carried on before?—No.

545. Mr. Goschen.] You receive a commission of so much per cent., I suppose?—So much per cent.

546. On the value?—On the value; the cattle are sold in the market, and we receive a commission of so much per cent. on the sale of the cattle.

547. Mr. Hunt.] As you are interested in the cattle market, you like all animals landed at the port of Liverpool to go through the market; is that so?—It is to a certain extent; but the cattle market was built 30 years ago, mainly by the trade, for the special accommodation of the trade, and the charge in the cattle market is very small. It is all an honorary business throughout. The officers are honorary, and there are no paid managers in it.

548. I suppose certain dues are paid with respect to all cattle that come into the market?—Yes, 2*d.* a head for cattle.

549. Why does it not serve your purpose to send the cattle away to Salford and other places by rail without ever coming to Stanley Market?—The difficulty is this: if we have a large market with a varying supply, we have a large number of customers. We do not always have special descriptions of stock to suit every customer; some of them are very good, and some very bad; and we might not be able to sell all in Liverpool.

550. You say you are now practically limited to the Liverpool custom?—Yes.

551. That is because your animals go into Stanley Market?—Yes.

552. Supposing you send them by steam or by rail to Manchester and other places, you would be able to get the Manchester custom in that way, would you not?—To a certain extent, but we might overdo the thing if we sent to Manchester 60 or 100 beasts more than the market would take; we should have to sell them at a reduced price.

553. Do you send the whole of your animals into the Stanley Market?—Most of them.

554. What was the case when the railway traffic was stopped. Did the Liverpool buyers buy more largely of you for the purpose of supplying other towns?—They did; the wholesale buyers purchased much more largely.

555. Then there was a great impetus given to the butchering trade at Liverpool?—Yes.

556. Do you hear any complaints of the condition of the meat on its arrival at Salford or Manchester, or other towns?—Yes; eternal complaints from every part.

557. On the part of whom?—From the butchers.

558. How is it sent?—Nearly always by railway.

559. Was it packed?—In some cases it was packed. Sometimes it was packed in hampers to Manchester; in consequence of the railway accommodation there, there were great facilities afforded for sending it; it went packed in cloths, packed in straw, and so on.

560. What was the condition of the meat generally?

Mr. H. Cullen.

3 May 1866.

generally?—Generally it was soft, and never properly set, and very often dirty too.

561. It was not properly set because it was sent out before the proper time?—Yes, that is one reason.

562. That was the fault of those who sent it off, was it not. If it had been kept in Liverpool a sufficient time for the meat to have got set, it would not have been in that state on its arrival at Manchester?—It would depend a good deal on the weather. If the weather was soft or muggy weather, you could not get it to set. There is another thing; the Manchester market days are Friday and Saturday. Some the butchers would like to have a portion of their meat kept over till Monday. They could not come into Liverpool till the Wednesday or Thursday, and the consequence was it had scarcely time to set for the Friday or Saturday's market; it would not pay the Manchester butchers to have to come down two or three times a week.

563. Was it the practice of the Manchester butchers to come to Liverpool to kill?—Yes, to a certain extent.

564. Where did they kill?—In the abattoirs. The Cattle Market Company erected a slaughter-house here, but the local authorities and the county magistrates prevented it being used.

565. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Until the Act of Parliament prohibiting the transit of animals by railway they bought the beasts alive, and sent them down to Manchester alive, did they not?—Yes.

566. That is what is wanted now?—That is what we want to do.

567. They do not like this dead meat being sent to Manchester by rail, because they say the meat is not sent to the markets in good order?—Yes; and not fit for consumption.

568. Mr. Hunt.] Is that a complaint from the butchers or from the people of Manchester?—We do not come in contact with the people of Manchester; we only come in contact with the butchers.

569. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Do you know there is a large deputation of all the butchers in Lancashire and Cheshire who have waited upon the Chairman upon the subject of this dead meat?—I did not know it until I came into this Committee.

570. But is it the fact?—Yes.

571. Their complaint is that the meat they have had during the time the transit of the live animals has been stopped has been very bad, and that great complaints have been made by their customers in consequence?—Yes.

572. And they want a removal of the power to send the live animals from Liverpool to Manchester?—Yes.

573. Chairman.] But they can do that now, can they not?—No; from the borough but not from the market; foreign cattle are confined to the port of Liverpool.

574. Mr. Dent.] Cannot you forward these cattle from Oporto where there is no disease?—No.

575. That is under the Order in Council?—Yes.

576. Have you any importations of foreign cattle to Liverpool except from Oporto; have you any from Germany?—No; a great number of sheep come from Germany, but they do not come direct; they come through Hull.

577. I am speaking of their being imported into the port of Liverpool?—No, we are badly situated for that; a few years ago we got some, but now we have none.

578. The whole of the stock comes from Oporto, I believe?—Yes.

579. Mr. Goschen.] You mentioned Buenos Ayres, did you not?—Yes; I mentioned there were two cattle in the spring from Buenos Ayres.

580. Only two in the year?—Yes.

581. Were they fine animals or not?—No, very inferior; they were very much reduced by the length of the voyage; they were tall, and only fit for stores.

582. Mr. Dent.] Have you any lean stock from Ireland coming to Liverpool?—A great number of lean stock used to come in.

583. I mean before the recent regulations?—Yes, thousands of them.

584. Those were not sold at the Stanley Market?—No, they never went into the Stanley Market; we have not a market for lean stock at Liverpool.

585. They were sent inland at once?—Yes; there is no market for them in Lancashire, as a rule; they must go into the feeding districts, Yorkshire and Leicestershire, &c.

586. Chairman.] Are the Irish fat cattle sent to Manchester?—To Manchester, Leeds, Huddersfield, Wakefield, and Birmingham; Liverpool is the great centre of supply for all these towns.

587. Mr. Goschen.] You said you were a large grazier at Liverpool yourself?—No, in Ireland.

588. Is it your habit to supply fat cattle or store cattle?—Entirely fat cattle; we have nothing to do with store cattle, except so far as purchasing them and putting them on the land in Ireland to fat them for our correspondents.

589. Mr. Hunt.] Store cattle are purchased under license from Liverpool?—Yes, but none have come in that way latterly.

590. Mr. Goschen.] What is the cost of keeping the cattle at Liverpool per day?—From 8*d.* to 1*s.*, according to their keep; 8*d.* I think is about the minimum, and 1*s.* the maximum.

591. Mr. Edward Egerton.] You do not put them into the sheds?—Yes, we house and water them, and supply them with hay for 8*d.*

592. Mr. Goschen.] What is the average price of these cattle; are they high or low priced cattle?—There is a butcher from my town here; last week he purchased 30 of these Portuguese cattle; he is one of the leading butchers of the place, and they sold at 26 l. 5 s. a piece.

593. Mr. Dent.] They are quite first-class animals, are they?—Quite first-class animals.

594. Mr. Goschen.] Would a quarantine interfere with the foreign trade with you?—It would extinguish it; put it out.

595. Mr. Norwood.] The state in which the cattle arrive from Oporto is good?—Yes.

596. You attribute that to the large size of the steamers?—Yes.

597. In what respect is a large steamer better for the conveyance of cattle than a small one?—There is not the motion in a large steamer that there is in a small one.

598. You said something about these large steamers calling at Oporto trading from Alexandria. These large ships, as you are quite correct in stating, trade to Alexandria and call at Oporto sometimes to complete their loading?—Yes.

599. Have they any space below hatches?—Frequently,

Frequently, and sometimes they take them in the summer months on deck.

600. In the winter these steamers avoid taking cattle on the deck?—Yes, because they are then exposed to cold weather and a rough sea.

601. Have they any arrangements of stalls on deck?—Not stalls, but they have got what they call shifting boards, which are a description of stalls.

602. Is there not a shifting board between each of the cattle?—No, but between every four of five.

603. That supports them on their legs, in point of fact?—Precisely.

604. Mr. Goschen.] I understand you to say that the owners of the steamers had an interest in the cattle?—Yes, owners of the cattle as well.

605. Are they Liverpool owners?—Yes, they have agents to purchase them, and those cattle are purchased and sent to a place of rendezvous, and the steamers call for them, according to circumstances.

606. They are bought for the account of the owner of the steamer?—Yes; the cattle are bought in couples, and then a number of them are brought to a place of rendezvous and then shipped.

607. Mr. Norwood.] Are there trading steamers from Oporto too?—Yes.

608. Those are small boats?—They are smaller boats.

609. Your experience is that the large ships that come from Alexandria bring their cattle in better order than the small draught steamers?—I do not mean to say that there is any steamer that does not bring them in good order, excepting one or two small steamers from Oporto.

610. What do you call a small steamer?—A vessel of 500 tons or 400 tons or under that. Some of these vessels are 2,000 tons and 2,500 tons, and 300 feet long.

611. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Would not they bring sometimes beasts from Corunna?—They did, but latterly they have not brought many. Their cattle are not in so good a condition, and they do not suit our trade so well.

612. The great majority of the cattle killed in Liverpool are Irish cattle?—Yes.

613. Are you satisfied with the condition and facilities afforded by the steamboat companies in Ireland for the traffic of cattle?—I think they might be improved, they might have a larger class of steamers.

614. Do any cattle arrive by Holyhead?—Comparatively few.

615. The cattle sent direct from Dublin to Liverpool, are in a better condition than those sent viâ Holyhead?—Sent direct from Dublin to Liverpool, decidedly; cattle suffer more abuse in the transhipment from the boat at Holyhead into the railway trucks, than they do on the whole voyage. The cattle are down in the hold; they are driven up, and the cattle are very much abused in that way: they are then forced into the trucks, coming out of a heated hold, they do not see very well, and altogether, the cattle come very much better the other way.

616. Do you think that better facilities might be afforded than are at present afforded for the transport of cattle from the middle and southern parts of Ireland to Liverpool?—No, I think not; the voyage from Cork is rather too long, and paddle steamers would not pay. There is direct communication by railway up to Dublin, so that cattle come up in a very short time to Dublin, and are then sent direct to Liverpool.

617. Chairman.] What has been the effect in price from the regulations connected with the cattle plague?—The prices have been most irregular.

618. I mean when the railway carrying was first stopped?—The prices were most irregular, and we could not calculate upon anything like a fixed price; for instance, on Monday last, in our market, we had a surplus supply of sheep; all these sheep were marked for slaughter, and they were obliged to be slaughtered within four days after the market. There was a surplus supply for the borough, and these sheep could not be sent out of the borough, but had to be slaughtered in it. A great many of those sheep were left unsold, and I do not know what will become of them; they must be killed to-day.

619. Sir James Fergusson.] I suppose the fact was, the new system required some time to be matured; it was the novelty of the system that interfered with the process?—I do not think it was the novelty of the system; I think that as long as the system should continue, the surplus supply would always be affected in the same way.

620. As long as the obligation remained to slaughter in a very short time?—Precisely.

621. But the same difficulty would not occur if they were slaughtered when required, and there were the means of keeping them at that place?—Not to the same extent.

622. Mr. Edward Egerton.] As a matter of fact, do you think it would be possible that Manchester, and all those large towns in the neighbourhood, could be supplied by meat killed in Liverpool?—I do not think it practicable.

623. For the reason you have given, that the meat cannot always be depended upon to keep?—Yes.

624. Mr. Hunt.] What is the time it takes for a goods train to run from Liverpool to Manchester?—They send special and cattle trains sometimes under an hour.

625. Do you think that meat killed at Liverpool, and transported to Manchester in an hour, would get so bad that the people at Manchester could not eat it?—No; I do not think it would do that, but I think the putting in and the handling of the meat would damage it considerably. It is the loading and unloading and handling that damages the meat so much.

626. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Is it not a fact that you have to wait for many hours, sometimes days, before you can get a special cattle train?—I think not.

627. Mr. Hunt.] I put the question, what is the time a goods train takes to go from Liverpool to Manchester?—I think an ordinary goods train takes about two hours or two hours and a half.

628. Do you think if the animals were killed when their blood was cold, and the meat was kept and properly set and properly packed, it would cause the slightest harm going from Liverpool to Manchester?—I think if all the conditions were as you mentioned, if the meat was properly set, and the weather all right——

629. I say nothing about the weather if the animal was killed when it was cool, and the meat was not packed until it was properly set, would there be the slightest risk in any weather of its becoming unfit for human food, or be prejudiced by the two hours or two hours and a half of the journey to Manchester?—I do not say that it would become unfit for food, but it would be deteriorated in quality.

Mr. H. Cullen.

3 May 1866.

630. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Do you not know, on the other hand, that there have been great complaints that the meat has come very bad?—Yes.

631. Mr. Hunt.] From its being done in a bungling manner?—Yes.

632. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Would not the expense be greater coming that way from Manchester to Liverpool?—About three times greater expense dead than alive.

633. I mean would not the expense of carriage enhance the expense very much?—It costs the buyer three times more to send it dead than alive.

634. Mr. Hunt.] Supposing there was a slaughter-house adjacent to the Stanley Market, and a line of railway was laid right into the slaughter-house, and the meat killed, and conveyed at once from the slaughter-house to the trucks, and so conveyed to Manchester; how would it cost three times the amount it would if the animals were yet alive?—We have all those conditions; we had erected a slaughter-house.

635. Which you did not use?—We were prohibited only yesterday; of course we cannot use it now.

636. Supposing you are using the slaughter-house; do the rails run into the slaughter-house?—No, they run alongside it. There is a map of it; there is nothing between it except the road.

637. You want manual labour to transfer the carcase from the slaughter-house to the railway?—Yes; but we have trucks close to.

638. The trucks do not run into the slaughter-houses?—No.

639. Then you want manual labour to transfer the meat to the truck, and that might be avoided, might it not?—I think not.

640. Might it not be so arranged that the trucks might run at once into the slaughter-houses?—It might, but I do not think there would be any particular advantage.

641. How do you make out three times the cost by going to Liverpool?—The first thing is, the rate for meat from Liverpool to Manchester is 1 s. 3 d. per cwt.

642. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Is that delivered?—No; only delivered at the Central Station in Manchester.

643. Not delivered to the parties to whom it is sold?—I think not.

644. Does that 1 s. 3 d. include the cost for packing?—It includes nothing, except the mere carriage; the cost of the truck for live cattle to Manchester is 14 s. 6 d., and that truck contains eight or nine beasts; in dead meat, the offal, and the hide is left behind.

645. You get rid of one-third of the weight by leaving the offal behind?—Yes.

646. Then you gain that much?—Yes, certainly.

647. What do you put the weight of the carcass without the offal, on the average?—I suppose from five to six cwt.

648. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Then you have to pay, besides, for the cloths and hamper?—Yes; it is quite exclusive of that.

649. You know what they do charge?—No, I do not know what they charge for that. The Manchester people look upon it as a great inconvenience to get the meat from the Central Station to their own places; they have to wait the arrival of the trains.

650. Mr. Hunt.] That is in consequence of a higher rate of the carriage by rail?—Yes.

651. Suppose they come alive; I suppose you have to employ some one to truck them?—Yes; of course there must be a man to load them, but that is generally done by the railway porters.

652. If that is done by porters, you save the expense of the man?—No, because the carcasses have to be put upon the trucks.

653. I am supposing that the trucks run into the slaughter-house?—The railway companies supply porters to load the cattle.

654. You generally send a man in charge?—Yes.

655. When you get to Manchester, it is necessary to send some one in charge of the animals through the streets, to the butchers?—Yes; but there are not more than one or two drovers to a large number of cattle; it is not necessary.

656. Still you have one expense that would be saved?—Yes.

657. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Is there not a trade profit to the butcher by his buying the animal alive, instead of buying dead meat?—More than a trade profit, I should say; a trade profit to the man not buying the animal alive, rather than in buying it dead by wholesale, and selling it retail.

658. Mr. Goschen.] The carcasses, without the offal, is from five to six cwt.?—Yes.

659. The cost would be about 6 s. a carcass?—Yes.

660. If there were eight carcasses it would be 2 l. 8 s.?—Yes.

661. What is the expense of the truck?—14 s. 6 d.

662. Therefore the difference between the two is enormous?—Yes. I may be 3 d. or 6 d. out in the price of the truck, but, as far as I recollect, I think it is about that. Mr. Salmon will be able to give you that.

663. You get there the difference between the 5 s. and the 2 l. 8 s.?—Yes.

664. Sir James Fergusson.] Can you tell us what was the actual difference in the selling prices of beasts to the public in Manchester when carried dead from Liverpool, as compared with meat carried alive, and slaughtered after arrival?—I could not say that.

665. Do you know whether the wholesale price of beasts in Manchester was materially raised by being carried dead, as compared with the price when carried alive and slaughtered on arrival?—I could not say; there are some Manchester butchers here who could tell you.

666. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Have you any doubt whatever, that instead of the Manchester butcher buying his dead meat that was slaughtered at Liverpool, having it alive at Manchester, that would enhance the price of meat very much, because the profit that he would get on the live animal would be lost to him, and he would only be able to remunerate himself by the profit on the wholesale and retail prices of the dead meat?—Certainly.

667. Sir James Fergusson.] But that is an assumption. It is not within your knowledge that the prices were actually raised by the one class over the other?—No, I know that positively.

668. Mr. Hunt.] I wish to ask one question about the relative prices of the Irish and foreign cattle cattle under the present regulation. Irish traffic can be sent inland by rail?—Yes.

669. But foreign cattle cannot?—But foreign cattle cannot.

670. Has the price of Irish cattle risen in comparison with the price of foreign cattle since that has been the state of the law?—No. The number of foreign cattle that has come this year up to this time has been very small in consequence of the fear of these regulations.

671. Has the price of Irish cattle risen in comparison with the price of foreign cattle?—I think not much.

672. Supposing that it is allowable to send Irish cattle by rail and not foreign cattle, would you not expect the price of Irish cattle to rise?—Certainly.

673. How do you account for its not having done so?—Because a large number of home fed cattle have come to interfere with them. No number of foreign cattle came to interfere materially with the prices this season.

674. You would expect the price to rise if there was no competition?—No.

675. Then why has it not done so?—I cannot say that.

676. Is not that a curious state of things that the Irish cattle have almost a monopoly according to your evidence, and yet the price has not risen?—I do not understand you very well.

677. You stated that Irish cattle can be moved by railway inland, but foreign cattle cannot?—Yes.

678. One would naturally suppose that that would give the Irish cattle an advantage as to price, but you also said that you are not aware that the price of Irish cattle has risen in comparison with foreign cattle; is not that rather a remarkable thing?—I suppose it is.

679. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Is it not the fact, that the price of Irish cattle is kept down by the number of animals slaughtered in Lancashire and Cheshire and sent to Liverpool and Manchester?—Yes, there is no doubt that is one reason.

680. Mr. Hunt.] But still those animals could not travel by rail till recently?—The Irish cattle could not.

681. Cattle killed in Cheshire and Lancashire could not be sent to Liverpool by rail till very recently?—No; but they might have supplied the out towns which would have interfered with prices in Liverpool.

682. Sir James Fergusson.] Did you state that the importation of cattle from Oporto ceased in consequence of the regulations against carrying cattle alive inland?—Yes, almost; not entirely.

683. Do you mean that orders went out to Oporto, not to ship any?—Yes.

684. Mr. Hunt.] That is at Liverpool only?—I only refer to Liverpool.

685. You are aware that the foreign trade in cattle largely increased at other ports?—I believe so; but I do not speak of any particular knowledge of that.

686. Sir James Fergusson.] Do you know when the order went out to cease despatching foreign cattle from Oporto?—The importers of the foreign cattle from Liverpool were continually advised as to the state of the orders in Council, and as those orders in Council came out they restricted the orders according to circumstances. At the present time, I have no doubt the number of foreign cattle coming to Liverpool at this season of the year would be double what it is if it were not for these orders.

687. When did the importation of cattle from Portugal cease?—I cannot say the particular date, but all this spring the number of cattle coming from Oporto has been a mere bagatelle compared with what it would have been if we had an open trade for them.

688. Do any fat cattle come to Liverpool from Scotland?—Yes, a great number latterly.

689. That is to say, this spring?—This spring.

690. They were not allowed to be carried alive inland until the last order in Council?—I think not.

691. But their importation was not checked by the operation of "The Cattle Diseases Act"?—No, I think not.

692. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Perhaps you can give the Committee the proportion of foreign cattle imported from foreign ports to those imported from Ireland?—I can give the proportion as far as regards Liverpool; the total number of cattle sold in the Liverpool market is 140,000 annually, of which 120,000 are Irish, 14,000 Scotch, and 6,000 foreign.

693. Mr. Leader.] There was some evidence given before the Commission on Railways, and Mr. Cawkwell, the manager of the London and North Western, states this, referring to the dead meat market: "You have stated that, in your opinion, the resources of Ireland have been very imperfectly developed; do you mean that the articles of which the traffic at present consists might be largely increased, or that new sources of traffic might be opened up if they were properly looked after. Take the cattle traffic, for example, at the present time, that is carried on entirely by local rates; each company charges its own local rates, and there is no reason why that traffic should not be carried on in the same way as it is from Scotland, from which country we have a very large traffic, both in cattle and in dead meat. With proper arrangements, I have no doubt that from Ireland there might be a very large traffic created in dead meat." That is the evidence of Mr. Cawkwell, which seems to be opposed to your opinion?—Decidedly. If his opinion was correct he could simply create a dead-meat market in Ireland, and commence carrying the dead meat at once; and if it was an advantage to the public the public would see it. What difficulty would there be in it?

694. In what state do the cattle arrive in steamboats, through the winter months of the year, in Ireland; are you satisfied with the condition in which they are landed?—From the eastern ports, yes; not generally from the western ports; we get a good many cattle from Sligo and the western ports. The steamers are small, and they do not come in good condition from the western ports; from the eastern ports they do. Still, I think the steamers might be improved in size.

695. Mr. Norwood.] The distance is much greater from the western coasts?—Yes.

696. Mr. Leader.] Are there proper facilities at the port of Liverpool for landing these Irish cattle?—Yes.

697. Sir M. W. Ridley.] To revert for a time to the question of these boats; you have spoken of the comparative fitness of certain boats, and compared one with the other, that is, the larger and the smaller; have you an acquaintance with the various classes of vessels, both the larger and the

Mr. H. Cullen.

3 May 1865.

the smaller, that are engaged in bringing these cattle to Liverpool?—Yes.

698. Have you much acquaintance with the smaller vessels (taking them to be such) that bring the Scotch and Irish cattle into Liverpool?—Yes.

699. I should like to know what the arrangements are in these smaller boats that bring the cattle into Liverpool?—The great bulk of the cattle come to Liverpool from Dublin and Drogheda; and the construction of the vessels from Dublin and Drogheda is simply this, the vessels are made with a light draught of water, in order that they can enter Dublin Harbour and Drogheda, and that they can sail without ballast; they have two decks; the cattle stand on the bottom of the vessel. Then there is a 'tween deck, and then the cattle are above, so that they have three tiers of cattle, one above the other. There are very efficient means of ventilation, but the vessels are rather short, and in rough weather pitch and roll.

700. Is it your opinion that the ventilation of those small vessels engaged in the import of the Irish cattle from Dublin is sufficient for the health of those animals?—I think it might be greatly improved; still I think it is sufficient: the new vessels that are coming out are greatly improved.

701. Are these cattle equally placed on deck in addition to those three tiers of cattle, that you tell us are below?—No, there is one tier on deck, one between decks, and one on the bottom of the vessel.

702. That is three altogether?—Yes.

703. Are these cattle fed on board with this compressed food, or any other food?—They have no food whatever from Ireland.

704. What is the ordinary length of passage from Dublin?—Twelve hours.

705. What is the length of the passage from Cork, for you have spoken of that in your evidence?—Twenty-four to 28 hours; 48 hours from Limerick.

706. Are you acquainted with the mode in which they are put on board these vessels at Dublin?—Yes.

707. Are they slung into the hold or driven into the hold; how is it done?—They are put on long stages and forced into the hold by goads; properly speaking, they should have goads; but it is almost impossible to get the drovers to use their goads, and instead of that they use heavy sticks.

708. Then the cattle are driven down a slope into the hold of the vessel?—Yes.

709. You have seen that done frequently?—Yes.

710. Has it appeared to you that the cattle have suffered from the process?—Yes.

711. Have you actually seen them taken out when they have arrived at Liverpool?—Yes.

712. How are they taken out there?—In the same way; they are driven out from the bottom of the hold up to the deck on stages; but they do not suffer so much coming out, because they are anxious to get out into the air; but sometimes there is considerable suffering.

713. Have you known instances of fractured limbs either by putting them into the holds of vessels in Dublin, or taking them out of the holds in Liverpool?—Not to any extent; I have known of instances, but they are so few compared with the number of cattle carried, that they are not worth mentioning.

714. Does it appear to you that the cattle are a good deal agitated and heated in their system by these two processes, one on one side of the Channel and the other on the other?—I do not think they suffer much in Liverpool, because the cattle are anxious to come out into the fresh air, and they come out pretty freely; going down and being put on shipboard they do suffer, to a certain extent.

715. Do you consider to such an extent that it is prejudicial to the health of the animal that is to come over, when it comes to be slaughtered, and sold as a fat beast?—I do not look upon it as of much importance.

716. You have told us that these cargoes come as deck cargoes. Have you known cases in which the whole of the deck cargo, or any portion of it, has been thrown overboard to lighten the boat in very severe weather?—No, the number of times it has been done is very rare indeed; scarcely worth mentioning.

717. Mr. Dent.] Do you know anything of the lean cattle trade from Ireland?—Not as far as the importation to England is concerned. I know a good deal of it in Ireland.

718. You never keep these fat cattle sufficiently long to see whether there are the seeds of disease developed in them; pleuro-pneumonia, for instance?—Do you mean in ordinary times?

719. In ordinary times?—In ordinary times we keep them three days, and in case of pleuro-pneumonia we see it.

720. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] How many hours do you say these Irish beasts are on board the boats, from the time they are put on till the time they are landed?—From the east coast of Ireland about 12 hours.

721. How long do you suppose they are on board the boat from the time they are put on board, till they are taken off?—I should say 18 hours, as a maximum.

722. Sir James Fergusson.] I think you stated that one great want of the large cattle market at Manchester was, to supply other towns round about with meat?—That is so; small towns in the neighbourhood.

723. Is that meat supplied alive, or are the cattle driven from the fat meat market at Manchester to those towns, and to Salford?—They were usually driven from the market to the small towns; that is, before the recent regulations.

724. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Is it not a fact that a great many cattle are sent from Manchester to Macclesfield by rail?—Yes; I know as a fact that some were sent. I do not know what number.

725. Practically, there are very few small towns there. Round Manchester there are towns from 20,000 to 30,000 inhabitants?—Practically so.

726. They would be connected with Manchester by rail?—Yes.

727. Mr. Graves.] You have stated, the steamers that are practically engaged in the Irish cattle trade are paddle steamers; do you mean to infer that paddle steamers are superior to screws?—Yes, there is great preference given to paddle steamers, especially in small steamers, because they do not roll so much.

728. You find the cattle come in better condition than by screw steamers?—Yes.

729. Sir James Fergusson.] The greater proportion portion of the steamers that come from Oporto, and trade in the Mediterranean are screw steamers?—Yes.

730. Mr. Graves.] With regard to the mode of carrying the cattle in three tiers, are you able to draw any distinction as to which tier they come in better condition in, either on the deck, in the middle tier, or in the lower tier?—We generally think they come in better condition in the middle tier, but in any new boats that have come out, they have a cover on deck, and since any of these new and improved steamers they have come equally well on deck; in fact almost better, because there has been better ventilation.

731. Do you consider the protection that you speak of enables you to bring the cattle over in more comfort and in greater safety?—Decidedly.

732. And in better condition?—Yes.

733. Would you think it objectionable if all the steamers were obliged to have such coverings; would you see any advantage or disadvantage in such a thing?—I think it would be a very great advantage if all the steamers had that covering.

734. Do you think the steamers occasionally come over crowded with cattle?—I think they do occasionally, but it is not the rule.

735. Would you consider it an advantage or disadvantage if each steamer was licensed to carry a particular number of cattle, and not allowed to exceed that number?—No, I think not; I think private interest would prevent them being overcrowded to any extent.

736. I am speaking now of the Channel trade?—Yes.

737. In summer or winter do the cattle come in better condition?—In summer.

738. Do the cattle in winter suffer much by being on deck?—When the weather is bad the cattle always suffer, more or less.

739. Mr. Edward Egerton.] As I understand, the principal result of your evidence as regards the trade of Liverpool is this; you want increased ground for your cattle market, and want the jurisdiction of your borough justices extended to that particular part of Liverpool?—Yes; and we want also to be at liberty to move sound cattle coming from uninfected districts to our market into the manufacturing districts for immediate slaughter and for sale.

740. And in those three sentences you sum up most of the evidence you have given us to day?—Yes.

741. Mr. Goschen.] Before the time of the cattle plague, how was the trade carried on between Manchester and Liverpool; did you consign to Manchester, or did the Manchester people give orders?—Our course of business was this; we sold a certain number of cattle in Liverpool, and kept another certain lot in Manchester; those that we missed selling in Liverpool we brought on to Manchester, and brought the fresh ones, and sold all we had left as well in Manchester.

742. You sent them on your own account to Manchester?—Yes; for the account of our principal.

743. They were not brought by the Manchester people, you sent them to Manchester; the Manchester people did not come to you, but you went to Manchester?—Precisely.

Mr. H. Cullen.
3 May 1866.

Mr. Richard Hall, called in; and Examined.

744. Mr. Hunt.] You are a wholesale Butcher at Liverpool?—Yes.

745. About how many thousand cattle do you kill in the course of the year?—Fifty or 60 per week; I am not so much wholesale as I am in a large shipping trade.

746. What is your opinion of the present system of slaughter-houses in Liverpool?—The Manchester people who have come down have had some little difficulty at first in consequence of there being a great deficiency of lairs. There has been more deficiency of lairs than of slaughter-houses, but the Council have proposed to build a place, if this continues, out at Kensington; and they have got at the present time estimates for that. They would not go to the expense of building unless the cattle trade re-opened through the country.

747. What are the animals that you principally kill, Irish or foreign?—Irish, Scotch, and foreign.

748. They are nearly all animals that are imported?—Yes.

749. You do not buy anything from the country?—In our part of the country there is nothing; there is no feeding scarcely.

750. When animals are landed at Liverpool, what do you do with them?—When animals are landed at Liverpool they are consigned to salesmen, or else bought by them. They are brought up to the lairs, and driven to the Stanley Market. At other seasons of the year they are driven to fields within a radius of four miles round in the grass seasons.

751. Do you buy them at the market or at the lairs?—In the market.

752. Invariably?—Not always. Sometimes a dealer may come on the Saturday, and want to go away, and ask me to buy 30 or 40.

753. The market is held once a week?—Yes.

754. When you buy a quantity of beasts in the market what do you do with them?—Before these regulations I used to send, perhaps, 10, 15, or 20 to kill. The others I sent on to my farm, and brought them in as I desired to kill them.

755. Whereabouts is your farm?—About four miles from the market; perhaps it is about one mile out of the borough.

756. You have not been able to do that lately?—No.

757. Can you now?—No; the salesmen at the present time, according to these regulations, cannot do so; and the consequence is that they have to bring them into Liverpool, into very inconvenient places where they are overcrowded, and it deteriorates the quality of meat, and keeps the beasts in a state of fever.

758. The meat does not keep so long as if the animals were cool when killed?—No.

759. Should you approve of all the slaughter-houses in Liverpool being done away with, and a slaughter-house being substituted near Stanley market?—It would be very inconvenient for us in the shipping business, very indeed, because the principal market is out of Liverpool, and some of the steamers take 10,000 or 11,000 lbs. weight of beef. It has all to be done by five in the morning, and if it is killed at a distance I do not know how we should arrange it.

760. Mr. Dent.] How far is Stanley Market from

Mr. R. Hall.

Mr. R. Hall.

3 May 1866.

from the place?—Four or five miles, perhaps five or six.

761. Is there a railway communication down to the Docks from Stanley Market?—Yes; it has just been adopted because the railways are so excessively crowded in Liverpool. I know people who have taken things to be shipped to Manchester have frequently to wait for two or three hours with their trucks, and we could not do that.

762. Mr. Hunt.] Suppose there was an extra line of rails devoted to the purpose of carrying goods, or carrying meat; I suppose then that difficulty would be at an end?—I think the Liverpool trade would prefer carting it. They would cart their own in preference to the rail.

763. They would prefer carting it four or five miles to sending it by train?—Yes.

764. How does your meat get from the slaughtering-houses to the train?—It goes in large quantities by lorries; we weigh it off in quarters and put it on to the lorries.

765. What are lorries?—A sort of truck.

766. Are they the trucks you see in the Liverpool Docks?—Yes; we should load it off the mens' shoulders, and put it on to these lorries, and take it off again, and put it into the ship.

767. How many slaughter-houses have you?—Only one.

768. How near is that to the quay where you have to put it on board ship?—Mine is not central, but very near the centre of the town.

769. How far is it from the water's side?—To the extreme of the docks it would be two and a half miles, and to the other perhaps two miles.

770. Do they go down in lorries now?—Yes; but the notice they frequently give us is a very short notice. For instance, an order might come in late on Saturday evening to supply a steamer that was not sailing till Wednesday, but to send it off early on Monday morning if the vessel was going into the river, or else she might be neaped.

771. Mr. Goschen.] The difference would only be that it would be half an hour or an hour longer by the lorry?—It makes a difference where you have to send the men from your place; in fact, it is almost impracticable. Pilot boats in hot weather start on the Sundays and Mondays.

772. Mr. Hunt.] You say that under the present regulations you have to keep the animals in very inconvenient places, that the meat is deteriorated, and that you are very much inconvenienced?—It tends to deteriorate the meat, because if the animals are crowded up they cannot do so well.

773. That is merely the result of these temporary regulations?—Yes.

774. You have not found this inconvenience before?—Not at all. I have found the inconvenience on my own farm.

775. Do you buy many of these Spanish cattle of which we have heard?—Yes, I bought 30 last Monday week.

776. I suppose it is a chance what day they come in; do they sometimes come in five or six days before the market, and sometimes the night before?—Yes; sometimes the morning of the market.

777. In what condition do they generally come?—Usually in a better condition than the Irish cattle.

778. To what do you attribute that?—They are a much quieter and more placid animal than the Irish. They are tractable, and can be taken on board easier. The Irish grass cattle are very wild, and I am sorry to say the men who drive them are very wild. They do not use ordinary care; they abuse them very much in loading them in Ireland. That is the great complaint as to the bruises on the animals and the like. We have a great deal more bruises on the cattle, and they come in a worse condition from Ireland than from Oporto.

779. The Spanish animal has a great deal of bone in proportion to the meat?—No, less bone.

780. Less bone than in the Irish?—There is less bone in a good Spanish bullock than almost anything. I do not mean an old worn-out bullock, but the prime ones. They are very small in the bone.

781. How is the hide?—Very good.

782. Is it more valuable in the hide than English beasts?—Yes, considerably more.

783. Does the meat fetch as high a price as that of the other beasts you kill?—Not quite.

784. To what do you attribute that?—In the first place there is a little prejudice to commence with, or else the young Spanish bullocks are equally good to any other, except it be the primest Scotch.

785. What is your opinion of the desirability of supplying populous places like Manchester and Salford, with dead meat from Liverpool?—It could be done, but if there is no danger of bringing in rinderpest again, I would rather have open markets. It is practicable, and it can be done. I would quite as soon have open markets, if it does not bring in the disease.

786. Do you think there would be any deterioration of the meat by reason of its being carried to Liverpool and sent off by rail?—If they use proper care, there is not; I have tried it. I sent some up myself to Manchester a few weeks ago on purpose for the experiment. It left Liverpool at a quarter to 12, and was at Manchester at a quarter to one, and arrived there in beautiful condition.

787. You heard no complaints?—No, I consigned it to a person of the name of Heskell, a salesman there, and he was very much pleased with its condition. The week following I sold for a person of the name of Winterbottom at Holyhead, and they arrived in very good condition, but I am sure there have been very great complaints, because I have seen animals myself dragged and mauled in a most shameful state at Liverpool.

788. That is the fault of the way in which they are treated?—Yes.

789. You take care to have the meat properly set before you pack it?—Yes, I have had sheep down from London; they have been very much better in London than ours. I have had them down in the carcass in capital condition. They leave London at night, and are delivered per luggage train at half-past ten the next morning.

790. The expense of sending dead meat is much greater than the expense of sending live animals?—Yes, it is more. It costs about 18 s. a ton when it is dead meat to go to Manchester; 15 s. for carriage, and 1 s. 6 d. at each end; one for collecting it at Liverpool, and one for distributing it at Manchester, and there are about three carcasses to the ton.

791. That you reckoned at 6 s. a head?—That is 6 s. a head.

792. Supposing you take the live animals, what would would they come to per head?—Considerably less; about 1 s. 10 d.

793. There would be some extra expense in trucking and untrucking the animals, and driving them to their destination on each side?—Very trifling.

794. There would be a saving of the carriage of the offal, would there not, if you sent it as dead meat?—Yes.

795. That you reckon at 1 s. 3 d.?—The whole of the offal would not be saved, because many of the parts would come down to Liverpool; they would take the heads and the liver, and the part which is saleable, with them. All the offal they have left in Liverpool is the fat and the hide.

796. That is owing to the regulations being only temporary, and no regulations being made in Liverpool to dispose of the hide?—The hide and fat have been left in Liverpool, but many would take the small offal, such as the head, the tripes, the kidneys, and the tails.

797. Is there any loss on any animal when he is taken a long way by railway; does the driving them into the trucks and confining them there cause any loss in the animals?—I should think it certainly must deteriorate them, because Mr. Cullen has told you, in his evidence, that an animal coming by Holyhead to Liverpool comes in a much worse condition than they do direct.

798. As to the state of the blood, are they as fit for killing when they come out of a railway truck as when they come off a ship?—I should think not so fit to kill; we should keep them 24 hours before we did kill them.

799. After they come off the truck, for the purpose of getting cool?—Yes.

800. Do you consider that an animal that is killed without being driven far, or without being carried in a railway, is more likely to keep in the shape of meat than an animal that has been otherwise treated?—Yes, it must keep better.

801. Have you had experience on that point?—Yes; I have had experience so far, that even driving them from my own farm, which is only a distance of 3½ miles, in the summer time, if they have been driven very fast, and they were with full bellies, and they killed them, they would be very unfit indeed; whereas, if they remained 12 hours before killing you would get them cool.

802. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Are you a retail as well as a wholesale dealer?—Yes.

803. There are two distinct trades with a butcher, are there not; there is what they call the higher class trade and the lower class trade?—Yes.

804. And therefore the man who buys the whole animal has a better opportunity of meeting the demands of his customers than if he could only go and buy wholesale in the market?—Certainly; he has an advantage, the same as the wholesale purchaser, of buying it himself.

805. Then the man who slaughters the animals himself has a better chance of making a profit than the man who merely buys in the wholesale market?—Yes, if he is a good judge.

806. If he is not a judge?—If he is not a judge he had better buy it dead.

807. He must either buy it cheaper wholesale, or sell it to his customers dearer, to make the same profit as the man who bought the entire animal?—Yes. There are many small butchers in Liverpool that want only one piece at a time; they only get a quarter or two, and they go to the wholesale slaughter-houses and purchase of the wholesale butcher two or three sheep, and three-quarters of a beast, or a side of beef, just as they may require.

808. If the law requires them only to buy in this way they would either have to buy it cheaper, or sell it dearer to their customers?—The law of supply and demand will rule that; it would depend on whether there was a large or small quantity offered.

809. Would not the man who slaughters the animal have a chance of making more profit than he who only sold it after it was killed?—I do not think there is a great deal made by either.

810. Mr. Dent.] Do you know anything of the trade in Irish lean cattle?—No, I do not.

811. You say the Irish fat cattle which come to you do not generally come in so good a condition as foreign cattle?—They are fully as good, but they get dreadfully bruised. They are crammed on board the steamers, and the beasts are not so good for that purpose. It is either that the boats are insufficient, or it is the clumsiness in loading on the other side, I do not know which.

812. They come out of these Irish boats very much heated, as a rule?—I think they carry beasts sufficient in many of the boats; quite as many as they ought to.

813. Mr. Leader.] You heard Mr. Cullen's evidence in reply to a question put to him. He said every facility you could expect was afforded for the transport of Irish cattle. You do not seem to agree with that?—I only know as to the fact. We complained, and the people of Manchester complained, of the bruises. I have sent hundreds of cattle to London myself years gone by, and we had a difficulty in disposing of them. Butchers are afraid of bruises, for if choice meat is bruised you cannot send it to a first-class customer.

814. You have had the opportunity of judging of cattle brought from Scotland. Do the Irish cattle come in worse condition than the Scotch cattle?—Yes, generally so.

815. What per-centage do you think is taken off the value of the Irish cattle from the condition in which they arrive, how much a-head?—If the beast is badly bruised it may lose 3 l. or 4 l.; if it is only a slight bruise, you may trim it off, but certainly it is an eyesore and a deterioration.

816. Mr. Norwood.] I believe it is the case that owing to a late Order in Council foreign cattle must be slaughtered at the place to which they are imported?—Yes.

817. As you are a large buyer of cattle for slaughtering, have you found it has been a better market for you as a buyer since the Order?—There have no foreign cattle come since the Order until last week.

818. Supposing the prohibition as to the movement of foreign cattle alive was to be continued, do not you think it would be rather an advantage to the buyer that the foreign cattle were not able to be removed from Liverpool; there would then be a glut at Liverpool occasionally?—Yes.

819. Then you would buy it all the cheaper?—We should certainly buy it cheaper at Liverpool.

820. That would be against the seller?—Only slightly, because the fact is, that if they have to be sold at Liverpool, if I have to sell them at 10 s. per piece I should sell them. The parties who import them there were very much alarmed and stopped the importation. I offered to give them them 3 l. a head for 200 a week freight, and let them go in the present channel.

Mr. R. Hall.

821. The substance of the present prohibition would not affect the import to a very great extent?—I think they will still send to Liverpool, because there is a very good market at Liverpool now. The few cattle on Monday week brought the highest price of anything in the market; they were all sold at the highest price.

822. You say you have to send to London sometimes to get dead meat there?—Yes.

823. Do you consider that has arisen in consequence of the prohibition as to the traffic of live cattle?—No, it has not perhaps arisen from that; we have had very short supplies of sheep from Scotland this spring; they have sent very few indeed from Ireland; there have been a great many in London; 2*d.* a pound cheaper in London in many instances than in Liverpool.

824. Have you had any occasion to send to London for live cattle before this prohibition?—Yes, I have gone myself and bought large quantities.

825. Both oxen and sheep?—Yes.

826. To what do you attribute that, if you say Liverpool is such a good port for cattle coming into it?—Because there are very few foreign cattle can come to Liverpool, it is so situated; the principal portion of the foreign cattle goes to Hull, and the coast, and then again to London. Liverpool is only open for foreign cattle from Corunna and Oporto; but the Corunna beasts which come to us are very poor, and do not pay the importers; the Oporto beasts do.

827. Sir James Fergusson.] Have you been getting any dead meat from Scotland since the cattle plague?—Yes.

828. What was the comparative cost to you compared to live cattle?—What I bought of it was very fine meat; it was consigned to Mr. Gibbon, a salesman of Liverpool; it probably cost me 1 s. 4 d. a pound less than my own did.

829. Less than the live did?—Yes.

830. That made no difference to the public?—Very little.

831. What do you estimate as the difference in the wholesale price of meat arriving dead, from that which arrives alive, and is slaughtered on the spot?—I can hardly tell; in Liverpool we have very little slaughtered meat come. You will arrive at that much better from any of the London salesmen. There is nothing comes to us, only the first week or two, they come from Scotland; but the beasts were stopped there and killed at Dumfries.

832. And dressed there?—Yes.

833. Then, perhaps, you think that the loss falls upon the consigner?—Yes, what little loss there will be; it is very trivial.

834. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] How many bullocks can you slaughter in your slaughter-house?—From 50 to 60 a day, if I require it.

835. Supposing every animal that had to be supplied to Liverpool and Manchester were slaughtered at Liverpool, do you think that butchers in the towns that are dependent on Manchester, such as Macclesfield and Stockport, and other towns round about, could go into the Manchester market and buy the meat as they do now?—I do not think they could. I think that if that was so, they would establish dead meat markets through the different towns, and would go at once from Liverpool. For instance, many of the Manchester and other dealers have purchased their cattle in our cattle markets, and have them killed in Liverpool, and send them on. They have turned dead meat dealers instead of live meat dealers?—I suppose it would be very desirable that the manufacturing towns should have the small offal that you speak of?—Quite so.

837. There is a large number of the consumers of that part of the meat in the manufacturing towns?—I should very much like to see the trade open if there is no danger of bringing the plague.

838. Sir M. W. Ridley.] I should like a little more clearly to understand your opinion upon a point that arises from a question put to you. It relates to the relative condition of the Irish cattle as compared with the foreign cattle in your Liverpool market. I wish to know whether it is your evidence that the Irish cattle are diminished in value as compared with the foreign cattle, from the condition in which they arrive in the smaller boats?—I do not know. There is one part of them, the Spanish cattle, which are particularly quiet.

839. I think I understood you to say that the Irish cattle did not meet the wants of the highest class of customers; is that the case?—Only those that are bruised do not, because you dare not send them to a first-class customer, and you must sell them at a low price.

840. Are they much bruised?—Sometimes they are; we have had great complaints; more than those that come in the large vessels, and more than those that come from any other place.

841. Apart from the question of the bruises, would they be in other respects fit for the higher class of customers; as fit as foreign?—Yes, fitter than foreign. I do not know that they would get as high a price as the Scotch, but they are better than foreign, no doubt.

842. As regards the Scotch cattle that come to Liverpool, what is their condition as compared with the foreign cattle?—The Scotch come very well.

843. Do the Scotch come free from bruises?—Yes, generally.

844. What is the class of boats which bring the Scotch cattle?—I am sure I do not know, for I never go down to these boats.

845. Whence do these Scotch cattle come?—They are shipped from Wigton, Galloway, and Dumfries. At this season of the year the Irish cattle do not come so much bruised as they do in the grass season. As to the grass cattle, the heifers and the bullocks are very wild, and they get huddled together, and get very much bruised.

846. Has it ever occurred to you that the persons engaged in the cattle trade should be under special regulations as to space and ventilation and watering?—I do not think they could water them conveniently.

847. But certainly Scotch cattle do come by boat to Liverpool?—Yes.

848. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Had it been the practice to send dead meat from Liverpool to Manchester, and these large towns, before the prohibition of animals being sent by railway?—No.

849. Do you think it would be possible to carry on that system when the weather gets hotter?—I think it would be a great inconvenience.

850. Do not you think a great deal of meat will be spoilt in the hot weather?—They will have to build their trucks the same as they do in Scotland

Scotland; it would be a great hardship on the butchers, but still it could be done.

851. Do you see any objection to opening the market now?—No, not if it will not bring back the disease; you need not have any objection.

852. It must be very difficult at the present moment to know what demand there is for meat at the different towns; as to dead meat for instance?—I think not; I think each person knows pretty well what he kills every week, and what he will consume.

853. A Manchester butcher, you think, knows exactly within a ton a-week?—Yes; there is not one man in Manchester that does not know the amount to a ton.

854. Does he know the demand that is likely to be made upon him from other towns?—If the dead meat trade was an established fact, they would have dead meat markets in all the towns, and they would write for all they wanted; the live dealers would turn to dealers in dead meat.

855. Do you not think there would be a loss at times in consequence of change in the weather and hot days?—There is, no doubt, there would be a loss if the meat was not sold readily.

856. Do you not think it would be a great hardship on all the poorer class of population of these towns if they were deprived of this offal?—Yes, most of them sell it.

857. But the larger amount of offal is kept at Liverpool?—No; the fat and the hides are kept at Liverpool.

858. Have you any trade in pigs?—No.

859. That is a distinct trade, is it?—Quite a distinct trade.

860. Mr. Graves.] Can you give the Committee any idea what the effect would be of keeping foreign cattle for a limited period before being placed upon the market, with a view of ascertaining whether disease existed among them or not. Supposing they were put for a week or fortnight into lairs, and kept there in a kind of quarantine, what would be the effect of that?—Very injurious, because, in the first place, when they come here you can seldom get them to eat anything, sometimes they eat a little green meat in the way of vetches and oats, and if they are kept wasting away for a time, any animal that is worth 25 l. would soon not be worth 14 l.

861. You are speaking of fat animals; I am speaking of stores?—I think the foreign stores brought the plague into Cheshire and Lancashire. They never had it in the neighbourhood of Highton and Owself till some were sold to a Mr. Speed, the butcher, and he lost his cows, and his neighbours besides.

862. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Where did they come from?—They were sent from some part of Germany to Edinburgh, and from Edinburgh to Liverpool.

863. Mr. Graves.] What would be the effect, in your opinion, of keeping them for a fortnight in quarantine, would they improve or not?—I do not know; I should think that they would not improve. It is the stores in most instances that have been so predisposed to disease, and not the fat cattle.

864. Mr. Goschen.] These store cattle were sent from Germany to Edinburgh, and from Edinburgh to Liverpool?—Yes, I can tell you the date they were sold in our market, and the parties who bought them.

865. They must have passed through two inspections?—Yes, they were inspected in Edinburgh, no doubt, and then sent to Liverpool.

866. What time would elapse from their leaving Germany until they arrived in Cheshire, under these circumstances?—I cannot tell you that; they came into our market on the Monday.

867. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Can you give the date?—September 14th or 16th. Mr. Speed bought a quantity, buying them cheap.

868. Mr. Goschen.] Where did you buy them?—In the Liverpool market, of Mr. John Gibbon, a cattle salesman.

869. Who did Mr. Gibbon buy them of?—They were sent to him for sale from Edinburgh, because they could not be sold in Edinburgh.

870. Why could they not be sold in Edinburgh?—I do not know.

871. Was not that a suspicious circumstance of itself?—I should think so, very suspicious; they came there, and Mr. Fraser bought one lot, Mr. Speed bought another, Mr. Wright bought another, Mr. Speed sent his own to his farm at Highton.

872. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Near Liverpool?—Yes, close to Knowesley.

873. Mr. Goschen.] Then they went by rail from Edinburgh to Liverpool;—Yes.

874. Was it known at the time they were sold at the Liverpool market that they came from Edinburgh?—Yes.

875. They were not bought for stores?—They were bought by the wholesale buyers. Some of them don't care how they are if they can get a pound or two out of them.

876. There was imprudence at several different points as to these cattle?—There was no imprudence in the case of the wholesale butcher if he could get a pound out of them; he would not care.

877. He might have suspected that there was something wrong with the cattle?—I do not think he did, because if he had he would not have sent them to his own farm where there were a large number of cows. It hovered out about Highton, and then got to Knowesley, to Lord Derby's.

878. Is there any trade in cattle from Edinburgh to Liverpool?—Yes, in some years there are a great many dealers go and buy them, and bring them to Manchester and Liverpool.

879. Was there much trade at the time these cattle came?—No, at that season there seldom is.

880. Are they foreign beasts that come in that direction?—No, they are generally beasts out of Fifeshire, and in that direction.

881. The fact of foreign cattle coming from Edinburgh to Liverpool was rather an extraordinary circumstance?—Yes.

882. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] A lot of these animals went to Cheshire?—Yes.

883. Can you tell me what happened to them?—They were sent to Cheshire, and Mr. Fraser sold them for stores, and they were returned to Mr. Fraser in the course of three or four days after; they were seized by the inspector of meat in Liverpool as having the rinderpest.

884. Who is the person they were sold to?—I do not recollect, but I can get the information for The House. They were sold at Chester fair, I think.

885. Mr. Goschen.] What time should you say had elapsed from the period when the animals left Germany and got to Liverpool?—I cannot tell; they were shown in the Edinburgh market on Wednesday or Thursday, and sold in Liverpool market on Monday.

Mr. R. Hall.

3 May 1866.

886. Mr. Dent.] Do you know when the disease broke out?—They had no disease in Cheshire up to that time.

887. How soon after they were bought by Mr. Speed and Mr. Fraser did the disease show itself among the beasts?—In the course of three or four days.

888. Therefore, if they had been in quarantine for a fortnight, it would have broken out in quarantine?—Yes.

889. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] What quantity were there?—I should not think there were more than 50 altogether.

890. Mr. Goschen.] As a butcher, is there more risk in your buying dead meat than live meat; more risk of not making a profit?—If we did so.

891. A Manchester butcher, for instance, buying dead meat, would he have more or less chance of profit than if he bought a beast alive?—He would like to buy the beast alive probably, but that depends on circumstances. In nine cases out of 10 men like to exercise their own judgment and buy them alive.

892. Does he run more risk of not being able to dispose of the meat if he buys it in the dead state?—Do you mean at the present time?

893. Yes?—Certainly, because it will not keep as long if it is killed here and sent a distance by carriage as if it was killed at home.

894. Therefore there is more risk of the meat being left on his hands?—Yes.

895. Would that make him raise the price to his customers to cover himself that risk?—Of course he would want a profit.

896. Do you think that in the case of a dead meat market being established all over the country there would be any large amount of meat destroyed?—No, I think there would be if there were ordinary care used in packing it and sending it away.

897. The meat would not remain over, in fact, but it might be adjusted?—Yes.

898. Is there any prejudice now against dead meat?—There is not in London because they are used to it, but there is a great prejudice in the country, and I think butchers in Liverpool and Manchester have great difficulty with their customers, because the meat does not look so well to the eye. The eyes is the organ to all the senses, and if it does not please the eye it very often does not please the palate.

899. Would the live beasts deteriorate much in being sent the short distance between Liverpool and Manchester?—No, not much. The cramming them into the railway carriage would deteriorate them somewhat.

900. What is the furthest point to which you send from Liverpool?—We send from Liverpool to London; that was in the live trade before this Act came into operation.

901. Would the beasts deteriorate between Liverpool and Oldham?—Not much, but they would deteriorate a little between Liverpool to London. I have often seen mine in London and did not know them when they got there from Liverpool, they did not look so well.

902. Supposing they had not got to change their truck, it would not matter how far they went?—It does not do to change the truck.

903. Mr. Hunt.] Whenever an animal is driven forcibly into a truck there is more chance of its being bruised?—Yes; loading from Liverpool they do not bruise them, but in the other cases they bruise them at various parts of the journey.

904. You would rather buy an animal that had not been in a truck than one who had?—Yes.

905. You say there is a prejudice against dead meat; is it not the case that the meat you have now dead is very often badly dressed?—Very badly dressed, indeed.

906. A good deal depends on the dressing?—Yes.

907. An animal that is killed cool and the meat properly dressed and sent away, will come in as good condition as if it had been killed at home?—Yes, if properly packed. A great deal of it is dressed very badly, indeed, and does not please the eye; badly dressed and badly packed.

908. As to the meat which you say you have from Scotland, from Dumfries, does that come in good condition?—Middling; you could hardly call it good, and it was not bad. If it had come in good condition it would have been worth as much as our own.

909. Are you aware that a great deal of the meat that is consumed in the best houses in London comes from Aberdeen?—Yes.

910. Often in the heat of the summer?—I am not aware of it in the heat of the summer.

911. With regard to butchers buying in the carcase, or buying the live animal, you think if you are a good judge of an animal, you would prefer buying it alive?—Yes.

912. But if you are a bad judge, you are less liable to loss by buying the carcase?—Yes.

913. When the Act of Parliament was passed prohibiting traffic for a certain time, did that at all affect the price of meat in Liverpool?—Only the first week, never afterwards. The first week the cattle were sold in a field; there was no convenience.

914. The first week there was an alteration of price, and the price rose?—No, it was lower; the prices were irregular. Our members visited the field and saw it; some they sold dear, and others they sold cheap; the trade was unsettled, and the people did not conform to it. After the magistrates gave us our market back, our prices have been regular in Liverpool.

915. Have they been higher or lower before the Act of Parliament?—I do not think that has had the slightest effect as far as price is concerned; other things have made a little difference, but that has had nothing to do with it.

916. You say you slaughtered some beasts, and sent the meat to Oldham, and other places?—I sent some to Manchester and some to Oldham.

917. Are you aware from your customers there whether the price of meat was raised in those towns by reason of the legislation?—I do not think it was raised; I think it rather deteriorated for two or three weeks, and then afterwards they got settled, and made fair prices.

918. Since that prohibition has ceased for moving cattle by railway, have prices fallen or risen in Liverpool?—They are about the same; I do not think it has made the slightest difference myself.

919. Has it made any difference in Manchester and Oldham?—I fancy they would give more to have the meat alive than to have the meat dead.

920. I mean as to the price to the customers?—

I am

I am not aware it was predicted that we should have things very dear indeed this spring, and it has not come yet.

921. Mr. Goschen.] On the whole, your pecuniary interest would be to have a dead meat market?—No, it would not; it would create inconvenience to others in the trade, and I am quite satisfied, and do not want it; I would rather that things remained through the country as they were, but still I am only speaking of the practical way in which it could be done; I had much rather the trade was thrown open.

922. You would prefer the trade to be thrown open, but your pecuniary interests would be a little in the way?—No; it does not make any difference to me.

923. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] You say you have had some beasts from London?—Yes.

924. Was it under somewhat peculiar circumstances?—One year, when there was great shortness of stock in Scotland and in the North, I bought many beasts and sheep, and sent sheep to Manchester.

925. Was that when pleuro-pneumonia so much prevailed, four or five years ago?—Yes; and then supposing sheep had come from London, they made 10 s. a-piece profit.

926. Yours is not a sheep country?—No.

927. Mr. Hunt.] With regard to the inspection at Liverpool, when these beasts came from Edinburgh, which you say took the disease into Cheshire, was there any inspection at the Stanley Market?—No; it was before the inspector was appointed.

928. After that, in consequence of the recommendation of the Mayor of Liverpool, there was an inspector appointed?—Yes; two or three.

929. Do you know anything of the inspection of the imported animals in the port?—Yes.

930. There is an inspector of animals who inspects the foreign cattle?—Yes.

931. Do you know whether it is an efficient inspection?—Yes; because when he has done his inspection, the borough inspector inspects them, then the county inspector, and then the magistrates; so that after the three inspections it is hardly possible they could get away with the four, if they knew their business.

932. With regard to Irish cattle, are they efficiently inspected?—Yes; they are inspected by the borough inspectors appointed by the Health Committee, and then again by the market and county inspectors, the veterinary surgeons.

933. Mr. Dent.] Are the Irish cattle inspected when there is no cattle plague?—No.

934. Before the existence of the cattle plague, the Irish cattle were not inspected?—They were not.

935. Foreign cattle always were, I think?—Yes; there is one thing I omitted to mention to you, and that is about having to kill all our stock in four days. It is a very great hardship on those who have a large shipping business; there is a great deal of meat, for steamers cannot be sent till Monday. There is only one market a-week, and if cattle are killed on Thursday, if the meat is packed, and they cannot take it to sea with them when they want it.

936. Is that under the last Order in Council?—Yes; we may want to keep some of them alive till the Saturday; we shall keep as few alive as possible.

937. Mr. Hunt.] If you were allowed to put these in lairs or in fields outside the borough, you you would be quite satisfied then?—Yes.

Mr. R. Hall.

3 May 1866.

938. You would be satisfied with the four days?—No, we want both; we want a radius; we do not care so much about that now as we do in the grass season, but we are supplied in the grass season almost solely from Ireland; I may say almost entirely from August to Christmas, we depend on Irish cattle in Liverpool, or nearly so; they are all grass-fed, and if they have to be tied up in confined places in the town, instead of getting to grass, they will deteriorate.

939. How many days do you want?—We want up to the Saturday.

940. From Monday to Saturday; you want the limit of a week?—Yes; you allow the salesmen, when they come here, to put them to grass or in lairs, and we are not allowed to do so. Then, again, with sheep, we are very awkwardly situated, and send a great many sheep in steamers; for instance, the "Great Britain," which sailed for Australia lately, took out 140 live sheep. If we were to take them in the town, they are wasting the whole of the time; we do not know what to do with them.

941. Mr. Dent.] If the cattle market were separated from the sheep you would get over that?—There is an inconsistency in one portion of the Order. You allow foreign sheep, which have been landed and mixed with other cattle, to come and mix with other sheep where there is an infection, and you will not allow them to go to grass between three and four miles, because there is nothing grazed in the neighbourhood of Liverpool, the land is too valuable.

942. Mr. Goschen.] What is the nearest grazing land?—All round there we graze four or eight miles; but it is not a feeding country at all.

943. It is accommodation land?—Yes; some of it is let as high as 20 l. per Cheshire acre.

944. Mr. Edward Egerton.] It is all building land?—Yes.

945. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] But there is very good arable land also?—The arable land is all required for potatoes, and other produce.

946. Mr. Goschen.] You would be quite satisfied; you could do with a week if you had seven miles instead of four?—Yes, certainly; with the small radius of four or five miles.

947. Mr. Graves.] Four miles from the Exchange?—Four miles from the Exchange would suit every one in the trade.

948. Mr. Goschen.]. Are you able to purchase meat more cheaply by the regulation of the four days, or does it operate against your trade; I should have thought the importers would be compelled to sell within four days?—The importers sell them alive in the market, and the wholesale butcher buys them and kills them.

949. If you were to wait till the end of the four days then they would be obliged to sell them, otherwise they would be obliged to slaughter them themselves?—Yes; but persons do not care to run such a risk as that.

950. If the butchers do not choose to buy them immediately they would be obliged to slaughter them at the end of the four days?—Yes; but the competition is too great for it to be in the hands of the butchers, they want so large a quantity.

951. Mr. Norwood.] As to these foreign sheep coming by Hull; are they in good condition?—Some are bad, and some are good; they come in a sound condition, some of them.

952. Do they come free from disease?—I think so.

Mr. R. Hall.

3 May 1866.

953. Mr. Carnegie.] I suppose the sheep do not suffer so much from bruises?—No, they do not suffer at all.

954. Mr. Cogan.] You stated that the Irish cattle that came were a good deal injured?—Yes, a great deal injured.

955. Does that injury occur in the sea passage, or before?—I think it occurs in both ways; when we find that cattle have come a distance from Ireland to the railway, before they are shipped, we generally find them worse.

Mr. WILLIAM BRADBURY, called in; and Examined.

Mr. W. Bradbury.

956. Mr. Hunt.] You are a Butcher, living at Oldham;—Yes.

957. Were you put to any inconvenience at the time when the railway movement of cattle was prohibited?—Very serious inconvenience.

958. How did you supply your customers at that time?—We were obliged to go to Liverpool or Manchester, and into the farming districts where the cattle are fed, slaughter them there, and bring them dead, just as we could.

959. How were you principally supplied at that time, out of Liverpool or by the farms, between the time the Act passed and the 16th of April?—From Manchester and Liverpool principally, to Oldham.

960. Did you buy of wholesale butchers at Manchester?—We bought them alive up to that date, and from wholesale butchers when the movement was stopped.

961. How far is Manchester from Oldham?—Six miles, in a direct line.

962. And they came by road?—By the rail after the orders; by rail and road previous to the orders.

963. At the time when all the railway movement was stopped?—Then we had to go to Manchester and Liverpool for our carcasses, and buy them there.

964. You bought no live animals then?—No, retail butchers did not buy live cattle.

965. Did you buy your carcasses of wholesale butchers at Manchester and Liverpool?—Yes, mostly.

966. At that time did you charge your customers a higher price than you did before?—Undoubtedly we did charge a higher price; the regulations caused additional expense in slaughtering, &c., and carriage.

967. You raised the price of meat at that time?—Yes.

968. How much in the retail price?—From ½ d. to 1 d. per pound.

969. Did you continue that price the whole time, when the restriction was upon the moving by railway?—Yes, and it is the same price at present; higher prices are prevailing generally.

970. And the prohibition of railway movement ceased on the 16th April with respect to cattle?—Yes; although some relaxation was made on the 16th April.

971. Give us what the retail price is?—We are selling it at 9 d. in Oldham.

972. All round?—No, for the choice parts 9 d. and 10 d.; the other is sold at 7 d., and some inferior cuts less.

973. Is that for beef and mutton?—That is for beef; but we charge about the same price for mutton. Mutton, having less inferior cuts, maintains a higher average.

974. Is it the same price now as it was before the 16th of April?—Yes, perhaps ½ d. a-pound more; the markets are rising generally for first-class meat.

975. If you were obliged to raise the price in consequence of the railway movement in cattle being prohibited, how was it you did not lower the price when that restriction was taken off on the 16th of April?—The restriction on cattle is still in force as regards markets.

976. You can now move cattle by railway since the 16th of April?—Not from a market.

977. You can have Irish cattle from Liverpool to Oldham by railway?—Not from a market.

978. You can from the ships?—We are not prepared to take them from the ships in that way; they must not change hands in the port of Liverpool, as I understand the trade.

979. As I understand the law at present, you can have animals taken in ships to Liverpool, and consigned to Oldham?—We cannot buy them on the quay and send them forward to Oldham.

980. I know nothing to prevent it?—We have been prevented from doing it repeatedly; we cannot do it. The local authorities at Liverpool and Manchester both prevent it; and Manchester, I believe, is taking legal proceedings against parties for their contravening the Orders in Council.

981. Have you had no live cattle since the 16th of April to Oldham?—No; not from the markets of Liverpool or Manchester.

982. The restriction was taken off at that date?—There was a great mistake made with regard to some which Mr. Robertson Gladstone sanctioned the forwarding of from Liverpool to Oldham; as a magistrate he signed for some purchased on the quay at Liverpool, and afterwards the orders were withdrawn, and he declined to sign for any more such removals.

983. Were not you aware that by Act of Parliament the prohibition only extends to the 25th March, and then the Government, under the power given to them by the Act, extended it to the 16th April, and since that period cattle could be moved by railway?—I was not aware of that, as you put it getting them from the quays at Liverpool; we did not get them to Oldham. If they had landed at Liverpool, or any other port, if they have landed in the borough, having a licensed cattle market, you cannot get fat cattle thence.

984. Have you a cattle market at Oldham?—We have.

985. Is it open now?—It is.

986. Do not cattle come in here?—They do a few.

987. Do they come by road or railway?—They come by railway from various places in Scotland and England.

988. They have been coming into your Oldham market since the 16th of April?—Two weeks; our market has only been in existence two weeks.

989. Since you have got cattle into your Oldham market, have you been able to reduce your prices to your customers?—We have not reduced them yet; we do not rise and fall every day like cotton and flour, and those things; it is not the rule of the trade, and beef has had, this last month or so, an upward tendency.

990. If the prohibition of railway movement obliged you to raise your prices, one would have thought, when the prohibition was taken off, you would be able to lower them again?—In reference to the price of meat, of course, the meat is generally dearer now than it would be if these cattle plague restrictions were not upon it. That is what I want to enforce upon the Committee, the necessity of being, by the regulations, compelled to slaughter our cattle in Liverpool or Manchester, enhances the price to the consumer when it gets into our shops; and, as I beg to say again, as spring and summer advances, prices usually rise.

991. Mr. Goschen.] You do have live beasts now come to you?—Not properly yet; the new system is not developed; we have only had our market two weeks in Oldham; we cannot bring any beasts from Liverpool to Oldham, or from Manchester to Oldham, if they have been once in the market within those boroughs.

992. Mr. Hunt.] You are quite right; but you can purchase them on the quay and bring them?—I think they will not let us bring them even yet, although we have asserted we had the right to do so.

993. Mr. Goschen.] You have beasts there now, have you not?—Yes, at Oldham.

994. Where do those come from that you have now?—They come from Scotland and other places; we go right into Scotland and to the north of England to the homestead, and get them under certificates, to Oldham; and then they must be slaughtered in three or four days.

995. Mr. Hunt.] At the time the prohibition was still existing, you were obliged to purchase dead meat in Liverpool and other places?—Yes.

996. Was there any limitation of supply at that time in Oldham; were you ever obliged to refuse a customer?—No; we have always had a sufficient supply. It is a singular feature and has astonished the trade.

997. Can you give me the date when you raised the price of meat 1*d.* per pound?—I cannot particularly.

998. Can you give me the month?—I cannot tell the month.

999. Was it before Christmas?—Yes, through Christmas; upon the appearance of the plague meat took a rise, and throughout has maintained higher prices.

1000. The price has not been raised since Christmas?—Not practically or particularly except the approaching seasons general risk and the rise before mentioned, and the temporary rise about the 20th of February.

1001. The Act of Parliament prohibiting railway traffic was passed a good while this side of Christmas, was it not?—Yes.

1002. You did not raise the price in consequence of that Act of Parliament?—Not practically or particularly. There was a general rise in the price of meat in the country, as before stated.

1004. When you had dead meat sent from Liverpool and other places during that railway prohibition did you find the meat come in good condition?—Occasionally it was in good condition; but generally it was in bad condition.

1005. What was the reason of the bad condition?—It is an article that will not bear the treatment that some provisions will; it cannot stand it. It is not like many things; you cannot pack it up so closely; and every time it is moved it sustains great injury.

1006. Had the meat suffered from bad packing or bad dressing?—Perhaps neither directly; but from the fact of having to move it from the slaughter-house into the cart, then from the cart into the lorry, and then upon the railway, then from the railway into the butcher's cart, then from the butcher's cart into the shops, is enough to injure it; that is where the meat suffers. It is not so much during its passage on the railway. Occasionally it is knocked about, and shunted backwards and forwards. I heard Mr. Hall say that he sent meat to Oldham or Manchester, and that it was only an hour and a-half on the road. That is not so with us; we have to pack it overnight, and it is forwarded by goods trains only as a general rule, and is 10 or 12 hours arriving at Oldham, a distance of 40 odd miles.

1007. Did you go down to Liverpool and make arrangements?—Not myself, but others went down from Oldham.

1008. Was the meat kept a sufficiently long time to set?—No; the confusion is very great at Liverpool. Liverpool is provided with very bad accommodation; during the extraordinary circumstances that have taken place, we can scarcely get accommodation. We have to take some meat or carcasses down for the purpose of hanging other meat up sometimes.

1009. In consequence of the want of proper accommodation they send off the carcases before the meat has time to set?—Yes, in some cases.

1010. That is owing to the great pressure on the butchers at the time?—Yes, for want of space.

1011. I suppose if there were more ample accommodation the evil would not be much complained of?—No; this particular evil would not be complained of.

1012. If the animal is in a proper condition when killed, that is to say, if his blood is cooled and the carcase hangs long enough for the meat to set, the meat takes very little harm from being moved about?—Less harm. Certainly, than if disturbed too soon after being slaughtered.

1013. Mr. Goschen.] Do you think if there were proper accommodation at Liverpool for the sale of meat and so on, you would have a dead meat trade between Oldham and Liverpool?—It never would be satisfactory to the trade under any circumstances.

1014. Will you explain why?—Because it is almost impracticable; as I said before, the meat is of that peculiar nature that it is not able to sustain the great abuse that it is subjected to by such regulations.

1015. Then you do not think that if you had the best arrangements at Liverpool you would be able to supply the great towns in the centre of England with dead meat as well as with live meat?—I do not say we could not supply them; we could supply them certainly, but not satisfactorily; factorily; that is to say, that, as Englishmen, we think we can do anything we determine to do. I heard Dr. French's evidence about what the corporation of Liverpool and the railway company can, and will, and could do, if they had the power, &c., to supply the Lancashire towns with dead meat, and was astonished at his assertions, and emphatically protest against the assumption of the great towns in the centre of England being supplied with dead meat from Liverpool or elsewhere, as well as with live meat. The idea is utterly impracticable in the summer months; that our beef, and mutton, and lamb, which would in such a case have to travel 30, 50, or 100 miles on the rail after its being slaughtered before it can be sold in retail: and I assert that it would be green and stinking, and unfit for human food in many cases before arriving at its destination. Whereas the live animals, being on the butcher's premises, he is enabled to slaughter them daily, and in some cases hourly and present his meat fresh, and clean, and sweet, to his customers and in a satisfactory manner.

Mr. W. Bradbury.

1016. What do you mean by not satisfactorily? — Not advantageously to the purchasers or butchers, to the consumers in proper condition.

1017. As regards the quality or as regards the price?—As regards the price, and the quality as well.

1018. You would have to charge more for dead meat than for live meat?—If you confine yourself to one market, I do not see that it really could be done in the way it ought to be done.

1019. What do you mean by one market?—I am confining myself to Liverpool.

1020. Supposing you had the choice of any market for dead meat, would you be able then to supply your customers satisfactorily with dead meat?—I believe not, especially in the summer months.

1021. Do you think that a good deal of meat would be lost before it came into the butchers' hands?—It might be lost almost before it came into the butchers' hands, and certainly it would be lost before it could get into the consumers' hands, for factory operatives and other in-door workers want their meat fresh, whatever may be said in favour of over kept meat being easy to digest and not causing any disease.

1022. Do not you think there is more risk in a dead-meat market than a live-meat market?—Yes; many times more risk.

1023. The butchers would have to do what the fishmongers have to do, viz.: put on a price to indemnify themselves for the risk they run?—Yes.

1024. Do you think that the meat deteriorates in quality, or is it only in appearance?—With respect to a day or two, it perhaps does not deteriorate in quality, but in appearance it certainly suffers very much indeed. It accumulates a deal of dirt upon it, and really it is objectionable to have it on your tables or in the shop; it cannot be kept clean or fresh, and the way the railway servants, carters, and others, maul and handle the meat has only to be witnessed to condemn the system as the permanent one as thoroughly disgusting.

1025. You are speaking of the disadvantages to your customers, how would it operate on the butchers themselves; would their profits be lessened?—I can scarcely answer the question directly; the peculiarities of a dead-meat market are so different from a live-meat market; of course, it all depends on the supply and demand, and the supply and demand will regulate itself. I fancy we should be worse supplied eventually by a dead-meat market than we are by a live-meat market; certainly, we should not have the same choice, and the consumer would not be as well served; in addition to which the retail butchers would get into the hands of the middle man or meat salesman of whom I am sure they desire to keep clear as much as possible, as a general rule.

1026. On which side do you suppose your interest lies, on the side of the live-meat market or dead-meat market?—The live-meat market, undoubtedly; not so much as regards profit or loss, but from what I know to be the peculiarities and requirements of the trade.

1027. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] When you go into a dead-meat market, are you able to tell how long it is since an animal has been killed?—Certainly; we can tell to a day.

1028. You can?—We think so.

1029. Supposing you saw the quarter of an animal exposed for sale in the dead-meat market, you could tell whether the animal has been killed one day, two days, or three days?—I think I could to a day.

1030. Mr. Dent.] Have you any live-meat market at Oldham?—Yes; under the present Order of the Council.

1031. A new established market there?—Yes; what we call a local market.

1032. There is nothing to prevent Irish cattle coming in the market?—Not at all; if they come direct, consigned by Liverpool or Holyhead.

1033. No order to prevent any cattle coming in from the farmers?—None whatever.

1034. Do you think the rise in price has been occasioned from the regulations as to the cattle plague; I mean the increasing price which has been going on for some time?—I do not quite follow you.

1036. It ought to have lowered it, because the price up to a recent period has been against the farmers who sold, and farmers have not been selling their stock at an enhanced price?—I think they have; the farmers do not complain.

1037. I think up to the last month or so the price the farmers obtained for their beasts was not so high as the price they obtained last year; they do not get so much per stone as they did last year?—You may attribute that to the extraordinary state of the trade. They are afraid; the markets have been better supplied, and a vast quantity of stock has been thrown upon the market from farms where the plague has broken out and they have been compelled to slaugter them whilst sound to save them from the plague.

1038. The butchers' price to the consumer has gone on increasing, and is higher than it was last year?—There were a few weeks when the plague increased the price of meat, at the outbreak of the plague for example; and in the month of February a temporary rise took place.

1039. And you have kept up the price since?—Certainly,

Certainly, we must candidly admit that. But more particularly for the choice quality, as really choice animals are scarce and dear. Middling quality of beef is not so extraordinary dear even in the retail markets from the causes enumerated.

1040. Was there not an antipication that meat would be dearer at this period than it is now?—There was. The anticipation is very strong now that it will be very dear indeed.

1041. As it has been for the last six months?—We anticipate it will be extremely dear before the summer is over, because we think, so soon as the idea comes in that the cattle plague has somewhat abated, people will begin to hold their stock.

1042. Mr. Edward Egerton.] I believe you represent the sentiments of a large number of butchers who have come up from Oldham?—Yes, but not upon this inquiry.

1043. But you have come up with a deputation to Sir George Grey to represent the feeling of the butchers and inhabitants of all the large towns of Lancashire and Cheshire about the effect of these Orders in Council?—Yes.

1044. And I suppose you are authorised to support their sentiments before this Committee?—Yes; we are in this room almost by accident, feeling an interest in this inquiry.

1045. You have tendered yourself as spokesman on behalf of that deputation?—I have volunteered at the request of some of my fellow deputies to give evidence, in consequence of having heard what we think is very prejudicial to the best interests and requirements of the butchering trade of Lancashire, from Dr. French of Liverpool.

1046. Is it the unanimous opinion of the deputation that there are great evils in the existence of the dead-meat market?—It is; it is very objectionable to the trade in all respects.

1047. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] You say that is the feeling of the butchers in the towns of Cheshire and Lancashire, similarly situated to that of Oldham, that is to say, Macclesfield, Stockport, and Ashton?—Undoubtedly that is the feeling of the butchers, and it is the opinion of the majority of jobbers, and of cattle dealers as well.

1048. Was not mutton dearer than before the establishment of dead-meat markets?—Yes, in our districts.

1049. In the Manchester district?—In our district. I mean by that the Manchester districts.

1050. If you had a permanent dead meat market, where would you get your mutton from; you would not get it from Liverpool to any extent?—Oh, no, only at certain seasons of the year.

1051. Where do you get it from?—From Scotland and English counties; from the Wakefield district, and Lincolnshire to Oldham in particular.

1052. Do you think it would be practicable to supply the Manchester markets to any extent, if you had entirely dead-meat markets, and no traffic in live sheep throughout the kingdom?—I do not think it would be supplied in a proper manner, or in the way it ought to be, or as the necessities and peculiarities of the meat trade requires.

1053. Not without some increased price?—I do not say it would not be supplied with dead meat. The price I can scarcely speak to, or whether farmers would be disposed to consign their sheep in that sort of way, under the restrictions of a dead meat market; but I say that farmers, as a general rule, will not send anything to a dead meat market. They object, as a general rule, strongly, to send dead meat, there is too much risk for the farmer to run; such an arrangement for permanent operation would completely alter the trade in animals.

1054. Mr. Leader.] I suppose you are aware of the condition of Irish cattle, compared with cattle purchased in England and Scotland?—Yes.

1055. In what condition do the Irish cattle come to you?—In fair condition.

1056. You heard Mr. Hall say that the Irish cattle come more damaged and injured even than cattle from Spain?—That is so. We are very much surprised at the state Spanish beasts come in. It is a remarkable feature among cattle; they seem to sustain much less injury by coming from Spain than they do from Ireland.

1057. Do many of the Irish cattle fetch the highest price in the market, or are they generally inferior in price?—They are inferior to Scotch.

1058. But not to English?—They are inferior to English as well. We prefer a Scotch beast to an Irish beast, but there is not much difference between the Irish beast and the English beast. The Scotch beast has the preference over the Irish beast. A little preference is given to the Scotch and English, but Scotch first.

1059. But not considerable?—It is not very considerable; certainly not, when all are well fed and choice.

1060. Mr. Carnegie.] I think you said that when the live-meat markets were stopped in Oldham you raised your price; was the price to the customer higher in Oldham than it was in Manchester and Liverpool?—No, I do not think it was. They make a better price, I fancy, in Manchester than they do in Oldham.

1061. Mr. Goschen.] Is the price of meat generally higher in Oldham than it is at Liverpool?—I cannot speak to that. We go to the nearest or other market than Liverpool, and get it direct to Oldham.

1062. Where do you get the chief supply to Oldham from at present?—There are a few of what we may call cattle dealers, who go to the Liverpool market, and they undertake to purchase 10, 12, or 14 beasts for their various customers, which are there slaughtered and brought dead meat. Then other gentlemen go into Scotland, and bring a few in in that way alive now, and we get a few from other parts of the country as well.

1063. Mr. Hunt.] I suppose the demand for meat at Oldham is pretty regular week by week?—Yes, very.

1064. Unless there is a strike, or something of that sort, the consumption of meat is pretty much the same?—Yes.

1065. Mr. Goschen.] How many beasts do you consume per week?—I am not prepared to answer that question.

1066. What is the proportion of trade in dead meat and live meat since the last fortnight, when the regulations have been changed?—Last week there was, I think, more dead meat brought into the market than there was live meat.

1067. Although you can get the live meat?—Yes, but that power has only been recently given to us. I anticipate that Oldham has been better supplied this week than it was last, but these local markets, so near our central market of Manchester, chester, do not answer the requirements of the trade, as they are not supplied with variety, and are only serving, I hope, to tide over our present difficulties of the cattle plague.

FREDERICK SALMON, Esq., called in; and Examined.

F. Salmon, Esq.

1068. Mr. Goschen.] You are connected with the North Western Railway?—I am.

1069. What is your particular department?—I am Manager of the Cattle Traffic; I have the whole arrangement of the cattle traffic over the whole system of the London and North Western.

1070. Your head quarters are in Liverpool?—My office is in Liverpool.

1071. We wish you to give us your opinion upon the feasibility of having a supply to the dead-meat market as far as railway traffic is concerned; would you be able to carry the dead meat more cheaply than you can at present if the system were organised?—No; I think we could never carry the dead meat so reasonably as we could the live meat for one very simple reason. The dead meat requires a vast deal of porterage and attention, whereas live stock, being locomotive, loads and unloads itself.

1072. What is your charge for carcases; for dead meat?—I am not fully acquainted with the dead meat charges, that not being my department, but I believe the rate from Liverpool to Manchester is about 15 s. per ton, and I think 3 s. for collection and delivery. Our charge for a waggon for about seven beasts would be something like 15 s. 6 d.

1073. How is it you are obliged to charge so much for the dead meat?—There is more labour and very much more porterage.

1074. As far as the railway itself is concerned I suppose you can carry the dead meat as cheaply as you can the live beasts?—As far as that is concerned, and the working of the permanent way, there would not be much difference.

1075. Then it is only at the two ends there is an increase of charge?—It is at the two ends, which, of course, takes a considerable deal of trouble and a considerable number more trucks.

1076. Then the greater the distance over the same line the less would be the proportion of labour?—Certainly; there would be simply the two labours of loading and discharging.

1077. So that you can carry dead meat proportionately cheaper, as compared with live beasts, from Liverpool to London, than you could from Liverpool to Manchester?—Yes, it would be proportionately cheaper, I dare say.

1078. Could no improvements be made for the loading and unloading of the trucks with the dead meat, if the trade were reorganised?—I do not think it would rest so much in the way in which it is done; I think it is the article itself that gets damaged; we use as much caution as possible in removing it; but still, in removing carcasses of meat, it must deteriorate in value a little by the simple fact of being moved.

1079. That does not concern the railway, does it?—No; but as far as the meat is concerned the effect is there.

1080. As far as your charges are concerned, you have no kind of responsibility, have you?—There is responsibility if there should be any more than a trifling delay to the meat; it would be a very serious matter, especially for the party receiving it, and for the public.

1081. Do you know whether any claims have been made for railway compensation in connection with the transit of dead meat?—Yes.

1082. Have there been instances in which the railway companies have had to pay?—Very numerous instances.

1083. What have they had to pay for?—For detention, and what they call loss of market; in fact, a London salesman will tell you, that without his meat is at the place of destination within three or four hours of the time appointed, it is an utter loss to him of a 1 d. to 2 d. per pound.

1084. Is it the same with regard to live cattle?—No, live cattle cannot deteriorate to that extent.

1085. Mr. Hunt.] Not if they miss a market?—No.

1086. Did you never know an action brought for the delay of live cattle, so that they have missed a market?—Yes, numbers.

1087. Mr. Goschen.] Now, do not speak of opinions, but confine yourself to facts; do you say the railway has had to pay money for loss of market, and detention of dead meat?—Yes.

1088. And proportionately more than in the case of live beasts?—Considerably more, I should imagine; in fact, I am nearly certain that has occurred, although, as I said before, the dead meat is out of my department; I am sure that heavy compensation has been paid in London and elsewhere.

1089. Then the fear of having to pay such compensation, in the case of dead meat, would compel the railway to charge higher prices?—I should imagine so, that would be one reason.

1090. I suppose you would not be able to tell us whether better arrangements could be made for the conveyance of dead meat?—Probably there might be a little better arrangement, but I think to no very great extent.

1091. Have you heard that it suffers a good deal from dust?—I have not; but I have seen many a score, in fact, I may say, hundreds come in, and there have been great complaints of the state in which the meat has been received; the meat becomes soft; it will not keep as well, and they are compelled to take so much, instead of killing what they just want.

1092. You have told us of the disadvantages of carrying the dead meat; what are the disadvantages of carrying the live stock; do they deteriorate much in quality?—A very long journey will probably deteriorate them to some extent: we find we have more trouble with the Irish cattle than with any other. That is very easily explained; they are more restive and more difficult of management to get on board the boat, or to get into the trucks; other beasts are more tractable.

1093. Have you had complaints with regard to the deterioration suffered by beasts travelling between Liverpool and Manchester?—Not within that distance; that distance is too short.

1094. Or between Liverpool and London?—We have not had much complaint of that, as it is a head rate; it being a head rate they load them thinly, and they allow room for them to lay down, if they happen to get exhausted.

1095. Who determines how many beasts are to be put into one truck?—It is optional with the sender. We ourselves occasionally should like to put put as few as possible, so that they will not damage each other.

1096. It would cost you more if you sent many trucks than if you sent few?—Certainly.

1097. You do not charge more if a person packs his beasts into a truck than if you put them into it?—Owners may and do superintend the loading, but we expect them to load fairly, and not occupy more wagons than are necessary. It is our interest to get as many as we can, but to load them reasonably; if we load them to excess we have to suffer, and to pay compensation.

1098. They would claim compensation in such a case?—Provided we loaded them too thickly.

1099. Mr. Carnegie.] Do you make any arrangement for watering the cattle on these long journeys?—No.

1100. Would it not be proper to do so?—Yes; but they would be much more injured by being unloaded and re-loaded.

1101. Mr. Dent.] You could water them in the trucks?—I do not think one out of 20 would drink, and it would be dangerous in some cases to attempt to go amongst them; we do not tie them; they are loaded without being tied.

1102. You know the condition in which they arrive from Ireland in the boats?—Yes.

1103. You must have a good deal to do with the lean cattle as well as the fat cattle?—Yes, I have; I have had to do with some thousands.

1104. Do not they come over from Ireland in a most horrible state in the boats?—No, I have never seen them in such a state.

1105. Not heated and knocked about most horribly; I mean the low class of Irish cattle, at 3 l. or 4 l. a-piece?—You are speaking of yearlings, I think; there are very few of those at 3 l. or 4 l. a-piece that have come over for two or three years; they would not come in that state, for the simple reason, that the owners who travel will not allow it; and if they did so, we should be obliged to lose the whole amount of freight in compensation.

1106. Do they not come from your trucks in a heated state after being in the holds of these boats?—Probably they may get warm from being in the hold for six or seven hours; we run them in that time from Holyhead.

1107. Mr. Goschen.] Are the steamers under your charge with regard to cattle?—Yes.

1108. Have you laid many complaints of the condition in which the Irish cattle have been landed?—Undoubtedly, we have any amount of complaints if we listen to them, but practically there is no reason to complain; as I said before, it is to the interest of the Company if they are carriers not to load these things so as to entitle the parties to compensation for loss.

1109. Is there any competition?—There is a great deal of competition. The party I succeeded has opened a new line of competition in boats between Dublin and Liverpool, and the competition is very injurious to the Company as carriers.

1110. Both carry beasts?—Yes.

1111. There is a traffic in cattle?—Yes; I should remark upon a peculiarity of the evidence of one of the gentlemen who preceded me. Mr. Cullen, I think, stated that he preferred his cattle coming to Liverpool; that is a peculiarity which I mentioned to him as he passed out; he sends his cattle to the Liverpool market from Dublin to Liverpool, but then to Manchester, he sends by us from Holyhead. It stands to reason, that the short passage is very beneficial to him.

1112. What is the difference between the two?—Six hours on an average, in the passage.

1113. How much more railway carriage would the shorter passage involve?—The shorter passage would involve something like from five and a half hours to six; it would average perhaps six hours.

1114. So that you do not gain anything in time?—Yes, I think we do; there is less trouble; when they get to Liverpool, they have to be driven three or four miles from the place to the loading stations, but in Holyhead, we have excellent quays arranged for the purpose, and they can, within an hour and a quarter discharge a boat and load a special train, and it can be got away on its journey, which advantage they have not viâ Liverpool.

1115. Do you generally ship those off at once, at Holyhead?—If there is no wish of the owners to detain them.

1116. Is there usually a detention?—If they are going long journeys. We have arrangements for feeding to any amount.

1117. Mr. Dent.] Do they ordinarily avail themselves of that?—Not with fat cattle, but with lean cattle naturally they prefer to feed them. It is not well on an average to give cattle too much food on a railway journey.

1118. Mr. Goschen.] When the cattle arrive at Holyhead where do they go to?—To every part of England.

1119. Does it involve more changes from one set of trucks to the other?—We never shift them from the trucks. We do not pass on to the broad gauge like the Great Western. The whole of the gauges are the same.

1120. You have heard the evidence that they come in a better state from Scotland than from Ireland?—I have heard it.

1121. How do you account for that?—I cannot. I know the boats running from Wigtown and Kirkcudbright, and away from that shore, and there can be no comparison with the way the stock arrive at Holyhead and at Liverpool.

1122. Mr. Dent.] Do you mean they are so much better?—Yes, because they crowd the Scotch steamers very considerably.

1123. Mr. Goschen.] What is the size of the large class of steamers that you generally employ?—I should think 800 tons would be the smallest, the fleet of Holyhead boats are the best cattle boats that I know. I do not think there is a boat, with the exception of one, the "St. Patrick," that can compete with that fleet.

1124. Mr. Dent.] Are those boats kept entirely for the cattle trade?—They are kept entirely for the cattle trade when the trade is there. They fill them up sometimes with goods.

1125. Do they carry three tiers of cattle, lower deck, between deck, and deck?—Yes, during fine weather.

1126. Have you a fleet of boats also running to Liverpool?—No; no boats to Liverpool.

1127. With regard to the embarking and disembarking of these beasts, do you think the arrangements are capable of any improvement?—I think not. We lay ourselves out to do the best we possibly can. You must always use a little force with a certain class of animals.

1128. You think the Irish cattle arrive in a worse condition than others, because they are more restive?—I am certain of it. Irish beasts

F. Salmon, Esq.

3 May 1866.

are not only generally restive, but very spiteful; you are obliged to be very cautious with them, and grass beasts especially. They take more driving, as a drover will tell you, than any class of beasts we have.

1129. Which is the greater expense, sending them by Holyhead or by Liverpool?—The rates are similar.

1130. But which costs most, and on which is there most profit?—I think there is very little difference, or nothing. If I were sending beasts a long distance, I should decidedly take the Holyhead route. We book through with some of the Irish companies, and the droverage is paid mutually between the companies who participate in the division.

1131. Where do the Irish cattle generally come from?—From the Midland parts, and from the west; occasionally the north, as the case may be, from these large fairs. They sometimes arrive in a hurry, and are driven, no doubt, hastily on board. The dealers, who in nearly all cases accompany them, are anxious to get them away to the markets. At other times they come a day before, rest a night in Dublin, get fed and watered, and then proceed.

1132. Do the greater part of the cattle have a rest at Dublin or not?—Yes, the greater part of them; that is the rule.

1133. So that, on the whole, you would say they were imported in a satisfactory condition?—Yes.

1134. And that any defects that arise from that lie in the transport by sea, and these bruises which they sustain?—There must be always some chances of that kind, both in moving by boats and in moving by rail.

THE RIGHT HON. MILNER GIBSON, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. ROBERT MOSELEY, again called in; and Examined.

Mr. R. Moseley.

7 May 1866.

The Witness: I promised the Committee on this day week, that I would put in a Return showing the imports at Harwich. We opened that line of steamboat service in October 1863, and the quantity of cattle imported up to the 31st December 1865 were, according to this Return, cattle and calves, 64,102; sheep, 215,344; pigs, 23,965.

[The Return was put in, and is as follows]:

Great Eastern Railway.
General Manager's Office, 7 May 1866.

STATEMENT showing the Goods and Cattle imported from the Continent, viâ Harwich, from October 1863 to December 1865:

Cattle } Calves }	64,102
Pigs	23,965

R. Moseley.

I was also asked whether I knew the comparative charges in respect to cattle, when sent to London alive, and what the charges were in respect to cattle when slaughtered in the country. I have taken the freight from Rotterdam direct to London, at 15 s. a head. At the present moment the charge is 10 s., but that is the result of an exceptional state of things; therefore I have taken 15 s. per head, which was the charge some 18 months ago, and which I have reason to know will be restored before long. Therefore, I think it is better to take it at 15 s.

1135. Mr. Edward Egerton.] How long has it stood at 10 s.?—It has been at 10 s. for about 18 months, and sheep proportionately lower, also pigs and calves; but I take oxen, for that is the great source of freight. Take the carriage from Rotterdam to one of the wharves on the banks of the Thames in London at 15 s., and in addition to that charge, there is landing and wharfage, and lairage, commission, slaughtering and drover's charges; and those in the aggregate are 15 s. 3 d., giving a total of 1 l. 10 s. 3 d. for the live animals, and the incidental charges connected with the slaughtering and commission and lairage.

1136. Mr. Hunt.] Is that upon an animal that is landed at the port of London, and driven to the London market?—Yes.

1137. Your line is not concerned with that?—No, but I am now giving you a comparison, what are the charges in respect to a live animal, say from Rotterdam to the port of London, and then the charges incidental to the landing.

1138. Mr. Edward Egerton.] What do you make them?—1 l. 10 s. 3 d. altogether; then the animal landed at Harwich, and the subsidiary charges stand thus: the freight from Rotterdam to Harwich, 7 s. 6 d. (that is half the charge from Rotterdam to London), slaughtering and all other charges at Harwich, 7 s. 6 d.; the carriage from Harwich to London, taking the carcase at eight cwt., which is a fair average for Dutch cattle, and taking it at our full rate for dead meat is 13 s., giving a total of 1 l. 8 s. compared with 1 l. 10 s. 3 d.

1139. Mr. Hunt.] Have you taken in every charge that would be necessary, in order to get the dead meat into the dead meat market in London?—Yes; our rate from Harwich to London is 1 s. 7 d. a cwt., that is 32 s. 6 d. a ton, and that charge includes the delivery in the market; it includes the collection of the empty hampers, and their redelivery back at Harwich.

The comparative Table was put in, and is as follows:]

CONTINENTAL LIVE STOCK and MEAT to LONDON.

Cost of Transit,
Rotterdam to London, by Sea direct.

	£.	s.	d.
One ox-freight	–	15	–
Landing and wharfage in London	–	2	6
Driving, carting, and lairage	–	1	9
Commission	–	4	6
Slaughtering	–	5	–
Drover's charges on board, &c.	–	1	6
TOTAL	£. 1	10	3

Mr. R. Moseley.

7 May 1866.

VIÂ HARWICH.

One ox-freight - - - - -	–	7	6
Slaughtering and all other charges at Harwich - - - - - -	–	7	6
Conveyance when dead from Harwich to London meat markets, eight cwt., at 1 s. 7½ d. per cwt. - - -	–	13	–
TOTAL - - - £.	1	8	–

Inasmuch as the total number of oxen and bulls imported into London was in the year 1864 115,219; and supposing one-half of that number had been carried viâ Harwich, the saving, at 2 s. 3 d. per head, would have been 6,480 l."

1141. What is your opinion as to the dust being prejudicial to meat if it is carried as proposed by railway to London?—I think that the dust has a tendency to interfere with its appearance when placed alongside fresh meat from the country packed in hampers; and if anything were wanting to illustrate my views in respect of that, it would be this: take the locomotive burning coal; the smoke from the funnel of the engine wafted alongside the vehicles would be very injurious to the meat.

1142. Do you see any means of preventing that?—If you stop ventilation, that would be a mode of affecting it; but stopping ventilation would be detrimental to the carcases.

1143. Sir M. W. Ridley.] Supposing the meat were all packed in cloths?—Then that answer would not apply. That would be a preventitive.

1144. Or in baskets?—Or in baskets; either the one or the other.

1145. Mr. Hunt.] Do you know any means, without packing the meat in baskets or cloths, of having meat carried without injury; for instance, by canvas curtains?—I do not think, practically, that would work.

1146. Mr. Edward Egerton.] There would be no means of keeping the canvas curtains in their place?—No, the draught of air would interfere with that.

1148. Mr. Hunt.] Then my suggestion the other day of asphalte in the bottoms of the trucks would be a much cheaper thing for you than carrying out this particular Order?—Decidedly.

1149. Because it would enable you to have them washed out in a short time?—A shorter time; but still there would the expense attendant on laying down the asphalte upon the truck, and removing it and keeping it in repair.

1150. That would preserve the floors of the trucks very much, would it not?—Well, I do not think so. If the trucks were employed only for the transit of live stock it would be another matter, but when you bear in mind that these cattle trucks have to be used for general purposes, and taking the nature of the articles put in these trucks, very frequently you would find the asphalte perforated in the course of two or three journeys; the water would of course leak through the perforations, and rot the wood.

1151. I am supposing the asphalte was laid down as it is in barns in many parts of the country?—There it is all plain sailing. There you are not subject to the difficulties and risks which you are when you are carrying a multiplicity of miscellaneous articles. Take hoop-iron, for example.

1152. Mr. Edward Egerton.] These trucks would have to be used for every description of traffic?—For every description of traffic.

1153. Mr. Graves.] Would the effect of your having asphalte in the bottom of the truck prevent your seeing defects or flaws in the woodwork?—That would be so.

1155. Mr. Edward Egerton.] They are inspected after every journey, are they not?—Yes, and they are inspected on the road. They are tapped at the stations every 40 miles.

1156. Mr. Hunt.] How often have the floors of trucks to be renovated on an average?—Taking cattle trucks, about once in three years. The ordinary goods trucks from seven to eight years.

1157. Sir M. W. Ridley.] You have had experience in the use of asphalte?—Yes.

1158. Is it not the case that the class of asphalte alluded to by the Honourable Member for Northampton, is liable to be affected by the heat of the sun?—Yes, it would be so. We have it upon some of our platforms, and the action of the sun is very injurious; in fact, it becomes a nuisance to many of the travellers.

1159. Half the damage that is done to trucks is not from wear, but from collisions and shunting?—Yes, there is a great deal of shunting, practically.

1160. Mr. Hunt.] I suppose the urine from the animals perishes the wood, does it not?—Most seriously. I may state that, as requested by the Committee, Mr. Peters, from Rotterdam, our agent, and Mr. Huger, from Antwerp, are in attendance to afford any information the Committee may desire.

Mr. R. Moseley.

7 May 1866.

Mr. Godefridus Samuel Peters, called in; and Examined.

1161. Chairman.] What are you?—I am agent to the Great Eastern Railway Company at Rotterdam.

Mr. G.S. Peters.

1162. Do you superintend the shipment of cattle from Rotterdam to Harwich?—Yes.

1163. Can you give us any information as to the condition in which those cattle arrive, and are generally shipped?—They generally arrive in very good condition at Rotterdam. They are examined before they go on board, and of course must be in good condition, otherwise they are returned.

1164. Who examines them?—A veterinary surgeon.

1166. Do you know anything of the treatment of the cattle on their road from the interior to Rotterdam; have you any information upon the subject?—Yes; I have seen a good deal of it; they treat them very well indeed; they mostly come by rail, or in steam or sailing vessels; it is according to the place they come from.

1167. Where do most of them come from?—From Holland, they come from all parts, because Holland is a grazing country everywhere, but most of the cattle come from Guilderland and Friesland; from Guilderland it all comes either by steamboat or by rail, and takes only a few hours, because Holland is a very small country; the Friesland cattle come by sailing vessels to Amsterdam, and from Amsterdam it is brought over to Rotterdam by rail.

1168. The cattle plague has been prevailing a good deal in the south part of Holland, has it not?—Yes.

1169. As to these cattle that are shipped, is any inquiry made whether they come from farms where the cattle plague has existed?—I do not know as to that; but they are not allowed to come into the town before they are examined, and they are not allowed to come from Germany before they are examined on the frontiers.

1170. The only question you go into at Rotterdam is, whether they are in a healthy condition at that time?—Yes.

1171. You do not care where they come from, providing they are healthy at the time they are shipped?—Yes; we were prohibited sending any cattle at all from any other provinces into South Holland, until lately; they are now allowed to supply the farms and to import from places where there is no disease, that is to say, in the north part of the country.

1172. There is no disease in Friesland?—No, not in the north.

1173. Have you any rule as to the quantity of cattle that one of your boats is allowed to take?—No, there is no rule at all.

1174. Do you put as many on board as you can get on board?—Yes; that is to say, as many as can be placed conveniently on board, otherwise we do not ship them.

1175. Have the regulations with regard to foreign cattle being slaughtered at the port of arrival had any effect on the cattle trade?—Do you mean the regulations in England?

1176. Yes; previous to the prohibition there was a regulation that all foreign cattle should be slaughtered near the port of arrival, or at the port of arrival; has that had any effect in diminishing the export of cattle from Holland to England?—Yes, a good deal; they do not send so much by far.

1177. Why does that deter the exporters of cattle from sending so many?—I do not know; they seem to like to send to the Metropolitan Market; they say they have a loss if they send anywhere else.

1178. The question is, as to the slaughtering at the port of arrival. It is not sold there necessarily, I suppose?—No, but they do not want to slaughter at the port of arrival as long as they can send to the Metropolitan Market.

1179. You think that is a disadvantage to the trade?—That is a great disadvantage to the trade, of course; it must follow. They sent, of course, largely to London; they did not send anywhere else.

1180. Do you send any lean cattle from Holland?—Sometimes, young cattle, grass calves, as they call them.

1181. Milch cows?—Milch cows are sent in some quantity, but, of course, they have not been sent lately.

1182. What do you think would be the effect on the trade of a quarantine established on this side upon store cattle, that they should not be allowed to be sent into the country until they had undergone a certain quarantine to see whether they were healthy?—If it were a general measure all over the country I do not think it would have any bad effect at all; if there were no exceptions, I think trade would go on just as it used to do.

1183. You think it would be as large as it was?—I should think so. I do not think it would have any bad effect on the trade at all.

1184. Would it not increase the price of those store cattle to the buyers if they had to quarantine them?—Of course it would. There is some expense attached to it.

1185. Would it not check the trade if it increased the price?—No, because the buyers would have to pay for it.

1186. There is a limit to that, I suppose. Would they have more confidence in making their purchases?—I dare say they would. They are more certain about the health of beasts after two or three days than at the moment they arrive from the continent; so that I think they would have more confidence in buying; but, of course, it is all a matter of opinion. I cannot tell exactly what people may think fit to do.

1187. Mr. Hunt.] Are there any State regulations in Holland as to the treatment of cattle when travelling by railway?—No.

1188. I understand that at certain stations they were untrucked, and fed and watered?—Yes, but that is not according to regulation.

Mr. G. S. Peters.

1189. Whose regulation is that, the railway companies' or the State?—There is no regulation at all, it depends upon the sender.

1190. Tell us what the practice is?—It differs, according to the places they come from; for instance, the German beasts that are sent in transit by Holland come a long way, and the central point for the German cattle is Berlin or Magdeburg.

1191. Take Berlin, how many hours' transit is it from there?—It takes from two days to two days and a half, and I do not think they are untrucked.

1192. Are they watered?—I understand they are watered and fed.

1193. Tell us how they manage to water them without untrucking them?—I think by pails or buckets.

1194. Have you seen it done?—No; I have heard of it.

1195. Is it done with common buckets?—Common buckets.

1196. Are they fed?—Yes.

1197. How are they fed?—With hay.

1198. With hay put into the trucks?—Yes.

1199. Is there a rack, or anything in the truck?—No, nothing whatever; they are open trucks.

1200. Then, how is the hay given them; is it let to fall on the floor?—Why, yes, partially; I could not tell exactly.

1201. How many beasts do they put in a truck?—I think about eight, on an average; sometimes when they are smaller beasts they put more in.

1202. The hay is not left in the truck when the truck is in motion?—No, I have never seen that; I have never seen trucks arrive in that condition.

1203. Are there regular stations for feeding and watering?—There are; at Emmerich and the frontier, that is the last town in Prussia; they remain there on an average for 24 hours.

1204. Are they untrucked there?—They are untrucked there, and put in lairs.

1205. Who is responsible there, for the same animals being sent on in the same lots; is the Company responsible, or are the drovers attending to them responsible?—The drovers attending to them.

1206. Is there any regulation at the frontier, at Emmerich, as to seeing whether they are healthy?—I do not know whether there is at Emmerich, but on the frontier of Holland the animals must be examined before they are sent on, and that is upon an average seven or eight hours distant, before you arrive at Rotterdam; at Rotterdam they are put in lairs, or are turned out into the fields.

1207. How far are the lairs from the places where they are shipped to England?—From our steamers it is about 100 yards; but it is a little longer through the town to the other steamboats.

1208. What is the average detention of the animals at Rotterdam before they are shipped?—Under 24 hours, on an average.

1209. During that time a veterinary surgeon belonging to your Company examines them?—Yes; and every animal is examined before it goes on board.

1210. And all the suspicious animals are rejected?—Yes.

1211. Have you seen the animals when they arrive at Harwich?—Yes, very often.

1212. Do they arrive in good condition?—Almost always; even in very bad weather.

1213. Now, with regard to slaughtering animals at the port, you prefer, I understand, that they should go through to the London market?—I beg pardon, I do not prefer it at all; I say it would be objectionable to order the slaughter at Harwich, if you allow the cattle arriving in the port of London to go to the Metropolitan Market.

1214. You think it would be detrimental to the trade if the fat animals were obliged to be slaughtered at Harwich instead of going through to London?—I beg pardon, that is not my opinion; I think it would be detrimental as long as the port of London remained open.

1215. I understood you to say that with regard to the slaughter of animals, you see no objection if there is the same rule applied to all the ports, but that with regard to the fat animals, you wish them to go to the port of London?—I beg pardon again; what I say is, I see no objection as long as it is a general rule.

1216. Do you think, if no animals went alive to the London market, the foreign trade in animals would not suffer by a rule that they should be slaughtered at the seaports?—No, not at all; I do not think it would have any influence.

1217. At the present time no animals can be imported into England from Holland?—No.

1218. Since the prohibition has been in force, has much dead meat been sent over from Holland to Harwich?—Very little indeed.

1219. That, therefore, is one reason why there should not be a dead meat trade between Rotterdam and Harwich, and Antwerp?—I do not know what the reason is; but the fact is, it is unprofitable to do it; they cannot make the price.

1220. Is it because of the meat being injured in the transit?—It may be that.

1221. What has become of the trade in animals since this prohibition has been in force; what has become of the surplus animals in London? Have they found a market in other countries?—No; they keep them.

1222. Has that lowered the price of stock in Holland very much?—No.

1223. Do you know when the prohibition came in force as to the importing of stock from Holland into this country?—No; I could not tell exactly.

1224. It was something like a month ago, was it not?—About six weeks or two months ago.

1225. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Is there any officer appointed by the Dutch Government to inspect these animals?—Yes; before they guarantee them.

1226. Besides that inspection, you also have a veterinary surgeon?—Yes.

1227. Tell, us upon an average, the number of diseased animals that come into Rotterdam out of every hundred; I mean animals that are rejected?—I cannot tell.

1228. You say the veterinary surgeon had the power of rejecting a certain number. I want to know what effect that has upon the different cargoes?—I can only speak to what I have seen at the steamboats.

1229. Can you give us any figures?—Perhaps two in a hundred.

1230. Not more than two in a hundred?—No.

1231. Have you had the disease called the pleura-pneumonia, the lung disease, much in Holland?—Oh, yes; we have had it fearfully.

1232. How many of the animals have been stopped by having the lung disease, at Rotterdam?—They are never sent to the steamers when they are diseased.

1233. But can you tell me what proportion of the the animals having the lung disease have been stopped?—There are very few sent to the steamers. I could not say more than one in a hundred.

1234. Is your knowledge confined to those that go on board the steamers?—I only see them going away by the steamer. They are rejected before they come into town. We have no statistics about it.

1235. Would the Dutch officer you have mentioned have those statistics?—No.

1236. Who would?—Nobody. The animals are simply refused.

1237. Are they not consigned to some person?—They are.

1238. The consignee must know how many of those are shipped to England, and how many are kept back; what becomes of those that are kept?—They are sent back again.

1239. Are they sent by train back to the place they came from?—Yes.

1240. Do you know that as a fact?—I know that as a fact they are sent back, and in some cases they are slaughtered at Rotterdam.

1241. You say they are kept in lairs at Rotterdam for about 24 hours?—Yes, on an average.

1242. How often do those steamers start for England?—Only twice a week now; they used to go three times a week.

1243. Do the trains come in on particular days before the steamers start?—About a day before.

1244. Do not many of those cattle come from a long way off; from Prussia and Silesia?—Yes, and even from Hungary.

1245. Are matters arranged so that they come in 24 hours before the time the steamers start?—Yes.

1246. Are the steamers made up entirely from cattle trucks?—Some of them are entirely made up from cattle trucks. On the Dutch Rhenish Railway they have got special cattle trains.

1247. Since the Order in Council, stopping animals being sent from Holland, there has been no dead meat at all?—Yes, there has, but not much.

1248. Have the same amount of animals come into Rotterdam, or has it stopped the trade?—The trade is entirely stopped.

1249. Does the same Order in Council stop the sheep?—Yes.

1250. Was there much of a trade in sheep before?—Yes; we had a large trade in sheep, especially from the north of Holland, and German sheep.

1251. Are there any means of feeding these animals in fields at Rotterdam?—Yes.

1252. Every convenience?—There is every convenience.

1253. Close to the town?—Yes, almost up to the town.

1254. Have you any idea what the charges are?—No; I cannot tell that. I think about 1 s. a day for an ox.

1255. Is that regulated by the authorities of the town of Rotterdam, or is it a private speculation?—It is all private speculation.

1256. What is the largest cargo of beasts that you have sent over in any of your vessels?—We never took more than 240.

1257. Have you had any complaints of the animals suffering on the voyage?—No, not to Harwich.

1258. Sir M. W. Ridley.] What means are taken for putting these cattle on board the boats?—They are walked on board.

1259. How are they put into the hold of the vessel?—They walk into the hold of the vessel down an incline.

1260. Do you regulate the number that you take by the tonnage of the vessel, or have you any rule?—We have no rule, but of course it is regulated according to the room we have; the animals must have proper room, and we cannot go beyond that.

1261. Have you good provision for the admission of air?—Very good, in the new ships at all events; they are all regulated by a fan that is kept going during the loading, and of course kept going on the road.

1262. Have you known accidents occur to the animals in the course of their shipment, producing broken limbs, or anything of the sort?—Very seldom.

1263. You say they were occasionally killed at Rotterdam; at what season of the year was that?—That is all through the year.

1264. Are they sent over as dead meat?—They are killed and kept at Rotterdam; and in some cases they are buried there; they are very strict as to that.

1265. You said that some of the cattle that reached you came by boat, and some by rail?—Yes.

1266. Which of those two classes came to you in the best condition?—I could not see any difference, except that the German beasts are sometimes a little chafed, because they have been so long in the trucks; but they generally arrive in very good condition, and before they go on board of course they are watered and fed.

1267. Mr. Graves.] I think you told the Committee that some of the cattle you sent over in your boats came from Hungary?—I have seen them from Hungary often.

1268. Do those cattle come without any break in the journey?—I do not know; they come as far as Berlin, being the central post, but from Berlin they are very seldom untrucked; the journey takes from about 2 days or 2½ days.

1269. With regard to the Dutch cattle, have you any reason to think that any portion are now diverted through Antwerp?—No, they are not allowed.

1270. Do the Hungarian cattle come through Antwerp?—No; nothing going to Antwerp. They would not allow the transit. The Belgium Government stopped it as well as the Dutch. The Dutch Government has stopped the transit; but we got permission up to six weeks ago to transmit German cattle from Holland. The Dutch cattle are still prohibited.

1271. Is that from leaving the country, or from entering the country?—Both from entering and leaving the country; if they will not allow them to enter they cannot leave.

1272. Do you mean the Dutch cattle?—No; I am speaking of the German cattle.

1273. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Is there much traffic in cattle in small coasting vessels coming to Antwerp?—No; there is some from Friesland.

1274. Is there much of that?—Yes; that is rather important.

1275. Does any come from Demark or Sweden, or that way?—No, never; we never import any cattle for our own consumption.

1276. Are there any means of shipping the cattle separately from cattle which come from districts where the cattle plague is known to exist?—Certainly, they must be kept separate.

Mr. G. S. Peters.

1277. As to those that came from Hungary and Poland where the disease is unfortunately known to exist, are they kept at all separate from those which come from the country?—No, they are all mixed.

1278. Lord Naas.] Does any dead meat come from the country to be shipped at Rotterdam?—Never.

1279. I suppose the trade is quite unknown?—Quite unkown.

1280. Mr. Holland.] What is the size of the steamers that bring over the cattle?—I could not tell, about 800 tons.

1281. Are they built expressly for the trade?—Yes.

1282. How many do you say you generally average on board?—The largest number that we ever carried I should say is 240, that is to say, beasts as well as sheep.

1283. Are they on deck?—They are on deck.

1284. Is there any way of separating them by boards?—Yes.

1285. Each animal separated from each other?—No, not each, it is according to size, from six to eight animals in a pen.

1286. Now as to these cattle which arrive from Prussia, by rail from Rotterdam, in what position are they placed in the trucks; are they placed in any particular position as a rule, so as to be fed and watered?—Of course they can easily be fed and watered because their heads are always on the outside.

1287. Then they are in a particular position?—Yes, they are always placed that way as far as I have seen.

1288. Mr. Dent.] I suppose there is a very large trade from Rotterdam, both to London and Hull, as well as to Harwich?—Yes.

1289. There is a great deal of live stock sent, is there not?—Yes, more so than to London.

1290. A great many milk cows are sent to London from Harwich?—Yes, there used to be before the prohibition.

1291. Did you send milk cows at all to Harwich?—Yes, very often.

1292. But not so much as you did the lean stock or the fat stock?—No.

1293. The lean stock that you send over are Dutch animals, or do cattle partly come from Germany?—They are all Dutch.

Mr. Francois Huger, called in; and Examined.

Mr. F. Huger.

1294. Chairman.] What are you?—I am Agent for the Great Eastern Company at Antwerp, and Sworn Shipbroker at the same place.

1295. Does the Great Eastern Company run boats to Antwerp?—Yes, twice a week.

1296. From Harwich to Antwerp?—Yes.

1297. Are cattle shipped at Antwerp in these boats?—There are no cattle shipped at Antwerp, only sheep and pigs.

1298. Have you had anything to do with the superintendence of the shipment of horned cattle?—Yes; Belgian cattle is now only shipped by steamers direct to London; it cannot be imported at Harwich; that is the reason there is none shipped at Antwerp for Harwich.

1299. Is it prohibited in Belgium?—The transit of all foreign cattle is prohibited in Belgium, except from France; there are no cattle from Holland or Germany allowed to pass through Belgium.

1300. You ship Belgian cattle?—We may, but we do very seldom, because we have nearly no stock; Belgium has got little cattle to export; there are a few beasts from time to time, but it is very seldom.

1301. Does the prohibition upon the import of Dutch cattle affect cattle shipped at Antwerp?—No, not Dutch cattle; Dutch cattle are never exported from the port of Antwerp, it is merely German cattle, and German cattle are not allowed now to pass through Belgium; they are going to allow it shortly, I am informed.

1302. Previously to this prohibition in Belgium, did you ship many German cattle at Antwerp?—Yes, there were a good many shipped.

1303. In what condition did they arrive at Antwerp?—In first rate condition.

1304. They are inspected before they are put on board, I suppose?—Yes, there is a veterinary surgeon appointed by government who inspects the cattle before it is loaded, and there are none going on board before being inspected.

1305. By the Belgium Government?—Yes, as well as by the Great Eastern Company.

1306. They will not allow any cattle to be shipped at Antwerp until they are passed by a government officer?—Yes, a veterinary surgeon; there is a veterinary surgeon to inspect the sheep when they are discharged out of the trucks.

1307. So that they undergo two inspections if they are shipped?—Yes; the object of the government is to watch that there are no diseased cattle imported; the government agents are to stop the importation of cattle which might be diseased.

1308. And the exportation, too?—And the exportation, too; so that they would kill the beasts if they are diseased, immediately; if a beast was found on its arrival diseased, it would be killed immediately.

1309. Has that been a permanent regulation or only lately since the cattle plague?—That has been a permanent regulation; we have had nearly nothing of it in Belgium. There were a few cases happened, and the government immediately, when the disease broke out in England and Holland, ordered, wherever a beast was diseased, or appeared to be diseased, it should immediately be killed, as well as all the cattle in the same stable that had been in contact with it.

1310. Before there was any cattle plague, or before it attracted much attention, you say it was a permanent law in Belgium that all cattle should be inspected?—Yes; it is not a law, but it is a regulation of the town; the cattle trade has only been opened in Antwerp since the Great Eastern Company ran their steamers there. As soon as the cattle were transported through Belgium, the town authorities appointed a veterinary surgeon to inspect all the cattle, not only on account of the disease, which they did not expect, but on account of any other disease which might be imported into the country.

1311. As a rule, after this inspection, were there many cattle found to be diseased?—Not one which had the cattle plague has ever been found; it is quite natural that they have not found one, because the cattle which have been exported exported from Antwerp have only come from countries where there wasno disease.

1312. And knowing there was this inspection, I suppose the people would not send diseased cattle?—The people would not send diseased cattle; there is another reason why they will not send diseased cattle; the cattle are sent in consignments to the London cattle market, and those cattle merchants knew perfectly well that when the cattle arrived in England they would be killed there, so that they would go at their own loss.

1313. Lord Naas.] Are you talking now of cattle plague?—Yes, but my remarks apply to all diseases.

1314. Chairman.] How long have these steamers run to Antwerp?—They began to run from the 1st of August 1864.

1315. Was the cattle trade from Antwerp considerable before the Belgian regulations prevented the import of cattle from Germany?—There was something like 400 beasts weekly exported from Antwerp.

1316. In how long a time?—In a week.

1317. What sort of cattle were they?—German cattle.

1318. Fat cattle?—Yes, all fat cattle.

1319. No store cattle?—No, it is only lately they have been sending some store sheep.

1320. I suppose you think that trade will gradually grow to be much larger than it has been?—Certainly it would.

1324. Have you formed any opinion upon what would be the effect of a regulation in England, that all the cattle imported from Antwerp should be slaughtered at the port of arrival instead of being sent off to be stored at the Metropolitan market?—I think the effect might be this, that some of the cattle merchants would be afraid of sending so much cattle as they actually do, because they would say as soon as our cattle are carried there they are killed immediately on arrival, and we shall have to sell the dead meat at any price it will fetch, whereas if the cattle are sent alive, and they are authorised to stay at the sea-ports until they are sold, it would not have that effect; then they could keep it back until they could get their price for it.

1326. You think it would lessen the amount of the trade if they were subject to the law that the cattle were to be killed on arrival?—If they were killed immediately on arrival it would lessen the trade, but if they were authorised to stop at the sea-ports, and not to be removed from the sea-ports, it would not injure the trade at all, because you might keep them at the sea-ports as well as they were kept formerly in the stables in London.

1327. If they were kept there it would make no difference?—I do not think it would.

1329. If low prices exist in England, is the trade at once checked?—Yes, it is generally checked; they would stop sending; they generally do so. Some days the trade may be very low on account of a great number of beasts being in the market.

1330. An over stock of live cattle in England, at Harwich, the fact being at once telegraphed to Antwerp, they could be held there until from the stoppage of shipments prices rise again?—I do not think I quite understand the question.

1331. Suppose live beasts to be overdone in the Harwich market, by telegraphing to Antwerp you can stop the supply till the price rises, which they could not do if they had the dead meat, because they could not keep it?—Just so.

1332. Chairman.] But if they wanted to move them from Harwich alive, and they could not be received alive, but only in the form of dead meat, it would diminish their value?—Oh no, they can keep them and feed them at Harwich.

1333. You do not understand the question. If they could only be removed from Harwich in the form of dead meat, it would diminish their value. Would a man give as much for an ox if he could only have it in the form of dead meat as he would if he could move it alive?—Yes, I think he would.

1334. Have there been any complaints made of the treatment of cattle on the steamers from Antwerp to Harwich?—No; we have had no complaints because the steamers are very nicely arranged for the transport of cattle. We have got stables and compartments made between decks, and each compartment takes a certain number of cattle; you cannot put more or less in. Each cattle, in fact, has got his place, so that it must keep upright. Of course, the treatment depends upon the accommodation the ships have; you must have places arranged in between decks, in which you put five beasts together, so that they cannot fall down.

1335. Mr. Hunt.] Have you seen any animals watered in trucks?—No, this is not done.

1336. Do you know how it is done?—It is not done.

1337. Do you know that animals are watered without removing them from the trucks?—I do not know, but I know that they are stabled at Cologne and Neuss for watering and feeding.

Mr. F. Huger.

1338. For the purpose of watering and feeding them?—Yes. The sheep that are sent to Antwerp come from Magdeburgh; they are sent to Neuss, there the people who forward them have got stables, and keep them a few days in the stables, and they send them from Neuss direct to Antwerp, which takes only 14 hours. And the cattle coming from the south of Germany alongside the Rhine are stabled at Cologne, and from Colonge they are sent to Antwerp.

1339. Are they fat beasts that pass through your hands?—Chiefly fat beasts; only the last six weeks we have had sheep sent for the farms in England.

1340. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Where do these sheep come from to Antwerp?—A great deal from Magdeburgh, some from France, and from the south of Germany.

1341. Do you find they suffer from the railway journey?—No, not at all; when they are not overdriven they do not suffer.

1342. Are the sheep inspected?—Yes, just the same as beasts.

1343. Have you seen what is called the foot and mouth disease?—Yes.

1344. Have many of these beasts which have come to Antwerp suffered from the foot and mouth disease?—Very little; I think altogether we have not had more than 50 or 60.

1345. Do you mean during the whole time that the trade has been made in communication?—Yes; I do not think more than 50 or 60.

1346. Would the inspector pass an animal which had the foot and mouth disease?—He would not.

1348. And sheep that are suffering from the scab?—We do not take those sheep on board the steamers.

1349. How long are these animals that are suffering from foot and mouth disease generally before they recover?—I cannot say, they are so few; they immediately send them to the butchers and have them killed.

1350. A good many of those animals come a long journey from the south of Germany?—Yes, some of them do.

1352. You have found that to be the fact?—Yes, we have found that out; as to the German sheep we have only had three or four cases.

1353. Chairman.] The Great Eastern Railway are only interested in the cattle as regards freight?—Yes.

1354. They do not purchase cattle through agents abroad, do they?—No.

1355. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Are you agent to any other firm besides the Great Eastern Railway Company?—Yes, I am agent for the Goole Steam Shipping Company, Tyne Steam Shipping Company, and for the Antwerp and Meuze steamers.

1356. Is that company interested in the cattle trade?—Lately they have taken some sheep but very few; I do not think that they had more that 3,000 or 4,000 last year to Goole and Newcastle.

1357. I think it is not much of a grazing country round Antwerp, is it?—No.

1358. You say the French cattle are allowed to come into Belgium?—It has not always been so.

1360. Have you found any cases of pleuropneumonia among the French cattle?—No, we have not found any.

1362. Were there beasts shipped to London before the cattle plague?—No, there were nearly none shipped; there may have been a few hundreds, but not many; they were generally shipped to Harwich on account of the short sea voyage.

1363. Are those German beasts brought to market, or are they sold from the farms?—I think they are sold from the farms, and from the breweries and distilleries to cattle merchants who bring them to the London market.

1364. Do you mean that they feed them at the distilleries?—Some of them.

1365. And that you go to the farmers to collect them before they put them on the railroad?—Yes, they are collected at the farms of distilleries.

Mr. ROBERT MOSELEY, re-called; and Examined.

Mr. R. Mosely.

1366. COULD you get us any statement from abroad as to how the watering and feeding of cattle in trucks is carried on on the journey to the ports of shipment?—Yes, I could get every information.

1367. Mr. Edward Egerton.] It is not possible to water animals in the truck, as far as we know, in England; you could not supply them with water in the truck?—As was mentioned this morning, the simple plan is to take the ordinary pail when you arrive at the station, and to put the shepherd or drover in the truck, and give the animals water.

1368. But there is no room for the shepherd?—No.

1369. Mr. Hunt.] If the animals were very thirsty, and all rushed at once to get to the pail, it would not be fit for the drover to go amongst them?—Take the distance the cattle are driven on the Great Eastern. The remotest point is Norwich, 113 miles from London; the transit is about from five to six hours, and the necessity for watering the cattle within that short distance does not arise as it does on the Continent, where the beasts are a couple of days on the road.

1370. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Does it not often happen happen that the cattle trains are shunted to allow other trains to go by?—Yes, we have to give way, of course.

1371. How do the beasts get water?—Take a train coming from Aberdeen, which is a journey of 20 hours; there is no doubt whatever that it would be a great advantage to the owners of stock if they could be watered on the road.

1372. Do not you know that they never are watered?—Yes, I know that for a fact.

1373. And some trains are two days and a half on the road; kept at York, for instance, 24 hours?—Yes, that is too long.

1374. Mr. Hunt.] You could give us a letter or statement from some person as to this matter?—Yes; or from various railway companies abroad.

1375. Mr. Leader.] You see no difficulty as to feeding and watering cattle in the trucks?—My own impression is that, looking at our own traffic and the short time it occupies on the journey, the necessity for watering does not arise.

1376. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Is there a possibility of giving them water in the trucks?—I should say it is possible.

1377. Do you know that it has not been done?—I know it has not been done, because the pressure has not been put on the railway companies to do it.

1378. Animals have constantly been kept on your line 24 hours, coming from Harwich to London?—No.

1379. Have they never been obliged to shunt the cattle train?—I may say that the journey of the cattle train from Harwich to London since we have commenced the trade has not exceeded four hours; as a rule it is two hours and a half.

1380. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Could a water trough be fitted into the truck?—No, it could not be done; the simple way is to take the pail, and let the drover get into the truck. Mr. R. Moseley. 7 May 1866.

1381. But could not you fit an iron trough into the truck?—No; the oscillation of the train would spill the water.

1382. I do not mean that; but might not a trough be put there, and might not you pour water into it in the same way as you would pour water into an engine?—That would injure the animals.

1383. It might be put outside, might it not?—It could not be put at the outside; the simple mode is the pail.

1384. Mr. Dent.] We had a witness here from the London and North Western at the last meeting, and I said to him, "You could water them in the trucks." He said, "I do not think one out of twenty would drink, and it would be dangerous in some cases to attempt it, because they are put into the trucks without being tied"?—That is so; they are loaded without being tied in trucks.

1385. Do you agree with the witness that probably they would not drink?—That I cannot say.

1386. Mr. Hunt.] That would depend on how long they had been thirsty?—Yes; I think the grazier would be able to give you a better opinion than I can.

1387. Sir M. W. Ridley.] When you make these inquiries, will you ask also how frequently they are watered?—Yes.

1388. And what the distance is considered to be at which they could be watered?—Yes; and I will take Berlin as a common point; from Berlin to Rotterdam.

Mr. JOHN ELLIS, called in; and Examined.

1389. Chairman.] WHAT is your calling?—I am a Veterinary Surgeon, and Government Inspector for Her Majesty's Customs at the Port of Liverpool. Mr. J. Ellis.

1390. When cattle arrive from abroad, what is it your duty to do?—To inspect them, and to see that they are free from contagious diseases; such as pleuro-pneumonia, mouth and foot disease, as it is commonly called, or rinderpest.

1391. You have notice when the ship arrives, and go down forthwith?—Yes; I examine them before they come off the ship.

1392. Then, in case you find any animals with any one of those diseases, what happens?—If they have rinderpest, or pleuro-pneumonia, they are condemned and destroyed; if they have foot and mouth disease they would be put in quarantine, and put under treatment, because they would get well in a few days if they were taken care of.

1393. Where are they put in quarantine; where do they keep them?—We have not had any occasion to put them in, but they could be put in some of the dock sheds, I should think; very likely they would get dock sheds, or something of the kind; we have not had any occasion to put them in, but if any cases occur they would be put in quarantine.

1394. Do you inspect the Irish cattle?—I do not.

1395. Is there any inspector of Irish cattle?—Yes; but that is done by the inspector of the borough; the Customs do not interfere with that.

1396. I thought you might be employed also by the Corporation?—No, I am not; I am employed by the Customs.

1397. In what condition have you found the foreign cattle to arrive?—The cattle that come from Oporto are in first-rate condition; we have not many of any other sort; there are very few cattle from Hamburgh come to Liverpool; most of them come from Oporto.

1398. Have you found such cattle as come from Hamburgh not to be in so good a condition as those from Oporto?—Yes; they were poor young ones; two years old.

1399. Store cattle?—Yes.

1400. In point of disease, what has been their general condition?—They have all been very healthy, with the exception of two that were condemned, having pleuro-pneumonia, some two years ago.

1401. Do you think all the cattle that have arrived from Oporto might very well have been allowed to have been forwarded on into the country?—Yes, all of them, as far as being healthy is concerned.

1402. They were all fat cattle?—Yes.

1403. Is it easy to detect the rinderpest when it is at its first commencement?—If the disease has set in, you may detect it; but it lies dormant in the system, and it is a difficult matter to detect it then.

1404. It may be latent in beasts, and still no outward and visible sign?—Yes; that is so.

1405. There has been a great increase in slaughtering slaughtering in the town of Liverpool, has there not?—There has.

Mr. J. Ellis.

1406. Do you think the storing so many more cattle than is usual in Liverpool, or slaughtering so many, has been prejudicial to the health of the cattle, in consequence of the blood, and so forth, being carried about in the gutters and sewers?—No, not for the time; of course, if they were kept in that state long it would be prejudicial, but they are killed so soon that I do not think it interferes with them at all; when they are once brought into Liverpool they are bound to be destroyed within four days afterwards, so that they do not take any harm.

1407. But a greater number of cattle have recently been kept in Liverpool than used to be the case in ordinary times?—Oh, yes; a great number more.

1408. Does not the crowding the cattle together in a town like Liverpool have a tendency to produce sickness in a town like Liverpool?—That would be so, no doubt, if they are kept long enough together.

1409. But take three days?—I do not think it would in three days bring on any disease.

1410. They are bought in the market on the Monday, and kept until Thursday?—They are obliged to be killed before Thursday, or on the Thursday; Thursday is the last day.

1411. Then from the Thursday till the following Monday, there is comparatively a fewer number?—None.

1412. All the fore part of the week?—Yes, from the Monday to the Thursday.

1413. And then the town is very full of cattle on Saturdays, in sheds?—Yes, from Saturday to Thursday.

1414. And a vast amount of slaughtering going on?—Yes, a great deal; there is a great deal for the shipping, and a great deal to be sent to Manchester and up the country.

1415. Liverpool has become more or less a slaughter-house for the adjoining districts?—Yes, that is so.

1417. You do not understand my question; my question is this: whether you have heard that this excessive slaughtering in Liverpool, and keeping of cattle there in greater numbers than at ordinary times, is prejudicial to the health of Liverpool?—I should think it would be, especially in the neighbourhood where the cattle are kept; there are many of them kept in the neighbourhood of the slaughter-houses; and in that neighbourhood, I think, it will be prejudicial.

1418. When the hot weather begins, is it probable the effect will be felt more strongly?—Yes, I should say so.

1419. Do you think that these foreign cattle should be permitted as a permanent arrangement to go freely from Liverpool alive to be killed were people may choose to send them?—Yes, upon conditions, I should say that all cattle sold to leave Liverpool, should be duly slaughtered after they reach their destination; if the foreign cattle, for instance, are wanted to be sent to Manchester, let them be sent there and slaughtered at once at Manchester, or in the neighbourhood to which they could go.

1420. You would have them slaughtered at the place of their destination?—Yes.

1421. But not in Liverpool, or to be sent as dead meat from Liverpool to Manchester?—No; I think if they were sent alive as far as Manchester, or further, if it was required, wherever they might want them to go, they should be slaughtered at once, and not kept.

1422. Is it your opinion that the carrying of cattle about alive in steamboats and in railways has a tendency to produce any disease amongst them?—Not by railway; it may in steamboats, where they are put in the hold down below, and do not get ventilation; then, of course, it would be prejudicial to them; but I do not see that it can do them any harm in the railways, provided the trucks are kept clean and there is every care taken that there is no diseased animals get amongst them.

1423. What is your opinion as to the ventilation of the ships which bring the cattle to Liverpool?—They are very well ventilated, and every care taken of them.

1424. You think, as far as those ships are concerned, the treatment of the cattle could not be improved?—No, it could not; the treatment is good; of course, I am speaking of the foreign cattle coming into Liverpool; I do not know anything about the Irish cattle.

1425. Does your professional knowledge as a veterinary surgeon enable you to judge of whether meat can as well be sent from Liverpool to Manchester without deterioration, the cattle being killed in Liverpool for the purpose of supplying Manchester?—I should think it could, except in very hot weather, when we know meat will not keep long; I think it will deteriorate in value.

1426. Are there not sometimes states of the atmosphere, at certain periods of the year, muggy weather, as it is called, when meat will not keep in a proper condition so as to be sent by rail anywhere?—Yes.

1427. Under those circumstances meat would deteriorate?—I think it would. I think if meat is sent the only plan is to hang it, and not to allow it to lay on one side of the meat or the other. If so it will heat, and very soon get a different colour. It will turn a bluish colour.

1428. It should have a circulation of air all round it?—Yes, all through it.

1429. You have never had any practical experience as to a quarantine?—No.

1430. You never have had any occasion for that?—No, all the cattle coming into Liverpool have been very healthy, with the exception of two that I spoke of as having had pleuro-pneumonia two years ago; they have all been very healthy with that exception.

1431. Mr. Hunt.] Was there much increase in the foreign trade when the railway traffic was stopped about the country by Act of Parliament?—We have not had much foreign trade in Liverpool throughout the winter at all; very little.

1432. In the month of March?—We have not had any foreign trade since October or November of last year, until within the last week, with the exception of perhaps three or four cargoes.

1433. To what do you attribute that?—I should not know to what to attribute it, unless it is a greater risk to bring them in the winter.

1434. You are not the inspector of Irish and Scotch cattle?—I am not.

1435. Did

1435. Did you ever see them land?—I did not.

1436. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Has your attention been called by Dr. Trench to the danger which he says arises to the health of Liverpool from the blood getting into the sewers of the town?—He has never said anything to me about it, but I can quite believe there is danger in it.

1437. There has been no request made to you on the part of any of the authorities?—No.

1438. You are aware there is a great deal of opposition to the dead meat coming into Liverpool and Manchester, and the other manufacturing towns?—There is.

1439. Has that been brought under the notice of the authorities of Liverpool?—I believe it has.

1440. You see no objection to the live animals going by railway, and their being slaughtered in those towns?—I do not.

1441. How long have you filled the office of inspector?—Three or four years the last time, and I was appointed before, in 1856 or 1857.

1442. All these animals you inspect are animals fit to be killed at once?—Generally speaking.

1443. Have you found many cases of pleuropneumonia in these animals?—Only two cases, two years ago.

1444. Where did they come from?—Hamburgh.

1445. Sir M. W. Ridley.] Are you acquainted with the condition of the cow houses at Liverpool, as regards cleanliness and ventilation. I do not mean the houses where cows are kept for milking purposes, or new sheds used for cattle that are to be slaughtered. I mean the general condition of the houses which are used for milking purposes?—They are in very bad condition.

1446. Your profession has given you the opportunity of judging what is the condition of these houses?—Yes, I have frequently seen them.

1447. Are they very bad?—They were very bad when the plague first broke out.

1448. Is the condition of those houses such as is likely to generate or encourage disease?—Certainly.

1449. Are you aware whether the local authorities exercise any inspection whatever; the Board of Health, for instance?—I cannot speak positively, but I think the authorities see that they are kept clean at the present time; I have nothing to do with the borough of Liverpool; I do know from my own practical knowledge, having to go to them very often, that they are very badly ventilated, very badly lighted, and lie, as a rule, very low, without any drainage, and the soil is very bad.

Mr. J. Ellis. 7 May 1866.

1450. Is the manure and dung allowed to accumulate?—It was allowed to accumulate, but now the authorities have a strict supervision over them.

1451. And not taken away sufficiently often?—It was not; it was allowed to accumulate near the door and other places.

1452. Have many cows died at Liverpool of rinderpest?—A great many.

1453. Do you know the number?—I do not.

1454. Mr. Holland.] Have you found any difficulty in examining on board, in consequence of the animals being in particular positions?—No; the way I do it is this; I can easily get to see those which are on deck and tied round the sides of the ship; I look at those first, and those that are below I examine one by one as they are brought up; they put belly bands on them and pull them up with a pulley, and before they let them loose the man holds them there to be thoroughly examined, so that each one is examined carefully.

1455. Sir M. W. Ridley.] Are they hoisted up from the hold?—Yes.

1456. Mr. Holland.] You approve of animals going alive from Liverpool to Manchester to be slaughtered immediately?—Yes.

1457. What do mean by immediately?—A day or two, not more.

1458. You would have a certain number of hours elapse, would you not?—Say two days, and I cannot think there would be any detriment or harm in any way in that.

1459. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] I think you said all this was as to foreign animals; you include sheep in that?—I said foreign animals, for this reason, that I have nothing to do with others; I am merely speaking about the foreign cattle. The foreign cattle I can answer for myself; having made a thorough examination of them, and I should not be the slightest afraid of their going away as far as they are consigned, and I do not know why the Irish cattle could not do so as well.

Mr. Seymour Clarke, called in; and Examined.

1460. Chairman.] You are connected with the Great Northern Railway, are you not?—Yes.

1461. What position do you hold?—I am general manager of the Great Northern Railway.

1463. Previously to the Orders in Council suspending the carrying of cattle by railway, the cattle traffic on the Great Northern Line was very considerable I suppose?—Yes, and very considerable, especially with Scotland. We carry far more from Scotland than from Ireland, because our route from Ireland, although we have a station at Liverpool, is a more circuitous one than the North Western; but we are the most direct route to Scotland. Of course our own districts of Lincolnshire, Yorkshire, Bedfordshire, and places near London have been very much served by the Great Northern.

Mr. S. Clarke.

1464. You carry large quantities of fat cattle for the Metropolitan markets?—Yes, and large quantities of store cattle go to Peterborough, there to be taken to the grazing districts of Norfolk. We carry both fat stock for the supply of the metropolis, and lean cattle to be fed up in Norfolk, and what come eventually to the same place.

1465. Previously to the cattle plague breaking out in England, did you cleanse or disinfect your cattle trucks periodically?—We always swept them after every journey. We swept the floor, but we did not lime white them, or do anything that we have been called upon to do by the Orders in Council; since then we have adhered as rigidly as possible to the Orders, but some of the Orders have been so framed, not by the Board of Trade, but by the higher authorities, that they have been impossible to be carried out.

1466. Mr. Hunt.] You are not alluding to the Legislature, but to the Privy Council?—I allude to the recent Order given us, which it was really impossible to carry out. I have no doubt some modification will be made in that by the officers of the Board of Trade. I believe we have nearly come to a concurrence of opinion as to what can be done.

1467. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Did that relate to the cleansing of the trucks?—It did. Up to the recent Order, the trucks and the pens were effectually cleaned and lime whited, and deodorised, in the same way pointed out by the last Order but one.

1470. Mr. Hunt.] Can you tell us the comparative cost of carrying cattle alive, and carrying them dead in the form of carcases?—Yes; my attention was called to that specially some few weeks ago by a report that appeared in the papers; and a letter from Alderman Mechi, in which he states that some meat had been carried at a very exorbitant price, and he thought the railway companies were charging too much; of course there are always elements of the different modes in which these things are treated, that require explanation. For instance, a lot of cattle walk to the station; they walk away from it, they take no packing. If meat is slaughtered and carried into the country, there is a large cost involved which has to be deducted before you can come to a comparative price chargeable for the carriage of meat, dead or alive. There are the meat hampers and cloths that we contract for, and we pay a contractor 6 s. a ton to find these meat cloths and hampers; then there is the cost of collection from the place where the animals are slaughtered, and the delivery to Newgate Market, or any other market in London where the meat is sold, which has not to be done in the usual slow way that horses travel about London with heavy loads, but we have quick trotting horses, which take these hampers to the market. Then we have special men employed doing nothing else, working through the night to pitch these hampers. It is a trade of itself, and these men who are employed in pitching such loads, carry immense weights; you would think they would fall under the immense loads which some of them attempt to go with, but they struggle on and get to the salesman's door. These meat hampers have to be collected again by separate vans, and taken up to the station to be transferred to Lincolnshire or Yorkshire, wherever the trade is to be served, and that, of course, involves a cost. Then there is the labour of the men employed at the station in loading to and from the collecting waggons, first of all into the trucks, then from the trucks into the delivery waggons, and the cost of these services is immense.

1471. Mr. Dent.] You said that you charged 6 s. a ton for cloths and hampers; what do you mean by that?—I mean that if a man has half a ton of meat to send, he would be charged 3 s. for the hampers that we send; if he had one ton, he would be charged 6 s. for it.

1472. That is for any distance?—Yes. It would involve too much detail to charge a certain price for 100 miles, another price for 50 miles, another for 25 miles, and another for 200 miles.

1473. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] I suppose you charge in the same way that a fishmonger charges, who sends home a hamper with a turbot?—Yes, perhaps a nearer parallel would be a carriage of coal; we charge 9 d. per ton for the use of the waggon, whether it goes two miles or 100 miles.

1474. Mr. Hunt.] I suppose until the Act of Parliament was passed, prohibiting railway movement, your carriage of dead meat was very limited?—No, we carried about 20,000 tons or more to London per annum.

1476. I suppose it is very limited, in comparison with what it was at that time?—No doubt there has been an increase in the carriage of dead meat since.

1478. Is that continuing now, since the prohibition has ceased?—The increase at present is not very large. The increase was rapid at first, and has maintained about the same figure since. The consumption of meat in London is considered to be about 200,000 tons a year, and we carry about 10 per cent. of the dead meat.

1479. Do you know how much dead meat comes into London?—More than half the quantity tity is dead meat now, but of course the proportion has increased considerably since the prohibition of carrying cattle has been in force.

1480. That prohibition ceased on the 16th of April?—Yes, but the carriage of live cattle has been but very partially resumed indeed, for one reason, and a very strong one, that the Order in Council which gave liberty to carry cattle again, was accompanied with such stringent regulations, that it was impossible to avail ourselves of it.

1481. In fact, the movement of live cattle has not resumed its ordinary course?—No, and I do not think it will; I believe that the great difficulty that has to be solved is this; not whether the fat cattle can be beneficially moved when dead, but the difficulty will be, I believe, in carrying store cattle to the grazing districts, because, of course, the meat when carried as a valuable commodity, is carried at high rates of speed, and everything is ready to take it to its destination as soon as possible. It is worth carrying at those high prices, but store cattle cannot be carried dead. The only great difficulty will be to supply the grazing districts of Norfolk with the proper quantity of store cattle, in order to keep the farmers sufficiently supplied.

1482. We are not dealing in this Committee with the temporary regulations for the purpose of preventing the cattle plague spreading, but more with regard to the present trade in cattle; do you think it will be possible to supply London and populous places with dead meat?—I do.

1483. Mr. Dent.] All the year round?—All the year round.

1484. Mr. Hunt.] You carry dead meat largely in the summer months on your line?—We do.

1485. Meat is brought from Aberdeen to London?—Yes.

1487. Mr. Dent.] You say it was in a better condition, but which made the most money?—I do not know that.

1489. Every stage of movement is accompanied with excitement to the animal?—Yes.

1490. First of all driving the animal, and then the conveyance in the truck, with the shunting, the whistling of the engine, and so on, and everything to which the animal is unaccustomed; then there is the driving out of the trucks, through the streets in order to reach its destination in the market?—Yes, and there is the amount of thirst the animal undergoes; I do not know what sort of evidence you have had here, but as long ago as the 25th November, I suppose, in common with all other railway managers, I received a letter from the Home Office, from Mr. Waddington, which is as follows:—"Whitehall, 25 November 1865. Sir,—I am directed by Secretary Sir George Grey to transmit to you the inclosed extract of a letter received from the solicitor to the City of London, relative to the conveyance by railway of cattle from Scotland to the Metropolitan Cattle Market; and I am to request that the attention of the traffic manager, or of whoever is responsible for the arrangements for the conveyance of cattle on the Great Northern Railway, may be forthwith called to the statement of the inspector of cattle at the Metropolitan market, and to express Sir George Grey's hope that measures may be taken for remedying the evil, which, if that statement is correct, may be productive of very serious consequences. I am, Sir, your obedient servant, W. Waddington. The Secretary to the Great Northern Railway Company." The other letter is this:—"Guildhall, London, E.C., 22 November 1865. Mr. Tegg, the inspector of cattle, at the Metropolitan Cattle Market, informs me that cattle conveyed by the Railway Companies from Scotland, leave there on the Thursday and do not get to the lairs of the Metropolitan Cattle Market until Saturday, and he has every reason to believe that they have neither food nor water during the transit; and if there were any predisposing causes of disease, this cruel treatment may well induce its appearance. I am, &c. (signed) T. J. Nelson, City Solicitor. T. G. Baring, Esq., M.P., Under Secretary of State for the Home Department."

Mr. S. Clarke.

1491. Is that a true statement, that the animals come from Aberdeen to London without being fed or watered?—They do.

1492. Have you any information as to what the loss of weight is upon the animals so treated?—I made it my business to communicate with the Scotch Companies and the intermediate company, the North Eastern, which goes from York to Berwick-on-Tweed, to see how far the statement made by the City Solicitor was true; I knew what it was on our own line, and how far the remedy could be found. I will read you my letter, which I addressed to Mr. Waddington. "The Great Northern Railway, General Managers' Office, King's Cross Station, London, 11 December 1865:—Sir, In reply to your letter of the 25th ultimo, enclosing copy of a letter received by the Under Secretary of State from the City Solicitor, dated 22d November 1865, relative to the carriage of cattle between Scotland and London; I have to state, that the average time occupied by cattle, whether carried by ordinary trains or special trains from Aberdeen to London, a distance of 554 miles, is 36 hours (about 16 miles per hour), but of course in a long journey like this, a cattle train is subject to occasional delays and detentions for the passing of other trains, &c.

"Cattle, when once placed in the trucks, are not fed or watered until their arrival at their destination, for several reasons:

"First, That the cattle are unaccompanied (in most instances) by persons in charge of them, and therefore the feeding and watering would devolve upon the servants of the several Railway Companies;

"Secondly, That no payment is made for the provender that would have to be given to them;

"Thirdly,

Mr. S. Clarke.

7 May 1866.

"Thirdly. Because cattle will not feed or drink while in the trucks; and they would have to be unloaded, involving considerable delay, considerable expense, and the probability of mismatching cattle, they being unknown, except by the number of the trucks, to the railway servants; and if once the beasts in any two or more trucks were to get mixed, it would be impossible for them to be redivided, without the almost certainty of error, and any errors would involve a loss, as the parties who got better beasts than those intended for them, would make no allowance; and the parties getting less valuable animals would be sure to claim on the railway company.

"Fourthly. There is at present no place throughout the journey where the operation of feeding and watering can be performed.

"I readily, Sir, admit that the case is one that wants a remedy, but the remedy does not rest, as I hope you will see from the communication, in the hands of the railway companies. There would be no great difficulty, if the senders of the cattle were willing to pay something to remunerate the companies for finding a plan for unloading the beasts, and keeping the contents of the small trucks separate from each other; for finding service and provender; and if the senders were content that the journey should occupy several more hours than is now the case, and which would, of course, cost the companies somewhat more for engine-power, which would have to be paid by the sender. Further, there must be concurrence on the part of all the senders of cattle, as, if the plan were adopted for any, it must be for all. I am, Sir, your obedient servant, Seymour Clarke, General Manager. H. Waddington, Esq., Office of Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whitehall."

1493. Mr. Hunt.] You say that it is impossible to feed and water the animals in the trucks, because they would not take it. Is that statement the result of experience?—Yes, there is no doubt about it.

1494. Have you had it tried?—We have the evidence of the people who are in the habit of dealing with cattle, and they all come to this conclusion, that unless you allow time enough for the cattle to come out and shake themselves, and get accustomed to the place in which they are, they will not feed.

1496. I was surprised at the statement of the gentleman this morning; but that is his statement?—So am I. The time that would be taken to get the beasts out of the trucks, and give them time to get a little more comfortable than they would be when first taken out, would involve a great delay, or an immense space of time. There is another great practical difficulty as to the mixing of the beasts. They come up in lots, and one truck holds ten or a dozen, according to its size. There may be 50 wagons to a train. Just fancy all those animals let loose in one place, to be fed and watered. We should never be able to match them again.

1497. No railway company would undertake the responsibility of untrucking them and retrucking them?—No; it never could be done. All we know is, that John Smith has truck 754 consigned to him, and we are bound to deliver to John Smith the contents of number 754.

1498. You have not answered the question I put to you. Have you ever tested the loss of weight on any animal in its transit from Scotland to London by train?—No. I know that general report says the depreciation both in weight and quality is considerable. Of course it must be much more when they have to be "walked."

1500. Have you seen the evidence given on the part of Mr. Way, who is a butcher: "We calculate, and have brought a good authority for our calculation, that an ox will lose one stone a day (that is the Smithfield stone of 8 lbs.) in its transit, say from Scotland to London"?—Oh no, I have not seen that. Of course he would be a much better judge of that than I am. That is his business. I should think the loss was greater in quality, because of the uncomfortableness of the animal; he gets feverish.

1501. They are in a less fit state to be killed than before they leave the place from which they come?—Yes, I believe there is no doubt of that at all; you were asking me the question whether I could tell you the relative cost of the carriage of live and dead beasts, after deducting the several items I have mentioned, such as hampers, and cloths, and the cost of their working, and I have compared several stations on the line from the existing cost per head, and the existing cost per ton, taking the weight of a carcass at 7 cwt.; I have taken Biggleswade, Peterborough, Boston, Alford, Lincoln, Grantham, Retford, and Leeds; I will now give you the price per head, and I will give you then the price per carcass of 7 cwt. to a beast, after I have deducted all the et ceteras I gave you just now. Biggleswade, a distance of 41 miles, the cost per head is 3 s. 5 d., the cost per carcass 2 s. 11 d.; Peterborough, 76 miles, cost per head 6 s., per carcass 7 s.; Boston, 106 miles, cost per head 7 s., per carcass 11 s. 1 d.; Alford, in Lincolnshire, 130 miles, cost per head 8 s. 7 d., per carcass 13 s. 5 d.; Lincoln, cost per head 8 s., per carcass 12 s. 10 d.; Grantham, cost per head 8 s. 9 d., per carcass 11 s. 1 d.; Retford, cost per head 11 s. 6 d., per carcass 13 s. 5 d., and Leeds (the longer distance) 13 s. 4 d. per head, and 12 s. 10 d. per carcass, of 7 cwt. The reason why the Biggleswade price comes out less is, that these deductions bear more hardly upon the smaller amount than upon the large one, because my deduction comes to 18 s. 6 d. a ton; and 18 s. 6 d., taking the Biggleswade rate, of course leaves a less proportion for carriage than if the 18 s. 6 d. was taken off the larger amount.

The Irish traffic is carried viâ the London and North Western Railway to London.

Mr. S. Clarke. — 3 May 1866.

1502. Then what you put down there for the carriages is what actually goes into the pockets of the Company?—Yes.

1503. That is after taking away everything you have to pay the contractors for supplying packages?—Yes; and then there is this which, of course, cannot be given accurately, but is estimated; the claims that are made on the Company for the detention or wrong delivery, or anything that happens to the carriage of dead meat for which we are responsible to the parties paying the higher rate.

1504. Tell me how you reckon to carry that per cwt.; do you reckon in that any offal at all?—No, it is only that which is fit to eat.

1507. Supposing Smithfield Market is constructed, I suppose you would like to run a line into the market from your own?—It does exist.

1508. But it is not under your own control?—We have running powers as far as the Farringdon-street Station, and the Metropolitan Meat Market is just beyond. I am now in treaty with the owners of the Metropolitan Railway for the Great Northern trains to run on to Moorgate-street, which would be through the market.

1509. Then the difficulty about the detention of the meat would be very much got over if that was ever carried out?—Yes, but there is one leading defect with the scheme of the metropolitan market, that there is not siding accommodation for the great number of trains that will come from Great Northern and Great Western, and other companies, so that they can be got rid of under the market. The market is on the level of the present old Smithfield. The access is underneath; all the meat will have to be got up by hoists through a floor. Then, of course, all coming at a certain time, or nearly at a similar time, in order to get the meat into the salesman's hands at six or seven in the morning, there would be such an accumulation of railway waggons from all parts, that I am satisfied there is not nearly siding accommodation enough provided here.

1510. What remedy do you suggest for that?—To make a larger area of sidings.

1511. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Whose fault is it that it has not been done; is it the fault of the City, or the fault of the railway?—It is the fault of the immense cost of acquiring land.

1512. But money could be obtained either by the railway or the City; is it the fault of the railway company or the fault of the City?—If you can call it a fault, there certainly will not have been money enough expended by the railway companies, in my opinion, to utilise the large area of the market. There will not be means enough to supply the market itself.

1513. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Whose fault is it that the Smithfield market has not been opened?—I believe it is for want of concurrence between the Metropolitan Company and the City as to the mode in which it could be carried out.

1514. How many years is it since that Bill was brought in?—I think 10 years ago. Mr. Bunning, the City architect, has died in the meantime.

1515. Mr. Hunt.] What is your opinion as to the great convenience to the metropolis of having one central market; or is it better to have several markets in different parts of the town?—I believe that if access could be given to one market it would be far preferable to have one central market than any in the out-lying places. All these things were gone into by myself with Mr. Charles Pearson when the thing was first originated by him. The great object of concentrating it was that the out-lying butchers who came in shoals in the morning to take back the meat in their carts might all know where to come to get their supplies, and if they found they had got one market to go to first, and then to another where they might get a better supply, it would tend to immense inconvenience. I am talking now of the outlying places, such as Kennington and Clapton, from which many butchers come in their "tax carts" to get their supply of meat for their shops to supply their own neighbourhoods.

1516. Supposing there was proper accommodation in a central market, and good communication from the chief lines running into London, you would see no difficulty in supplying the dead meat market?—No.

1517. Not even in hot weather?—No; one great point to be made, and of more importance than any other, is the road access to the market; we have constantly to apply to the City police authorities to try and get better regulations made, in order that the buyers may be able to get into the market.

1518. During the few weeks that the railway traffic has been suspended, there have been some temporary temporary regulations made by the City authorities?—Yes, a small attempt; the access to Newgate market is so miserably bad now that they could not remedy it much; the time occupied in getting a short distance from King's-cross to Smithfield is very great; an average of one hour and 18 minutes for each load.

1519. On account of the blocking up of the streets?—On account of the blocking up of the streets.

1520. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Nothing can well be conceived worse than having a dead meat market close to Newgate-street, one of the main thoroughfares?—Nothing; it is impossible for anything to be worse, both in space and the mode of getting at the salesmen's shops, which I am now talking of.

1521. Mr. Hunt.] Supposing that no fat cattle were brought into London alive, and the dead meat traffic took entirely the place of the live fat stock traffic, do you think the railway companies would be able to reduce the rate for carrying dead meat?—Yes, I think over long distances it might, but then it would want concurrence on the part of the senders of meat before any considerable deduction would be made; we are obliged to pay dividends to our shareholders, and also not to make extravagant charges at the same time, but if we do not make a margin to cover the claims we are subjected to, we should be losers by the carriage instead of gainers; bear in mind that the meat hampers only go in one direction, and the quantity of them that are constantly in use is very great indeed; they have to be sent back empty.

1522. You have no goods on the return journey?—No; that last answer I gave will apply to Yorkshire, because I remember the Scotch people do not send their beasts up in hampers; the Scotch people only use cloths.

1523. Have you seen what are called travelling larders, which are in use on the Great Western?—Yes, we tried them ourselves years ago; the great difficulty is, that in order to hang the meat up (it would only apply to sheep in any case) you must have an immensely strong vehicle, because the meat is all attached to the roof; then as the meat is attached to the roof, it makes it immensely top heavy; and, then again, if carcases of mutton are hung up by the legs at the top, they swing against each other, and chafe to such an extent, that a great depreciation takes place; you cannot confine them at the bottom, it would be no use if you could, and you cannot give sufficient space for them not to touch, because you could not get a load if you did.

1524. Do you see any way of fitting up trucks for the purpose of the conveyance of meat better, in the way of shelves for instance?—I had an idea once that we could do better than find hampers and cloths, and I took an immense deal of pains about it. I consulted the leading men of Newgate market; they took the question up with a good deal of interest also; they came to me, and the result of their inquiry, and the discussion we had was that placing them in layers, or any other mode of carrying them, would not be so satisfactory as the hamper. One great point you see is that each man now gets his individual consignment. If a hamper comes with so many carcases of meat, or sides of beef, it goes to him; but if they were all packed upon shelves they would have to be pulled out piecemeal; the shelves could not go to market, and they would very likely be mismatched. I think I am justified in saying that meat could be carried all the year round, from the fact that fish is.

1525. Fish is carried in ice, is it not?—To a certain extent it is. I have no doubt if it were the practice that dead meat should be carried instead of cattle in the heat of summer, means of carrying the meat would be resorted to. I find that last year we carried no less than 14,000 tons of fish to London.

1526. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] That is in baskets, and so on; from what parts did you carry them?—From Grimsby all along the east coast as far as Aberdeen. A great deal from Scarborough, and a great deal from Hull. There was a great deal from Grimsby, because there we have laid ourselves out very much for carrying cod fish from the Dogger bank, &c.

1527. Mr. Dent.] The fish runs right through by your fast trains from Scarborough to London?—Yes.

1528. Mr. Hunt.] You have got special fish trains?—Yes, during some parts of the year, when there is a great glut of fish; and we have fish trains in the season from Grimsby, but, generally speaking, trucks are attached to the fastest goods trains.

1529. Have you ever had to pay any damages for the detention of fish?—No doubt; but there are two rates; some are at owner's risk, and some not.

1530. Mr. Holland.] Is there any injury caused by the dust to the dead meat?—Not much. I have no doubt it is an element; but it would be an element in favour of hampers and cloths. No doubt the dust would be a disadvantage in the system of hanging, because you would have to have open sides to the waggons.

1531. And wherever you have ventilation you must have dust?—You cannot keep it out. In travelling in a passenger carriage in the summer it is impossible to avoid it. You are obliged either to have the window shut, and make it very hot, or else to have it open and get covered with dust.

1532. Mr. Hunt.] You say there are large consignments by the same individuals from Scotland?—Yes.

1533. That is one firm have a whole truckload sometimes?—There is one figure in this which I omitted to mention to you, and which your question now will give me an opportunity of filling in. I gave you the number of consignments on a certain morning, and I find that the 93 tons were composed of 1,014 packages, the average weight of them being 1 cwt. 3 qrs. per package.

1534. Do you know whether that was principally beef or mutton?—The Scotch is chiefly beef.

1535. Where does the mutton chiefly come from?—Yorkshire; and a great deal from Lincolnshire.

1536. Do you know where these beasts are killed in Scotland; are they killed in the towns?—I think they are killed in the towns. Of course, if the system of exclusively carrying dead meat was to be adopted, instead of carrying live cattle, a plan would have to be invented, and no doubt the demand would bring about the custom of slaughtering beasts at the several places, or near them.

1537. There would be no difficulty in having slaughterhouses adjacent to the stations?—The difficulty would be the cost, if it was a small neighbourhood. It would be very hard on the company company. I do not think we have any funds to expend in slaughterhouses; and I do not think the public would do it. I think, practically, the farmers should have to do the slaughtering on their own premises, and men, instead of going round as drovers to collect cattle, would have to transform themselves into slaughterers, and kill the cattle on the farmer's own premises.

Mr. S. Clarke.

1539. You think those men might establish slaughterhouses of their own, or the same class of men?—No; I think in some barn or other belonging to the farmers, they would have the means of killing the beast, slinging him up, and quartering him.

1540. Have you any other evidence which you wish to give to the Committee on the subject?—No. I read through Mr. Moseley's evidence, and tried to collect certain points that seemed to have been made by the Committee; I think I have given you the result of it.

1541. Mr. Dent.] You have not told us what is the ordinary time you take to bring your cattle up from Aberdeen to London?—The Great Northern route occupies about 36 hours from Aberdeen to London; and the steamboats take two days.

1542. Mr. Hunt.] You stated you had to pay a considerable sum for loss by reason of detention; does that apply to long distances more than to the short ones?—Yes; and that is because, if we do happen to be a little behind time, it is of more importance, because the meat has been longer slaughtered. The claim would not be so heavy, in consequence of the meat having been carried a short distance, because it would not have depreciated so much, and therefore we have a better margin; that is the English of it.

1543. Mr. Dent.] Take your consignments from Leeds or Scarborough, do you run them by the same sort of trains that you do your fish?—Yes; they come through in the night.

1544. But the fish come by fast trains?—Yes, but if the meat is to be carried extensively, Government would not allow trucks to be put on in any number upon the limited mail.

1545. Mr. Hunt.] One question about the bottom of the trucks; you said if they were covered with asphalte there would be no hold for the animals' feet; would that not depend very much on the composition of the asphalte?—No.

1546. If the asphalte was mixed with rough grit, the animal would get a very good foothold?—I am afraid it would soon get so smooth that it would be of no use. The battens that we nail across are certainly an inch thick. It takes a very great difference of level, or a great amount of roughness to give a foothold to an animal, because so much slush and litter gets about him, that the foothold is very bad.

1547. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Do you supply Manchester with dead meat?—No, of course there is a good deal goes there, but we are not cross country carriers. That is chiefly done by the Lancashire and Yorkshire, and the Manchester and Sheffield.

1548. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] With regard to the supply of London with dead meat, do you think London could be supplied with dead meat all over from one central market?—I do; of course it would require something much larger than is contemplated now, but I have no doubt it could be supplied by the central market, and then the outlying butchers, in those suburban places, which now are almost London itself, could come and fetch the supply they wanted for their customers. I do not suppose the ultimate supply would be confined to one market.

1549. I am speaking with regard to general convenience. Do you think if Parliament were to contemplate the supplying the whole metropolis, the 3,000,000 of people with dead meat, that that could be done by its being brought into one central market?—I do, and then of course I accompany that answer by the statement that it will have to be done in a very extensive way, both as to access to the market, and the means of sending the railway trucks to supply the demands of the market.

1550. Do you think it could be done by dividing the markets and having several of them?—The difficulty there is that the people do not know where to get to the best market. An immense quantity of meat is carried away out of the City to be sold in the suburbs. I should think the best meat is taken away to be sold in the suburbs. It would tend to the good of the trade in general, if all these outlying men were to know where they could get supplied, rather than go to different markets.

1551. I am not speaking so much as to the commercial and economical side of it, I am speaking to you as a great railway conveyor of goods, and I am asking whether you think that for the convenience of so large a number, it would be better to divide the markets rather than have one?—I think I had better confine my answer to all railways north of the Thames; in fact I have this in my mind, because in coming from the south of England, the Brighton Company if it ever carried much meat which it does not now, and the other Companies on the south of the Thames, might be concentrated into one. At present the largest carriers of meat are the Great Eastern, the Great Northern, London and North Western, and the Great Western.

1552. When you say meat you mean cattle and sheep?—I mean both. I mean dead meat and cattle.

1553. You carry a great many sheep?—Yes, we do carry a great many out of Lincolnshire.

1554. Sir M. W. Ridley.] Are not a great many sheep consigned to you from Berwick which come from the North?—Yes, I have the comparative numbers here of the sheep that come from the North, and the sheep that come from the home counties of Lincolnshire and Bedfordshire. In twelve months we carry 28,393 beasts, 166,311 sheep, 4,218 pigs. That is taking six months, July, August, September, October, November and December 1864; and adding January, February, March, April, May, and June 1865.

1555. You stated 200,000 tons of meat was the consumption of London. That includes all kinds of meat, beef, mutton, and pork?—I suppose so,

I am

I am only taking it from common hearsay. That is the general belief as to the consumption of meat.

1556. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Where did you get these figures?—The figures I last gave you are from our own returns.

1557. But where did you get the consumption of meat of London?—That is more from rumour than anything else.

1558. You got it from wholesale dealers, I suppose; from some authentic source?—Yes.

1559. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Your opinion is that the arrangement now made for supplying the markets are utterly insufficient for the purpose as to the City, and so forth?—I think so indeed; I think there is not enough in a railway point of view to supply the market as a market.

1560. Mr. Edward Egerton.] There is a want of sidings accommodation?—Yes.

1561. Will there be the means of avoiding that difficulty by procuring land? There are the means of doing it at an immense cost; part of the basement of the market is to be used as the goods depôt for the Great Western, just opposite the hospital in the south part of Smithfield; there is a great circular access now being made from the level of the market to the goods department below, and the Metropolitan Company are now laying out large sums of money in increasing accommodation, but that is chiefly for warehouses in which to store bale goods, and other things to be dispersed about London, but they are not increasing the siding accommodation immediately contiguous to the market.

1563. Mr. Edward Egerton.] The Corporation of London are in possession of all the streets near the market, are they not?—Yes; but the ground below is the property of the Metropolitan market; part of the arrangements between the City and the railway was, that the columns were to be built in a certain way, which would support the basement of the market, and the hoists were all arranged; that was in Mr. Bunning's time; the earth that was taken out was carried out partially by the Metropolitan Company, and partially by the City authorities.

Mr. S. Clarke.

1564. What is the area that is left for the market?—I cannot tell you what is the length of it.

1565. What sort of accommodation will there be for the butchers' carts?—The access will be very much better than now; they come from north, south, east, and west; there will be a stream of carts through; they will come in by Smithfield-bars, and pass down the market to the south, and there is a way through; there are various hoists to be placed there, where the meat will be brought up from underneath.

1566. Will there be found room for an immense number of carts?—For a great many.

1567. Mr. Graham.] You mention that you approve of the store cattle being brought in alive, and not the fat beasts; would it not be practicable to distinguish between the two, do you think?—Oh, yes; they are very easy to distinguish from each other; they look very different, and they weigh very different; it is known that a beast carried to London as a store beast would not be valuable for slaughtering; it is in no condition at all for killing.

1568. Chairman.] A certain amount of store beasts is brought to the London market in order to be sent off to the provinces?—Will you allow me, in reply to the Honourable Member, to say that a beast sent to be fattened and to be eaten is so different an animal from the other, that there is very little difficulty in distinguishing them.

1569. Mr. Dent.] You have been speaking altogether of the home trade and not of the foreign trade?—Altogether of the home trade: I suppose the importations will much increase, and that better regulations for the ports will be very desirable indeed.

Clare Sewell Read, Esq. (a Member of the House), called in; and Examined.

1570. Mr. Hunt.] You are a Member of the House?—I am.

1571. You were one of the Cattle Plague Commissioners?—I was.

1572. You have had very great practical experience in cattle?—I have in grazing, not particularly in breeding.

1573. What is your opinion as to the desirability of increasing the restrictions upon the importation of animals into the country before they have been subjected to quarantine?—I think that the foreign fat stock should be slaughtered at the port of landing, and that store cattle should be subjected to quarantine before they are allowed to proceed into the provinces.

1574. Would you make that a universal rule, or would you allow the Privy Council or some department of Government to prescribe what animals should be subject to quarantine?—All cattle and sheep that were not intended for immediate slaughter I should quarantine.

1575. Would you leave the Government to say what countries were infected with contagious diseases, and the animals coming from those countries only to be subject to quarantine, or animals coming from all foreign countries?—I think animals coming from all foreign countries.

C. S. Read, Esq., M.P.

1576. I suppose the expense of placing animals in quarantine would add something to the price of them to the purchasers?—It would.

1577. I suppose you consider a purchaser would find his account in that by reason of having a sort of warranty that the animal was sound?—I think they would be increased in value by having gone through a period of quarantine. As to store cattle, they almost all of them come from districts where there is some sort of disease. We do get very few store cattle from France, I believe, and certainly I have never heard of any coming from Spain or Portugal.

1578. The animals that come from Spain and Oporto are fat animals?—They are fat animals, and generally aged, good animals.

1579. The countries generally from which we get store animals have more or less disease among their herds?—Yes; I think they have.

1580. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Have not cattle lately been sent from Gottenburg, in Sweden, to London?—Yes; they were all slaughtered. They were poor, miserable things.

C. S. Read, Esq., M.P.

I saw some of them in the Metropolitan Market, and they sold at 5 l. each.

1581. Do you know, as a fact, that there has been no disease in Sweden, within the memory of man?—I do not know.

1582. Mr. Hunt.] Is it the opinion of people concerned in the feeding and grazing of cattle, that nearly all the diseases we have in this country, in cattle, have been imported from abroad?—Yes; pleuro-pneumonia, foot and mouth disease, small-pox in sheep, and, I need not say, rinderpest. I may add that I have grazed a good many of what we call Dutch store cattle, and I have had fearful losses from pleuro-pneumonia; so much so, that I will not buy any more of them, even if they are very cheap.

1583. Mr. Dent.] More than from Irish cattle?—More than from Irish cattle.

1584. Mr. Hunt.] Have you had much experience of Irish cattle?—Yes; we graze a great many in Norfolk.

1585. Do you find you get much disease from Ireland?—I think that next to the foreign cattle, they are more subject to pleuro-pneumonia than any others, and we think it is from the bad way in which they are shipped across the Channel.

1586. Have you been able to judge of the way they are shipped by personal experience; have you seen them shipped?—Some years ago I saw some of them unloaded at Liverpool, and they seemed in a dreadfully heated state, when taken out of the hold.

1587. You think they were too crowded in the hold?—I think they were.

1588. Have you any suggestions to make as to the improvement of the treatment of animals, either on board ship or on railway trucks?—I think that vessels should be built specially adapted for the transit of cattle, and that they should not carry more than a certain number. I think that railway trucks again, should only have a certain number of cattle put in them.

1589. Do you think there is any possibility of feeding and watering animals without untrucking them?—I do not think there is. I have heard here to-day that foreign stock are watered and fed in that way; but foreign stock are much more docile than our English ones, many of them having been worked; they have been at stake or tethered, and they are managed much more easily than our cattle, especially the Scotch and Irish.

1590. There is more personal attention given to cattle abroad, is there not?—I believe there is.

1591. They are led about?—Yes.

1592. And they have not such large pastures to roam about in?—I believe so.

1593. The cattle from Spain have mostly been worked, and all the fat cattle?—I believe all the old fat cattle have been worked, and very fine animals they are.

1594. Do you think it desirable that animals coming from Aberdeen to London, should be untrucked for the purpose of being fed and watered?—No, I do not; but I think they should not be hindered in their progress to town.

1595. You think if they come through without any detention, there is no occasion to water them? Yes; I would make it imperative that they should be watered before they are loaded, and should not leave the railway yard before they are watered again.

1596. Is there any convenience for that purpose at most of the yards?—I think there is.

1597. Mr. Dent.] You mean in the railway yard when taken out of the trucks, I suppose?—Yes; I would not let them leave the railway yards where they are untrucked, without having water.

1598. Mr. Hunt.] Have you considered the question of whether London and other populous places could be supplied with dead meat only, without any live animals being brought into them?—I think they might.

1599. But not with the present arrangements?—Certainly not.

1600. What arrangement would you suggest?—The present state of Newgate Market is atrocious and abominable. I have been there a good deal during the time of the prohibition of live stock by rail. I have sent some meat up, and it has been muddled about in a most unsatisfactory way.

1601. It is wholly insufficient for the arrangements of the metropolis?—Quite so; it seems to be about the worst arranged place I ever saw.

1602. Would you be for allowing fat stock from the country districts to come into London?—Certainly.

1603. Not the London market?—Yes.

1604. But not foreign cattle?—I think not, I think they had better have a market by themselves somewhere close to where they are landed. It will not signify, provided everything, as it is now, was slaughtered in London. I do not see that any harm would arise from it, but the danger would be when cattle are mixed with foreign stock, and then scattered over the country, as they have been hitherto.

1605. Are you acquainted with the slaughter-houses in London, or any of them?—I have visited many of the private ones.

1606. What is your opinion of them?—I think they are generally very well managed, but I think they are very badly situated as to a great number of them.

1607. Do you think it would be desirable to have a public slaughter-house attached to the Metropolitan Market?—I do.

1608. Is there plenty of space for that purpose?—Plenty.

1609. You would have that under proper regulations?—Certainly.

1610. The advantages of having a central slaughter-house would be, that you would have inspections carried on much more efficiently, would you not?—I think you might.

1611. Are you acquainted with the abattoirs of Paris?—No.

1612. Or Edinburgh or Glasgow?—No.

1613. Have you any more observations you wish to make to the Committee?—I made an observation about the carriage of dead meat and the price that the Eastern Counties Railway charge. Their rate for fat cattle from Norfolk to London averages from 10 s. 6 d. to 12 s. 6 d. per head alive. They charge from 3 s. to 3 s. 6 d. a hundredweight, and, as a matter of course, as our cattle will average somewhere about eight hundredweight, it is double. They do not find us with cloths or hampers either, and the farmer delivers the meat into the truck. I have seen as much as five tons of meat in a truck, which of course would be something like 15 l. for the truck. Of course, if the truck carried cattle, it would not carry above six live ones, which would come to little more than 3 l. There is the difference, that the bullocks walk out of the truck, and are no more trouble, but the meat has to be carted to Newgate.

1614. Mr. Edward Egerton.] You furnish the cloths and hampers yourselves?—Yes.

1615. And they send them back empty?—Yes.

1616. Viscount Cranborne.] Is that general through the whole of the stations on the Great Eastern?—I do not know; I am speaking of Norwich.

1617. In all its branches?—The trade in dead meat from Norfolk was not very extensive.

1618. Mr. Hunt.] You think the railway companies might carry dead meat at a much lower rate?—I think they might.

1619. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Were you here when Mr. Moseley was here?—I was not. I am only speaking of Norwich now. I do not speak about other branches of the Great Eastern.

1620. He speaks of Harwich alone; but that is part of the Great Eastern system?—Yes.

1621. It is all under their own government?—Yes.

1622. Sir M. W. Ridley.] May I ask whether you went on board the boat at Liverpool, out of which you saw the cattle come in a very heated state?—No; I saw the boat unload, and they all came out covered with sweat.

1623. Was it one of the Irish boats?—It was one of the Irish boats. This is some 10 or 15 years ago, and therefore I could not say whether there is any improvement in the trade.

1624. Viscount Cranborne.] Have you any knowledge how many store cattle come into this country?—I have not.

1625. Or into your own district?—I can only give you a fair idea of it, that is to say, from last July to last December, at the Norwich station. The Great Eastern Company were 2,500 head of cattle short of their usual supply on account of the cattle plague.

1626. You propose that a quarantine should be applied to all foreign store coming into this country?—Yes; but I am not talking of that now. I am talking of store cattle from Ireland, from Scotland, and from the Midland counties, which come to graze in Norfolk.

1627. You cannot tell me what quantity come into the ports?—It is very irregular indeed; sometimes you hardly have any, and in some years they come by thousands.

1628. When they come in by thousands you would require a very considerable bit of land to quarantine them?—Yes.

1629. Mr. Dent.] Would you apply your quarantine to Irish stock?—No.

1630. Do not you think (putting the rinderpest aside) that Irish stock are very nearly subject to as much complaint as foreign stock?—Not so subject. I should first of all place the foreign stock, next the Irish, and then the Scotch and English.

1631. All stock that have to travel, whether by railroad or sea, are subject to pleuro-pneumonia?—I think that the sea voyage is considerably worse than the railroad, I suppose on account of the bad ventilation.

1632. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Might not the very same thing that affects the Irish cattle affect the foreign cattle if they come across the sea. Might it not have the effect of producing pleuro-pneumonia in them as well as in the Irish cattle?—I should think they are liable to contract it from the confinement they undergo.

1633. You think the cattle that come across the sea, are more liable to pleuro-pneumonia than any others?—Yes, certainly.

1634. And therefore you put the Irish and the foreign together; both are likely to be affected by the sea voyage?—Yes; but the foreign cattle more so, from my experience of them, than the Irish.

1635. Is the sea passage longer?—The passage would be longer, certainly.

1636. The total amount of travelling would be more?—Much more, I think.

1637. Mr. Dent.] Do you think it necessary to establish quarantine for foreign store stock from countries that are clear of cattle plague, or would you only establish it for animals coming from where there was a suspicion of it?—We have no foreign stock that I know of which comes from any district that you might consider always free from cattle plague.

1638. A witness told us that in the South of Germany there was no disease; that the Belgian Government have lately sent a commission to inquire, and that they were going to allow the transit to be re-opened?—I believe the more railways are opened towards the south of Russia, and consequently through Germany, the more likely you are to have the cattle plague.

1639. From the south of Russia the cattle will come through Northern Germany?—Yes, but Hungary is hardly ever free from disease.

1640. Mr. Norwood.] You feel quite satisfied that we imported the rinderpest?—Yes, I have no doubt about it whatever.

1641. It appears to me that you have no objection to foreign cattle coming into the country; you would not do anything that would discourage importations without a strong benefit on the other hand?—Certainly not.

1642. As an agriculturist, you feel the necessity of foreign cattle coming in?—Yes, we quite agree that we cannot supply the country with meat now; we want to be protected if possible; we consider the importation of stock has done us a great deal of harm in both ways; first of all in taking away the market from us (although we do not object to that), and secondly, by introducing a number of diseases which considerably reduce our profits.

1643. You think that all lean cattle should be put in quarantine?—Yes.

1644. How long would you quarantine them?—I think they should be quarantined for 21 days; three weeks.

1645. Would there never be this difficulty; you could only quarantine them in fields or pastures, within the immediate neighbourhood of the port, because the county authorities would not permit foreign cattle to be removed into their district, and they would have to be quarantined at the place of importation. Supposing you had a lot of cattle from the Continent which developed a great amount of disease, would not the animals going into quarantine contaminate the place of quarantine in which they were placed, and make it dangerous to place a second lot of animals there?—I apprehend if you find a cargo diseased, you would slaughter them at once. I think it is highly necessary to have lairs, and quarantine, and markets, and slaughter-houses, at all the different ports at which foreign cattle are landed. Almost all of them come to four or five ports, the great majority of them; certainly I think not to more than six or eight.

1646. I am asking you these questions, having in my mind the port of Hull. Supposing the import 1,000 store cattle a week, how would you arrange for accommodation for keeping them in quarantine. Would it not be a very serious matter to quarantine 4,000 or 5,000 cattle?—Yes, it would, indeed. I have no idea that the cattle would come in those numbers. We generally get ours from Harwich. I have never known anything like that number come in a week.

C. S. Read, Esq., M.P.

1647. The trade is increasing very much, I think?—Not the trade in store cattle; I am not aware of it. I have had a good deal of experience in feeding those foreign store stock, and I really will not have any more of them. As to sheep, again, although they have grazed well, they are subject to scab, and other cutaneous diseases.

1648. Mr. Graham.] Have you ever seen a cargo of foreign cattle landed?—I have.

1649. Where?—I have seen some at Lowestoft, some at Harwich, and some at London.

1650. You thought that the ships were utterly inadequate for the accommodation of cattle?—I beg pardon, that was some time ago; I thought the Irish boats were not perfect as to cattle accommodation.

1651. Mr. Norwood.] You are not prepared to speak distinctly upon that?—Not now. I think the boats which now bring the foreign cattle are very good. They are built on purpose for the cattle trade, I believe.

1652. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Are you not aware there is a quarantine established on the Continent with regard to cattle supposed to be afflicted with any disorder?—I do not know that.

1653. We had it in evidence before the Committee two years ago, that there was a very close examination to prevent any infected animals coming in?—Yes, but that examination is very much broken through now; they have got railways, and they come straight away to the seaport.

1654. I do not think you would find a cattle train running through the Continent to any one of the ports of import of this country; do you know of such a thing?—We had it in evidence before the Cattle Plague Commissioners that they did come.

1655. Did you ever hear anybody of their own knowledge say that cattle came direct from Hungary to Rotterdam or Hamburg?—We heard a great deal of evidence before the Commission upon that, and the salesmen constantly tell me, when I go to the Metropolitan Market, that some of them are Hungarian cattle, and come straight from Hungary.

1656. Viscount Cranborne.] Is there any reason why store cattle should not come from Spain?—I have no idea why they should not come; the simple fact is that they do not.

1657. But supposing they were quarantined coming from Holland, and not quarantined coming from Spain, would not that stimulate the importation of store cattle from Spain?—It might; I have never seen any cattle from Spain, only those that are old and fat; I am not aware that they have a great quantity of store cattle to dispose of.

1658. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] We have it in evidence that the Spanish cattle are the finest cattle that come into the market?—They certainly are the finest cattle that come into the Metropolitan Market.

1659. After that the Frish?—Do you mean as regards size or quality?

1660. Both?—Yes, they are very fine cattle indeed; very large, and well grazed.

1661. Viscount Cranborne.] Have you ever tried to make any calculation of the increased price which would be demanded for cattle in consequence of the quarantine?—I should think they would be worth 1*l.* a head more to the person who buys them.

1662. How much less would they be worth to the person who sells them; how much additional expense in point of time and payment for feeding would it be to the person who sold them?—If I were a grazier of foreign store stock I should not at all mind paying for the quarantine if the animals were sound at the end of the quarantine.

1663. You do not think it would improve the demand in England at all?—I do not think it would.

Mr. HUNT, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. JOHN HÖNCK, called in; and Examined.

Mr. John Hönck.

10 May 1866.

1664. Chairman.] YOU are a Consignee of Foreign Cattle to the Port of London?—Yes.

1665. How long have you been engaged in that trade?—Sixteen years; since 1851.

1666. How many thousand cattle pass through your hands in the course of the year, on an average?—I should say, during the last few years, I have had, on an average, 20,000 head of cattle and from 50,000 to 70,000 sheep pass through my hands annually; all foreign cattle.

1667. Are you concerned in foreign cattle landed at any other port except London?—I receive them from Harwich, Thames Haven and direct to Blackwall. At present they are consigned to those two outports, Harwich and Thames Haven, and London direct. Occasionally we have them from Hull also, but that is only in few instances.

1668. When they come from Harwich, do they come to London, or do they come to the London market?—They come by train to London.

1669. The principal part of your trade is direct to London?—The principal part of our trade is direct to London.

1670. What foreign ports do you receive animals from?—We receive them from Denmark, from Schleswig and Holstein, from Hamburgh and all the north of Germany, from the Weser, from Holland, from Portugal, and Spain.

1671. But I ask you, what are the ports at which they are embarked?—Tonning is the principal port of shipment for the Schleswig Holstein cattle, then Hamburgh, Gestemunde on the Weser, Rotterdam, Harlingen, Vigo, and Oporto.

1672. Is your trade principally in store stock, or fat stock?—Almost exclusively fat stock.

1673. Most of the animals which you import at present go into the London market?—Most of them.

1674. Do you supply the markets of any other large town?—None, except in London.

1675. Do you import milch cows?—Not any.

1676. What is the condition in which animals arrive from these different countries; I mean, as to the way in which they are treated, and whether they suffer from their passage, and so on?—The vessels which are, in almost all instances, particularly adapted to the trade, generally bring them in very excellent condition, except in cases of very bad weather, in which, of course, they suffer.

1677. What is the average passage from Tonning?—The average passage from Tonning is about 48 hours.

1678. From Hamburg?—A few hours more on an average.

1679. From Oporto?—From Oporto, from three and a-half to four days.

1680. Are they carried in your own vessels?—We have two vessels in the cattle trade; they were built especially for the cattle trade, and we bring them over by them.

1681. And I suppose you freight other vessels of companies with cattle?—Vessels of various companies; only as consignee.

1682. Do you find that the cattle are well treated on board vessels belonging to other companies?—Yes; I should say that the arrangements are very excellent, with a few exceptions, of course. There are always a few steamers which are not so well adapted for the cattle trade as those which are specially built for it.

1683. Have you many losses, by reason of deaths on board, in coming?—In the autumn time we have had severe losses; in very stormy weather, during October and November; but otherwise not.

1684. Do the animals get damaged by being knocked about in stormy weather, or do they suffer from sickness?—No. Of course, in very bad weather, they would get knocked about a little, but if the boats are of the character which I have described they do not suffer so much; it is only in smaller vessels that they get knocked about much.

1685. The loss is from sickness in stormy weather?—No, I should say not.

1866. But you say that sometimes you have losses in stormy weather?—In very severe weather.

1687. What is that owing to?—That is owing to the badness of the weather.

1688. So that they get knocked about and injured, and suffer from sea-sickness?—Certainly, they get injured.

1689. From being knocked about?—Yes.

1690. Is that the case in your own vessels?—I should say not. Where the vessels have proper fittings there is not so much chance of their being knocked about. It is necessary that every vessel which is in the cattle-carrying trade, should have proper fittings.

1691. Then we arrive at this; that some of the vessels are not sufficiently adapted for carrying cattle in bad weather?—Certainly not. I should say that every vessel, which is in the cattle-carrying trade, ought to have proper fittings, and some of the vessels have not.

1692. Now, in all these vessels, are there provisions for feeding and watering the cattle during the voyage?—Yes; they are well cared for on the voyage, generally speaking.

1693. What are the different wharves at which they are landed in the port of London?—There are two wharves at Blackwall, and there is the Dublin wharf; they are the three principal wharves, 1694. Is that at Poplar?—No; the General Steam Navigation Company's wharf is at Poplar. Then there is the Brunswick wharf at Blackwall.

1695. And Brown's wharf?—That is what is called Brown's wharf; then, further up, is the Aberdeen wharf. There are comparatively few landed there. Next to Brown's wharf, at the Dublin wharf, the greatest quantity of cattle are landed; and there is also the General Steam Navigation Company's wharf, opposite St. Katherine's Docks.

1696. When the animals are landed, are they inspected?—They are always inspected.

1697. What place is there for use for that purpose?—They are inspected on the wharf directly they are landed. The veterinary surgeon is, generally speaking, in attendance.

1698. And they are not passed on until he has inspected them?—They are not passed on until he has inspected them. I think he is obliged to give a certificate with them before they can be removed.

1699. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Is that always so?—It has been so for the last two years.

1700. Chairman.] How long a time does he take to examine each animal before passing it?—The examination is very rigorous, and I should say, on an average, it took him a couple of hours to examine a full cargo of cattle.

1701. What do you call a full cargo of cattle?—About 300 or 400 head of cattle, and 500 or 600 sheep.

1702. That is nearly 1,000 head altogether?—Yes.

1703. That is at the rate of 500 head an hour?—Yes.

1704. Do you think that that examination is sufficient to detect disease?—I think so; perfectly. A practiced eye can very soon detect anything like sickness or illness, either in horned cattle or in sheep.

1705. The animals that are not passed are slaughtered at the port, are they not?—The animals that are not passed are slaughtered at the port; but, if you will allow me to state we have had this year very great inconvenience from the number of cattle that have been stopped from "eczena"; that is foot and mouth disease. The loss at one time to the owners was so great that they stopped sending altogether.

1706. Do you mean that they stopped sending cattle altogether, or stopped sending those which had the foot and mouth disease?—They stopped sending for one week altogether; we had hardly a foreign beast in the market.

1707. In what month was that?—To the best of my knowledge it was about six weeks ago.

1708. And after that the importation, I suppose, recommenced?—The high prices have tempted them again since.

1709. After they recommenced, did you find as many animals stopped from foot and mouth disease as before?—No; I do not think so many came of that description.

1710. The effect of the rigorous inspection was to prevent their sending over animals that had the foot and mouth disease?—It so happens sometimes that the animals may catch it on the journey.

1711. But the effect of the rigorous inspection was that when they sent the animals again you found not so many with the foot and mouth disease?—It so happened that there were not.

1712. That is a testimony to the good of the inspection, I suppose?—Oh, decidedly.

1713. Have you had many animals stopped as having rinderpest?—No; none whatever.

1714. Is there any inspection at any of the ports at which the animals are embarked?—There is an inspection now at every port where they are embarked.

1715. Is that a Government inspection, or an inspection on the part of the owners?—In Germany it is an inspection on the part of the owners; in Holland I believe it is enforced by the Government.

1716. The Government do not allow a diseased animal to be exported, is that so?—I think not; but I am not prepared to speak positively on that point.

1717. Do the animals come long railway journies on the Continent before they are put on board the vessels to come to London?—They do.

1718. Do you know whether they are fed and watered during these long journies?—Yes; the owners take every care of them, and there is a kind of half-way; when the cattle were brought through Holland, they always used to stop at Emmerich, that is one station.

1719. At Emmerich they are untrucked, we understand?—They are taken out of the trucks and fed there.

1720. Do you know of any place where they are fed without being untrucked in any continental country?—No; I do not.

1721. Do you think it possible to feed and water animals in the trucks?—I should think it quite possible to feed them.

1722. And to water them?—They could be watered with pails. It would be a good deal of additional trouble, but I do not see that it could not be done.

1723. Do you think that the animals would drink if a pail was put into the truck?—Decidedly.

1724. But you have never known it done?—No; I have not.

1725. Do you think it would be an advantage that they should be watered on long railway journies?—I should think the better they are cared for, the greater advantage it would be to the owners, decidedly.

1726. I suppose it is quite a chance what days the animals are landed at Blackwall?—They are principally landed on Saturday.

1727. For the London market on Monday?—For the London market on Monday; they are principally landed on Saturday and Sunday.

1728. What route do they take in going to the London market from Blackwall?—There is a regular route pointed out for them by the police regulations, and they must not deviate from that route.

1729. They go through the streets?—They go through the streets.

1730. Have

1730. Have there been many complaints on the part of the inhabitants of those streets?—I have heard that there have been complaints from the inhabitants of Poplar.

1731. There has been a memorial to some Government department on that subject, has there not?—I believe so.

1732. When they get to the London market and are bought for slaughter, what becomes of them; are they taken out to be slaughtered immediately for the most part, or do they go to lairs?—They mostly are taken by the buyers to their own slaughterhouses, and, with the exception of those that have to go into the country, they are slaughtered principally in private slaughterhouses.

1733. Are there many slaughterhouses adjacent to the London market?—There are three or four slaughterhouses which are built by the City.

1734. May they be used by anybody?—They are rented by certain private individuals.

1735. But not for the use of the public?—Yes, the public have access by an arrangement there.

1736. But it is not the practice for butchers to slaughter animals there, unless they happen to be the renters' of those places?—It is not; they drive them to their own slaughterhouses, because they invariably suffer loss if they do not. They like to have the offal and everything under their own eye. I have heard them say they would certainly give from 1*l.* to 1*l.* 10*s.* a head more for an ox, if they could slaughter it at their own slaughterhouse.

1737. Do they go to lairs before they are slaughtered, or are they not driven off straight away to the slaughterhouse as a rule?—They generally are driven to the lairs, and are taken out later. There are only certain hours during which they can drive them from the market, and if they do not get them away before eleven in the morning, they cannot get them away until five in the afternoon.

1738. They are driven to the lairs, and there kept until they are wanted to be slaughtered, and then they can be taken to the private slaughterhouses?—Yes.

1739. Are you acquainted with many of these private slaughterhouses?—I know some of them.

1740. Are they situated in populous parts of the town?—Many private butchers have their own slaughterhouses adjacent to their own premises, but invariably they have, also, at the market a slaughterhouse: for instance, in Whitechapel almost every butcher has his own slaughterhouse adjacent.

1741. I suppose it is rather a nuisance having these animals driven through the streets to the slaughterhouses?—There have been complaints about it, no doubt.

1742. You do not think it a good arrangement to have private slaughterhouses dotted about a populous town?—Well, I am hardly prepared to say that.

1743. Are you acquainted with the system in Paris?—Yes, I know the system in Paris.

1744. Can you tell us what the system is there?—They have abattoirs erected for the purpose of public slaughterhouses, but the slaughtering of cattle is not carried on there on nearly such a large scale as it is in London.

1745. By the law in force there, animals, I believe, cannot be killed in private slaughterhouses, can they?—I believe not.

1746. Do you think that having a public slaughterhouse ensures a better inspection, both of cattle and meat, than you can get where there are private slaughterhouses?—I do not think so.

1747. Do you think that an inspector can discharge his duty as efficiently if he has to go about to the different slaughterhouses, as if the slaughtering took place at one large public slaughterhouse?—I am not aware that there is an inspection; in fact, I know no inspection takes place after the butcher has once removed his cattle from the live market.

1748. I was alluding to the inspection of the meat; there are in London inspectors to inspect the meat?—There are in the meat markets.

1749. Could not the inspector discharge his duty more efficiently, if he could see the carcass of the animal before it is removed to the different shops and to the public slaughter-houses?—There is no doubt if an inspection of the dead meat was made absolute, that he would have that opportunity.

1750. Would you give us your opinion as to whether animals should be slaughtered at the port of London without going to Copenhagen Fields?—I do not think they could, without entailing a great loss to the owners, and without upsetting every arrangement.

1751. It would disturb existing arrangements?—It would entirely.

1752. But what would be the difficulty of having a place down the river, where animals could be slaughtered?—In the first place there would be a ruinous loss to the owners of at least 3*l.* to 4*l.* per head through the present system being upset, and persons not being always in attendance to go and buy cattle there; so much so, that I am quite persuaded it would not work.

1753. I wish to know how you make out that loss; will you give us the details of that?—People are not there to superintend their own property, and we have had it shown that in many instances a great deal of the offal has been, if I may so, taken away; it has been stolen.

1754. I am supposing that there was a permanent slaughter-house established somewhere near the port of London by the river side, for the slaughter of all imported animals; do not you think that would draw down all the people in the trade to that particular place?—I do not think it would.

1755. Do you think that if animals were obliged to be slaughtered at the port, the foreign trade would cease?—I do not say it would cease altogether, but it would make a very great difference in the price of meat, and no doubt if the price of meat were so enhanced, then they would make an effort to bring them, but it certainly would cause a great enhancement in the price of meat to the consumers.

1756. Why do you think the price of meat would be enhanced?—Because there necessarily would be a great deal of extra expense entailed upon the cattle so brought into consumption.

1757. I wish you would go into particulars about that, and tell us how?—We have it from experience that there is a loss upon every bullock which is slaughtered at the water side at present.

1758. But then your experience is in exceptional cases, where the bulk of your animals go to the London market, and the few that are rejected and not passed by the inspectors, are slaughtered by the water side; but I am putting the case of the the animals being received at the London market, and the whole of the animals being slaughtered there?—It would stop the importation for a time, that is quite certain; I do not think that foreigners would submit to it.

Mr. John Hönck.

1759. We have had evidence from Harwich that it would make no difference to the foreign trade if animals landed at Harwich were to be slaughtered there. If that is true, what is the difference between Harwich and London in regard to that matter?—I have had one experience, last autumn, of going down to Harwich, and I soon found out that the butchers who came there wanted to have them at 4 l. a head less, and I was actually obliged to take a butcher down from London to buy them. I told Mr. Moseley that I should, in either case, have to bring a claim against him of 3 l. a head from that very circumstance.

1760. Which he laughed at, I suppose?—He did not quite fancy it; we have not quite settled the matter yet.

1761. You do not expect to get it, I suppose?—I do.

1762. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Have you sent in the claim?—No. I am about sending in the claim now.

1763. How long ago was this?—About two months ago.

1764. Chairman.] Supposing that such a system was established, or some means could be devised for converting the offal to the purpose for which it was used at the same spot; if such a system was established of slaughtering all animals brought to the port of London, means could be devised for converting the different kinds of offal to the use to which they are severally put at that spot?—There is no doubt that the evil could be removed.

1765. And it could be turned to better account than if it was to be carted away from the places where the animals are slaughtered now?—No; the butchers like to have the offal under their own control.

1766. When an animal is slaughtered at a private slaughter-house in London, what becomes of the hide?—The buyer sends it to his own skin salesman.

1767. And the skin salesman takes it to the tan pit, at Bermondsey, or to the railway stations?—To Leadenhall market.

1768. Then it has to go again out of London, in order to be converted, has it not?—Not necessarily so. We have a great many tanners in Bermondsey.

1769. It has to be carted away to Bermondsey, or else to be sent down into the country?—Precisely.

1770. I suppose there is a considerable expense occasioned by removing the hide?—I should say the expense is not much. There is a regular system by which they collect all the hides.

1771. But that is not done without expense?—It is not done without expense, certainly.

1772. I suppose it is the same with the horns?—Yes; they are left with the hides.

1773. The same with the hoofs?—Yes.

1774. The same with the blood. The blood is largely used in manure, is it not?—Yes.

1775. I suppose it has to leave the populous haunts in which the animal is killed to be converted into blood manure?—They do not make use of the blood except in large quantities. The large contractors sell the blood wholesale.

1776. That has to be removed from these slaughter-houses?—Yes.

1777. Everything that goes to the slaughter-house alive has to be carted away dead. All the offal has to be carted away to the different parts of the town to the blood-manure manufacturers, and so forth?—Such things as hides, certainly.

1778. Supposing you could find a place near the river side where you could slaughter the animals, and where there was space for this manure manufacture, and so forth, it would be a very great saving with regard to the removal of the offal, would it not?—I think the expense of the removal of the offal is so very trifling that it would not be a consideration.

1779. Perhaps you have not gone into the question?—Well, I cannot say I have made a calculation; but I have certainly an idea of my own as to what it is, and I think it would be very trifling.

1780. Supposing there was a direct railway communication from your slaughtering places at the port of London to the London central dead meat market, proposed to be erected at Smithfield, a great deal of the evil you anticipate would be removed?—No, I do not think it would remove the evil.

1781. If you could run carcasses straight from the places where they were slaughtered by the river side to the central market at Smithfield which it is proposed to erect, I suppose the dead meat purchasers would congregate there?—Any arrangement which would upset the present system would be very detrimental, and, I consider, almost tantamount to stopping.

1782. You think the present system is perfect, and cannot be improved?—With regard to the foreign cattle.

1783. I believe you do not import store cattle in numbers?—No, we have a few store cattle at times.

1784. Are you aware that there are great complaints made of different diseases coming in by means of foreign cattle?—I have heard complaints, but I do not believe there has ever been any proof of it.

1785. Do you believe that every disease we have suffered, from pleuro-pneumonia, foot and mouth disease, and rinderpest, are all indigenous?—I do not go so far as that, but I certainly say there has been no proof that any disease has been brought here from abroad by the foreign cattle; I am speaking of the rinderpest.

1786. I am speaking of the other diseases; do you think the foot and mouth disease was brought from abroad?—That I am not prepared to say.

1787. You are not prepared to deny it?—No.

1788. You are not prepared to give your opinion to the contrary?—I am not.

1789. What do you say as to lung disease?—We have scarcely any cases of lung disease on the Continent now; it is much more prevalent in England.

1790. Do you think it was originally brought from the Continent?—I am not prepared to state that.

1791. Do you think it was not brought from the Continent?—I do; I think it was not brought from the Continent.

1792. Do you think that is the general opinion of cattle owners in this country?—I am not prepared to say that, but I believe it is the general opinion of all persons connected with the foreign cattle trade.

1793. Do you think it is the general opinion of professional men in England?—I do not think it is the opinion of professional men.

1794. Nor of cattle owners?—I have heard many cattle owners say, that they do not believe it was imported from abroad; I have heard English cattle owners and dealers say that.

1795. But you think the general opinion of the cattle owners is, that it did come from abroad?—I believe it is the opinion of the professional men that it came from abroad.

1796. But that it is the opinion of the whole of the persons connected with the foreign trade in cattle, that it did not come from abroad?—Yes; I am quite sure of it, and also of many English cattle owners.

1797. Mr. Banks Stanhope.] Do they always go through the streets from Brown's Wharf up to Islington?—Yes.

1798. Do they never go by Bow?—Yes, they do.

1799. Bow is rather outside London; is it not?—It is just on the borders of Essex.

1800. Do they ever stop at Bow on their way?—Do you mean for the purpose of being laired?

1801. Yes?—Certainly they do.

1802. Is that in open fields?—Yes.

1803. Have they any grass fields near them?—No; the fields there are only used for the purpose of lairing cattle.

1804. But have they any grass fields near those fields?—The grass fields are used for the purpose of lairing the cattle, generally speaking.

1805. What are the adjacent fields to them?—There are very few fields in that district.

1806. Are all the fields used for the purpose of lairing cattle?—What few there are in the neighbourhood.

1807. To whom does the Dublin Wharf belong?—I believe it belongs to Mr. Hartley.

1808. You said you principally imported fat stock?—Yes; I am a consignee of fat stock.

1809. And you know Brown's Wharf?—I do.

1810. To whom does Brown's Wharf belong?—It belongs to the General Steam Navigation Company.

1811. How do the Dutch cows come there?—The General Steam Navigation Company land most of their cattle which they bring from Germany and Holland, and various parts of the Continent there.

1812. I wish to know if Dutch cows come to Brown's Wharf?—They may be imported there.

1813. Do they come in a vessel by themselves?—No, they do not; they are mixed up with fat stock.

1814. You say the inspection is very good there?—I do.

1815. I am now going two months back. Supposing any fat beast happened to be stopped for any disease which happened to the cows that came over in the same vessel with them, what would be done?—The cows are taken to whoever will buy them. They used to go to the Metropolitan Cattle Market.

1816. Therefore, if the fat animal was diseased and stopped by the inspector, and killed at the wharf, the cattle coming over in the same vessel were allowed to go on?—Until lately, if there was any single head of cattle suffering with the foot and mouth disease, the whole cargo used to be stopped; but the Custom House authorities thought those regulations so strict, and, in fact, so unjust, when the foot and mouth complaint in this country was so prevalent, that they made the exception, and allowed the animals which were not suffering with the foot and mouth disease to go away.

1817. Supposing any animals were to be stopped with the rinderpest, am I rightly informed that all cows that came over with those animals were allowed to go on?—If there was one animal with the rinderpest I would guarantee to say the inspector would have stopped the whole lot.

1818. Go back to the month of February; was that the case then?—I am not aware that there was a single case of rinderpest detected at the water side, otherwise they would have been stopped.

1819. Now, as to sheep; supposing any beasts are brought over diseased, and there are sheep on board with them, what happens to the sheep?—The sheep would be passed, supposing the sheep were sound.

1820. Supposing a beast was killed having the rinderpest, three months back, what happened to sheep which came over in the same hold with it?—I believe there were a lot of sheep stopped at Harwich.

1821. I am talking about Brown's Wharf, as you know perfectly well?—I am not aware that there has been such a case at all.

1822. Am I to understand that no animal was stopped at Brown's Wharf with the rinderpest?—Not that I am aware of.

1823. Did not the English Government, some six weeks ago, stop the importation from Dutch wharves?—They did.

1824. Did they not give, as a reason, that the cows which came in with the diseased animals were admitted into London?—Yes; if it be the case that those were suffering from the rinderpest, there is no doubt that either it must have been incubated in the system, and brought out after removal from the wharves, or that they must have caught it in the places to which they had been removed.

1825. Then you think it quite possible that an animal should be passed as apparently sound, and then that it should afterwards become (as you call it) incubated on its way up to the place to which it is sold?—Yes; it may be so.

1826. There is one thing I wished to ask, namely, why this enormous loss should happen to an owner of an animal when killed on the banks of the Thames?—At present we have found, from experience, that it is so, because of the extra expense and trouble; and the peculation, that is going on, frightens every buyer, and the meat is not so good; the meat does not look so well as if they can take the animal home to their own slaughter-houses and have it killed, and therefore it creates a loss of some few pence per stone.

1827. Then you mean it is from deficient arrangements that there is peculation and a deficient accommodation for slaughtering?—From the deficient arrangements, and the fact that the persons have not got their property under their own control.

1828. Am I to assume this, that the person who hires these slaughter-houses, at Islington, suffers a loss in comparison with the man who kills at his own slaughter-house?—Undoubtedly they suffer a loss through having the cattle killed at the water-side.

1829. Will you answer my question. I ask whether whether I am to understand that these men, who hire those public slaughter-houses at Islington, suffer a loss of some pence a stone, in comparison with those who slaughter in their own slaughter-houses in the City, or elsewhere?—I cannot say that they do not suffer any loss.

1830. Then a person may slaughter with the same advantage, in a public slaughter-house, as he may in his own slaughter-house at home; am I to understand that?—No, I think not.

1831. Does he suffer a loss?—The butcher suffers a loss through not having his property under his own control. They always object to slaughter at public slaughterhouses when they have an opportunity of taking them home to their own places.

1832. I understand a certain number of butchers hire slaughter-houses at Islington Market?—Yes; a few of the largest wholesale butchers.

1833. Has it been their custom to do so, year by year?—It has, since the market has been in existence.

1834. Do you suppose that they suffer a loss by killing at Islington, instead of killing at the slaughter-houses close to their own shops?—I should say so.

1835. Then may I ask why, if there were proper slaughter-houses, and a proper system, on the banks of the Thames, similar butchers would suffer a loss there more than they do at Islington?—It is the general opinion that they would do so.

1836. I ask you, if you can give me any reason why they would?—From the deficiency of arrangements.

1837. I know your arrangements at Brown's wharf are very bad, for I have seen them. I am asking if there were proper arrangements, and similar slaughter-houses, as there are at Islington, why a butcher should lose more on the banks of the Thames than he does at Islington?—I do not suppose the butchers would lose any more, but the importers would lose; the loss would fall on the importers.

1838. If a butcher does not lose, why should an importer lose?—Because there is not the competition for buying the cattle. The competition for buying the cattle would vanish at once. When they are brought to a certain known market, we have plenty of competition among the butchers, but if you do away with competition the price at once becomes nominal.

1839. Supposing there was a market on the banks of the Thames for live cattle to be exhibited, with slaughter-houses in which to kill them, would you not have the same amount of competition as you now have at Islington?—I do not think you would, because you would divide the markets, and it would leave a certain quantity of buyers to go to an English market, and another portion of them to go to a foreign market.

1840. Supposing you had a foreign cattle market on another day from the English market, why should you not have the same amount of competition as you do for your foreign cattle at Islington?—A division of markets is always bad, it cripples the trade; that is my impression.

1841. I believe at present, and during the last month also, the live cattle has been almost an entirely foreign market at Islington?—During the time the traffic by railway was stopped.

1842. May I ask what part of London the butchers who buy the foreign cattle principally live in?—They are principally the wholesale buyers and contractors who live in Whitechapel Market and Newgate Market.

1843. Is Whitechapel Market nearest to Islington, or to the banks of the Thames?—It is nearer to the banks of the Thames I should say.

1843*. Then I understand at present, an animal goes up to Islington, comes down again to Whitechapel, and goes up five or six miles to Islington again, is it not so?—No; the cattle that are landed at Blackwall do not come to Whitechapel at all.

1844. They go to Islington?—Yes.

1845. The Whitechapel butcher buys them, does he not?—Yes, frequently.

1846. You said that they were principally bought by contractors, who live at Whitechapel?—The wholesale butchers of Whitechapel, Leadenhall, and Newgate Markets.

1847. Then the animal goes up to Islington and comes all the way back again to Whitechapel?—Certainly, they go to the meat markets.

1848. Would it not be more convenient for the butcher who lives in Whitechapel, to buy his animal in a live meat market on the banks of the Thames, kill it there, and take the carcass on by rail?—That I am not prepared to state.

1849. Are you prepared to state it would not be so?—I am not.

1850. I think I understand you, the Government contractors are the principal people who buy foreign stock?—A great many of them are sold to Government contractors.

1851. Do they supply Woolwich?—Woolwich is a small contract; it affects a very small portion of the contract.

1852. Deptford?—Deptford is not a permanent contract.

1853. But they would supply Deptford as one?—Yes.

1854. They would supply Woolwich as another?—Yes.

1855. Chatham, as another?—Certainly.

1856. Therefore all this meat would go to the south side of the river?—Certainly it would.

1857. Now, supposing that is the case, would it not be more convenient to get your animal on the banks of the Thames, kill it there, and take your meat at once?—It would be more convenient perhaps for the supply of those three particular contracts; but they only form a very small portion of the Government contracts in England.

1858. Now we will go through the foreign meat market: I understand there is a great portion taken by these contractors?—There is.

1859. A great portion is taken by the Whitechapel and Leadenhall butchers?—When I say a great portion, I suppose 400 or 500 a week are taken by the contractors.

1860. Out of what number?—Out of something like 2,000 or 3,000.

1861. What sort of number would a Whitechapel butcher take?—That depends quite upon circumstances; but I should say, on an average, they take 400 or 500 a week.

1862. And Leadenhall and Newgate?—A similar quantity.

1863. Who are the butchers who supply the population near the docks with meat; where do they live?—They live at the east end of London; the whole district from Whitechapel to the Victoria Docks.

1864. Do not they principally buy foreign meat for that population?—I believe they buy their meat principally at Whitechapel and Leadenhall markets. They buy it principally dead at these meat markets.

1865. Is it not, to a great degree, foreign meat which they buy?—I have no doubt a great quantity of it is.

1866. Would not all those butchers who live near the Victoria Docks buy more easily at the banks of the Thames than they would by having to go a greater distance from it?—Those who are in the habit of buying their meat at the dead meat market, and do not come as customers to the live market, invariably attend the dead meat markets only.

1867. What becomes of the rest of the foreign animals; we have only got 1,200 out of 3,000 yet?—They are distributed about London in different places.

1868. But are not the great majority of the foreign cattle consumed near the banks of the Thames?— No; they are consumed in all parts of London.

1869. But about half are consumed either by the contractors or on the banks of the Thames?—Yes; about one-half.

1870. Mr. Edward Egerton.] I do not think you have described what the course is yet; you say you are a consignee of foreign cattle?—Yes.

1871. Do the butchers come down and buy of you from the ships?—No; we bring the cattle to the Metropolitan Market, and they come there and buy them.

1872. Will you give me some idea as to the relative price of the foreign meat, compared with the English?—Invariably the difference of price is ½ d. per pound in favour of the English.

1873. Lord Naas.] Does that include Spanish beasts?—Yes, it includes Spanish beasts; but we have had instances where they have been very fine; where they make quite as much as English cattle.

1874. Mr. Edward Egerton.] I am excluding Spanish beasts; but, as a general rule, are the foreign beasts as good as the English?—I should say they are not so young, as a rule; they keep them longer, and always, in consequence, lose the prime of the meat.

1875. You have told the Chairman that the inspector stopped animals when there happened to be any one of the cargo infected; what became of those animals that were stopped?—They were slaughtered at the wharf, and then there is an examination after they have been killed.

1876. Have the inspectors a power of ordering all those animals to be slaughtered at once?—Certainly.

1877. Can you tell me an instance where any number of animals have been so slaughtered by the order of the inspector?—I have known cases myself where cargoes have been stopped which have lost as much to the owners as 5*l.* per head; 200 at a time through that very circumstance.

1878. Do you know what became of that meat?—That meat was obliged to be brought to the meat market, and there it was invariably sold at a ruinous price, from the fact stated before.

1879. Was there nothing to show that that was the meat of animals that had been slaughtered from infection?—Nothing.

1880. So that it had a chance of going to the market as sound meat with only the difference that there was the low price fixed for it?—The meat is always inspected by the inspector after the cattle are slaughtered at the market.

1881. Would it be possible for any inspector, after the animal had been slaughtered, to discover whether the meat was the meat of a sound or unsound animal?—Yes, certainly.

1882. Do you think that any inspector, on a view of it, would be able to detect at once whether it was sound or unsound?—I should think a practised eye certainly could.

1883. What class of men are these inspectors generally?—The inspector who inspects these cattle now is as competent a man as any in the United Kingdom.

1884. Was he brought up as a veterinary surgeon?—Yes.

1885. Have they all been brought up as veterinary surgeons?—Yes, certainly. I should say the London inspectors are as competent men as any you could find in the kingdom.

1886. Is there any previous course of study before these men are employed as inspectors?—Yes.

1887. Are you sure of that; do they pass an examination?—Yes, as veterinary surgeons.

1888. Do they all hold any diploma?—I am only speaking of the two we have in London; I know they do.

1889. You have mentioned four wharves; do these two inspectors look after these four wharves you have named?—They do.

1890. You told us that from 2,000 to 3,000 animals pass through your hands in the course of a week, and you now state there are two inspectors; are there only two inspectors for passing the whole of the foreign cattle which pass through your hands?—At these wharves there are only two inspectors.

1891. The whole of these 2,000 or 3,000 animals come to these wharves, do they not?—Yes; but they arrive on various days; they do not all arrive on the same day.

1892. If they did, it would be utterly impossible for any two inspectors to examine the number; what is the largest number you have ever known to come on any one day?—About 1,500.

1893. You say that six weeks ago there was a great quantity of cattle with foot and mouth disease; were any of those animals killed?—They were all killed.

1894. Were there any means of detecting after death, or any sign by which was denoted the presence of the foot and mouth disease?—The foot and mouth disease does not affect the flesh of the animals.

1895. Pleuro pneumonia does very much?—Not in the earlier stage.

1896. Is not the lung generally destroyed in cases of pleuro pneumonia?—That is only in the more severe and advanced stages.

1897. Did you ever see any case of pleuro pneumonia where the lung was not affected to a considerable extent?—I have seen very slight cases of pleuro pneumonia.

1898. The Chairman asked you a great many questions about slaughtering animals on the banks of the Thames; are there any public places where animals could be slaughtered now?—At the present moment there is no accommodation at all.

1899. Chairman.] They slaughter 20 or 30 beasts in the shed at the wharf, do they not?—At one slaughterhouse they can slaughter 40.

1900. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Is that shed the property of a private individual, or does it belong to the company?—It belongs to the company.

Mr. John Hönck.

1901. The two companies you have named are the General Steam Navigation and the Dublin?—Yes.

1902. Is their charge the same?—They charge for slaughtering cattle at the wharf.

1903. You seem yourself to have a very great objection to slaughtering these animals; is that by reason of any increased expense?—By reason of the very bad experience I have had of it.

1904. How have you found that experience to be bad; what is the difference between slaughtering an animal on the banks of the Thames and slaughtering it at Islington?—We cannot get the men down to buy them of us.

1905. Then it is the disinclination on the part of the trade to come to the water's edge?—Certainly.

1906. Would they not have a better opportunity of inspecting the animals there as they come out of the vessel?—No, they never can have a better opportunity than in a public market.

1907. Do not you find in your trade, as in every other, that habit is everything; after it is done for a month, will they not be willing to come down to the water's edge?—We have been obliged to have cattle killed for the last four or five years, to my knowledge, and the system does not seem to me to improve; the buyers are not more numerous than when we first began.

1908. You say at one time the foreigners did not send any cattle there; did you then try to deal in English cattle, and make another market in that way?—No, I did not.

1909. Sir M. W. Ridley.] To revert for a moment to this question of the boats; it seems that certain cattle are consigned to you in the boats of the General Steam Navigation Company and another company, and that other cattle are consigned to you in certain other boats; now, are the animals imported in the better boats of more value than those which come in vessels not so well adapted for the purpose?—In case of fine weather it would make no difference, but in case of bad weather the result would be that the butchers, if they had any idea that they came by a vessel where they would be bruised, would fight very shy of buying them.

1910. What proportion of the foreign cattle consigned to you, which are very numerous, come over in these inferior boats, which are not so suited to the purpose?—That I cannot say. It is only occasionally that those boats are made use of; and I was only mentioning that every boat which is carrying cattle ought to have suitable fittings for the purpose of carrying them.

1911. In saying that, is it your opinion that the general shipping trade or companies associated, as the Steam Navigation Company is, for the importation of cattle, will provide proper vessels without the regulation or inspection of Government?—I have no doubt of it. That would be to their own interest, because if they did not provide proper vessels, they would not get the cattle to carry.

1912. Now, go a little further; is it your opinion that it would be desirable that no vessel should be allowed to import cattle other than those licensed and surveyed under the regulations of Government so as to preclude the market from being supplied, and to save you from being supplied with animals which, you say, are frequently, in bad weather, damaged on the passage?—I should say that it would be a very good plan, and I believe there is a system of inspection already by the Government.

1913. I am afraid that is not a rule?—I have heard of the Government inspectors coming down to inspect the various cattle vessels at Blackwall; I know, for a fact, they have inspected our own.

1914. Do you know that it is required by the Government, or do you know that there are officers appointed to see, and required to see, to the construction and adaptation of the vessels for the foreign cattle carrying trade?—No; I do not know that it is absolutely law and compulsory.

1915. Are you acquainted with the manner in which hides are exposed, and the horns cut off, at a shed immediately adjoining the present Leadenhall Market?—I am.

1916. What is your opinion of the arrangements adopted there as to that particular matter of the hides?—I have no doubt that the arrangements adopted there are such as at present suit the trade.

1917. Do you think it a system which can be advantageous to the public, and that it is not connected with very great danger to the public health?—I am not aware that it is at all dangerous to the public.

1918. Have you frequently been there?—I have been there on several occasions.

1919. You have been at the shed during the time that the hides have been laid out and the horns cut off with an axe, and the people there at work?—Yes; it is not a very inviting place.

1920. Have you not been very much oppressed with the most extraordinary and disagreeable effluvium which takes place in the midst of a very large population on that spot?—There is no doubt of it.

1921. Have you chanced to pass there in the last autumn during the prevalence of the rinderpest and the disease in animals in London?—Yes; I have been there.

1922. Were you struck with the effluvium being worse at that time than ever it was before?—No; I cannot say that I noticed it particularly.

1923. You told us you thought the cattle on debarcation were sufficiently inspected; do you consider two hours sufficient for the inspection of a thorough cargo, consisting, I think you said, of from 300 to 400 beasts, and from 500 to 600 sheep?—I do, provided the inspector is a competent man.

1924. I am assuming that the inspector is a competent man; in the inspection of these animals, does he examine their mouths?—Yes.

1925. And as regards those sheep; are the sheep turned up to see whether they are healthy, or to see whether they are scabbed or not?—Yes, they are all turned up.

1926. Have you ever known an instance, in any of these vessels, of the General Steam Navigation Company overladen and bringing too heavy a cargo, and damage arising from it?—I have not.

1927. Lord Naas.] Do the cattle suffer in hot weather, in the holds of the vessels?—Yes, they do; unless they are properly ventilated.

1928. Have you any idea what the temperature of the hold of a vessel, bringing over cattle in the usual summer weather, is?—I have not; but I know the temperature is so oppressive, that, without without proper ventilation is given in these vessels, it is scarcely possible for a human being, in the heat, to go down below.

1929. Do not the animals, coming out of this very high temperature, appear very much exhausted?—Yes, they would do so, but the vessels regularly adapted for the trade have proper ventilation, and therefore it is not so much the case with them.

1930. Have you any idea what the temperature would be on a very hot day in summer, the thermometer standing, say, at 75 degrees; do you know what the temperature would be in the hold of one of the best vessels, under those circumstances?—No, I cannot say as to that.

1931. When are those cattle inspected?—They are inspected on being landed.

1932. Immediately on being landed?—Immediately after being landed.

1933. Do you think, when the beasts are taken out of the hold of a vessel, after having been subjected for many hours to that very hot atmosphere, that they are in so natural a state that even the most skilful can detect disease or unhealthiness?—I do, invariably.

1934. And you think, that subjecting the beasts, for so many hours, to such a hot atmosphere, has, in fact, no serious effect on their general appearance or state?—I do. We have not found it to be so in well adapted vessels.

1935. I am not speaking of beasts that have been knocked about, but of beasts that have been subjected to the heat of these holds?—The vessels which have been employed in the cattle trade are nearly all of them properly ventilated; those, at any rate, which serve regularly in the cattle trade, and I should say this is one of the greatest objects which shipowners have to provide for; proper ventilation in cattle ships.

1936. You stated to Sir Matthew Ridley that every beast's mouth is examined, and the sheep turned up; how could that process be conducted when you say that very often a thousand head of cattle and sheep are passed in two hours?—The inspector has an assistant. There are invariably two or three of the drovers to mouth these cattle.

1937. You do not wish the Committee to understand the inspector personally inspects every one of these beasts?—He inspects them himself, but the drovers or assistants open the mouths of the cattle, so that he may get on with the inspection.

1938. You think a thousand head of cattle and sheep can be inspected in that way in two hours by one man?—I do.

1939. Without a chance of an unhealthy beast being passed by?—I should think so.

1940. That is your opinion, is it?—It is.

1941. Have you known cases of cargoes of beasts being passed over, and disease afterwards detected amongst them?—No; I have not known any cases, with the exception of the cows which were bought by Earl Granville's steward.

1942. Speaking generally, are you of opinion that it is almost impossible that a case of pleuro-pneumonia, or of foot and mouth disease, or of rinderpest, could escape the cognisance of these inspectors?—I am.

1943. Do you believe that?—I do; I had a case last Saturday where the inspector at once detected an animal which was suffering from pleuro-pneumonia, and which was the only one amongst a cargo.

1944. You state that the butcher would give from 1*l.* to 30*s.* more for the beasts they could kill at their own slaughter-house, than for the beasts they would be obliged to kill elsewhere?—Yes.

1945. Is that your opinion?—I have heard them give testimony to that effect; they have told me so.

1946. Do not these butchers buy a great quantity of dead meat?—Yes, they buy a certain quantity for their consumption.

1947. Do they give from 1*l.* to 30*s.* less for the dead meat they buy, than for the beasts they kill at their own slaughter-house?—I should say that they buy the dead meat invariably on better terms.

1948. On better terms?—I should say so.

1949. Then, in fact, they get it cheaper?—Yes, that is the case.

1950. They give less for the live beasts than they do for the dead beasts?—The meat which they buy, as dead, does not come up in such a good state, and therefore they must have a certain quantity of live cattle to make their shop look nice.

1951. But is that so; some of the very primest meat that is sold in London arrives from Scotland daily?—I am aware of that; the Scotch meat invariably fetches a very high price.

1952. Does it not look as well as the meat which is killed in London?—It does not look so well, but it invariably fetches a higher price.

1953. What advantage to the butcher is it by killing at his own slaughter-house, if he can get a higher price for meat which is killed in Scotland; how can you reconcile these two things?—The supply of dead meat is irregular, and sometimes it happens that if he goes to a dead meat market he has to pay an enormous price, whereas, at other times, when there is a glut in the market, he can buy the dead meat very cheap.

1954. I am not talking of the dead meat being cheap or dear, but I am talking of the relative value of meat killed out of London, and meat killed in slaughter-houses?—Will you permit me to say that, with the live cattle which they buy, they regulate the supply; and, supposing we had no supply but the dead meat, it would cause the greatest irregularity in the supply of London that could possibly be imagined. In my opinion it would have the effect, that sometimes there would be such a glut of meat brought into London that it would be impossible for it all to be consumed, and at other times London would be without meat.

1955. Then you wish the Committee to understand that the butcher will give more for the live meat, because he will be able to keep it or kill it at his convenience, and not with reference to the quality of the meat?—Precisely.

1956. Sir Matthew Ridley.] Do you have any Scotch cattle come to your wharf?—The Scotch cattle are landed at the Aberdeen wharf.

1957. Then you do not know anything about the condition in which they arrive by the steamers?—I believe they arrive in tolerably good condition.

1958. And that the boats by which they come are well fitted for that trade?—I believe so.

1959. Do you know what difference there is in the price of sending them by sea or by rail from Scotland?—I believe that the price is pretty much much the same. It does not vary much, either by one route or the other.

Mr. John Hönck.

1960. Have you heard in what way they are considered to come in the best condition?—People generally prefer sending them by railway, I believe, and not subjecting them to the sea voyage.

1961. Mr. Graham.] You said the advantage to a butcher of getting his meat in a live state was that he could keep it until it was wanted?—Yes.

1962. Is it not the case that by keeping a beast after landing from one of these hot steamers for a day or two the condition of the meat will be improved very much?—Yes.

1963. So that there is an advantage not only in keeping it until it is wanted, but in having the meat in a better condition?—Precisely.

1964. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Is there any bill of lading sent with the cattle that come over?—Yes.

1965. Then, if any animal dies of disease on the passage, is it thrown overboard, or kept till it is landed?—That is a case which has not occurred during my experience, where they die they generally die from stress of weather.

1966. They never die from disease?—I never heard of a case.

1967. You spoke of the inspection of meat in France; do you consider the inspection of dead meat in France more stringent and severe than it is in England?—I do not.

1968. Are you aware that it is the custom in France to stamp every piece of meat that comes into the public market; it is so in some parts of France; is it so in Paris?—I do not think it is so in Paris.

1969. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Do you know the custom of Paris?—I have noticed the way in which the meat is sold there.

1970. They have a large cattle market near Paris?—They have two, Poissy and Sceame markets.

1971. One on each side of Paris?—Yes.

1972. How far is Poissy from the abattoir?—Poissy is about 12 miles from Paris.

1973. Would that be two or three leagues from the abattoir?—Yes.

1974. I heard some evidence given about the foreign meat; you say that some part of it is a halfpenny cheaper than our English meat?—Yes, on an average, I should say it is so.

1975. Has there not been some importation recently of cattle from France?—Yes, there has, a very large importation.

1976. What has been the quality of the meat?—Exceedingly fine.

1977. As good as the English meat?—Yes; they have imported splendid cattle from France during the last three months.

1978. Have they come from Boulogne?—From Boulogne and Havre.

1979. Have the cattle been brought from Havre to London by boat?—Yes, from both places.

1980. From Boulogne they come up to London by the Steam Navigation boats?—Precisely.

1981. You do not know anything about the Newhaven trade, I suppose?—I do not; I think that is stopped.

1982. With regard to some other boats which brought cattle, you said there was not sufficient accommodation; is it a common occurrence that cattle are brought by boats which are not properly constructed for the cattle trade?—It is not a common occurrence, it is only in cases where boats are at certain out-ports, and for the sake of getting freight, they take cattle home, and are not properly fitted.

1983. Do you mean that as to London?—It may be so; we have had it occur.

1984. We want to know the fact; is not the main cattle trade carried on between the continent and London by boats constructed for that purpose?—Most decidedly so.

1985. When cattle are brought in boats not fitted for the purpose, it is more by chance than anything else?—It is.

1986. The cattle brought in these boats, I suppose, are brought on deck?—They are brought on deck, and under deck also.

1987. When they are brought by boats of that kind under deck they are brought by a boat that has not proper fittings, I presume?—The fittings I am speaking of are all under deck. By fittings, I mean proper divisions to carry the cattle so that in case of bad weather they do not pitch about in the vessel.

1988. I am afraid I have not made myself understood; the boats in the cattle trade have fittings for the purpose of carrying cattle on the deck?—They have.

1989. I am now speaking of the boats which do not carry cattle regularly; do those boats when they carry cattle, ever bring them on deck or under deck?—That would be a matter of chance, no doubt; no doubt they would bring them under deck if they had room under deck.

1990. Do they?—I have heard of such cases.

1991. You do not know of it of your own knowledge?—I have heard they did so last autumn.

1992. I suppose, if there was a large trade carried on in that way, you would know of it?—There is not a large trade carried on in that way. Those cases always are exceptional.

1993. Is there not a great desire on the part of those who send cattle over, as well as purchasers, that they should be able to do it at some open market?—Precisely.

1994. And that a market of some kind or other, whatever it may be, whether at London or elsewhere, must be a large market, where buyers and sellers can meet?—Undoubtedly. By the competition that is created in the public market, the trade is kept on a proper level, and carried on to the satisfaction of all parties concerned.

1995. And buyers are reluctant to go to small places?—They are. The fact is, that frequently they could not get what they wanted.

1996. Then it would be a loss to them, of course?—Certainly.

1997. Besides which, there being no regular standard by which they could judge how other people buy, they would be reluctant to go to a small place?—Yes, they always prefer a large market, where they know they can get suited, and there they will go.

1998. That will be the case whether you have dead meat or live meat; persons will go to the large market so as to fix the prices; that I apprehend to be the case with all buyers and all sellers?—Yes.

1999. Mr. Norwood.] Is it not the case that the owners of the steamers are very often the importers of the cattle?—No, not very often; they are quite exceptional cases. I believe Mr. Robinson

Robinson and Mr. Hall are about the only shipowners who regularly import cattle.

2000. It must be much to the advantage of the shipowners to make their steamers as perfect as possible for the conveyance of cattle?—Undoubtedly.

2001. And there is no necessity for a Government inspection?—I should say that self interest would always be a sufficient guard to the shipowner to protect himself in having the vessels adapted for the purpose of carrying cattle.

2002. Supposing there were two steamers in the cattle trade frequenting the port of London, one bringing its cattle invariably in good condition, and the other, from defective construction, bringing the cattle badly; the ship which brought the cattle in good condition would get a better trade?—As a matter of course, it would get all the trade, and the other would get none.

2003. Therefore, there it is the greatest possible inducement for owners to make their ships perfect?—Precisely.

2004. A question was put to you by the Chairman, and by another honourable Member, with reference to the disadvantage you have been at when you have slaughtered your cattle at the wharf. You have not been able to sell?—No.

2005. That would not be the case if there was a joint meat market formed somewhere on the water-side, where all foreign cattle might be exposed, and to which the butchers would come down?—That would be a division of the market.

2006. Between the foreign trade and the home trade?—Between the foreign trade and the home trade, and therefore very detrimental.

2007. Wherever there is a large quantity of merchandise, you find the merchants and factors and brokers will come to it?—Yes.

2008. So that if there were all the conveniences for holding a large market by the water side, you would eventually get a market there?—That is a question I am not prepared to answer, but my opinion is, that it would meet with very great opposition from the whole trade.

2009. Chairman.] Supposing that no live fat cattle were allowed to come into the Islington market at all from England or Scotland, should you then object to having your cattle slaughtered by the water side?—In the first place, if you will permit me to say so, I do not think it would be possible to shut up the Islington market.

2010. I do not ask your opinion whether it would be possible to shut up that market, but I ask you this: supposing no cattle could come into the Islington Market for the purpose of being slaughtered, should you then object to having your foreign cattle slaughtered by the river side?—We should certainly object if we could help it.

2011. Supposing you had the monopoly of the live fat stock market, would you then object?—Yes.

2012. You say it would be impossible to prevent live fat stock coming to the Islington Market; was it not possible, and was it not done, a few weeks ago?—It was done during the cold weather, and I believe it was possible during that time.

2013. What has been done, I suppose, is possible to be done again?—As soon as the hot weather comes you would find it very different, and I believe the result would be that some days London would be without meat, and on other days it would be overflooded with it.

2014. We had some experience of it when the Act of Parliament was passed, prohibiting the movement of cattle by railway, as to what could be done. Did you hear then that there was a short supply of meat in the metropolis?—Yes, I did, on one or two occasions.

2015. Did you ever hear that a butcher refused a customer: did you ever know a single instance where a customer sent for a joint of meat and could not get it?—No, I did not.

2016. Do you know there was no great rise in price in the London markets?—The fact of the cattle plague raging in the different districts assisted the movement very much, because, in consequence of the Government Order, the owners were obliged to have the cattle killed, and the dead meat markets were, during that time, over supplied.

2017. So that when you could not bring live stock by railway to the London market the dead meat market was over supplied?—It was, through that circumstance, from the owners being obliged to kill on account of the cattle plague.

2018. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Do you mean, obliged to kill animals that were not diseased?—No, I mean that, if among a herd, a quantity of stock, an animal was taken with the disease the others were all obliged to be killed.

2019. Chairman.] They were obliged to kill those which had been in contact with it?—Yes.

2020. And the consequence was, there was a great glut in the dead meat market?—Yes.

2021. And there was a great impetus given to the foreign cattle trade?—I believe that the foreign cattle trade has increased.

2022. The newspaper reports showed nearly double the foreign beasts coming into the London market in the week that prohibition took place and a few weeks before?—Yes, I believe that was so.

2023. If that were so, should you have any objection to look forward to a similar state of things, to shut out all live stock coming by rail to the London market, and for you to have a monopoly of the foreign trade by the river side?—I think the whole trade would object to it if they could.

2024. I ask you if you should have any objection; do you think it would be very injurious to the foreign trade?—I think it would.

2025. Why do you think so?—Because, if such a regulation were adopted, I do not think there would be half the quantity of foreign cattle come.

2026. If the foreign cattle had the monopoly of the London markets you think that only half the quantity would come?—No, I misunderstood you.

2027. Then, what is it you mean?—I understood you to ask me the question, whether if the foreign cattle were obliged to be killed at the water side.

2028. And no other live stock for slaughter could come into London at all; would that be detrimental to the foreign trade?—No, it would not.

2029. Supposing that the one regulation were accompanied by the other, I suppose you would very cheerfully submit to it?—Do you speak of me individually?

2030. I mean you and those whom you represent—the foreign cattle trade?—I believe the trade would object to any slaughtering at the water side.

2031. You were the importer of the famous Revel cargo, were you not?—Yes.

2032. It could never be satisfactorily proved whether the disease was brought in by means of that Revel cargo?—I am quite satisfied, as far as my own knowledge goes, that it did not come in by that cargo.

2033. You have given evidence to that effect before the Commissioners?—Yes.

2034. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Do you know how the regulations as to the cattle plague are carried on on the Continent?—Yes, I do.

2035. How are these large herds brought to the port of embarkation?—They are collected from the various markets on the Continent. We receive cattle now even from Vienna.

2036. Do they come by train?—They come by railway, generally, by way of Magdeburg and Hull.

2037. Do you know of any that have come from Hungary by rail?—Cattle come from various parts of Hungary to the Vienna market.

2038. Do they come by railway?—Yes.

2039. Are you sure of that fact?—Yes.

2040. Do any large quantities of them come by railway?—Yes.

2041. Are those store cattle that are conveyed by railway?—They are not so frequently conveyed by railway, if you are speaking now of the Hungarian cattle. I do not think they are always carried by railway.

2042. What I mean to ask is this; can cattle, having any disorder, come by railway from Hungary, all the way to Rotterdam, without inspection?—I should think not.

2043. Mr. Banks Stanhope.] I think I understood you to say that if there were too much dead meat introduced in a day into London there would be a glut?—Yes.

2044. And a great deal of meat would be sacrificed?—Undoubtedly, in warm weather.

2045. If live animals were allowed to come into London, and not to leave London, and there were too many came in, what would be the case then?—They would be kept alive until such time as they were wanted.

2046. At what expense?—At a very trifling expense; say 1 s. per day.

PRESENT:

Mr. Edward Egerton.	Mr. Holland.
Mr. W. Egerton.	Lord Naas.
Sir James Fergusson.	Mr. Norwood.
Mr. Graham.	Sir M. W. Ridley.
Mr. Hunt.

THE RIGHT HON. MILNER GIBSON, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. THOMAS COULSON, called in; and Examined.

Mr. T. Coulson. 14 May 1866.

2048. Mr. Norwood.] I believe you are extensively engaged in the foreign cattle trade at Hull?—Yes.

2049. Are you an importer or salesman?—I am a wholesale salesman.

2050. Can you tell the Committee from what foreign ports your import of horned cattle arrive?—We get them from Hamburgh, from Bremen, and from Toning. The trade with Holland is now closed, but we have had a great number from Holland.

2051. Have you in your possession statistics showing the amount of horned cattle that are imported into Hull from those ports that you mentioned?—I have not.

2052. I believe another gentleman who has been summoned can produce those statistics?—He probably may be able to do so.

2053. With regard to sheep, is there not a considerable import of foreign sheep into Hull?—Yes.

2054. Where do the sheep come from?—They come now principally from Hamburgh.

2055. Did they come from Holland before the prohibition?—Yes; we had them from Holland, but not in such large numbers as from Hamburgh.

2056. Are the parties on whose account this stock is imported foreigners who consign to you, or are they British subjects who import?—They are chiefly foreigners.

2058. Where do you sell them?—I sell them in my own premises chiefly, in Hull; since the prohibition we have been obliged to sell them in Hull.

2059. Before the prohibition came into force, what was the course of procedure with regard to the disposal of them?—We sold all we could in Hull, and what we did not sell we sent forward to different markets, to Rotheram, to Wakefield, to Manchester, which I attend on Tuesday, and to Leeds on Wednesday.

2060. The horned cattle which you get from abroad are principally fat cattle, I suppose?—Yes, they are principally fat cattle; I have had a great number of lean cattle from Holland; stores from Harlingen particularly.

2061. You have a fair proportion of cows?—Yes, milk cows.

2062. Those are chiefly from Holland?—Yes.

2063. The importation of cows has ceased since the prohibition?—Yes.

2065. Where do you get your store cattle chiefly from; from what foreign ports?—Harlingen is the principal place.

2066. You do not get very much from Hamburgh?—Very few into Hull.

2067. Where do the store cattle go to?—I sold one man 450, which went to Dundee; and I had a letter from him three weeks ago, in which he expressed his satisfaction with them.

2068. In point of fact, are they sent all over the country for the purpose of fattening?—Yes; he only wished to have 100 or 200 more.

2069. Mr. Edward Egerton.] When was this?—A few weeks ago; that was a gentleman in Dundee; he wrote to me to say that 80 per cent. of them were living.

2070. Mr. Norwood.] Do you find the importation of store cattle into Hull is increasing?—It is not now; but it will.

2071. There is an increasing demand for foreign store cattle, which would enable you to do a larger trade, if you were enabled to have the cattle?—Yes.

2073. To be grass fed?—Yes.

2074. Now, in what condition do the foreign cattle reach the port of Hull?—In very good condition, generally; it is according to weather; that is all; but as to their general health, I think I have seen nothing wrong in them, excepting that from Hamburgh, there have been a few with the foot and mouth disease; I have never seen anything else in my life.

2075. You have seen no rinderpest?—Never.

2076. Can you tell me what your importation of foreign cattle into Hull is in the year?—I cannot tell you the number; there are many salesmen in Hull.

Mr. T. Coulson.

2077. You have no complaint or suggestion of improvement to make with regard to the import of foreign cattle, as far as the steamers are concerned; tell the Committee any suggestion you have to give them on that subject?—There are some little things which, I think, should be altered; sometimes they are overcrowded in the steamers.

2078. What is that occasioned by?—It is when they are very anxious to start them, and so long as they can crowd them aboard they do not mind particularly how they put them in.

2079. And the cattle suffer from that overcrowding, I suppose?—Yes, that is to say, if it comes on bad weather; they do very well when the weather is fine.

2080. Are the owners of these steam vessels, in Hull, also importers of cattle on their own account?—I do not know of one at the present time.

2081. Do they merely confine themselves to the trade of carrying?—They do.

2083. What is the cause of that?—The cause of that is, that their accommodation is not quite so good, and they generally fill the boats too much; they are generally overcrowded a great deal too much from Bremen.

2084. I suppose the result is, that you have many of them with broken limbs?—Yes, and some have to be slaughtered on board if they come in in bad weather.

2085. Are they also much bruised?—Yes, in bad weather, when they have been overcrowded.

2086. Of course that is an immense disadvantage in the sale of them?—Yes.

2087. What is the length of the passage from Bremen to Hull?—It is about two days and one night; it is rather a long passage sometimes.

2089. In the Bremen ships you have the cattle and sheep in the hold as well as on the deck?—Yes; there are some vessels made expressly for cattle.

2090. Those vessels, I presume, are fitted up for cattle?—Yes, some of the Bremen boats.

2091. Those boats bring their cattle better than those that have not those appliances?—I do not know so much about that; they generally want to make the best of the voyage; it is a question of payment; they crowd them too much.

2092. The Hamburgh trade is your chief trade?—At the present time.

2093. Do you find the same objection there with regard to the delivery of the cattle?—No; I think we have better accommodation from Hamburgh in every way; better steamers, more facility, and not so much overcrowding.

2095. Have you personal accommodation in Hull; pastures and every accommodation of that sort?—Yes every accommodation.

2096. Belonging to yourself?—Yes.

2097. Within the borough?—Within the borough.

2098. There is no market, I think, in Hull that can be fairly used by you as an importer of foreign cattle?—There is a market on Tuesday, but it is of very little importance.

2099. You do not use the market in that case?—Very seldom.

2100. Then I suppose the buyers come to your private premises and inspect what you have in stock, and purchase or not, as they think fit?—Yes.

2101. As I understand, that which you cannot get rid of in Hull, you send to these two or three other large markets which you mentioned which you regularly attend?—Yes.

2102. Is there a very large amount of foreign cattle slaughtered in Hull at the present moment?—Yes, one man bought and slaughtered 200 within three days.

2103. Was that recently?—Yes, it was the week before last.

2104.—How did he dispose of those carcases; was it all for the consumption of Hull itself?—No, very few of them were disposed of in Hull. He sent them to Sheffield, to Manchester, and different west country places.

2105. Of course, that kind of trade has considerably developed itself since the restrictions which have lately been put on the movement of cattle?—Yes, they must do that or not have them at all.

2106. Do you think that the system of slaughtering at the port, and distributing over the manufacturing districts behind Hull, is likely to prove a permanent source of business?—No; if it comes hot weather it would be a bad case directly.

2107. You think there will be objections, then?—Yes, it would not keep them, it would not pass.

2108. I think there always used to be a considerable amount of dead-meat traffic from Hull before the late disease showed itself, is not that so?—I have seen a great number of sheep go to London dead.

2109. That has been a trade for many years? That has been a trade for many years.

2110. Mr. Hunt.] In hot weather?—Not in hot weather; sometimes they go by rail; they sometimes kill them and put them on the rail, and they get to their destination the same night.

2111. I thought the general mode of conveyance to London was upon the deck of a steamer?—Yes, before railways.

2112. They were sewn up in cloth and placed on the deck of a steamer?—Yes.

2113. In moderately cool weather that system is a very feasible one?—Yes; I think they go in as good condition by rail, if it is in cool weather, or they could do so.

2114. With regard to the inspection of foreign animals in the Port of Hull; is that satisfactory?—Yes; very satisfactory.

2115. Do you think the inspectors competent and able to perform their duty?—I do.

2116. With regard to sheep you have a large importation of them?—A very large importation.

2117. In what condition are they brought over?—In good condition generally

2119. The other is a large trade; the wholesale butchers slaughter the sheep and send the carcases to London and in all directions?—Yes.

2120. Your slaughter-houses in Hull are private in every respect?—They are all private.

2121. Do you consider them well managed?—Yes; very well managed.

2122. Are they sufficient for the purpose of the trade?—They have been, so far.

2123. Would they be sufficient if the system of slaughtering fat stock at the port was adopted as a permanent thing?—I should say it would be sufficient; we have had an immense number in a week or two, and there seems to be plenty of room.

2124. You believe the business was satisfactorily and properly done?—Yes, it was; they have them in several places; they have not them altogether.

2125. I believe the Board of Trade in Hull have a meat inspector, whose duty it is to examine carcases and to examine meat in every shape and form?—Yes.

2126. Is he a competent man?—He is.

2127. And does his duty well?—He does; I do not see any fault in him in that way.

2128. As far as the supply of meat to Hull is concerned it is abundant and good?—It is generally good; Hull is noted for good meat.

2129. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Do you get any cattle from Gottenburg?—Yes, I have had.

2130. There has never been any disease among them?—I never saw anything wrong in them myself.

2131. Are they store cattle?—They are sent for fat cattle, but they are rather short of being fat.

2133. Could they not send them through the summer by night?—They could if they liked, but railway companies will not accommodate us when we like.

2134. Sir James Fergusson.] Have you ever known them to refuse to take dead meat at night?—I have never seen any go at night. There might be some travelling at night, very likely. There are trains at all times in the day. When a man wants to go to Sheffield he can leave at six o'clock, and can get in in the middle of the night, I believe.

2135. Have you any reason to believe that if the trade generally asked the company to carry the dead meat at night, they would refuse?—I do not suppose they would do so if a man could take one train to himself. They would refuse to take a carriage with only 8 or 10 beasts in it; if he would take a special train himself that would be another thing.

2136. Sir M. W. Ridley.] As a salesman what is your opinion of the way in which the cattle trade would be affected, if the regulations were, that all foreign cattle imported should be killed on the spot?—It would depreciate the trade very much.

2137. In what way would it do so?—When the hot weather came.

2138. Do you think the consignments from foreign ports would be lessened?—Yes, very much so, indeed, I am certain of it; it could not be done, I think; I have seen it for one week when there came a little bit of a heavy trade, and they made about nothing.

2139. Do you apprehend that at one time there would be a glut, and at other times there would be a scarcity?—Yes, I apprehend there would; it would vary.

2140. Do you think that the foreign owner would not send over his cattle with the risk of finding the market overstocked when they got there?—If he was napped very strongly once I think he would be very cautious again.

2141. You spoke of the boats in which these cattle came being of a different character; you mentioned the boats by which the cattle came from Bremen as being the worse?—Yes; I have seen most damaged on board those boats.

2142. Are those particular boats vessels that bring any other goods, or are engaged in another trade, and being disappointed of freight, or not finding their freight ready, take the cattle as supercargo?—They are of both classes.

2143. Not getting enough freight they fill them up with cattle?—Some come with cattle expressly, and some with cattle and goods.

2145. I understood that in some they came very bad; that in bad weather there were broken legs, and so on, and that sometimes some had to be slaughtered?—Yes.

2146. Does that arise in the cases of these insufficient boats?—Yes, and the weather besides; but the boats are not sufficiently good; they are generally overcrowded, that is the only fault.

2147. Would it not be an advantage to the trade if regulations were adopted prohibiting all vessels importing cattle which are not built and formed for that express purpose?—No. There ought to be a restriction of the numbers, but the boats that bring cattle and goods are just as good as those which are made expressly for cattle.

2150. Would the temperature be so high as 80°?—I have known it, I should say, to be 70°.

2151. Is that frequently the case?—Yes. It is worse when they arrive, and there is no through draught; of course if a boat is sailing there is a draught.

2152. You complained rather of want of sufficient accommodation, and of time being somewhat lost in getting these animals ashore at low water?—Yes.

Mr. T. Coulson.

2157. Then am I to understand that these Bremen boats, of which you rather complain than not, have no proper means of ventilation on board?—Yes, they have; but not sufficient for the number that is sometimes in the holds; I suggested to Ringrose's that their boats ought to have a regular current of air through, and they made it immediately; there were some cattle suffocated in the hold of one of their boats, and it resulted through nothing else but because there was not a sufficient draught of air through.

2159. Have you had as many as half a dozen cases in a month?—In some months do you mean, or taking month by month?

2162. Have you ever seen any cases in hot weather in which the necessity for slaughtering arises from excess of temperature in the hold; have you known cattle in such a state that they were obliged to be slaughtered on being taken out of the vessel in consequence of the heat?—I have seen them in a very bad state; I have seen them dead, but I have not supposed that it has been entirely from the heat; it has been the stormy weather, and the heat also.

2163. Now, as regards sheep, you say you are a large importer of sheep from Hamburg?—Yes.

2164. In what condition do those sheep arrive?—They come generally in very good condition; there were 1,300 landed the other day, and only two wrong out of the 1,300; they had good steamers.

2166. That they come reasonably cool, and reasonably ready for the shambles?—They do.

2167. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Have you had any complaints from any of the people to whom you have sent this dead meat, as to the condition in which it arrives?—I do not send dead meat away; I sell it to the men who send it away; I never slaughtered a beast for sale yet.

2168. That is a distinct trade?—It is.

2169. You speak of having premises of your own within the Borough; supposing any cattle arrive with foot and mouth disease, have you any means of separating them from the rest?—We have.

2170. What is the practice with regard to animals that come over with foot and mouth disease?—They used to be killed immediately, but there is not so much notice taken of them now.

2171. They are killed and sold to the butchers?—Yes, they are sold to dealers, speculators, and butchers.

2172. Do you know of any means by which that meat is distinguished from the other meat?—It is easy to distinguish.

2173. You think there would be no difficulty in any one conversant with the trade distinguishing them?—No, it is very easy.

2174. What would be the marks upon an animal having the foot and mouth disease; I want to know if there is a distinction made in the market at all, between the beasts killed in consequence of having foot and mouth disease and other beasts?—No, there is no difference; I was a butcher before I was a salesman, and I know dead meat as well as live meat.

2175. Have you any place for putting animals in quarantine?—I have a place where I can fasten them up; but I have never been asked that question.

2176. Have you imported any of those animals having foot and mouth disease, yourself?—I have seen many that have been sent to me.

2177. What have you done with those?—I have killed them.

2178. At once?—Yes, the quicker the better.

2179. They have been killed in the ordinary way, and sent into the large towns as meat fit for consumption?—Yes.

2180. Do you not think there ought to be some regulation by which that meat might be distinguished from the other?—I do not know what regulation there could be.

2181. How many inspectors have you at Hull?—Two.

2182. You say they have done their work very well?—Very well.

2183. I suppose you cannot tell me what number of animals come in the course of the week?—No.

2184. Have these two inspectors any assistance in inspecting the animals when they arrive?—One of them has a son, I think.

2185. You cannot give us any details as to the number of animals which come into Hull in a week?—No.

2186. Are there 5,000?—Not 5,000.

2187. Are there 3,000?—No; I should say a thousand in a week.

2188. Chairman.] Have the regulations which have been recently in force had the effect of depreciating preciating the value of foreign cattle?—Very much so at times.

2189. Mr. Hunt.] What particular regulations; will you specify them?—As to the slaughtering?

2190. Chairman.] The regulation that they must only be moved from the port of arrival in the shape of dead meat?—Yes.

2191. Is it your opinion that if that were a permanent regulation, the importers of foreign cattle would have to submit to a considerable depreciation?—They would for many months in the year, and a very great one.

2192. That would tend to lessen the importation?—It would.

2193. Are the cattle which are imported by you and consigned to you, Dutch cattle or any of them?—Not at the present time.

2194. Are they Dutch cattle which may have passed in transit through the countries from which you do import?—No.

2195. There are none of them Dutch cattle?—None of them are Dutch that I have ever seen; most of them are German or Prussian.

2196. Mr. Hunt.] You say that when the regulations which were made in consequence of the cattle plague were in force, there was a depreciation in the value of foreign cattle imported into Hull?—At times; when they were overstocked. Then we had not a difficulty in getting them away.

2198. Were there fewer or more cattle imported into Hull when that regulation came about?—I should say there have been fewer since, but the time of year has something to do with it.

2199. When cattle were not allowed to be moved in this country by railway, did not that give an impetus to the foreign cattle trade?—No, I do not think it did.

2200. A great many beasts were slaughtered in Holland for the purpose of being sent inland at that time?—Yes.

2201. Was that new to you in a great measure, or had you been in the habit of having that done before?—No.

2202. Then did not that rather give an impetus to the foreign cattle trade?—No; for there were larger numbers came than we should have sent before alive. We had a better chance of trade. If we are overset with a bad trade in Hull, we should go where we could find a better.

2203. With regard to the number that arrive, and are consigned to you for sale, are they sent haphazard, or do you advise how many should be sent?—No; they are sent haphazard; we do not know what is coming until the boat arrives.

2204. I suppose you correspond; you give them hints as to when there is likely to be a good market?—Yes, to men that are regular customers.

2205. How far is it from Hull to Manchester, by rail?—About 100 miles.

2206. How were these carcasses sent; were they sent at night?—They are sent at all times. I see them going away all day.

2207. Is there a special meat train?—No, I have never seen a special meat train.

2208. They go by goods trains?—Yes, by goods trains. I see that Messrs. Thompson McKay adopt the plan of sending them through. They are great carriers.

2209. What is the character of the inspection at Hull; does your inspector pass animals with the foot and mouth disease?—Yes, they are passed now. He does not now stop them, because he knows they have all to be killed.

2210. Would he stop store stock with the foot and mouth disease?—They would have to go into some place or other till they got better.

2211. By order of the inspector?—Yes; but we never have foot and mouth disease from Dutch beasts.

2212. You have had foot and mouth disease from Hamburg?—Yes.

2213. Are they always stopped by the inspectors, unless they are fat animals?—Yes; if they have foot and mouth disease, the inspector would put his mark upon them. He would not allow them to travel if they had foot and mouth disease.

2214. Do you occupy land in the neighbourhood of the port for the purpose of taking in these beasts?—Yes, I have land for my own business.

2215. Pastures as well as other places?—Pastures as well as sheds; but we prefer them tied up generally. I cut grass for them.

2216. That depends upon whether there are stones or not?—Yes.

2217. Chairman.] Are those lairs of yours within the port of Hull, and able to be used under the Orders in Council?—They are within the limit, a mile.

2218. Mr. Hunt.] Do you keep the fat animals for some days before you sell them?—We keep them as short a time as we can, and sell them as quick as we can.

2219. What is the average number of days you keep an animal?—I never keep them more than two or three days.

2220. You get them off as fast as you can?—Yes, the same day if we can.

2221. What do you do with regard to store stock?—They are beasts which generally stop with you a little; they must wait for the market.

2222. With regard to your store stock, do you wait until you have orders for them, or do you send them to different places?—There are customers that come from all parts.

2223. You wait until customers come to look at them?—Generally.

2224. What are they; jobbers?—They are generally all dealers; very seldom farmers; they go all ways.

2225. Supposing you get a lot of animals with foot and mouth disease, which I suppose you have now and then, does the inspector refuse to pass them?—He will order them to be locked up, but I have never had any.

2226. Does he mark them in any way?—I have never had any to try.

2227. What security is there, that you do not send those animals out before they are cured?—There is only the appearance of them.

2228. The inspector inspects them on their landing?—He does.

2229. And then they are brought into your premises?—Yes.

2230. What security is there, that they will not come out of your premises before they are cured of foot and mouth disease?—There is no security for fat beasts. I have never had a lean animal with foot and mouth disease in all my experience, simply because I have never had a lean beast from Hamburg through my hands.

2231. With regard to the fat stock, the inspector does not stop them?—Not under the present Act.

Mr. T. Coulson.

2232. What should you say to a regulation requiring all animals to be kept in quarantine for a certain number of days?—I think the remedy would be a great deal worse than the disease.

2233. Will you explain that?—Do you mean for lean or fat stock?

2234. For lean stock?—For lean stock it would be decidedly the best.

2235. How many days should you recommend them to be kept?—Some for a less time than others. Some animals will get better in less time than other animals. One animal will take two days, another three days, another a week; we can have no guarantee about that.

2236. There would be some expense attending it, would there not?—A great deal.

2237. But would not the animals fetch a much higher price?—No, they would fetch much less.

2239. Are you speaking of fat cattle?—No, of lean cattle.

2240. Why should lean cattle go back, when they are properly watered and fed?—They can neither eat nor drink when they have foot and mouth disease.

2241. I am speaking of animals landed and put in quarantine, as to which you do not know whether they have any disease at all; supposing all the store animals that are landed at Hull are put in quarantine for 10 days, and properly cared for, fed, and watered, would they not fetch a higher price at the end of their term of quarantine than they would if they were killed immediately on being landed?—Much less.

2242. Explain how?—You cannot keep foreign cattle up to the mark; you may give them what you like; they always go back.

2243. Supposing they were sent away to pasture at once, would they go back?—No, in pasture they would do better.

2244. Why would they go back at all if they were kept in pasture?—Up to a certain time they do go back; if a farmer gets beasts on to his lands they go back a certain time, up to a month or so before they turn the right way.

2245. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Is that from the effect of the voyage?—The climate and the voyage and other things which perhaps we do not know about exactly; it is more particularly the case with foreign stock.

2246. Chairman.] A man would not give so much for a beast if he could only have it on the condition of its undergoing quarantine for 14 days, with all the resulting expenses from that, as if he could have it at once?—He might give as much, but there would be a great depreciation to the owner of the animal.

2247. Somebody must find the money for the quarantine expenses?—Yes.

2248. Is there any difference between the effect of the quarantine and its expense upon the price of a beast, and a duty; suppose I put a tax, equal in cost, in time, and in money, to the quarantine, would there be any difference in the effect of the one and the other?—I think the effect of the quarantine would be very bad on the trade.

2251. What is the difference?—One is in good condition and the other is in bad; a horse that is warranted is generally in good condition, but a beast, after it has been quarantined, becomes depreciated.

2253. You would take your chance?—Yes; and all men will that have to do with beasts; you may talk to them as you like.

2254. Mr. Norwood.] Since the prohibition of transport into the country, have the net proceeds to the foreign consignee in foreign cattle declined or reduced?—The prices have been last week going up, but before that time they went down considerably, owing to the supply; our own country beasts are now becoming perfectly nominal. There are very few of our own country beasts left.

2255. I do not think you quite understood me; since the prohibition of transport into the country, when you have been able to take your surplus to Rotherham or other markets, have your account sales become more or less favourable to the owner abroad?—Less favourable.

2257. But since this order the cattle have all been slaughtered in Hull?—Yes.

2258. Do the buyers come down from the manufacturing districts to buy the carcass?—No; they buy them alive. I sold a man from Scarborough seven beasts, and he killed them in Hull and took them to Scarborough.

2259. Is that the course with the West Riding people generally?—Yes.

2260. They come to you, buy the beasts, and kill them themselves, do they?—They buy the beasts and kill them themselves.

2261. Mr. Hunt.] Then do you find there is a cessation of the cattle traffic from abroad to your port, when the price is low?—I cannot say much about that.

2262. Is the effect of the depreciation in price to stop animals coming?—It stops them for a certain time.

2263. What other markets do they send them to in other countries when they are stopped from coming here by reason of the lowness of the price?—They generally send them to the best market they can; Newcastle, for instance.

2264. What markets have they in Continental countries when the low price forbids them to send them here; that is what I want to know?—I do not know that; I cannot tell you.

2265. Mr. Norwood.] Has the value of Dutch fat cattle fallen very much in Holland since the prohibition?—

prohibition?—No, the price has kept up in Holland, for fat cattle particularly.

2266. Chairman.] Supposing you had a quarantine of these store cattle, would there be any security that after all they might not have the foot and mouth disease when they began to travel?—Not at all; there would be no security; they might have it; I have seen it twice myself.

2267. If you made the restrictions upon the foreign cattle sufficiently great there would be none come at all, would there?—There would not; it would lessen it very much.

2268. If it was a condition that every beast that came to England, upon its arrival, should have a sum of 10*l.* paid upon it, I suppose nobody would send one?—I think not.

2269. You might turn all restrictions, whether of quarantine or anything else, into a money value?—You might.

2271. Sir M. W. Ridley.] But, on the other hand, if the cost of detention were only to be about 1*s.* a-day, which would make it 10*s.* instead of 10*l.*, do you apprehend that would have much effect in diminishing it?—It is not so much the amount, but it is the detention in point of time.

2272. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Is there not this further insecurity, that the foot and mouth disease might break out at the end of a fortnight?—I think it might; half the farmers and dealers would have them left on their hands with the foot and mouth disease.

2273. Mr. Hunt.] Quarantine would be a security against cattle plague, would it not?—It would be a security against cattle plague, there can be no doubt of it, because that would show itself during that time in fat cattle; they would be killed and eaten, and done with before the quarantine was over.

2274. Mr. Norwood.] Have you had any rinderpest imported at all?—I have never seen any.

2275. You have not had any instance through your own business?—No.

2276. Mr. Hunt.] Have you heard of any of your customers having cattle plague on any of their farms?—Yes, I have known some farmers who have had it, and lost all their beasts, and some who have never had it.

2277. Do they trace it to the foreign cattle?—No, they never had a foreign beast on their place.

2278. Do they consider that their cattle got the disease from foreign cattle; did any of the persons whom you have supplied store cattle to complain that they have got the cattle plague on their farms from its being introduced by foreign beasts?—No, I never heard of that; I am only sorry I have been obliged to leave that letter from Dundee behind; I could not find it.

Mr. T. Coulson.

2279. Chairman.] Had you anything to do with that importation which took place of Russian cattle?—Yes, the Revel beasts came through my hands.

2280. Last year is the first time the cattle was imported direct from Revel?—Yes, I believe so.

2281. Have you been able to trace any cattle plague as arising from these particular cattle which came from Revel?—No, never.

2282. What became of them when you got them?—I sold 106 to two men, and the remainder all came to London; those which were sold went to Leeds and Manchester.

2283. For slaughtering?—Yes.

2284. The rest went to London?—Yes.

2285. How long did you keep them at Hull before you sold them, and sent them away?—A day and a night; they were soon off; they were as wild as deer; we could not turn them; I never saw such wild cattle in my life; there did not appear to be anything amiss with them; they were very tight in their hides; that is all I could see; they were poorish beasts, and not fat, and they are generally tighter in the skin when there is not any fat under it; poor beasts have that effect more than fat ones.

2286. Mr. Hunt.] Do you get any Hungarian cattle from the ports of Holland?—Not that I am aware of.

2287. You do not know where the cattle which you import come from?—No, I never inquire; I know the Dutch beasts well, and I can tell a Dutch beast from a beast of any other country, and I can tell the German beasts from the Dutch.

2288. Sir M. W. Ridley.] Have you had any French cattle lately?—None.

2289. Chairman.] How long were these Russian cattle on their journey from Revel?—I believe they were six days, but I am not certain.

2290. Is not that a long time to keep cattle in the hold of a steamer?—Yes, but that steamer was a splendid boat, and cool and airy; I went aboard her when she lay in the river; she was a very nice boat.

2291. Is there likely to be a great deal of importation from Russia direct?—I do not know; I never heard whether that paid or not; we did not make that inquiry.

2292. It was new altogether?—Yes, it was a speculation, I believe.

2293. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Were they not fat beasts?—They were sent for fat, but nobody would buy them for lean; they were very old, some of them without teeth.

Mr. JOHN MALCOLM, called in; and Examined.

2294. Mr. Norwood.] I BELIEVE you are connected with the large firm of Brownlow, Browning, Lumsden, & Co., Steam Shipping Owners?—Yes.

2295. You have vessels regularly running in the Hamburgh trade, which convey cattle of all kinds?—They do.

2296. What other ports, from which cattle are imported, are you connected with?—Antwerp and Dunkirk.

Mr. J. Malcolm.

2297. Have you any statistics by which you can inform the Committee what number of animals have been imported in the last two or three years into Hull?—I can for the last three years.

2298. Tell me the quantity of cattle imported in 1863, 1864, and 1865; give them separately?

Mr. J. Malcolm.

—In 1863 there were 7,400 bulls, oxen, and cows; 6,211 calves; 34,783 sheep; and 2,138 swine.

2299. In 1864?—21,279 oxen, bulls, and cows; 8,276 calves; 36,245 sheep; 7,415 swine.

2300. Can you tell the ports from which they were shipped?—I cannot give you the quantities from each port.

2301. Give me the various foreign ports which supplied Hull during that time?—Hamburgh, Bremen, Rotterdam, Amsterdam, Gottenburgh, Revel, Tonning, and Dunkirk.

2302. What was the number imported in 1865?—Oxen, bulls, and cows, 26,947; calves, 9,197; sheep, 69,041; and swine, 15,293.

2303. I think these figures show that the trade is increasing in cattle?—It is increasing rapidly.

2304. Are you of opinion that the trade in foreign animals will increase considerably if there are no restrictions put upon it?—I believe it will.

2305. Your Hamburgh steamers, I believe, are specially adapted for the conveyance of cattle, are they not?—Not specially built for the cattle trade, but adapted for the conveyance of cattle.

2306. Have you adopted all the suggestions that have been made to you from the importers?—Yes.

2307. You are quite ready and willing, and anxious to do so?—We are open to adopt any improvement they may suggest.

2308. It is your interest to bring the animals in as good a condition as possible?—It is.

2309. Are you paid freight for animals which die on the voyage, or are thrown overboard through stress of weather?—We do not claim freight for dead animals thrown overboard at sea.

2310. Then you are the sufferer as well as the owner of the cattle, if accident does occur to them during the voyage?—Yes.

2311. Is your accommodation satisfactory, having regard to the length of time they are upon the voyage?—We have every possible accommodation on board ship, but the landing accommodation might be improved.

2312. In what respect?—In the detention in the case of vessels arriving about half-tide.

2313. Is it a fact that the river Humber is a tidal river, and that the tide flows very strongly indeed; that there is a great rise and fall in the tide?—Yes.

2314. And if vessels run up within half-an-hour of high water, they could run alongside the landing-place?—That is so.

2315. You coincide with the opinion of Mr. Coulson, that there ought to be a landing-place where the steamers might run alongside and discharge their cargo very soon after the tide flows?—It is very desirable to have such accommodation.

2316. That would reduce the length of time the animals would have to be confined on board ship?—It would.

2317. Have you any other suggestion to make to the Committee?—There might be a shed for the cattle to be put in after landing near the landing stage: the accommodation in that respect is rather deficient at present.

2318. You have two modes of landing cattle at Hull; one is, that you run your vessel alongside the pier in the river at a certain time of the tide, and discharge the vessel upon that wooden pier?—Yes.

2319. When the tide admits of going into the dock, you discharge your cattle on the dock quay?—Yes.

2320. The inspectors are present, the Customs inspector and the Corporation inspector, and every animal is inspected and passed?—Yes.

2321. And then driven away by the salesmen to their private yards?—After they are all landed.

2322. Is it not the case that within the last few months the Hull Corporation, at the special request of the Lord Lieutenant of the Riding, Lord Wenlock, has fitted up one of the old baths and washhouses for the purpose of placing foreign cattle therein?—Yes, they have.

2323. Has that place been at all used yet?—Not to any great extent.

2324. It is fitted up for that purpose?—Yes.

2325. Do you know the accommodation which is provided there?—I do not.

2326. Have the Dock Company done anything at Hull within the last few months to improve the appliances for the importation of cattle?—At the suggestion of the Lord Lieutenant they are about erecting a shed.

2327. A large shed?—Yes.

2328. Under which the animals could be driven in coming from the ship?—Yes, to remain there until the whole cargo was landed.

2329. Are your appliances for landing the animals proper, do you think, for taking them out of the holds and so on?—Oh, yes, we walk them out.

2330. You walk them out; you do not sling them at all?—No, with our own vessels in the Hamburgh trade, we do not sling them at all; we walk them out.

2331. I suppose in the winter months, when the North Sea is extremely stormy, you have occasionally cargoes that suffer considerably from the weather, and animals have their limbs broken and get suffocated, and so on?—We have instances of that kind sometimes, but not to any extent.

2332. And I suppose that happens when the weather is really very bad, when there are equinoctial gales and other severe weather at sea?—Yes.

2333. In ordinary weather there is no casualty of that kind?—Nothing at all.

2334. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] What is the freight of the animals from the different ports?—From Hamburgh it is 15 s. for cattle, and 1 s. 3 d. for sheep.

2335. From Bremen?—From Bremen, I think, 1 l. for cattle, and 1 s. 6 d. for sheep, but I am not exactly sure.

2336. From Gothenburg?—I do not know; it is a small trade, and quite a new trade.

2337. Chairman.] Is there any detention on the wharf after the cattle are landed?—No; after the landing is completed there is no detention; they are walked away at once.

2338. When the cattle are shipped on the other side, is there a careful examination of them, to see what is their condition?—No, there was no examination as to their condition; there is now, within the last six months. I speak more particularly of Hamburgh; we get a certificate from a veterinary surgeon, who examines them when they are put on board, and who certifies that they are in good condition.

2339. Mr. Norwood.] That is the case in the Dutch trade, is it not?—Yes, in the Dutch trade also, I think.

2340. Chairman.]

2340. Chairman.] Is there anything of that sort at Tonning?—No.

2341. Supposing cattle arrive for shipment that are suffering from cattle plague or from foot and mouth disease, would you take them on board just the same?—No, not if we saw that.

2342. Have you anybody to look to them, to be sure of that?—No, we have not.

2343. Do these cattle come from various parts, and meet at the port for shipment?—From all parts of the interior.

2344. Then they are thrown together for the first time on board your ship?——

2345. Then, if by chance one animal with the cattle plague came on board it would probably infect the whole of them?—I am not able to speak to that point.

2346. You do not yourselves take any precaution as to the state of the cattle that you ship?—No, we do not, except where there is a supervision by the authorities at Hamburgh and other places; we do not ourselves inspect them.

2347. Have you not yourselves an interest in doing so?—No, I do not know that we have.

2348. Supposing the cattle arrived at Hull, many of them in a state unfit for human food, would there not be some question as to the freight?—No.

2349. In whatever condition you deliver the cattle, are you paid the same?—No; if one of the cattle arrived with a broken leg, and had to be slaughtered on board, we only charge, in that instance, half-freight.

2350. But if they were suffering from any disease when they arrived, you would have the freight just the same?—Just the same.

2351. Do you cleanse the holds of these ships that carry these cattle from Holland to Hull, and from the Continent to Hull?—Every voyage.

2352. How do you do that?—They are brought up on fresh water sand; we take the sand out and scrape and wash the hold well down.

2353. You do not use any disinfectant?—We have occasionally used a disinfectant.

2354. You do not wash with lime water, for instance?—We have used lime water and chloride of lime occasionally.

2355. Would you object to that being a permanent regulation that ships bringing cattle have their holds washed with lime water after every voyage?—I see no objection to it.

2356. Do you not think it would have a tendency to prevent the spread of cattle plague if the holds of these ships were carefully disinfected and cleansed after every voyage as a permanent regulation?—I should say it would.

2357. There is always a chance, at the best, of having one animal on board having symptoms of the disease?—I have never seen anything of the disease imported.

2358. You have not?—No, never.

2359. Do you carry any of the cattle on deck?—Yes; about half on deck.

2360. In the winter season as well as in the summer?—We do not bring so many in the winter, they are generally all below hatches, as a rule.

2361. Are you the insurers of the cattle, or are the shippers?—The few that are insured are insured by the shippers.

2362. But supposing you were obliged to throw some of these cattle overboard to save the rest, and to save the ship, how would it stand then?—We are protected by a clause in our bills of lading.

2363. Mr. Norwood.] That is the clause which says, "All accidents at shippers' risk"?—Yes, "On deck at shippers' risk."

2364. Chairman.] Have you any regulations as to the number of cattle that you will allow to be shipped?—No.

2365. Have you no regulation as to the amount of cattle that each boat is to have?—No; we regulate that ourselves. We allow three feet for a beast, but we are not bound by that; we could take more if we liked.

2366. You have a regulation amongst yourselves?—Yes.

2367. What space do you allow for each beast?—Three feet in breadth.

2368. It is an order that is given to the shippers that your agents ought not to allow more cattle to be put in the steamers than will fill a space equal to three feet each?—That is so.

2369. I suppose three feet is barely sufficient. They lean against each other as they stand, I suppose?—I think three feet is a very fair allowance for the class of cattle we get.

2370. Is it true that the cattle do better rather closely stowed than if there were a space between them; do they support one another better, and are they less liable to fall?—I think so.

2371. Have you any regulations as to ventilation during the voyage?—Yes, we have wind sails and ventilators from the far end of the hold, where it is likeliest to be warm. There are two ventilators in each ship, one for the hot air to go up, the other to bring down the cold air. There are also wind sails.

2372. Are they so fitted that they can be used in all weather?—Yes, the ventilators can.

2373. Is this ventilation going on in gales of wind, and heavy weather at sea?—Yes; of course it is limited. The hatches are always open during the voyage. The vessels bringing cattle are very light, generally, and consequently in almost the worst weather, the hatches can be kept off.

2374. Sir M. W. Ridley.] Do you feed with compressed food?—No, with ordinary hay.

2375. Hay and water?—Water twice a day.

2376. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Have you lost any vessels in the cattle trade since the establishment of the cattle plague regulations?—No.

2377. Mr. Norwood.] In the stowage of the cattle in the hold of your steamers how are they stowed. Are their heads towards the centre of the vessel, and their tails towards the sides?—Yes.

2378. They are not stowed fore and aft, but athwart ship?—Athwart.

2379. Which way are their heads?—Generally towards the hatchway.

2380. Then, in point of fact, the space that you describe was three feet of length in the hold?—Yes; that applies to deck and to hold also.

2381. There are only two rows of cattle in the hold, one along each side?—Two rows as a rule; few ships will admit of three rows.

2382. Lord Naas.] Your company carry from the Dutch ports to Hull?—No; from Belgian ports, France, and Hamburgh.

2383. Now, have you ever calculated what the cost would be for carrying dead meat from these ports to Hull?—No, I have not calculated that. I have never thought of it.

2384. Could you carry dead meat at the same rate per hundredweight as you carry ordinary merchandise?—Yes.

Mr. J. Malcolm.
14 May 1866.

2385. What is your freight per ton now on ordinary merchandise from the Dutch ports, and German ports, to Hull?—Do you mean merchandise occupying the same room that dead meat would?

2386. Yes, taking it in that way?—About 25 s. per ton.

2387. Chairman.] You would not be able to pack your dead meat so closely as ordinary merchandise?—No.

2388. You would be obliged to give it air?—Yes, we should take that into consideration.

2389. Mr. Edward Egerton.] You would not keep it down in the hold?—No.

2390. Lord Naas.] Your freight is about 15 s.?—Yes.

2391. A beast weighs five or six hundredweight on an average?—Six or seven hundredweight.

2392. That would be about three beasts per ton?—The Hamburgh beasts weigh considerably more than that.

2393. What do they weigh in live weight?—10 cwt. or 12 cwt.

2394. Then I suppose it would be rather under the mark to put two beasts per ton as actual dead weight?—Yes, it would be under the mark for German beasts.

2395. Then at that rate the difference between the carriage of the dead meat and the live meat would not be very much?—No, but then the quantity would be very small.

2396. Two beasts at 15 s. would be 30 s., and you say your freight for merchandise similarly packed, and in the same way, to meat would be 25 s.?—Yes, 25 s. or 30 s. per ton.

2397. So that in fact there would be no material difference between the carriage of dead meat and the carriage of live meat as far as your freight is concerned?—Not much.

2398. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Have you taken into consideration the claims which might be made upon you as to the condition of this dead meat?—We could protect ourselves from that. We could take it at the shippers' risk the same as we do the live stock.

2399. Are you aware that is one of the reasons why the railway companies have been obliged to adopt higher rates in consequence of the large claims that have been made upon them?—Yes, but we never bring perishable goods over the sea except at shippers' risk.

2400. What convenience have you for carrying dead meat. You could not leave it on deck, could you?—It would be best on deck.

2401. Would not the action of the water have a bad effect?—It would not hurt it on a short voyage.

2402. Lord Naas.] I suppose if you had a dead meat trade from the German ports alone, you would be obliged to alter somewhat the construction of your vessels?—Yes, we could only bring a limited quantity. We could not bring as many as we can alive now; they would have to be brought in part from the German ports.

2403. Could you not store the dead meat in the holds for nine months in a year?—No, I do not think we could from the German ports; it would be almost impracticable to bring dead meat from the German ports in the summer months or in the spring months.

2404. Even at this time of the year?—It would be impossible, I think.

2405. That being the case, you would not be able to carry as much dead meat on board the vessels as you do live meat?—No; certainly not.

2406. You think you could not carry as much dead meat as you can carry live meat now?—No, we could not.

2407. Mr. Norwood.] Have you ever brought any dead meat from any of these foreign ports to which you have alluded?—Never. The longest voyage I have known dead meat taken by sea is from Hull to London; it is a long voyage, and meat is only carried during the cooler months.

2408. Have you any statistics you can hand in?—I can hand in the importation from Hamburgh during 1865.

[The Statistics were handed in, and are as follows:]

Mr. NOEL JAMES LOCKWOOD, called in; and Examined.

Mr. N. J Lockwood.

2409. Mr. Norwood.] I BELIEVE you are the Veterinary Surgeon appointed by Her Majesty's Customs at Hull, and also by the Corporation of Hull, to inspect foreign cattle of every kind?—I am.

2410. How long have you held that position?—About 19 or 20 years.

2411. Have all cattle, bullocks, cows, and calves, which are imported from abroad, to pass through your inspection before they are taken away from the ships?—Yes.

2412. In what condition do foreign cattle arrive at Hull?—I have never seen them arrive in better condition at any time than they do now.

2413. Have you any experience of other ports, and the way in which they arrive there?—I have not.

2414. Upon the whole, they arrive very well at Hull?—Very well indeed.

2415. You have heard the previous evidence?—I have.

2416. Do

2416. Do you confirm what has been stated about the general good delivery by the Hull steamers?—They generally deliver them in very good condition.

2417. Are there any special exceptions to that?—The Bremen boats, when they are full, bring them very dirty and very crowded.

2418. Can you tell us the actual points of deficiency on board those boats?—Ventilation is one.

2419. It is not so good as the others?—No, and they are kept in such a dirty, filthy state.

2420. Then the attention paid to them is not so good?—No, they do not pay that attention that Messrs. Browning & Lumsden pay to their boats. In fact, they come so crowded that you cannot get in a proper way to inspect them.

2421. Do you think it would be desirable to license the space on board cattle boats?—Certainly.

2422. So that an excess of that kind could not be permitted?—That is what it ought to be.

2423. You think a regulation would be a proper thing?—I do.

2424. Will you tell us what is the proper space to be allotted to cattle?—I should think three feet six inches would be plenty.

2425. That is in width?—That is in width.

2426. Mr. Hunt.] Is that exclusive of the partitions?—It is exclusive of the partitions.

2427. You would not have a partition for each animal?—No, but I should have six animals or so partitioned, because then, if they got down the others could not tread on them; to have partitions between every six would be a good plan.

2428. Mr. Norwood.] There are only two rows of cattle in the hold of a steamer?—There is what they call the 'tween decks.

2429. There are only two rows of animals, one on each side of the ship?—I have seen them along each side, and one row in the middle.

2430. Is that a general rule?—No.

2431. If there were only two rows, there would be a considerable space in the centre of the ship?—There would, and that would keep them cool.

2432. In regulating the steamboat space allotted to each beast, that vacant space would have to be taken into consideration?—It would.

2433. Do you put the heads together; do you recommend that?—The tails are in the centre.

2434. And the heads are to the sides of the ship?—The heads are tied to the ship's side.

2435. Is that the best mode of conveying them?—They would get more air if they were tied the other way.

2436. They would get more air from the hatchway?—Some boats tie them that way, head to head.

2437. Do you think that is the preferable mode yourself?—Yes.

2438. Of course, if there were only two rows, there would be vacant space in the centre, which would enable the men to get to the animals' heads to feed or water them?—Yes.

2439. Mr. Hunt.] Are there any vessels in which they keep them so now?—They do in Browning & Lumsden's. They can get round and feed them as well as possible.

2440. Mr. Norwood.] That is the firm to which the last witness belongs?—Yes.

2441. With regard to disease, do the foreign cattle suffer from that on arrival?—We find them sometimes with the foot and mouth disease.

2442. Have you had any cases of rinderpest?—Never the slightest; never the slightest symptom.

2443. Do you know cases of rinderpest?—I have had many hundreds of cases.

2444. Have you never seen any animals at all landed with rinderpest?—Not with the slightest symptom of it.

2445. The store cattle that arrive have foot and mouth disease more than the fat cattle?—They have.

2446. Is the accommodation at all satisfactory to you?—No.

2447. What can you suggest?—There ought to be a large shed built.

2448. The dock company are about to build one, are they not?—I believe it is stopped now; the parties who live about the shed do not want it, and I suppose they cannot enforce it.

2449. Do you mean to say that the dock company object to build it?—No, they are very willing to build it.

2450. Then, who objects?—The inhabitants of the neighbourhood, because it would block up their sight.

2451. They are fearful of a nuisance?—Yes.

2452. Is there not a place at Springbank, which used to be the old baths and washhouses, and which has been fitted up?—At Bath-place.

2453. Would not that be useful?—Very.

2454. Has it been used?—Yes, there have been 320 or more in.

2455. That is a decided improvement?—Yes, but it wants more ventilation and more light.

2456. Have they plenty of water there?—Plenty of water.

2457. With regard to the landing place, the previous witness stated there should be access at all times of the tide. Do you agree with him that that would be a great advantage?—Certainly.

2458. The sheep arrive in good order?—Very good order.

2459. And the Dutch cows also, before they were prohibited?—I never saw any case of rinderpest.

2460. You have seen no case of rinderpest, but have you seen other diseases brought by these cows, especially from Holland?—Not the slightest.

2461. Then, do they generally arrive pretty healthy?—They always come healthy; I never saw any one of them in any other condition.

2462. With regard to the suggestion that has been made, as to the quarantine for store cattle, would that be desirable, do you think?—I think it would.

2463. As a preventative to anything like the rinderpest?—Yes, it would prevent that, because it would appear within a certain time if the beasts had it at all.

2464. In your judgment, as an experienced medical officer, do you think it would be a desirable thing to quarantine store cattle?—I do think it would be desirable to quarantine store stock.

2465. You would not quarantine fat stock?—It would be better for them to wait for 12 hours, and then examine them when they are cool; allow them to come on shore, and get fed and watered for 12 hours, and then examine them afterwards.

2466. Mr. Holland.]

Mr. N. J. Lockwood.

14 May 1866.

2466. Mr. Holland.] Do you examine them on board?—As they come on board, and as they come off as well.

2467. Individually?—Yes.

2468. Mr. Norwood.] You think you would do that better if you were able to do it in some pasture or shed when the beasts are cool?—Yes, for they come out of these holds sometimes half blind with the steam.

2469. Are you able at a glance to detect whether an animal is fit to pass or not?—Not at the first glance. They are tied up until they get a little bit cooler, and you can go round and look at them again.

2470. They stand upon the quay?—They stand upon the quay, tied to the rails.

2471. Then, you give a closer supervision and inspection after they have stood for some little time?—Yes.

2472. And you consider that you are able to detect any disease, if it is to be detected?—We could do it more satisfactorily to ourselves if they were kept about 12 hours.

2473. Would there be accommodation in Hull for quarantine?—Yes.

2474. The pastures adjoining the town would be sufficient for that purpose?—They would.

2475. Even as to store cattle?—Yes.

2476. Chairman.] Would you subject the store cattle to quarantine if they came from countries where there was no cattle plague?—I would, for 12 hours, just to keep them cool, so that you could examine them better.

2477. But you do not subject human beings to quarantine when they come with a clean bill of health, in order to see if there is anything the matter with them?—No.

2479. When they come from countries where there is no cattle plague, with clean bills of health, would you subject them to this detention?—I should.

2480. But why?—It would be more satisfactory to ourselves to examine them after they had stood for 12 hours, and got quite cool. I should not require any more.

2481. Mr. Holland.] You are now speaking of fat stock?—Yes.

2482. Chairman.] I speak of the store cattle; how long would you keep them in quarantine?—From three to four days.

2483. Come from where they might?—Come from where they might, if they are poor stock; they are not sending any of the poor stock at present, or scarcely any.

2484. Supposing it was ascertained that there was not a single case of cattle plague in the country from which they are imported, would you subject those cattle to four days' quarantine upon their arrival?—Yes, as a precaution.

2485. As a precaution against what, if there was no cattle plague in the place from which they came?—There might be a cattle plague and you not know it.

2486. But I am supposing that there was not?—I can only say it would be more satisfactory to us.

2487. How long does it take to make sure the cattle plague is not in a latent state in a beast?—About five days, I should say.

2488. You could not keep them less than five days?—Yes, we could, because they would be two days on the passage, and we should count that in.

2489. Sir M. W. Ridley.] If the stores were quarantined, is it your opinion that they would be increased or diminished in value to the buyer?—I do not know; I think the foreigners will send as long as they can get the money for them.

2490. But, I mean, would they be increased in value to the buyer in this country of store cattle?—I should think it would not make any difference to the buyers myself.

2491. Would they not command a better price if they were passed out with a clean bill of health, and upon your certificate as the inspector?—I should say they would; I do not know much about the price of cattle, but I should say they would.

2492. Chairman.] You would not put the ship that brought them for five days in quarantine?—Oh, no.

2493. Is not the hold of a ship that has brought over cattle, if there has been cattle plague among them, very likely to have the poison in it?—The best plan is to wash it out, and to cleanse it with chloride of lime before any other stock of cattle is taken in.

2494. You would have a regulation of that sort?—Yes.

2495. What would you do with the drovers, with the people who look after them; would you keep them in quarantine?—No.

2496. You would let them go about their business?—Yes.

2497. Would they not spread the infection?—I do not believe in it to that extent.

2498. Lord Naas.] Are there many drovers come with these cattle?—Very few.

2499. They are consigned to agents here?—They are consigned to agents here.

2500. What class of people are the drovers who come with them; are they Englishmen or Germans?—Principally Germans; Jews, I should say.

2501. Are there drovers or small dealers who bring their own cattle?—They do sometimes, but very rarely; they are exceptional cases.

2502. In whose employ are the drovers who come from Germany?—They are employed by the party who puts them on board on that side; I do not know who pays them.

2503. The large majority of the cattle come without any drovers at all?—The large majority are without any drovers at all; the sailors take them, and get so much a head for attending to them.

2504. In hot weather, and in summer months, when these cattle are for 48 hours in the hold of these vessels, is it possible that an inspection, no matter how carefully conducted, can be perfectly satisfactory?—It is; you can tell whether there is any disease when they get cool.

2505. Before they get cool, is it possible that an inspection can be satisfactory if it takes place on board a vessel, or immediately on landing?—It is not quite satisfactory; but still we cannot do it in any other way.

2506. Do not cattle show symptoms, in consequence of over-heating, and the stifling atmosphere which they have been in, which resembles disease very much?—Yes, their eyes water sometimes; sometimes; but when they have been in the open air for some time, all that goes away.

2507. The symptoms which are caused by the over-heating are similar to symptoms of disease?—There is water in the eyes, and the eyes look inflamed, but that very soon disappears.

2508. But still these would be, in ordinary circumstances, preliminary symptoms of disease?—Yes, exactly; sometimes we wait for three or four hours, and then look over them again.

2509. You think that every beast ought to be allowed to stand in some quiet place 12 hours before inspection, in order to secure safety?—That is what I think.

2510. Chairman.] Would you subject the Irish cattle to quarantine when they arrive in England?—We scarcely see any at our port.

2511. Not store cattle?—No.

2512. Why not?—Because their passage is not so long.

2513-14. But is that not rather more a reason why they should be put in quarantine?—I believe they bring the Irish cattle on deck.

2516. Mr. Hunt.] In Ireland you would almost have the means of knowing what cattle disease there were?—Yes.

2517. But with regard to foreign cattle, you do not know where the animals come from?—We do not.

2518. Is it the case that some come from Hungary through Vienna, to the ports of Holland for shipment to this country?—Yes.

2519. You have no means of knowing what country they come from, or whether they have had any disease there?—No.

2520. You think it desirable that any animals coming from those districts should go into quarantine?—Certainly.

2521. Do you not think that the buyer would give a greater price for the animal that had passed through quarantine and come out sound, than for an animal that was supposed to have any disease latent about it?—I think he would.

2522. What disease do you stop animals for now?—There is the foot and mouth disease.

2523. Would you stop an animal that had the foot and mouth disease?—We should order it to be slaughtered there and then, and take the tongue and hoofs away and destroy them.

2524. Were would they be slaughtered, in Hull?—In Pig Alley, or in any parts to which we could get them nearest to the ships.

2525. In the case of a store animal with the foot and mouth disease, what would you do with it?—I should lock it up.

2526. You would put your lock and key upon him?—The Customs would, or else they would send a man down.

2527. Would it be treated in order to recover it if possible?—They would treat it themselves.

2528. It would not be allowed to go inland?—Not until it got better.

2529. With regard to such a disease as scab in sheep, would you stop a scabby sheep?—Yes.

2530. What would you do with it?—Just the same; lock it up.

2531. Lord Naas.] Is that what they do, or what you would do?—We do that.

2532. Mr. Hunt.] Have you had cases of scabby sheep imported?—I have not.

2533. What do you do with the sheep; do you turn them up?—We send them to the pens, and turn them up there; they are so crowded that we cannot get round them in the ship.

2534. Have you discovered any sheep disease among the sheep imported?—I did about 18 or 19 years ago, but never since. The small-pox came in one of the foreign boats.

2535. With regard to pleuro pneumonia, what are your directions about that?—If we saw any of those cases, we should stop them in a moment.

2536. Do you order them to be slaughtered?—We order those having pleuro pneumonia to be slaughtered.

2537. In the case of lean stock?—In the case of lean stock or fat stock, because it is infectious.

2538. Are you employed as cattle plague inspector by the magistrates?—Yes, I have two districts.

2539. I suppose you have seen a great deal of the cattle plague?—I have seen hundreds of cases.

2540. Is it not the opinion of professional men that the disease may be incubated in 10 days?—It was some professional men's opinion, but I think it would show itself sooner.

2541. Supposing that in some cases it takes 10 days before it appears; I suppose you would require a quarantine that would cover those 10 days?—Yes, but I am taking in the passage in that.

2542. Mr. Holland.] Have you any experience of cattle travelling by railway?—No, I have not.

2543. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Where did you see all these cases of rinderpest you have mentioned?—We have had it very bad in Hull and East Holderness.

2544. Mr. Hunt.] What do the people who have had it among their herds, attribute it to; how do they think it came?—They cannot tell; some fancy the foxhounds bring it; there are the most ridiculous ideas about it.

2545. Do they attribute it to the importation of foreign cattle?—No; some of the old farmers say it is the foreign cattle who have brought it, but the younger men do not think anything about it.

2546. You think it is a foolish prejudice?—They think so.

2547. What is your opinion; do you think it came from abroad?—It did not come from abroad at all.

2548. Chairman.] Then how do you think it arrived?—I cannot tell that really; I should like to know.

2549. Mr. Hunt.] If it did not come from abroad, you have no theory to account for its introduction?—No; I believe myself it broke out spontaneously, and I believe it broke out in London; in London the cowkeepers have not the chance that our cowkeepers have; they cannot turn their cows out to grass, and they give them stimulating stimulating food, grains, and so on, to get all the milk they can.

2550. Are you acquainted with the Hull slaughter-houses?—Yes.

2551. Is there a public slaughter-house there?—There is not one.

2552. The butchers kill at their own slaughter-houses?—Yes.

2553. Are the slaughter-houses situate in populous parts of the town?—Yes.

2554. Are they not nuisances in those populous parts of the town?—Some of the people complain, but I do not complain; other people think they are healthy. For myself I do not find any inconvenience; it may be so, some parties make a deal of noise about it.

2555. Are they licensed?—I believe they are.

2556. Would you think it an improvement to have a public slaughter-house on the outskirts of the town, or outside the town?—I do not know about that.

2557. You have not considered that question?—No.

2558. Lord Naas.] When you lock up a beast with foot and mouth disease, do you continue to inspect him as long as he is in custody?—Yes.

2559. How long do you keep the animals there?—Sometimes three days; sometimes only two days; sometimes four days.

2560. Is that sufficiently long to cure them?—They soon get a turn; it is only local disease.

2561. What is the general duration of foot and mouth disease?—Five or six days, not more.

2562. Is the beast not turned out or allowed to go into the countryuntil you give him a certificate that he is well?—No.

2563. At whose expense is he kept?—At the expense of the importer.

2564. Now, in cases of store beasts, if you find cases of pleura pneumonia amongst them, what do you do then?—Slaughter them at once.

2565. No matter how lean the beast is, you never attempt to cure him?—No; if he is not very bad at the beginning, he is fit for human food.

2566. Have you ever had any cases of disease of that kind?—I have not.

2567. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Is it the result of your experience that foot and mouth disease lasts only that limited time?—Some beasts get over it quicker than others.

2568. I have known some beasts to have it 14 days?—If you dress out their mouths with salt, and so on, you can soon get rid of it.

2569. Mr. Holland.] Would it not infect another animal after five days?—It would if the matter from the feet got to a sore part of another beast.

2570. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Did you ever know any die of it?—I do not recollect any dying of it myself.

Mr. William Valentine, called in; and Examined.

Mr. W. Valentine.

2571. Mr. Norwood.] I believe you are the Meat and Nuisance Inspector of the local Board of Health at Hull?—Yes.

2572. The local Board of Health have cognisance of all matters affecting the health of the town?—Yes.

2573. You have under your inspection the slaughter houses in the town?—Yes.

2574. On the whole, are they well managed?—Yes.

2575. At the present day are they sufficient for the purpose of slaughtering the foreign beasts which have to be slaughtered at the port?—Quite, if there were three times as many.

2576. Do you say that distinctly?—Yes.

2577. So that if it was to be a permanent regulation that fat cattle were to be slaughtered at Hull for import, there would be accommodation for that purpose in the town?—Yes.

2578. Is there any difficulty in the way of the butchers from the inland towns obtaining slaughtering accommodation?—No, the butchers in the town of Hull are quite agreeable to lend them any aid they can to bring forward the cattle slaughtering.

2579. Has it been the case lately, since the prohibition, that when butchers from inland towns have bought foreign beasts in Hull, they have had no difficulty in getting accommodation to slaughter them themselves?—No, they can slaughter them at once.

2580. The slaughter houses are licensed by the local Board?—Yes.

2581. And you have constant inspection?—I have them quite under my control, all of them.

2582. Have you any suggestion to make as to improving the slaughter houses in any way?—No.

2583. You are quite satisfied?—Yes.

2584. You say the health of the town is properly considered in the regulations of them?—Yes.

2585. Do you know of your own knowledge that the health of the town is now remarkably satisfactory?—Yes.

2586. I believe the average of mortality is under 26?—I believe it is.

2587. You have nothing to do with the inspection of foreign cattle when they come in. Your inspection commences when they get to the shambles?—Yes, but the Board require me to see all cattle landed if I can; it gives me a great insight if I see anything wrong to notice them more when they are slaughtered. Any beast that is the least touched with foot and mouth complaint is ordered to be at once slaughtered.

2588. That, I suppose, is ordered by the last witness?—Yes, and the Custom House officer stops with it whilst it is being slaughtered, and then I take possession of the feet, and head, and tongue; I examine them, and if they have the complaint they go to the boiling house to be destroyed, and the Custom House officer sees them destroyed. Anything that comes foreign is under the Customs, and they see it destroyed if there is disease.

2589. You have cognisance of all the dead meat in Hull, whether it is offered for consumption at Hull, or going away?—Yes.

2590. And you have power to stop any carcase?—Yes.

2591. Have you been compelled to exercise that power lately, and to stop any carcases going to the railway?—Not one.

2592. And the meat has gone away in good condition?—In capital condition.

2593. Mr.

2593. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Do you think Manchester could be supplied with dead meat from Hull?—A great deal of it is.

2594. It is now?—Yes.

2595. And has been since these late regulations?—Yes, a great deal of it has gone to Manchester, to Sheffield, to Leeds and Bradford; all the way round for nearly 100 miles.

2596. Do you think that could be continued during the summer, if the trains were sent by night? — Not if you came to kill it in hot weather.

2597. Supposing it was kept a day at Hull, and then sent off the following evening?—That would make it nearly two days; it would be as green as grass before it got there, and most of it condemnable. I am afraid that would work very badly when the hot weather came on.

2598. Are animals who are seized with foot and mouth disease, when slaughtered, fit for food or not?—They are fit for food if taken in the first stage, and you do not put any medicine through them. We never allow them to have any medicine; if they do we condemn them directly, and have them slaughtered.

2599. Mr. Banks Stanhope.] You know nothing of the state of the foreign animals when they come?—Yes, I attend to them the same as the veterinary surgeon does, but I have not the power that he has; if I see anything wrong I mention it to him, and we consult about what is best to be done with them. They are all under his inspection, but I look after them afterwards; there is nothing comes but which they inform us of.

2600. In what condition do the foreign cattle generally come?—I have never seen them come in so good a condition since they began coming; I have attended to the boats ever since I have been in the cattle trade, and I have never seen them come so well as they have come lately.

2601. Therefore you think the inspection has been good?—I think it could not be better.

2602. It has been useful in bringing the animals in better condition?—Yes; they could not possibly come in better condition than they do now. They are wonderfully improved since last year.

2603. Before the inspection used you to see any diseased animals among them?—No; I have never seen cattle come in in a more satisfactory state; they are more like cattle coming out of a fold yard than anywhere else. From most of the boats several of the beasts came in a very unsanitary condition, which we had to bring before the magistrates; and we had to bring some of the people before the magistrates for ill-using the cattle, and likewise bringing them in in such an unsanitary state.

2604. Before the inspection you had complaints to make of the way in which the animals were carried?—There was always an inspection.

2605. But lately they have been much better than they used to be?—Last year I was complaining to the Sanitary Committee about every fortnight as to the state of the Bremen boats and other boats.

2606. Tell us in what condition these Bremen boats were, and what you had to complain of?—There were too great a number of cattle, and they brought them without any bedding at all. I believe they very seldom gave them any water. The heat prevailed to such a degree that no person could go below. If I went below, in two or three minutes I was nearly blind.

2608. Then you mean to tell us that the beasts used to be very much illused?—Yes; I brought the Humane Society's officer, and showed it to him, and we summoned the captain. The stipendiary magistrate fined him 5 l., promising him faithfully if he went again before him, he would imprison him, and not fine him. They used to have a boat, in which they used to take them out by slings, and so on. The store beasts are chiefly in calf, and it used to do them a great deal of injury; in some cases the calves used to be actually protruding at the time they were getting them out.

2609. Are these screw vessels or paddle vessels?—The screw boats can bring them equally well as the paddle boats.

2610. Taking last year, when you had so many complaints to make, were the screw boats or the paddle boats worst?—Last year was very bad weather, and stormy. I think it would be very much better if so many cattle were fixed in a pen, and all tied by the neck. There is a very great objection to tying them by the head.

2611. Do you think that any regulation laid down as to the number of cattle to be carried in each boat would be observed?—I should think it a great benefit.

2612. Do you think that any system of licensing vessels to carry so many cattle of a certain age would be of use?—It would.

2613. Would that make your duty more easy?—Yes, a good deal more easy; certainly it would.

2614. Would it enable them to bring the cattle over in better condition?—It would; they are too much crowded now; and, when it is stormy weather and the vessel begins to rock, they would go 20 or 30 of them down together, and they must injure one another very much.

2615. Would it be of any use to give power to the local authorities to admit any cargo that has been overpenned?—It would be better if a law was laid down to restrict them on the other side from putting so many cattle on board.

2616. Would it be of any use to turn back any vessel that had transgressed your regulations?—Yes, it would be better to put restrictions on them to stop them.

2617. Your observations apply principally to store cattle?—Yes, to store cattle; that is the mode of getting them out of the hold. So many of them come in calf that by landing them in the slings, it is very injurious to them.

2618. Do you mean that the animals which have been most injured in the transit, have been the cows?—Yes.

2619. In consequence of the slinging them out of the vessels?—Yes.

Mr. W. Valentine.

2620. You have no landing place?—Only at certain times of the tide.

2621. You have no floating landing place?—No.

2622. Would it have been of use to the cattle trade to have a floating wharf?—Yes.

2623. That is one of the things that would be recommended, as far as you know Hull?—Yes.

2624. With regard to fat animals, are they also overcrowded?—Yes, they are.

2625. Do you find that fat animals have been ill used?—Very much indeed.

2626. That they have been bruised by blows to force them into a crowded space?—They have been bruised by the bad weather, and the knocking about, which cannot be avoided in any vessel I believe, if they are ever so few, but it would be better if there were restrictions put to bring a certain number.

2627. As to the fat animals, are they brought over in a crowded state as well as the others?—Yes, at times; nearly all those are sent from Bremen.

2628. Are there any divisions in those vessels between the animals?—Some of them have.

2629. But that is not always?—Not in all of them; in many of the boats they put what they can upon the poop or anywhere; where the passengers are even. Every available space which they can fill they will.

2630. They carry animals below and also on deck?—They do.

2631. What precautions are taken on board those boats to clean the vessels after they take their animals out?—I only know that they take the sand out and wash them before they put the cargo in; I do not know whether they disinfect them at all.

2632. They do not lime-wash them at all?—No.

2633. Merely take the sand out and put fresh sand in?—I am not aware that they do not wash them out, but I am not aware that they do.

2634. Is the smell from the animals very bad on board those vessels?—Dreadful at times.

2635. Have you seen a cow with any disease come over?—I have not; not one; the only complaint I have ever seen has been the foot and mouth complaint.

2636. What is done with those that come over with the foot and mouth complaint?—The veterinary orders them to be slaughtered immediately; the Customs House sends a man with them while they are being slaughtered, and then, after they are slaughtered, I take what is not sound away, the head and feet, and so on, and have them destroyed.

2637. Supposing a certain number of cattle with the foot and mouth disease are killed by order of the inspectors, what happens to the other cattle that came over in the same hold, which do not happen to show symptoms of it?—They are sold.

2638. Do you think, according to your knowledge, it is possible that those animals might have caught the disease, but did not show it at the time they were sold?—Do you mean with the foot and mouth disease?

2639. Yes?—It is a very common thing, and I know it was formerly, when we used to shift them by the railway; for many years that has been so; a farmer always expects it when the beasts go to a fresh climate; the different heats and colds will bring it on.

2640. Used you to have any animals suffering from pleuro-pneumonia?—Yes, a great many.

2641. What happens to those animals which have that disease?—When they were in a bad state, we used to condemn them, and have them destroyed.

2642. Supposing any animals were condemned, what happened to the animals that were brought over in the hold of the same vesssel?—They were slaughtered.

2643. Were those slaughtered which did not show symptoms of it; was the whole cargo slaughtered?—No, only those that had it.

2644. What became of the others; were they allowed to be sold?—Yes.

2645. And do not you think it possible that that might have communicated the disease?—I do not know that it would.

2646. Do you not think it possible that they would catch that disease, coming over in the hold with the diseased animals?—No, there have been very few of that sort; I have not seen above one during this 12 months or more.

2647. Mr. Hunt.] It is your duty to inspect the slaughter-houses and meat markets?—It is.

2648. How many slaughter-houses are there in Hull?—Seventy-two or 73.

2649. Then whenever a beast is slaughtered have you to attend?—Yes, I visit all the slaughter-houses twice a week, and some of them several times in a day, when we know there is much slaughtering of foreign cattle.

2650. The regulations with regard to the movement of foreign cattle, I suppose, induce the Hull slaughtermen to slaughter largely for the purpose of sending dead meat to other towns?—No, not a great deal; they did sometimes, when the market suited, send to London.

2651. Do they not send to Manchester and Leeds?—No, I never knew any instances but once or twice, of dead meat going to Manchester.

2652. Was there not an increase in slaughtering when the railway prohibition was in force?—Not until the traffic was stopped from going by the railway.

2653. When the cattle were stopped from going by the railway were more beasts slaughtered in Hull?—Certainly; the buyers have to come there to buy them.

2654. Then the Hull butchers supplied other towns with dead meat at that time?—Yes.

2655. I suppose that gave you a very great increase of labour, did it not?—It did.

2656. Does it frequently happen that you have to condemn meat as unfit for food?—I have only condemned one beast within the last five months.

2657. What had the beast been suffering from?—Partly from the lung complaint, and what they call "nangberry;" it grows in the inside, more like a large berry than anything else; right from one side to the other, in the inside, and the lungs are very much diseased.

2658. Was that a foreign animal, or an English animal?—An English animal. It was passed for a healthy beast, but it did not turn out to be one.

2659. Is that the only animal you have condemned this year?—Yes.

2660. Have you condemned any joints; any portions of meat?—No.

2661. How many hours a day are you occupied in the inspection?—My time is night and day when I am wanted. I get up at six o'clock in the morning; I do not go to bed until 10 or 11 at night, and I am called up at any hour when they want me.

2662. I suppose you have a great deal of conversation with the butchers and slaughtermen?—Yes.

2663. Did you hear that when they were sending away dead meat to other towns there was any complaint made of its not reaching the other towns in a good state?—No, I never heard a word.

2664. Would you approve of there being a public slaughter-house in Hull instead of all these 72 private slaughter-houses?—No, I think it answers uncommonly well as it is.

2665. You think it is not capable of improvement?—No.

2666. I suppose the inspection would be carried out more easily if there was one slaughter-house?—Perhaps it might, but the butchers have all their own places, and they would be much more comfortable as they are; it would be a very hard thing to keep the men in order if they were all in one slaughter-house.

2667. I suppose the slaughter-house would be kept in order more easily?—There is not a place in England which is supplied with water in the same way as they are at Hull, and we have them white-washed two or three times a year; we get the manure out twice a week; in fact, everything is kept in good order, and I assure you the Board of Health are very strict with them.

2668. Mr. Norwood.] In answer to an Honourable Member about the crowding on board the ships, in what you said you were not alluding to all the ships; you alluded more particularly to the Bremen boats?—To the Bremen boats.

2669. In the Hamburgh trade you do not find the overcrowding?—They cannot bring them better than they do; they are anxious to do everything to meet the urgency of the trade.

2670. Am I right in assuming you do not mean to complain of the steamboat traffic of Hull?—Yes; I think they cannot do better; it is more like going into a farm yard as to several of the vessels that come up; there are tons of hay and straw left behind which have not been used. They have a benefit in keeping them well, for the captain and the men are well paid for looking after the animals.

2671. They have an interest in bringing the cattle over as well as possible?—They have.

2672. As to these things which you have spoken of, if I recollect rightly, there was a great deal of attention paid to the case you alluded to about the cows in calf, and there was a considerable deal of indignation about the matter, and there has been a change?—Yes, there has; Mr. Ringrose has got splendid boats, on board of which the beasts can walk, and there is no more slings.

2673. There has been a decided improvement in the arrangements during the last few months?—There has, indeed; they cannot possibly bring them in a better way than they have brought them, or in better condition.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE MILNER GIBSON, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. JAMES CRESSWELL WALL, called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. C. Wall. 17 May 1866.

2674. Chairman.] WHAT are you?—I am the Goods Manager of the Bristol and Exeter Railway.

2675. Have you much cattle traffic on your line?—We have a very heavy traffic from Cornwall, and from Devonshire, which is a large breeding county, as Members are aware, and also from Somersetshire. Somersetshire and Devonshire especially are very large grazing counties.

2676. From Exeter to Bristol?—From Exeter to Bristol, and from Barnstaple to Bristol, and from Bridgewater to Bristol, and from the rich districts of Taunton to Bristol.

2677. Fat cattle principally?—Fat cattle principally of the Devon kind. Those are a very heavy class of cattle.

2678. And store cattle?—And store cattle. We used to carry very large numbers from Somersetshire and Devonshire to the neighbourhood of Banbury, and also to the eastern counties, for grazing.

2679. Has it been your practice previously to this cattle plague to cleanse the trucks after each journey?—I would not positively say that they have been cleansed after each journey previously to the Orders in Council, but they were generally cleansed, for this reason: that the traffic of the Bristol and Exeter, and the West of England Railways generally, is a traffic going westward as to general merchandise, and we depended, to a great extent, on the carriage of cattle for the return journey, so that we were obliged to cleanse our trucks because we used our cattle trucks for the transmission of our ordinary merchandise.

2680. When you cleansed them, did you use any disinfectant?—We did not, until the cattle plague appeared, and we had orders so to do.

2681. It was not your practice to use lime-water, or anything of the sort?—It was not.

2682. Since the permission to carry cattle by rail has been given, has your trade recommenced?—It has recommenced partially, but certainly does not amount to one-fourth of what it was this time last year. I may, perhaps, inform the Committee that on the appearance of the cattle plague, and the orders given by Parliament, which interfered to a great extent with the transmission of cattle the Bristol, and Exeter Railway directors turned their attention to the subject, and at their request and desire, a circular was issued to this effect; perhaps I may as well read it: "Bristol and Exeter Railway. Goods Department, Bristol, January 4th, 1866. Cattle Plague.—The traffic by railway of horned stock and swine having been to a very great extent interfered with, the 'West of England Produce Company' hereby inform the graziers of Somerset and Devon that they can offer, at their stores, on and after the 11th instant, ample and complete accommodation for the reception of carcasses sent to them by railway, and that with a view to diminish, as far as possible, the inconvenience and loss that must necessarily arise under the present restrictions, both to graziers and to the public, they have made the necessary arrangements for the sale of carcasses, which must be addressed to the care of Mr. H. T. Swan, West of England Agricultural Produce Stores, New-cut, Bristol. The carcasses will be removed direct from the meat vans of the Bristol and Exeter Railway Company to the shambles, which are very lofty and roomy." Then they nominated certain persons whose names are given here, to whom the meat intended for those sales were to be delivered. The arrangements were these: that we placed a large goods shed at the disposal of two or three gentlemen who felt an interest in the subject in Bristol. The goods shed was fitted up as a carcase market, with sidings running into it, and meat vans constructed to carry carcasses, were immediately ordered, and then we informed the public that all information could be had at our several stations from the goods superintendents at those different points. As manager, they authorised me to say, that until some other arrangements were made, we should be responsible for the proper account of sales, and for remittances. We found that that was responded to to a very great extent by the graziers and farmers of Devonshire and Somersetshire, and that several station slaughter-houses had been erected, so that animals are slaughtered at the railway stations, put into very commodious vans, hung, in fact, as they would be hung in the shambles, brought to these stores, and there they are offered for sale.

2683. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Is that a railway arrangement or a company arrangement?—All railway arrangements. We found our traffic was considerably diminishing.

2684. Chairman.] This was during the time when there was the prohibition going on as to carrying cattle by rail?—On the 4th January.

2685. Mr. Edward Egerton.] The prohibition did not take place until the 20th February?—No, it anticipated the prohibition.

2686. Chairman.]

2686. Chairman.] The butchers in Bristol came to this shed, where all the meat was, to purchase for their shops?—No; the butchers in Bristol held a meeting, and came to a resolution not to have anything to do with, or to deal directly or indirectly with any one who sent carcases to these stores. The result was this, that the carcases were offered to the public. The public rushed down in very large numbers, and there was no difficulty at all in selling the meat. People of first-class respectability, such as physicians, in Clifton, proprietors of schools, and others, clubbed together: several gentlemen said, we will have a sheep between us, and all that sort of thing. There was a very great demand, and farmers and graziers, if one may judge from the success which attended the undertaking, got very much better returns through this company than they were receiving from the butchers, while, on the other hand, a very large saving was made to the consumer.

2687. The butchers declined to have anything to do with your arrangement?—They did. I have had a report this morning from the manager as to it.

2688. Mr. Hunt.] Did you find customers almost immediately on your opening these stores?—The customers arrived in large numbers.

2689. Immediately?—Immediately. The stores were advertised in the morning papers, three daily papers, that we have in Bristol; there was no difficulty at all.

2690. Mr. Edward Egerton.] What was the difference in price?—I will not speak positively, but there was a difference of something like 3 d. a pound.

2691. Three pence a pound cheaper to the public?—Cheaper to the public. I know that the returns averaged about 4 s. 8 d. a stone, which is 7 d. a pound. The money was returned to the graziers and farmers, who sent their meat to these stores. At the same time I, residing in Clifton, was paying 10 d. per lb. for mutton.

2692. Who took the hides and skins?—The hides, I should think, were sold to country tanners; the hides did not come to Bristol, because the prohibition extended to hides as well as cattle.

2693. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] You said 7 d. a pound; the 7 d. is a wholesale price, and 10 d. a pound is the retail price, to say nothing of the profit, and we cannot compare the 7 d. with the 10 d. unless we compare the 10 d. with the wholesale market price?—I think the 7 d. that was returned to the farmers and graziers must have been a larger price than the butchers were then paying, for this reason, that the stores were inundated with carcases, and the graziers and farmers appeared to like the system very much; the butchers of course did not. It was not taken up at all by the Bristol and Exeter Railway Company or by myself as a speculation in meat; the steps were taken merely with a view to keep up, as far as possible, our traffic receipts which we found were falling off, and there has always been a very large difference in the price of conveying the live cattle and the price of conveying the dead meat; but we find now it is as much more profitable to carry dead meat than it is to carry live cattle; therefore, we have reduced our carriage for dead meat, something like 40 per cent. within the last two months, and now it is about 60 per cent. higher than the price we should receive for the carriage of live cattle.

2694. Mr. Hunt.] Would you give us the rates?—I will give you the rates from Exeter to London, if you please.

2696. What was your rate for live stock?—Our rate for live stock averaged about 6 d. per truck per mile; fat cattle would have been brought for about 7 s. each.

2697. To Bristol?—To Bristol; that would give us 2 l. 2 s. for the use of a truck from Exeter to Bristol on an average; we, generally speaking, load from three to four tons of dead meat, which would give us 5 l. or 4 l.

2698. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] This was not winter time?—Yes; we have had no experience of hot weather; the carriage of carcases by railway, even in the summer time, is not a new thing on the broad-gauge system, as between Cornwall and London, for, during the whole of last summer, there was a very heavy traffic in dead meat from Cornwall to London.

2699. Was that carried in baskets?—Sometimes in baskets, and sometimes hung in the trucks. In wet weather it travels very nicely indeed, and does not get dusty, but in the absence of rain, it is necessary when the meat is slung, to protect it with cloths.

2700. Mr. Hunt.] Is there any particular difficulty in protecting the meat, when it is hung?—We have not found any.

2701. Would the carcases swing against one another when suspended in the trucks?—They are hung rather closely to each other, and steadied by hooks.

2702. Laterally?—Yes, laterally; I have not heard any complaints.

2703. Has the meat sustained damage; has the surface of the meat been abraided at all?—We have not had any claims from salesmen for compensation for any damage; I cannot speak as to the state in which the meat arrives in the market.

2704. You have had no complaints?—We have had no complaints.

2706. Where were the animals slaughtered which found their way to the store at Bristol?—Most of them were slaughtered at the farm-houses, but a great many animals are slaughtered at Tiverton, in Devonshire, at the railway company's station, where we have provided very ample slaughter-houses.

2707. Do you provide slaughtermen?—No.

2708. When an animal is sent to your station to be slaughtered, who slaughters it?—It is brought there by the owners; they witness the slaughter of the animal, and consign it to their salesmen in London.

2709. What time elapses between the time of the slaughtering of the animals and sending them off by the train?—Sometimes between a quarter of an hour and half an hour; it depends very much on local circumstances.

2710. Is the meat sent off before it is set?—It sets very well in the vans, because the roofs are very high, and the vans are ventilated; there is a great current of air rushing through them. I have been told the meat sets exceedingly well during the journey.

2711. Who is it left to to place cloths and arrange the meat in dusty weather; is it left to the company, or to the owner of the meat?—In some cases to the owners of the meat, in some cases to the company; the company finds hampers and cloths at the different stations for the accommodation of the public.

2712. I am speaking of the case where car cases are suspended in the trucks; does it rest with you to protect them by cloths?—Generally speaking the owners provide the slaughtermen, but if they do not, then we provide them, and lend them to them.

2713. Would there be any claims against the company, supposing the meat got damaged by dust during the transit?—I have never received any claim of that kind, and I think it is a claim that would be resisted.

2715. The trucks run by means of sidings into the slaughter-houses?—Yes.

2716. So that the meat is taken down from beams, and transferred at once into the meat van?—Yes.

2717. By hand?—By hand.

2718. Are you now in a position to accommodate all the dead meat with trucks in which it can be suspended; you call them "travelling larders," do you not?—We call them "meat vans." Occasionally it happens that a few hours detention arises; but we are constructing them now as fast as we can; practically we have not had any complaints from the public.

2718*. Since the railway movement of cattle has been allowed, have you found that the farmers still prefer slaughtering the animals, and sending up their carcases?—The farmers still send very large quantities slaughtered; but the butchers have gone down into the country and bought animals, and Bristol has been supplied, of course largely, with live stock since the orders have been modified.

2719. Has this plan of selling carcasses at these Bristol stores been carried on since the railway prohibition has been taken off?—There was one of the largest sales there on Saturday last, as I am informed by the post this morning, that they have had at all.

2720. Has the effect been to make the butchers lower their prices in Bristol?—Yes.

2721. Do you know what the retail price in Bristol is now?—I will not say positively now, but, about a month ago, I conversed with several people, and they thought it had the effect of reducing the prices of mutton by about 2*d.* a pound; these stores have been largely patronised by co-operative stores. In the districts of Bristol there are several co-operative stores, and meat from these places has been bought to a very great extent by these people, and retailed to the consumers on Saturday nights.

2722. In the case of the slaughtering of animals adjacent to the station, what becomes of the offal?—It is retained by the owners.

2723. They dispose of it as they please?—Yes.

2724. How do you think it possible to continue this large traffic in dead meat in hot weather?—We had considerable expèrience last summer in carrying dead meat from Cornwall; I do not remember any inconvenience, I myself do not see why it should not be continued.

2725. Was meat sent from Cornwall to London; to Newgate Market?—Yes.

2726. During the whole of last summer?—During the whole of last summer; during the very hot weather.

2727. Were any claims made against you for loss, in consequence of the meat being spoilt?—If the meat was delivered in proper time, and it was tainted, we should not have heard anything about it; we heard nothing of the kind.

2728. If your trains were late, of course the claim would have been made?—Yes.

2729. Have you meat trains, or does the meat go by the ordinary goods trains?—We run very fast meat trains.

2730. That is to say, trains carrying nothing but meat?—Nothing but meat.

2731. Perishable things?—Perishable commodities, vegetables. If the train is a small one, we carry a few trucks of merchandise, very likely.

2732. And you carry fish?—Yes; and there is a large traffic in vegetables from Cornwall.

2733. What time do these trains, taking these perishable articles of food, occupy in the journey?—We have a train which leaves Exeter at five in the evening, and which reaches London at four o'clock in the morning. The distance is nearly 200 miles.

2734. The meat which was sent in the carriages by those trains was meat killed that morning?—Killed during the day.

2735. How long have you had these meat vans on your line?—From about 15 to 18 months, I think.

2736. I suppose the advantage to the owners of the cattle is, that they know exactly what weight goes to the market?—They weigh them before they send them.

2737. In the case of a man sending off a live beast, he would trust to his salesman?—Yes, I suppose that would be so.

2738. But where the owner of a beast sees it slaughtered, he knows exactly what it is that he is selling?—I know the animals are weighed before they are put in the trucks.

2739. Do you think that the feeder of the beast gets more, but that the butchers suffer?—That is my opinion. I have based my opinion upon the fact, that the farmers and graziers of Somersetshire have availed themselves of these opportunities to a very great extent, and have gone on, and are well satisfied.

2740. You sum it up in this way: that the farmer gains, and that the feeders of the cattle gain, but that the butchers lose?—That is my opinion.

2741. Have you any statistics as to the quantity of dead meat which you have brought up at any any portion of the year?—I have not brought it with me, but I can give you an approximate answer in a moment. Do you mean in tons weight?

2742. Give it us in tons?—To Bristol and London from places west of Bridgwater, about 200 tons a-week, or rather more.

2743. Do you find the quantity varies accord- to the state of the weather?—No; the quantity varies, I fancy, more from the state of the markets. If there is a large market in London or Bristol, the graziers are advised to hold on until they hear again from the salesmen.

2744. Where formerly they used to send live stock up to salesmen, they now send carcasses up to salesmen?—To a very large extent.

2745. Do you find the same salesmen have taken to the dead meat trade who used to deal more in the live trade?—I am not in a position to answer that question; I believe as far as London is concerned that the system has not varied, and that the old firms still have consignments sent to them, but, as far as Bristol is concerned, it is quite a different thing.

2746. Do you think the vendors of stock down in the remote west depend on advices from London as to what quantity they should send?—I should say, to a great extent, they are controlled by the quantity they should send off at any particular time by the question of demand and supply in London and large towns.

2747. Are orders sent by letter or by telegram?—In some cases by telegram and in other cases by letter; but very frequently by telegram.

2749. You have said that your traffic in live stock has very much fallen off, and that it has not re-commenced since the railway movement has been prohibited to anything like the extent it formerly took place?—Last week I was speaking to one of our largest graziers in Somersetshire, who had that morning sent 20 large Devon steers to Bristol market. At Bristol market the order is that if cattle once enter the market they are to be branded, and must be slaughtered within a certain time. The natural consequence is, that when the animal is once there the butchers have it all their own way, and this gentlemen, who is a very respectable man, Mr. Bond, said that he sold 32 prime Devon beasts at about 4 l. each less then he gave for them in the neighbourhood of Taunton.

2750. You used to carry lean stock into the the grazing districts?—In large numbers.

2751 That was particularly at two periods of the year, was it not?—Yes.

2752. Do you know what has become of the surplus store stock in Somersetshire, Devonshire, and Cornwall, which used to come up from the grazing districts in the Spring?—I know that there are very large numbers still remaining in those districts, and that it is a very hard case for a great many people who have them in large numbers, because they cannot realise; there they are, and they cannot remove them.

2753. They are very much depreciated?—No doubt.

2754. Do you know how the grazing districts have managed to get a supply?—No; I do not think they have been able to get a supply; there is a very much larger breadth of grass about Somersetshire, Devonshire, and Cornwall, than I have ever seen, and I have known those counties intimately now for the last 20 years.

2755. Do you carry any Irish animals, landed at the port of Bristol?—No; the Irish cattle principally go to the north and to London, when they are landed at Bristol; very few of them go westward.

2756. You know nothing of the traffic of the Great Western Railway up to London?—I know it by being intimately connected, as we are, with the Great Western, and in continual communication with their officers. I could give you the rates of carriage pretty nearly.

2757. We will get it from a gentleman from the Great Western Company; you have nothing to do with it?—Nothing at all.

2758. Now, with regard to the cleansing of the trucks; the floors of the trucks want renewing very frequently, do they not, in consequence of what falls from the animals?—Yes; the trucks that carry cattle require renewing much more frequently than those that do not.

2759. How often have you to re-floor your trucks on an average?—I should think a truck would last for two or three years.

2760. It is very difficult, in the present construction of trucks, thoroughly to disinfect the floors, is it not?—It is not difficult; but it requires a great deal of labour and care.

2761. The fluid gets down into the joints; is it not so?—Yes; it requires a copious supply of water, and very hard brushes, and a great amount of labour.

2762. The cleansing of the trucks is left to your subordinate officers very much, is it not?—It used to be, but since the peremptory orders we have had, the station-masters at the different stations are held responsible; and, I believe I may say, it is superintended as well as you can expect anything of the sort to be superintended.

2763. The trucks have to be shunted on to sidings?—They have.

2764. Therefore the station-masters eye cannot be always on the process of cleansing and disinfecting them?—Not always; but the orders are very peremptory: I think I may say it is practically done very well.

2765. Have you turned your attention to any mode of flooring the trucks and covering them with a substance, which would enable them to be washed out more easily?—I have thought of it, but it is a very difficult question. If you employ zinc or any other metal, the animals slip about very much; in fact, you must naturally have a rough surface to prevent that, in order to obviate difficulty in travelling.

2766. You must have a cross piece, in order that the animals may get a grip?—You must have cross pieces or you must have divisions.

2767. Have you thought about pitching or tarring the bottoms of the trucks, or asphalting them?—We did think of asphalte, but I am afraid that would soon get rotten and torn; and if once it got holey, it would be difficult to cleanse the trucks.

2768. What are you using now to disinfect the trucks with?—I cannot tell you the chemical properties, but we get it from the wholesale druggists in very large quantities. It is a powerful disinfectant, but I cannot tell you the chemical properties.

2769. When the filth is taken out of the trucks, where is it thrown?—It is taken away by people in the neighbourhood, who are very glad to get the sweepings of the sheds generally.

Mr. J. C. Wall.

17 May 1866.

2770. Is it used as manure?—It is used as manure.

2771. You throw the disinfecting fluid into the truck before the truck is swept out?—Yes; and after.

2772. Is there any disinfecting fluid poured over the heap of refuse after it is swept out of the trucks?—I cannot say that it is so.

2773. Has any person visited any station with which you are connected for the purpose of seeing that the disinfection is carried out properly?—I was not present, but an officer, I think from the Board of Trade, visited several of the places, and expressed himself satisfied. I happened to be in London during the time on parliamentary business.

2774. There is no person appointed by any local authority to visit the stations from time to time to see it done, is there?—No.

2775. Sir M. W. Ridley.] Are these carcases of dead meat all transmitted to London, or are they left at intermediate towns?—They are left at intermediate towns; but principally at Bristol and London.

2776. Then you have not had any complaints from the intermediate places at which they have been deposited any more than from London?—No.

2777. Do you propose continuing the system?—We shall encourage it as much as possible, inasmuch as the directors believe it will prove ultimately more profitable to the company.

2778. You have found that your returns and profits are better since you reduced the rate of charge upon the dead meat?—Yes; we are in fact now considering a further reduction. The difference now is about 60 per cent. in favour of carrying dead meat instead of live cattle as far as we can make an estimate; and we shall be prepared to reduce it still further.

2779. Have you reason to suppose that no damage has been done to the carcases as they have been taken down from the slaughter-houses and packed by those who have had charge of them?—Our claims have been very small indeed We have not had any representation from any London salesman, or any other salesman, to the effect that they have found them bruised. It has not been suggested that we could stow them better.

2781. In some cases it is sent on warm?—Quite warm. It depends a great deal on the time at the disposal of the persons who bring cattle to the stations.

2782. The perishable goods trains are all night trains?—They are night trains principally, as far west as Exeter, but from Plymouth they are not night trains, because they are obliged to leave Plymouth at two o'clock in the afternoon, or at one in the afternoon, in order to reach London in time the next morning.

2783. That is, the two o'clock trains reach Exeter by five p.m.?—Yes, they reach Exeter by about five p.m.

2784. The O'Connor Don.] Do I understand you to say that you gain a profit of 60 per cent. by carrying dead meat instead of live meat?—I meant to say that the payment to the Company for actual weight is about 60 per cent. in favour of the dead meat over the live cattle, which is not 60 per cent. profit, because as to the live cattle, we have no loading or unloading, nor so much invoicing and clerkage work to do. A ton of live meat would pay us 60 per cent. less for carrying than a ton of dead meat.

2785. Therefore the public pay 60 per cent. less for the carriage of live meat than for the carriage of dead meat?—Yes; the difference would be diminished; it is quite a new trade to us.

2786. You do not gain the whole benefit of 60 per cent. which the public pay in addition?—No, it is more costly to us.

2787. And it is 60 per cent. more costly to the public?—Yes, that is to say, as the rates are arranged now.

Mr. John Dickenson, called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. Dickenson.

2788. Mr. Hunt.] Are you a Butcher at Sheffield?—I am a Butcher, but only by necessity.

2789. What are you?—I am a Cattle Dealer.

2790. You say you are a butcher "by necessity"; what do you mean by that?—Previously to the cattle disease breaking out, we used to trade in cattle, and show them at the market at Rotherham, Wakefield, Liverpool, and Manchester. We used to purchase them in Ireland, and also Scotland, and at Hull; but since the order came out, of course everybody cannot go to fetch the dead meat from the different ports, and we have had to slaughter, and have been slaughtering very largely.

2791. Your trade was entirely dispensed with by that prohibition as to the movement of cattle by railway?—Entirely.

2792. You turned your attention to supplying your customers with carcasses, instead of live animals?—Just so.

2793. Have you had to send your agents about to different places to purchase carcasses?—No. When the order came out, I used to go to Dublin and slaughter them at Liverpool. When we found we could get the foreign cattle cheaper, and thought we could work the thing better, we went to Hull, and have been slaughtering them at Hull.

2794. You have been slaughtering them at different ports for the purpose of supplying your own customers?—Yes; we have sent them to Huddersfield, to Wakefield, to Halifax, and different places.

2795. You have found great want of accommodation for slaughtering, I suppose?—There is want of accommodation, but not any difficulty. We have found room in Liverpool and in Hull for what we wanted to slaughter.

2796. I suppose the order about stopping the movement of live animals caused a great run to be made on the slaughter-houses for the purpose of supplying the markets?—Of course it did.

2797. But you were able to get your animals slaughtered?—Yes; and we have been slaughtering up to this time nearly 200 a-week.

2798. Where have you been slaughtering principally?—At Hull, for the last five or six months.

2799. Your trade has got very much into another line since?—It has entirely.

2800. Have you found any difficulty in supplying other towns?—We have found great difficulty; in fact, it is so much a difficulty, that when the warm weather sets in, we shall have to give it up; we cannot do it. The gentleman who has been last giving evidence states they have have quick trains for meat. The company afford us very little accommodation on the North Eastern line. We had the live animals taken much quicker than the dead meat.

2801. You have heard that gentleman's evidence as to the meat taken to London from Exeter?—Yes, I have.

2802. I suppose, if you had fast trains, you would be able to continue the supply?—Yes; but they will not do it. The difficulty would be so great, that we could not send it. It is only on account of the very favourable weather we have had, that we have been able to slaughter the cattle.

2803. What line do you use?—The North Eastern; we are shut up to that: there is no accommodation, virtually. The Lincolnshire Railway comes to Hull; but they have to cross the water; and if we sent it by the Lincolnshire line, that causes an extra loading and unloading in the truck. The less we move the meat after it is slaughtered, the better it is. We have frequently had heavy losses on meat.

2804. The fact of having to cross the water confines you, practically, to the North Eastern trains?—Just so.

2805. Where are the places at which you now slaughter the animals at Hull?—At different slaughter-houses in the town.

2806. There are no means of having the carcasses put upon the line except by carting it to the station?—No; the railway company have to send their rollies to fetch it. It costs them considerably more than sending the animals alive.

2807. Supposing you had a large slaughter-house that you could use, and a siding running into it, would not that greatly facilitate the trade?—Of course it would.

2808. Supposing you had fast meat trains, then, I suppose, the difficulty would be very much removed?—All those things tend to remove the difficulties.

2809. If you had the same facilities which Mr. Wall has been describing as existing on his line, there would not be much difficulty in the matter?—There would be difficulty even then.

2810. What difficulty would there be then?—I have known weather when, if the meat was killed one morning, it would be bad the next morning without removal; and the removing of the meat is much worse than if it was set firm and then taken into the retail dealer's shop and cut up. When you begin moving it it decomposes, and much quicker in hot weather of course, as you know, than during cold weather.

2811. I suppose it depends a good deal upon whether the meat is set before it is handled?—Yes the meat is decidedly better if it is set before it is removed.

2812. In the case of the carcase you have sent from Hull to Manchester and other towns, have you sent it off before it bas been set or after?—Sometimes before it has been set, but seldom. It has been when we have been pushed a little, and when we have had a great deal to do.

2813. Have you had complaints from your customers as to the condition in which the meat has arrived?—Daily.

2814. With regard to all the meat or with regard to the meat which was sent off before it was set?—We have had complaints of both.

2815. But principally that which was sent out before it was set?—That was the worst, of course.

2816. You have no special conveniences for packing the meat on the North Eastern Railway?—None at all.

2817. How do you send it?—It has to go in a low-sided truck.

2818. Have you sent it in hampers or cloths?—We generally cloth it.

2819. But otherwise you send it in an open truck with one carcass placed on the top of another carcass?—We do not place them one on top of another. A truck would hold about eight carcasses of beasts.

2820. You do not put one carcass on top of another?—No.

2821. Have you sent carcasses of sheep?—Sheep are allowed to travel, and of course, that being the case, wherever they are allowed to go alive, the butchers will not buy the meat dead.

2822. Do you know that large quantities of sheep come into London dead?—I know they do from Scotland and other places, but there they have the advantage of trucks with hooks on which they suspend the meat, and it does keep the meat pretty well in that way.

2823. I did not know that it came from Scotland?—Yes, from Berwick.

2824. By what line?—By the North Eastern.

2825. Have they trucks in which they can suspend the meat on that line?—Yes, sheep, not beasts; they can hang a number of sheep in the waggons, and they will set as they come along.

2826. Do you know that large quantities of beasts are sent up from Aberdeen and other places in Scotland all through the summer to west end butchers?—I am aware of that, but not in very large quantities in the extremely hot weather; if you inquire of the butchers, you will find that the traffic is nearly suspended then.

2828. I suppose you will admit this, that if London could be supplied from Scotland at any period of the year, Manchester could be supplied from Hull?—If they had the same conveniences, yes.

2829. Has your business consisted solely of dealing with fat stock?—Yes.

2830. You know nothing about store cattle?—No; I have not been in the store line at all.

2831. Do you know the price of meat at Manchester at different times?—I do.

2832. Has the price of meat risen in Manchester during the last few months?—It has been about the same for some few months.

2833. Has there been a rise within the last year?—Yes; meat is dearer than it was two years ago.

2834. Can you tell us whether there has been a rise in price in Manchester?—The price is always ruled by the supply.

2835. I am asking if you can tell us whether there has been a rise in price in Manchester?—I cannot say from memory exactly the time, but meat has been considerably dearer for the last six months than it was previously.

2836. I want to know when that increase of price took place; can you tell us within two or three months?—I should say the rise took place before Christmas.

2837. Has it risen since Christmas?—Yes, there has not been much variation.

2838. Not since Christmas up to this time?—No,

Mr. J. Dickenson.

17 May 1866.

No, I should say there has not been any great variation; there has been, of course, a little.

2839. Do you know when the Act of Parliament was passed prohibiting the moving of live stock by railway?—If I was to refer to my books I could tell you.

2840. It was the 20th of February, I believe?—Yes.

2841. You say there has been no great rise in price since Christmas?—No, I think it was first as dear before the cattle were ordered to be slaughtered as it is now.

2842. How do you account for the price not rising as soon as live stock were forbidden to travel by rail?—I account for it in this way; in a great many parts where the disease has been bad, the animals have been ordered to be slaughtered, and they have been sent to the dead-meat markets, Manchester and other markets, dead, and that has glutted those markets; that has reduced the price of the meat.

2843. That was so before the Act was passed?—No, not to that extent.

2844. You think that after they began to slaughter the animals which had been in contact with the infected animals, the meat market was glutted?—Occasionally very much so, and at other times it has been scarce, and then the prices have fluctuated, of course; as much as 2 d. a-pound between one week and another.

2845. Have you had anything to do with purchasing carcasses of animals that have been slaughtered on the farms?—No, I have not; we have never slaughtered one on a farm; we have confined ourselves to Hull and Liverpool since the slaughtering.

2846. Sir M. W. Ridley.] We were told by a witness that the private slaughter-houses of Hull appeared to be all-sufficient for the purpose of slaughtering any amount of animals which might be brought there; is that your opinion?—Yes.

2847. They are all-sufficient?—Yes, we have never found any difficulty in that respect.

2848. They are all-sufficient, but still you would desire to see a public slaughter-house; is that what I understand you to say?—No, I did not say that.

2849. I thought you did?—No.

2850. At what time did you begin to send the dead meat to Manchester and other towns?—As soon as ever we were prohited from bringing the animals alive; that was after the 20th February; for four or five weeks we slaughtered at Liverpool, and then went to Hull, and since that we have been engaged at Hull.

2851. I think you have not told the Committee that the increase in price at Manchester commenced at the time of the dead meat being so sent?—No, I think it did not.

2852. There was not an advance of price at Manchester and other towns?—I think a few weeks previously to our giving over selling them alive, they made more money than they have ever made since, but it was the uncertainty of the markets which caused that.

2853. Are you venturing to send dead carcasses now?—Yes.

2854. At this moment?—Yes.

2857. Have you any corresponding agent on the continent, to whom you transmit communications, requesting either an increase or diminution of consignments?—No.

2858. They are simply regulated by the public notice of price, which they get through the public means of information?—Just so.

2859. As a salesman, you do not communicate yourself directly with anybody representing you on the Continent, "Send me more, or send me less"?—No, I am a dealer, not a salesman. There is only one party I sell for in Hamburgh. I am a dealer, so it is not necessary for me to communicate with them.

2860. Mr. Graves.] Are the facilities for slaughtering in Hull better than they are in Liverpool?—No, I think not; they are excellent slaughter-houses in Liverpool; we find no inconvenience there; they are public slaughter-houses there. In the other case, in Hull, they are small private slaughter-houses.

2861. As a rule, how long after you buy the cattle in the market at Hull, do you retain them in your possession before slaughtering them?—They are not sold in the markets; we buy them of the salesmen at the different sheds; we keep them until they send for them. Sometimes they slaughter them a day afterwards, sometimes it is two days, and occasionally three days, but not more.

2862. Have you had any instance in your experience of cattle being seized with the rinderpest after you had bought them?—No, I have not, I have not seen one which has had the rinderpest since November, I think.

2864. The retail butchers would give less for the meat?—The retail butchers would give less for the meat that was sent dead, from 1 d. to 1¼ d. per pound.

2865. Would that be in consequence of the way in which it was dressed?—It would be in consequence of the state of the meat, it does not come in as good a condition, the condition of it is so much worse.

Mr. J. Dickenson.

2866. Do you mean that its condition is so much worse that it would not keep so long?—It would not keep so long, nor does it look so well, I could tell if I went into a butcher's shop whether it came dead, or whether it was slaughtered in Sheffield, without asking the question.

2867. There is a great difference in the way in which meat is dressed?—Yes, and in the care which is taken of it.

2868. Do you think if the man who had dressed the meat at Sheffield were to go down to Liverpool and dress it in his own fashion there, and the meat was sent on from there afterwards, that you could tell the difference?—We have our men to go to Liverpool to dress the meat.

2869. Do they dress it as carefully and properly in one place as the other?—We are there to look after it, and to insist upon it being done so.

2870. What happens to the meat to make it in this bad condition?—It is the removal of the meat and the shaking in the waggons. Sometimes we have had had it on the railway, and when it should have been in next morning at six o'clock, it has not come in till the afternoon.

2871. Is that the case of meat which has been sent off before it has been properly set?—We seldom send it away unless it has been properly set.

2872. If it is not sent off properly set, do you say that the condition is such on its arrival that it would be worth 1 d. a-pound less?—Just so. It would sell for that amount less in the market.

2873. Are you aware that meat slaughtered at Aberdeen, if removed in good condition to London, will keep for 24 hours longer than meat that has been slaughtered in London?—I should dispute that.

2874. You have had no experience of it I suppose?—Yes, I have traded in London.

2875. Have you ever tried the experiment of sending a live animal, and sending a carcase of a dead animal out of the same lot, to ascertain which would keep the longest?—No, I have never tried that particularly, but I know when I I used to bring cattle to sell alive in London, the salesmen used to say, in very hot weather, "Send all you can, for the dead meat cannot come, and it will fetch a better price."

2876. Have you many customers in London?—No; occasionally we send meat when we are a little overdone.

2877. Where do you send it to, to Newgate?—Yes.

2878. To Leadenhall?—Yes.

2879. And Whitechapel?—It has been sent to Newgate and Leadenhall, by another party; it has not been sent in my name when it has been sent.

Mr. Mark Aungier, called in; and Examined.

Mr. M. Aungier.

2880. Mr. Hunter.] You are an extensive Cattle Salesman at Liverpool?—Yes.

2881. How long have you been in the trade?—Thirty-seven years; since 1829.

2882. Does your business lay with fat or store stock?—Altogether with fat stock.

2883. Have you any suggestions to make as to any improvement that could be effected in the accommodation for animals on board vessels coming to Liverpool?—I think there have been some improvements made lately, but the ships are capable of still greater improvements.

2884. Would you wish to see vessels licensed only to carry a certain number?—Certainly.

2885. That should be under Government regulation in fact?—Certainly.

2886. Do the animals get much bruised, and knocked about?—Occasionally they do; I think latterly they have paid more regard to the speed of ships than is required, and they have built them rather narrow. Mr. Graves can inform you that a ship built that way cannot go so steadily as if it was built with a broader beam; and, I think, if they were built broader they would carry the animals better.

2887. You think a tub would be preferable?—Yes; great speed is not required for animals in vessels coming from the east coast of Ireland, because the animals can only be landed at tide time.

2888. Do the vessels that land cattle at Liverpool carry back goods to Ireland?—They do.

2889. That is a reason for their having fast vessels; the vessels are adapted to two kinds of traffic?—I do not know that that is exactly the reason; there seems to be a disposition at present that everything should go very fast.

2890. And you think sometimes things go rather too fast?—Yes.

2891. We have heard there is great difficulty in getting the Irish cattle on board the steamers, that they are very wild and not tractable; is that your experience?—They have improved very much in that latterly, for they are able to walk them all on board now.

2892. They have got greater facilities for putting them on board?—Yes.

2893. You do not mean that the cattle are improved in disposition?—I think they are a little better cultivated than they used to be.

2894. We understand that they are knocked about with cudgels to get them on board, is that so?—In some places very much so.

2895. That bruises the flesh?—It does.

2896. Have you any experience in the foreign trade?—We have sold a good number of cattle from Spain.

2897. Do the Spanish cattle come in better vessels than the Irish cattle?—I do not think they do; they are generally screw steamers. Mr. Bibbie has his ships very well prepared for them.

2898. Do they come in as good a condition as the others?—Rather better, I think.

2899. To what do you attribute that?—To having the vessels better fitted up; I cannot attribute it to anything else.

2900. We have been told that the Spanish cattle are quieter than the Irish cattle?—Very much quieter.

2901. Is that owing to their having been worked before they are sold?—Yes.

2902. They are generall older beasts, are they not?—They are.

2903. Is there any traffic in dead meat between the Irish ports and Liverpool?—Very little; there has been a little this year, but very little.

2904. Has that been in beasts or sheep?—Principally in sheep.

2905. Does the meat come over in good condition?—Very seldom. During the winter months the mutton is sent over in very good condition, but latterly they have stopped, finding the weather getting warmer, they could not do it.

Mr. M. Augier.

17 May 1866.

2906. Mr. Banks Stanhope.] Do you know anything about the dead-meat market at all; have you any experience at all in dead meat?—No, I have not.

2907. Mr. Carnegie.] Have you any cattle from Scotland?—We have but very few; very seldom indeed.

2908. Mr. Cogan.] The cattle that are sold in the market at Liverpool are not allowed to be sent forward by train alive?—They are not.

2909. Are the cattle that are sold in the Manchester market allowed to be sent by rail alive?—They are to a certain distance; about 15 to 20 miles round the Manchester market.

2910. To what towns are they allowed to be sent?—To Stockport and other towns; to Staleybridge; I cannot recollect the names of all, within 14 to 15 miles of Manchester.

2911. Has that privilege been allowed during the whole time that the same privilege is not allowed in Liverpool?—Oh, no! that privilege was only granted last week to Manchester market.

2912. Up to last week there was the same restriction in Manchester as there is still in Liverpool?—Just so.

2913. Do you object to the restriction which now exists in Liverpool?—I do; it has very nearly paralysed our market; very nearly closed it up altogether.

2914. Not being allowed to sell in the market, or to send animals on alive?—Yes.

2915. You do not think it possible to slaughter the animals, and to supply those towns sufficiently?—I do not think it could be done during the hot weather; not during five or six months of the year.

2916. Have you in Liverpool made any application to have the same privilege as is conceded to Manchester?—We are about making it this very day at three o'clock; we have an interview with Lord Granville and Sir George Grey.

2917. The O'Conor Don.] I understand you to say that you find the restrictions placed upon the transmission of live cattle of great disadvantage to your trade?—Very great indeed.

2918. It not only deteriorates the meat, I suppose, but the cost of the transmission of the dead carcass is much more expensive than the live one?—I have heard it, but I do not know it from my own experience; the way it injures our trade is, that if more cattle than the wants of Liverpool require come into our market, we cannot send them away from there, and they must be slaughtered within four days.

2919. And the fact that the cattle that are brought into the Liverpool market must be slaughtered within four days, and cannot be transmitted from the port alive, may cause a temporary depreciation in the price of meat?—Very much so, and increase the price of meat; you will have it at a very high price at one time, and very low at another, just according as the bullocks are sent.

2920. In that way you can account for the fact that the price of meat has not risen very much in consequence of that restriction?—I cannot account for it in that way; I think it is more from the numbers of animals that have been slaughtered in anticipation of the rinderpest; many animals have been slaughtered that would not otherwise have been so.

2921. In that way a glut of meat has been brought into the markets?—Yes.

2922. That, of course, would not continue?—I should think not.

2923. And, after a time, the necessary result of these restrictions would be that meat would rise in price?—To a very high price, no doubt.

2924. Sir M. W. Ridley.] What is the ventilation on board the boats which bring the Irish cattle from Ireland?—Latterly they have had very good ventilation; formerly they had very bad indeed; wretched.

2925. Have you observed that the condition of these Irish cattle has been improving since they improved the ventilation?—I think they are much better; they are better carried than they were.

2926. Have you ever known instances in which Irish cattle have been suffocated in these boats?—I have.

2927. Have you known those instances occur frequently?—Not frequently; very seldom indeed.

2928. But less frequently since the ventilation has been improved?—I should think so; but in the whole of my experience I have not known four cases in 37 years where there was any large amount of cattle lost.

2929. Have you known or heard of their having been slaughtered on board?—Occasionally, if an accident happened.

2930. From their having got down on board and being likely to be killed by others trampling upon them?—I have known such cases.

2931. Have you known any instances of broken legs?—Yes, I have.

2932. Have those instances been frequent?—No, very seldom indeed.

2933. Have you known any instances of a similar character arising on the boats bringing the Spanish stock?—I have.

2934. Has the value of the Irish cattle been depreciated by the character of the boats in which they have come; have they been depreciated in value in the market?—I do not think they have. Practically, some companies carry their cattle much better than others.

2935. Are you concerned in the trade in pigs at all?—Not at all.

2936. You know nothing of the trade in pigs from Ireland?—I do not.

2937. Do I understand you to say you would prefer to see all vessels employed in the cattle carrying trade under Government regulations?—I do.

2938. All?—All.

2939. That is all that come into Liverpool, which are those with which you are principally acquainted?—Exactly.

2940. Would you desire to see them regulated as to the number of cattle, as cargo, according to their space and accommodation?—I would.

2941. Do you think that cattle generally are too crowded on board these boats?—Some of the steam packet companies do crowd their boats very much.

2942. Which are the most crowded?—I do not like to mention names.

2943. Then, which are the least crowded?—The City of Dublin Steam Packet Company, I think, carry their cattle best. That is my opinion.

2944. Have any of these boats means of protecting cattle on deck from the weather?—Lately they have placed what are called hurricane decks on, within the last two or three years, but formerly there was no protection.

2945. Do you find that cattle which have come as as deck cargo arrive in better condition than they did before that protection was afforded?—Oh, very much better.

2946. Previously to that time have you known cattle a good deal affected by lying on the deck exposed to the hot sun?—No, I cannot say that, but I have known them very much affected by great cold and the sea washing over them, and frost.

2947. Is it your opinion that unnecessary exposure of that sort, either to heat or to cold, more especially, as that seems to be your point, would be to cattle a predisposing cause of disease?—I should think so.

2948. Would you consider that, after being landed, they being driven through the country as they frequently have been in droves, and lying out, under circumstances with which, I dare say, you are acquainted, that disease would be more likely to develope itself in such stock from their habit and state when they landed in consequence of previous exposure?—That would depend very much on how the cattle were treated before they were shipped.

2949. Take the time of their arrival. If they had been exposed unnecessarily, or improperly, as deck cargo, would they not be more likely, in the course of their transit to whatever their destination might be, to exhibit symptoms of disease of one sort or another?—I think they would.

2950. Do they water the Irish cattle on their passage from Cork?—They do not, on board.

2951. Do you consider it necessary they should be watered?—Scarcely, I think; the passage is not long.

2952. We have heard that the Spanish cattle, cattle that have a longer passage, are fed with compressed food?—They are; and watered.

2953. Mr. Banks Stanhope.] Are any steps taken to cleanse the decks at all?—Yes, they are washed; I have never known them otherwise. As soon as the cattle are discharged from the boats, the first thing they do is to cleanse the holds.

2954. Are they limewashed?—I do not think they are; but they are washed with sea-water, and made as clean as possible.

2955. There are no other precautions that you can suggest?—I do not know of any.

2956. Mr. Hunt.] Do you find there is any disease existing among the animals landed from Ireland, not speaking now of cattle plague?—I have not seen any for the last six months.

2957. Before the last six months?—They had; but not after.

2958. What was the nature of the disease?—Pleuro-pneumonia.

2959. No foot and mouth disease?—Yes, occasionally.

2960. What is the practice of the inspector at Liverpool with regard to foot and mouth disease; does he stop the animals?—Not for foot and mouth disease.

2961. Neither store cattle nor fat cattle?—We have had no instances.

2962. They have been allowed to go into the Stanley market?—They have with the foot and mouth disease.

2963. Of course he stopped those that had pleuro-pneumonia?—They have not been brought into the market, but have been sold otherwise under inspection.

2964. Liverpool is very badly provided with accommodation if the cattle cannot go into the market, is it not?—Very bad; in the borough there is scarcely any accommodation.

2965. That has been your greatest difficulty; not being allowed to go into the only place where cattle could stand, you did not know what to do with them?—Not for two or three weeks.

2966. I suppose if you had proper accommodation for the standing of cattle and the sale of them, you would not care so much for going into the market?—I would rather they could go into the market; there is no place in which we could dispose of them as well.

2967. Would you see any objection to there being in the market a separation of foreign and English beasts?—The foreign beasts are all inspected on their landing, and again when they come into the market.

2968. Should you see any objection to there being a separate place in the market for the sale of foreign beasts?—I do not see any objection, neither can I see any use.

2969. It would not injure your trade?—I do not think it would.

2970. Before the restrictions came into force, they stood anyhow in the market?—They did.

2971. Have you had any of the animals that have been consigned to you, slaughtered for the purpose of their carcases being sent to other towns?—I have not.

2972. Mr. Cogan.] From what Irish ports do cattle come into Liverpool?—They come from all the eastern ports, from Sligo, from Ballina, from Waterford, Cork, and Limerick.

2973. Do you find any difference in the condition of the cattle coming from these different ports?—I think they are better from eastern ports; that is from Dublin, and Drogheda, and Dundalk.

2974. That necessarily arises from the voyage being shorter, or from other causes, does it not?—Those ports are situated in the best feeding districts, and that would be one cause why they would come better.

2975. They are a better class of cattle?—Yes.

2976. Generally speaking, is the condition of the Irish cattle good?—Yes, in general it is.

2977. Do you sell many Scotch beasts?—Very few.

2978. Are you aware of your own knowledge what number of cattle come into Liverpool in the course of the year from Ireland?—Yes.

2979. Do you know what number came last year?—One hundred and forty thousand.

2980. Is that the total number from all parts?—That is the total number shown in our markets, 140,000.

2981. Are you aware how many of these cattle came from Irish ports?—About 120,000.

Sir M. W. Ridley.
Mr. Banks Stanhope.
Mr. Alderman Salomons.

THE RIGHT HON. T. MILNER GIBSON, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. MARTIN PRATT, called in; and Examined.

Mr. M. Pratt. 28 May 1866.

2982. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] YOU are the Secretary to the General Steam Navigation Company of London?—Yes.

2983. What is the nature of the trade that your company carry on?—A general trade in goods, merchandise, and passengers.

2984. And in cattle?—And in cattle. The company's vessels bring cattle, sheep, calves, and pigs, from the following foreign ports: Hamburg, Rotterdam, Antwerp, Tonning, Ostend, Calais, Boulogne, and Havre.

2985. Do you bring any large numbers?—The numbers brought during the last year, from the 1st January to the 31st December, were as follows: From Tonning we brought 24,901 cattle, 25,935 sheep, 4 calves. From Hamburg we brought 5,998 cattle, 109,167 sheep, 3 calves, 22,004 pigs. From Rotterdam, 31,705 cattle, 149,248 sheep, 20,334 calves, 14,423 pigs. From Antwerp, 360 cattle, 20,065 sheep, 1,551 calves, 768 pigs. From Ostend, 1,219 cattle, 7,337 sheep, 934 calves, 2 pigs. From Calais, 78 cattle, 2,212 sheep, 291 calves, 1,939 pigs. From Boulogne, 2,803 cattle, 10,935 sheep, 15,765 pigs. Making a total of, horned cattle 67,064, of sheep 325,016, of calves 23,117, and of pigs 54,901.

2986. That is during the year 1865?—From the 1st January to the 31st December 1865.

2987. Is this trade an increasing trade?—Yes.

2988. Was the trade in the year 1865 larger than in previous years?—Yes; without having the comparative statements, I may say so, decidedly.

2989. I see Tonning is one of the places from which you get most cattle?—We get the largest number from Rotterdam.

2990. But you do get a large quantity from Tonning?—Yes; from Tonning the trade only extends from July to November, but the trade of Rotterdam continues all the year round.

2991. Is that a trade in fat cattle?—Yes, they are all fat cattle from Tonning, and also, with very few exceptions, from Rotterdam.

2992. Have you many milch cows?—Yes, but I have not distinguished them.

2993. The larger portion of your trade is in fat cattle for the markets; is that so?—Yes.

2994. Have you a list of what you have done during this year from January up to May?—No.

2995. About what quantity should you suppose you have taken?—We have been restricted; the importation from Holland has been prohibited, and, therefore, it would not be a fair comparison.

2996. What do you say as to Tonning?—The Tonning trade has not commenced yet; I speak of Rotterdam. The Tonning trade does not commence until July.

2997. The trade from Tonning is only a summer trade?—Yes it commences early in July, and extends till the middle of November.

2998. What is the reason of that?—They are grass fed.

2999. It is not on account of ice in the rivers?—No; they are grass fed, and they begin to export them about that time; those brought in winter, in the other months, would be store cattle.

3000. Are those beasts which come from Tonning fat beasts?—Yes, they are all fat cattle for the market.

3001. At Rotterdam?—At Rotterdam they are principally fat cattle.

3002. And Hamburg?—And Hamburg; mostly for the market.

3003. I see you have 2,800 beasts from Boulogne; is that a new trade?—That is rather a new trade; about 18 months old.

3004. Is that for fat cattle also?—Yes.

3005. Are they French cattle?—They are French cattle, but I cannot say exactly what districts they come from.

3006. Are they generally large heavy beasts?—Very large, heavy beasts; indeed, they are the largest description of beasts we bring to London.

3007. Do the animals fetch a good price?—I have heard that the animals from Boulogne have fetched as much as 46 l.; one head of cattle brought by way of Boulogne.

3008. I see there are 10,900, or, in round numbers, 11,000 sheep from Boulogne; is that a new trade also?—Yes, that is a comparatively new trade.

3009. Is that a trade in sheep or lambs?—Mostly sheep.

3010. Are they in good condition?—In excellent condition.

3011. Are they a kind of animal which sells among the best butchers?—They fetch the average price, I believe.

3012. Does not your company trade with Scotland, and places along the coast?—Yes; but but the numbers brought coastwise are comparatively very few.

3013. I ask you first whether you have a coasting trade?—Yes; we have a coasting trade to Edinburgh, Newcastle, Hull, and Yarmouth; from Yarmouth we have brought only 404 during the whole of last year.

3014. Is that a new trade?—Oh dear, no; it has been established many years.

3015. Did you never bring anything up from Scotland?—No horned cattle.

3016. What do you bring from Scotland alive?—Sheep and pigs. We have brought 418 during the twelve months.

3017. Then, is it a diminishing trade?—We never had a large trade from Edinburgh in live cattle.

3018. Do you know of your own knowledge of there being any examination of the animals as to their soundness at foreign ports?—Yes; at most of the foreign ports, the animals are examined by veterinary surgeons appointed for the purpose, either by the company, or by the authorities of the port. These inspectors reject any diseased animals which may be brought down for the purpose of shipment, and they grant a certificate as to the soundness of the animals shipped.

3019. Chairman.] What interest have the authorities of the port in preventing the shipment of diseased animals?—In some ports it is a local arrangement. In other ports it is an arrangement of our own, and we pay for the examination.

3020. You stated that in some cases the authorities examined them?—I believe it to be a local arrangement; but our object, of course, is to prevent diseased cattle being brought on board, and sometimes we substitute an appointment of our own if it is not undertaken.

3021. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Of course they are examined here?—Oh, yes; there is a form of certificate which the authorities give. On their arrival here, these certificates are handed to the veterinary surgeons appointed by the Commissioners of Customs, but they disregard that, of course. They have their own system of examination.

3022. In the course of the last year, have many of the cattle and sheep, or other animals, which have been brought by your vessels, been rejected as unsound or as being diseased?—Yes; there is a disease prevalent called the foot and mouth disease; they are stopped upon discovery of it, and are slaughtered on the wharf.

3023. Have you had any large portion of yours so stopped in the course of last year?—Yes; I have not the exact particulars of the quantity stopped from foot and mouth disease and slaughtered at the wharf, but I believe the veterinary surgeons are in attendance, and will give you the exact number upon authority.

3024. Chairman.] Have you had any cases of cattle plague?—The only one was supposed to have been in the case of three cows which were brought from Rotterdam, but we always disputed the fact that it was the actual cattle plague.

3025. Mr. Banks Stanhope.] When was that?—Three or four months ago.

3026. Mr. Hunt.] Were they stopped?—Yes.

3027. At which wharf?—Brown's Wharf.

3028. Who was the inspector who stopped them?—Mr. Simmonds.

3029. Chairman.] They were slaughtered, I suppose?—They were slaughtered after a time.

3030. What became of the rest of the animals that were in company with them in the ship?—I think they were all slaughtered on the wharf.

3031. The whole ship's cargo?—Yes; but I do not recollect exactly; Mr. Simmonds is present, and will tell you exactly the history of the transaction; there was always a doubt in our minds whether it was the cattle plague, but that is a professional opinion which, perhaps, I have no right to give; it is perfectly certain that no disease followed in the same ship, nor did it extend to other animals upon the wharf.

3032. Mr. Hunt.] Did you take any special pains with regard to cleansing the ship after bringing the animals over?—No; the vessel was cleansed in the ordinary way immediately after the animals were all landed, but there was nothing very special done; the system of cleansing is so complete that I do not think we could have done anything more.

3033. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Your company have vessels specially fitted for carrying cattle and sheep?—The company have vessels specially fitted for cattle, and nothing else. In other cases we bring cattle as well as cargo.

3034. Do I understand that the number of cattle you speak of are brought first in ships specially intended for that trade, and for that trade only, and that others are brought in ships which have cargo?—Exactly. There are different stations. From the Tonning station we bring cattle, sheep, and pigs, and nothing else.

3035. What are the arrangements with regard to those ships that are arranged for the carrying of cattle only?—The holds of the vessels appropriated for the conveyance of cattle are divided off by stanchions, rails, and boards, with battens to give a foothold to the animals, and they are arranged in compartments, made to hold about five in each compartment. The compartments for sheep are formed of stanchions, rails, and hurdles.

3036. Are the cattle supplied with air?—Oh, yes; particular attention is given to the ventilation of the holds.

3037. Mr. Hunt.] Do they stand tail to tail, or head to head?—They are all athwart ship, and, of course, tail to tail.

3038. It does not follow that they are, of course, tail to tail, because in some vessels they stand the other way, so that a man can walk down between the two rows of heads and supply them with what they require; that is not so in your vessels?—No, they are all athwart ship, with their heads to the sides of the ship. There is a third tier in some ships, and then it is immaterial which way they are placed.

3039. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Are they supplied with food?—They are always fed on board, and there are large tanks of water, holding between 2,000 and 3,000 gallons.

3040. What is the average time they are kept on board?—Of course, it depends upon the stations. From Tonning, about 40 to 44 hours; it has been done in less, but that is the average; from Hamburg, the same time; from Rotterdam, 20 hours; the same time from Antwerp; from Boulogne, 9 hours; from Ostend, 11 hours.

3041. Are there any persons on board to look after them, and take charge of them?—Yes; on board the cattle vessels the shippers provide drovers, five or six in each ship, but the crew of course assist in attending to the animals, and keep the horned cattle from laying down, which is the great object. If they lay down it is very bad for them.

Mr. M. Pratt.

3042. Does a bullock shipped at Tonning, and all those hours on board, never lay down?—He never lies down.

3043. What is the peculiar disadvantage of the cattle lying down?—The others will interfere with them, trample on them, and they are weakened by lying down.

3044. How are they prevented from lying down; do they all have to stand close together?—Yes.

3045. So close that they have no opportunity of lying down?—No, they cannot fall.

3046. When they land, do not they appear very wearied from that state of things?—No, on the contrary, they appear in most excellent condition. I will just instance one of our ships, the "Maas"; she had on board 570 head of cattle, we embarked them in three hours and a quarter; they were on board for 60 hours, and they were landed and walked out in 50 minutes, showing in what good condition they must have been.

3047. How are they got on board?—They are walked on board. They are first landed on the deck, then they pass down a brow or platform to the 'tween decks, and then down another platform to the lower holds.

3048. They are not slung?—No. I have here a plan of the vessel; it will show the arrangements on board the ships, which will show the stowage, and more particularly the ventilation.

3049. When a vessel arrives is it not very foul?—No. The men, of course, immediately go down to the holds to assist in walking the cattle up, and they do not experience much inconvenience. The ventilation is so perfect that most of the foul air escapes.

3050. I suppose there is a good deal of cleansing after they have landed a cargo of this sort?—Yes, of course.

3051. What is done?—There is a little difference of opinion, perhaps, as to the best mode of cleansing a ship; but the captain of that particular ship always cleanses his ship by scraping the ship, and not applying more water than is absolutely necessary. He finds that the ship is much sweeter after the scraping than it would be by thoroughly saturating the wood, from which a great evaporation would take place.

3052. Do you use any disinfecting fluid?—Yes, we use a disinfecting fluid by means of an ordinary water pot; we use chloride of zinc.

3053. Does that leave any effluvium?—I am assured that it is as sweet as possible. The system of cleansing is continued during the time of their going out again, for they take no cargo back, and by the time the vessel gets to its port it is perfectly cleansed and sound.

3054. Where are the cattle landed?—We have two landing places belonging to the company, one is Brown's Wharf, Poplar, and the other St. Katherine's Dock, near the Tower. The animals are landed immediately the vessels arrive alongside the wharf, and there they are conveniently placed for the inspection of the veterinary surgeon. Usually the examination commences shortly after the animals are landed, but not until they are all landed. This is the case unless the vessel's arrival occurs during the night.

3055. Mr. Hunt.] They go into a shed, do they not?—No, not into a shed; they are not all covered in, but a great portion of them are covered in; others are in the adjoining open ground. The examination is carried on by daylight only.

3056. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] What are your days of arrival?—They arrive all days in the week at one place or another; some daily.

3057. What becomes of the animals when the ship arrives, and there is no market to take them to?—They take them to the lairs, I believe.

3058. And then you do not know any more about them?—No, when the animals leave us we enquire no further.

3059. Can you tell us how the freight is calculated?—Do you mean the freight only?

3060. Yes; what is the charge for bringing a bullock from any of the places you have mentioned, and landing it here free?—The freights vary. At Tonning last year the freight was 15 s. and 2 s. 6 d. for wharfage; that is the actual freight on the animals from Tonning to London.

3061. For the 15 s. you would transfer a bullock from the wharf at Tonning on to the wharf in London?—Yes, that was the charge last year, but it varies according to circumstances. From Hamburg we charge 20 s.

3062. Mr. Hunt.] Besides the wharfage due?—Besides the wharfage. At Rotterdam the charge is 15 s., and that includes wharfage. There are different arrangements for different stations.

3063. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] What is the price for sheep from Hamburg?—It is 1 s. 6 d.; they are very small.

3064. And pigs?—Pigs 2 s. 6 d. The freight varies at each station.

3066. You regulated your charge to meet their charge, including steamboat and railway?—Yes, we regulated our charge to compete with theirs by way of Harwich.

steam, and I will give you the statement by way of Harwich. He calls our freight to Harwich 15 s.; our landing and wharfage charge, 2 s. 6 d.; driving, cartage, and lairage, 1 s. 9 d.; commission, 4 s. 6 d.; slaughtering, 5 s.; and drover's charge on board, 1 s. 6 d., making a total of 1 l. 10 s. 3 d. Then he compares it with the charge viâ Harwich, and says the whole freight or charge from Rotterdam to London being 15 s., it gives half to the steamboat, and half to the railway. Therefore, he makes his freight 7 s. 6 d., and says slaughtering, and all other charges at Harwich, 7 s. 6 d. Their conveyance, when dead, from Harwich to the London meat market, reckoning it at 8 cwt., at 1 s. 7 d. per cwt., 13 s., making 1 l. 8 s., which he calls a difference in favour of Harwich of 2 s. 3 d.; although, of course, the circumstances are not parallel by any means. If you please, I will first point out where he makes an error in his calculation. The freight is 15 s., and that is correct. As to landing and wharfage, there is no such charge; we include it in the freight.

3068. Mr. Hunt.] But you do charge it?—We did before the Great Eastern competed; we did a regular trade, but immediately the Great Eastern Company began to run a vessel from Rotterdam to Harwich, we ceased the charge of wharfage from Rotterdam, and there is no such charge as half-a-crown for wharfage. The driving, cartage, and lairage, 1 s. 9 d., is correct; the commission, 4 s. 6 d., is correct; that is for selling the live animal; then he says, slaughtering, 5 s., which is in reality 4 s., including the delivery.

3069. You only charge 4 s.?—That is the charge for slaughtering.

3070. Where?—Wherever the animal may be sold for. He has introduced the item in his statement as 5 s., and it is only 4 s.; then the drover's charge on board, 1 s. 6 d., is not in existence; we know of no such charge, and if there is any such charge for drovers on board, it is applicable to the Harwich as well as to the London stock.

3071. Do you pay the drovers on board?—No.

3072. Who does pay them?—The owners of the cattle.

3073. Then I suppose that forms an item in the expense of bringing them?—No; it does not follow the animal; I do not know where the payment is made; we do not pay it at all.

3074. It is not included in the freight?—No; but if it is applicable to one route, it is to the other: there are drovers on board the vessel from Rotterdam to Harwich; that makes the total 1 l. 5 s. 3 d.

3075. Do you know that they do not include the charge for attendance on the cattle in the freight of the Harwich boats?—I do not know; but he does not state it as an item of expense at Harwich.

3076. I conclude by his not stating it, that it was included in the freight of the Harwich boats?—I should doubt it.

3077. I do not know that it was so, but I concluded it was from Mr. Moseley's statement?—I should doubt it very much.

3078. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] The competition by the Eastern Counties Railway to Harwich, lowered the carrying freight by your boats to London?—Yes, it had that immediate effect.

3079. Do you carry any dead meat?—Yes; in the winter months we bring it from Hamburg in quantities.

3080. How is it brought over?—In cloths; in sides and in quarters.

3081. In the same way as it is brought up in cloths from Scotland?—Yes; they bring it in sides as they do from Scotland.

3082. Who provides the cloths?—The shipper.

3083. Are these cloths returned to them?—I think they are, and if the meat comes in baskets, the baskets are returned; we do not provide them.

3084. Chairman.] Do you bring dead meat coastwise?—Yes; we bring quantities of carcases of sheep from Hull.

3085. Is that trade confined to the winter season?—Yes.

3086. You do not bring it in the summer?—Not in the height of the summer; not in the warm weather, in fact.

3087. For how long a period in the year, generally speaking, does that trade stop?—I have not the materials here to answer that question, but during the summer months.

3088. Mr. Banks Stanhope.] Has it stopped yet?—I have not seen the particulars of the cargoes lately; I could tell in a moment if you would allow me to refer to them; I am told it is still coming in very small quantities, but it will be all off by the end of this month.

3089. When does it begin again?—In October.

3090. Then there is just an interval of five months?—Yes.

3091. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] The trade from Hull is in sheep?—Yes; carcases of dead sheep.

3092. Are they brought in bulk or in baskets?—They are mostly in bulk, packed in cloths, arranged round the quarter deck of the vessel.

3093. Chairman.] They are consigned to particular parties; they are not sent to be sold?—They are consigned to particular houses for sale; we deliver them into the market immediately on arrival.

3094. Does the Steam Navigation Company ever do any business in cattle?—No; not on their own account.

3095. You have no agents abroad who buy cattle in case you have not sufficient shipment, so that you may have them in with your own stock?—No, we never do that.

3096. When the dead meat trade stops, in consequence of the heat of the weather, do you find an increase in the live cattle trade?—No; we do not bring the live animals then either from Hull or from Edinburgh.

3097. You never do?—No; but from Hamburgh, where we bring quantities of meat, they are shipped as live animals; we do not bring them as dead meat.

3098. When the dead meat shipping stops, you find an increase in the quantity of the live animals?—Yes, but to no very great extent; it is a very uniform and even trade from Hamburgh; with respect to this comparative statement of Mr. Moseley's, I may say this item of 1 s. 6 d. for drovers' charges is not accurate; it should not have been introduced into the comparative statement.

3099. Because you say the charge there, in the one case, would also be applicable to the other?—It would be applicable to the other, and therefore I omit it.

Mr. M. Pratt.

3100. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Do you feed the drover coming from Tonning?—No.

3101. You only give him a free passage?—That is all.

3102. Mr. Hunt.] Are these drovers Englishmen?—No; they are most of them foreigners, from all the stations.

3103. Chairman.] Have you received any complaints as to the condition in which the dead meat has arrived, when you have brought it?—Those complaints would not reach us but in a general way; it is in pretty good condition. Of course it is wholly dependent on the weather and the length of the passage; in general, I believe, the parties are satisfied.

3104. Have you had any cases, within your knowledge, when the meat has had to be condemned, after arrival, as unfit for human food?—I may mention an extreme case, which occurred two months ago, where we had 83 packages of meat that were required to be thrown overboard during the passage from Hamburgh, and were thrown overboard. That was occasioned in consequence of the extraordinary delay from gales of wind, and the captain stated, in his protest, that the safety and health of the crew obliged him to throw it overboard.

3105. Without mentioning any exceptional case, such as that, is it within your knowledge that a certain portion of the meat that has been brought by you from Hamburgh, or elsewhere, has been found unfit for human food?—No; I think the rule is, that it passes.

3106. It generally passes?—Decidedly, that is the rule.

3107. How often, should you say, have you a portion which does not pass?—I cannot say exactly, but the veterinary surgeon, whose duty it is to examine the freight, is here, and can give you evidence upon the point.

3108. Supposing meat is condemned, what happens; do you take freight for it just the same?—Yes, we take freight for the meat. If we land the meat, or land the animals, we charge: but if we throw the animals overboard we do not charge.

3109. In whatever condition they are, if you put them on the quay, you claim your freight?—We consider we are entitled to the freight.

3110. Supposing the animals have broken limbs, or anything of that kind?—We have a special arrangement at one station, at Tonning; we insure the animals, and if an accident of that sort happens to them we pay for them. Of course the conditions are regulated by a policy in the ordinary way, and that is one of the conditions: that if an animal breaks a leg on board that becomes a claim for the insurance arrangement. That is only applicable to Tonning; at any other station it is a sea-risk and not at our own responsibility, unless any accident is occasioned on board by the act of the crew; that is a different thing; and for the effect of the weather we are not responsible.

3111. Is the dead meat trade which you carry on between Edinburgh and London, and Hull, an increasing trade?—No, I think not.

3112. When did it begin?—In former times vast quantities came up from Edinburgh. I am speaking now of a time before the railways; there was an immense trade in meat then, but of course the direct railways made an inroad upon our trade, and therefore it is not increasing with us.

3113. How long does it take you to come from Edinburgh to London?—We have done it in 36 hours, but that was with the finest class of ships; 40 hours is a fair average passage.

3114. I suppose you bring the dead meat in your regular passenger vessels?—Yes.

3115. What is the difference in cost now in bringing a beast from Edinburgh to London in one of the ships in the form of a carcase and alive?—That requires a little calculation. Our charge for dead meat from Edinburgh to London, delivered to the dead meat market, is 29 s. a ton.

3116. That is delivered to the market?—Delivered to the market, including cartage, 29 s. a ton. For the animals we charge 30 s., but we do not bring them in fact. Our tariff rate would be 30 s., but we do not bring live horned cattle from Edinburgh.

3117. Mr. Banks Stanhope.] What would be your comparative charges from Hamburgh?—Thirty shillings, and a live animal 20 s.

3118. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Would you carry a large bulk and a small bulk at the same price?—Yes, it makes no difference.

3119. Do not you bring large quantities of poultry and rabbits from Ostend?—Yes, from Ostend we bring very large quantities.

3120. That is all dead, of course?—That is all dead. We bring great quantities of pork also.

3121. Chairman.] Do you ever take any cattle the other way, from England to Holland?—No, except a few for stock to breed. We carry horses, but I leave out horses altogether in my calculation.

3122. Does it not sometimes happen that cattle are brought from Holland to the Metropolitan Market in London, and are sent back again in consequence of the prices not being satisfactory?—I only know of one instance. I never heard of but the one instance, which, I believe, you allude to.

3123. The cattle by the "Batavier"?—Yes; I never heard of any case except that.

3124. That seems to be an exceptional case altogether?—Yes; it seems to me a great mistake on the part of the owner, but that is his business.

3125. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] I suppose the "Batavier" brings over live stock as well?—Yes; I have confined my figures to the conveyance and carriage of our own vessels, but there are of course other opportunities by other vessels.

3126. Are there any Dutch boats engaged in the trade?—There were the "Batavier" and two others engaged for cattle and goods from Dort, a port a little above Rotterdam. They were foreign vessels.

3127. Chairman.] I suppose although your company does not itself carry on the cattle trade or speculate in the purchase of cattle, you have shareholders who reside in Hamburgh and elsewhere who are concerned in cattle purchasing?—No; we have not.

3128. You have foreign shareholders, have you not?—Very few indeed, very few.

3129. But you have some; I do not think we could count more than a dozen.

3130. Still a dozen shareholders holding a good many shares may form a very important part of your company?—That is really not the case. I say a dozen, because I am so confident of it, I do not think they exceed half a dozen, and I do not think there are many traders, they are confined to individuals out of trade.

3131. Your

3131. Your shares are sold on the Hamburgh Exchange, are they not?—No; I think there is no market on the Continent for our shares; I do not recollect a transfer passing.

3132. Mr. Hunt.] To whom are the cattle mostly consigned which come by your vessels?—They are consigned to salesmen. From Tonning a whole cargo of 400 or 500 would not go to more than 15 consignees. The salesmen are limited in number.

3133. Is the foreign trade chiefly in a few hands?—I think it may be said to be so on this side; there are a large number engaged on the other side, of course.

3134. There is a foreign Trade Association?—There is.

3135. Is that for the purpose of protection, or for the purpose of trade?—It is not for the purpose of trade, merely protection.

3136. You have had some animals rejected for foot and mouth complaint this year, have you not?—Yes; they were not passed, but slaughtered on the wharf.

3137. There is always a loss on animals which are slaughtered at the wharf?—It is always understood so.

3138. It is a disturbance of the usual course of trade with regard to those animals?—Yes; there is not a fair competition for the parties.

3139. Supposing that there was a market for foreign cattle to the waterside, with commodious premises and slaughterhouses there, and all conveniences, do you think that the trade would be drawn down to the waterside as to purchasers?—I have understood it would not answer. Of course the trade requires encouragement, and unless the foreigner can get a certain price he will not send his animals. Without active competition you do not get a fair average market price.

3140. Supposing the foreign market day was distinct from the English market day, do you think that would make any difference as regards the trade?—That would be left to practice; I could only offer an opinion; I cannot say.

3141. A great deal of the meat of the foreign animals is consumed in the neighbourhood of the places where it is landed?—Not that I am aware of; do you mean the slaughtered meat?

3142. Yes?—I believe the market is very restricted. The first-rate butchers would not go down to the market to buy their meat.

3143. By the present arrangement the animals are brought to the London market, and then taken down to Whitechapel and other places to be slaughtered; I mean as to the stock animals?—Yes, they all go to the market, and from thence they are taken to the slaughterhouse.

3144. They go to the market and come back again very often, very much in the same way that they came: a great many of them have to traverse the distance twice, have they not?—That I cannot say.

3145. Would you object to any regulations being made as to the number of animals your boats should carry?—No; I think we give them so much space that it could not be improved upon.

3146. Do other companies carry without giving the same accommodation, with regard to space, that you do?—I do not know what arrangements there are on board other vessels.

3147. You do not know whether the animals are too crowded in other vessels?—No, that I cannot say.

3148. Mr. Carnegie.] How long have you been in the habit of having cattle examined before embarkation?—Speaking from recollection, I should say certainly for four or five years; in fact, I should say it has been since the foot and mouth disease was made a cause for stopping the animals.

3149. Mr. Banks Stanhope.] I think the examination of foreign cattle is not so strict as it was, is it?—Yes.

3150. But with regard to the foot and mouth disease?—I leave that to the inspectors to give their opinion upon it.

3151. You are not aware of it yourself?—No.

3152. What amount of room do you give to each beast on board your vessel?—Eight feet by two; the usual height of the 'tween decks and the holds is seven feet.

3153. You never exceeded that and never put in more beasts than you have stated?—No, the apartment is so formed that we cannot.

3154. Do you carry any on deck besides?—Oh, yes; a very large quantity.

3155. Have they any shelter?—No.

3156. Have you any stalls for your animals on board?—No; they are fastened to the sides of the ship in precisely the same way as they are fastened below.

3157. I understand you to say that a certain amount of space was given to each beast?—Not to each beast; it is in compartments, admitting five beasts each.

3158. The ship, below, is divided into compartments of 8 ft. by 2 ft.?—Yes, 8 ft. by 2 ft. to each animal.

3159. The compartments are little squares, I suppose?—Yes, to admit five animals abreast, the heads being fastened to the sides of the ships. At each fifth animal is a stancheon or division.

3160. And the same on deck?—The same on deck.

3161. In winter, do you not find great distress among your animals, from want of shelter?—No; they are landed in very good condition.

3162. Can they be landed at Brown's Wharf, and walked up at all times of the tide?—Yes; at all times of the tide.

3163. I think you mentioned that you had some "cargo" vessels, as I think you called them?—Yes.

3164. Those are not regular beast vessels?—No; we carry the animals on deck and the cargo below.

3165. Under similar regulations?—Precisely.

3166. You say you disinfect your vessels?—Yes.

3167. Is that under the charge of inspectors?—Not exactly, but they make suggestions. They know perfectly well what our system is, and they have made suggestions from time to time, which have always been adopted.

3168. They have no power of stopping a vessel, which is not disinfected from going out again?—No.

3169. Have you seen a memorial from the foreign cattle trade which was lately sent into the Privy Council?—No.

3170. They mention that they have suffered great loss from exposure to weather, and want of food, space, and rest at the wharves. I have marked the passage in the document?—It says, "The detention at the wharves occasions great suffering." The want of food, water, space, and rest is mentioned; I do not know what it means by "rest." I can assure you, as to water, we have water laid on at Brown's Wharf, from the East London Water Works, and tanks provided, and drinking places.

Mr. M. Pratt.

3171. According to your opinion, as far as Brown's Wharf is concerned, that allegation is not true?—No. As to exposure to weather, they are exposed in the same way in the market, if he means exposure in that sense. As to the want of food and water, they have decidedly as much water as they can drink.

3172. Do you feed them?—No.

3173. Supposing they land on Saturday afternoon, when are they inspected?—If it is still daylight, they are inspected the same afternoon.

3174. Supposing they are landed on Saturday night?—Then they are kept till Sunday morning. The examination goes on equally on the Sunday.

3175. A gentleman here has said that the cattle are not allowed to be driven on Sunday, but, if they come too late on Sunday, they must remain until Sunday night?—That may be so; I cannot say.

3176. That is stated in a letter to the Royal Commission from Mr. Gibbon?—They would be examined on Sunday morning, and be moved immediately the proper time arrived.

3177. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] They cannot be driven on Sunday, can they?—I believe not during church hours, but that is a local regulation as regards driving; there is no loss of time from the examination.

3178. Mr. Banks Stanhope.] Supposing different cargoes arrive during the day at Brown's Wharf, you have no means of keeping them separate, have you?—Yes; there is space enough; Brown's Wharf occupies an acre of ground; of course it depends upon the number.

3179. You think you would keep them separate?—We could not deliver them correctly unless we kept the animals separate.

3180. But, being separate, they are still sufficiently close that one infected animal would probably poison the remainder, would it not?—As regards separate cargoes, do you mean.

3181. Yes?—The same thing would follow in any collection of animals; we cannot keep them so separate as that each can be separate to that extent; that is perfectly certain.

3182. Sir M. W. Ridley.] Are there any written instructions given to the captain of your vessels as to the particular temperature they should maintain on board the ships which bring the cattle?—No.

3183. Is there any temperature prescribed at all, or any thermometer or register kept?—They have thermometers on board, and can tell exactly; of course they keep the holds as cool as possible, and have all sorts of contrivances and ventilators for the purpose.

3184. Do you think the dead meat trade can be safely carried on from Hamburgh during the hot months?—Decidedly not.

3185. It seems you bring a great deal of meat from Hamburgh in the winter months; is not a good deal of that in the shape of cured meat?—No; that is quite a separate trade; we bring a great quantity of cured meat; we call it "bacon" for distinction.

3186. How are these carcases placed on board ship?—I think they are kept separate as much as possible; occasionally they must be piled.

3187. Are they 'tween decks?—There is no meat on deck.

3188. Is the side of one carcase placed at the side of another, or one upon another?—It occasionally happens.

3189. Without any bars or intervening frame?—There is no such arrangement; they stow it the best they can.

3190. Are they not hung or suspended?—In some instances it is so; it is a special arrangement, but that is to a limited extent; they are hung up in the middle of the vessel.

3191. As to this dead meat which you bring from Hamburgh, are you informed that it is properly stiffened and cooled before it is put on board ship?—I should think it must be.

3192. But do you know yourself that it is; do the boats which pass between the Tyne and London belong to your company?—A portion of them.

3193. There are two boats on that station?—Yes.

3194. Do they bring meat to London?—No; I do not think we bring any meat from Newcastle.

3195. Have you ever heard that other companies allow 8 feet by 2 feet 6 inches for the space to be occupied by beasts, whereas you only allow 8 feet by 2 feet?—I am not aware.

3196. That has been stated to the Committee; 8 feet by 2 feet is your allowance?—Yes, and we consider that, after many years' experience, quite sufficient. Our object is to bring over the animals in the best condition, especially when we insure them. We consider this the best way of placing the animals, and it is desirable to confine the animals for the reason I have already given.

3197. Mr. Hunt.] They want lateral support?—Yes, they want support.

3198. Sir M. W. Ridley.] I suppose it is a question of degree. You have been alluding to some 83 packages of meat which had to be thrown overboard, the captain having stated that it was on account of the safety of his crew. In what month of the year was that?—In the spring; two or three months ago, I should think.

3199. Was it during this spring?—Yes, this last spring.

3200. Has the dead meat which you have brought from Edinburgh always arrived in good condition?—Yes, I believe it has. They continue to send it in small quantities, and, therefore, we presume it is so far satisfactory.

3201. Sir James Fergusson.] It is generally brought in hampers?—From Edinburgh it is.

3202. You mentioned that the rate for dead meat from Edinburgh was 29 s., delivered in the dead meat market in London?—Yes.

3203. And that the rate for live stock was 30 s., delivered at the wharf?—It would be; but we do not bring them.

3204. I suppose you put an exceptionally high rate upon them, because you do not want to carry them?—It may have been so at that time. We are continually altering our rates according to circumstances; I believe it stands in the tariff at 30 s.; but if we found we could develope the trade by lowering the rate, we might do so.

3205. You do not think it is a high rate which discourages the sending of the cattle in that way?—No; I think not. I do not think it is exactly a port for the shipment of cattle. A large quantity comes from Aberdeen, but not from Edinburgh.

3206. What is the rate from Aberdeen to London?

London?—We do not bring them from Aberdeen; they are not our vessels.

3207. Mr. Graves.] You stated in the previous part of your evidence, that there was always plenty of food on board your steamers; what are the instructions given to your captains with regard to the distribution of the food?—They are really in charge of the drovers, and they use their own discretion. We do not provide the fodder.

3208. I understood you did?—No; it is entirely the senders who provide the food. If they were detained in port on the other side, then the captain would send on shore for fodder if he was in want of it, or if there was a detention likely to lead to a scarcity of it.

3209. Have you known of any instance where there has been insufficiency of food?—No, I do not recollect any.

3210. You stated that, on a recent occasion, you had to throw overboard a large quantity of dead meat; tell the Committee where that was placed?—It was placed on the deck.

3211. Was it sheltered from the weather and from the sun?—No, it was in spring time; ordinary weather. It did not occur from the heat of the weather. There was a detention of two days on the other side by gales of wind.

3212. How was it placed on the decks?—It was placed round in the middle of the decks, piled.

3213. Was there any shelter of any kind?—Yes, it was well tarpaulined.

3214. You piled one layer over the other?—Yes, and protected them by tarpaulin.

3215. It was protected from the air?—Yes, protected from the weather.

3216. If it was covered by tarpaulin, that would make it impossible for the air to get to it?—No, not entirely; you could not do that; it was protected from the sea mostly.

3217. As a general rule, do you find that any other vessels in this particular trade carry the cattle better than you?—No, our aim is to bring them in the best condition, and we assimilate the arrangements as much as possible.

3218. But you have generally got your favourite vessels in a line; have you any favourite vessel on this line which you consider carries cattle better than the others?—That is a selection to be made by the shippers and not by us.

3219. But, to your knowledge, is it so?—The "Maas," I should say, is a fair sample.

3220. Is she made of wood or iron?—Iron. She is the newest. We have some others which are being constructed on the same principle. We consider we have arrived at the perfection of a vessel.

3221. I want to ascertain the difference of the construction of the favourite vessel "Maas" from the other vessels?—It would be difficult to state it. Either the form of the vessel admits of more opportunity of ventilation, or the size of the hatchways, or something of that sort. There are a variety of circumstances which lead to that result.

3222. You say you are building other vessels on the same principle; I think the Committee would like to know what the principle is on which those vessels are to be built?—Will you tell me any one point that you will select as an improvement over another.

3223. I would rather leave it to you to describe to the Committee?—Here is a plan of the "Maas" (producing a Plan.)

3224. I must try to make myself clear to you. You have stated that the "Maas" is a favourite vessel; that she is of new construction, and that you are building two more upon the same principle. I think the Committee would like to know what that principle is; in what does the difference consist between the new vessels and the old ones?—You extracted the term from me a "favourite" vessel; I told you it was for the shippers to make the selection, and not the Company to publish it; but, if you press me, I tell you that the "Maas" is perhaps better than the rest, and for the simple reason of its being more modern, and everything which has been found to be an improvement we have adopted; I cannot explain it better than that.

3225. I ask you this distinctly: have you adopted any protection from the weather for the cattle coming on the deck of the "Maas"?—No.

3226. Have you adopted any ventilating fans for the ventilation of the lower holds?—The plan, I think, will show you the system of ventilation. That is one that, I think, is not adapted to the other vessels, because they each have their own. I do not know whether the plan will show the system of ventilation.

3227. You have stated that on one particular line you insure the cattle?—We do from Tonning.

3228. Do you issue any policy?—Yes.

3229. Have you a form with you?—I have not.

3230. Would you have any objection to produce one?—Not in the least.

3231. Do you include that in the rate of freight, or do you charge a separate insurance for it?—Separately; a per-centage on the value put upon it by the shipper.

3232. Will you be able to furnish the Committee with a copy of that document?—Oh, yes; I could give you an original policy upon any voyage.

3233. Is it at all usual for cattle to come consigned by your vessels to inland towns?—No; in all instances they are consigned to parties in London; we do not forward them on.

3234. So that the drovers who accompany the cattle have no reason to go into the interior with any consignments?—I can only tell you they are consigned to parties in London; I know nothing as to their ultimate destination.

3235. Sir M. W. Ridley.] I want to ask you one question as to the construction of these new vessels. In constructing them, have you had in view a greater breadth of vessel, and have you built them more for the comfort of the animals than with a view to speed, as compared with this plan, which I take to be the plan of the "Maas"?—Yes, that is the "Maas."

3236. Are the vessels that you are now proposing to construct broader bottomed?—They will be larger vessels, and therefore their dimensions will be increased; I believe they will have a foot more beam.

3237. Are they built more with a view to affording better accommodation to cattle on board than with a view to speed?—Oh, no. The number of cattle will be regulated by the space the vessel affords. There is no special object in building a vessel which will carry the largest number. We carry the largest number that the construction of the vessel will enable us to give space for.

Mr. M. Pratt.

3238. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] From your position as the chief officer of this company, and knowing this trade in London very well, do you think you carry on the larger part of the trade in London, Tonning, Rotterdam, and Hamburgh?—I think we import more than any other steam ship company in London.

3239. Do other steam boat companies besides yourself import into London?—Yes.

3240. Have they vessels specially appointed for the purpose?—Yes.

3241. Are they foreign or English vessels?—Mostly English.

3242. Do you know the quantity imported into London by those vessels?—No; but the veterinary surgeon, the inspector, will be able to tell you the total number that have been imported.

3243. During last year?—Yes, or for any period.

3244. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Are your vessels screw-vessels or paddle-vessels?—Principally paddle-vessels, for cattle.

3245. Are they not much more convenient for carriage of cattle?—They are more in favour with the cattle-shippers than the screw-vessels.

3246. Are the new vessels screw or paddle?—Paddle.

3247. How soon are the animals landed after arrival?—Immediately the vessel can get alongside the quay.

3248. Are they never detained a night?—No, they land during the night, at any time. They are always expected by telegraph. We know when they are coming, and are always provided.

3249. Is there any other mode of ventilation than wind-sails; have you any fans?—Yes, there are in some vessels, but there is a peculiar arrangement in this: an air-trunk leading into the funnel, carrying the draught by suction. (The Witness explained the Plan to the Committee).

3250. Mr. Banks Stanhope.] Do you import any store cattle?—I believe but very few.

3251. You import Dutch cows?—Yes, a large number of cows.

3252. What inspection do they get abroad?—Merely the same inspection as the ordinary animals are subjected to. There is a veterinary inspector there.

3253. Is he a Government inspector?—At Rotterdam, where these milch cows are brought from, there are inspectors appointed, and paid by ourselves.

3254. Do you ever find that the animals which are passed at Rotterdam are stopped here?—Yes, we do; from foot and mouth disease.

3255. You said you had three stopped for what they believed was rinderpest?—I believe it was said so.

3256. And they were passed at Rotterdam?—Yes.

3257. Might it not happen that an animal might be passed at Rotterdam, and at Brown's wharf, and yet have the rinderpest the next day, in London?—If the animal had it in its system, and it broke out afterwards, that is a professional opinion that I cannot give.

3258. Would it be possible to have any quarantine at Rotterdam for taking the store animals, after your animals had been inspected there. Could your animals be inspected by your inspectors, or Government inspectors, at Rotterdam, and kept a certain time before embarkation?—Of course the thing is possible, but I do not see the object to be attained.

3259. It would give additional time for the disease to break out, would it not?—I think the shippers would rather oppose it.

3260. Is it not at present the case that animals are very often passed at the wharf as free from foot and mouth disease, and it subsequently breaks out?—I think it is very likely.

3261. Would not the same thing be likely to happen with rinderpest?—I think not; the foot and mouth disease is very contagious, and rapidly spreads from one animal to another.

3262. You know no reason why the same thing should not happen with rinderpest?—I know not how long the disease is in the system of an animal before it actually appears.

3263. You are not aware of any reason for preventing the quarantine at the port of Hamburgh?—I think it would be a detriment and delay to the shipment, and the animal would, possibly, get out of condition.

3264. I am now taking cows; if they were fed, where would be the detriment?—There would be an extra expense to be borne by the shipper.

3265. Is there any mode of having quarantine for cows in England?—No. We have a space on Brown's Wharf that has been applied as a quarantine; animals have been detained, but it has not been done on any large scale.

3266. Are they not driven into lairs beyond, to fields?—Yes, at Tottenham there are large lairs. We do not take any interest in the animal after it leaves the wharf; it is then out of our possession. The importers would give you more information than I can. I have left this comparative statement unfinished; I do not know whether you want me to finish it.

3267. Chairman.] You can hand it in?—I will, if you please. I have made this comparative statement more for the purpose of showing what would be the result of the operation of an animal being conveyed from Rotterdam to London direct, and passed to the market and sold; and, again, I have taken the instance of an animal from Rotterdam to Harwich, and there slaughtered, and the meat conveyed to London.

Mr. ANTHONY GEORGE ROBINSON, called in; and Examined.

Mr. A. G. Robinson.

3268. Chairman.] WHAT is your occupation?—I am a Shipowner and Steam Shipping Agent in London.

3269. Do the ships with which you are concerned carry cattle?—Yes, a good many of them; we carry cattle from Oporto, from Holland, from Denmark, and from Bremen.

3270. Do you bring them to London?—Yes. I have also to do with several of the steamboats that carry the cattle across Channel from Ireland to England.

3271. You say you are a steam-shipping agent; what is your particular duty?—I have several friends who are large shipowners. I manage their business as their agent here; and I am a shipowner myself; the business is entirely in my hands.

3272. Do you carry any cattle coastwise in the ships you are connected with?—In a few we do.

3273. Where from?—From Waterford and from Dublin to London.

3274. Have you any steamers running along the English coast carrying cattle?—No, we have not.

3275. Where do you bring the foreign cattle from principally?—Principally from Holland, from Friesland, from Rotterdam, from Amsterdam, from North and South Holland.

3276. From Harlingen?—Yes, we have the entire steam trade of Harlingen in our hands.

3277. Have you any account of the quantity of cattle you brought before the cattle trade from Holland was prohibited?—I have not; I have got here the account of the quantity of foreign cattle brought in last year; I have taken out the daily account of what was brought on each day and landed at the different places.

3278. You may as well hand that in, rather than read it at length?—Yes; it is too long to read through.—(The Witness handed in the Statement. Vide Appendix).

3279. Do you bring store cattle?—Yes, we do it at times.

3280. In any quantity?—The store cattle principally come from Holland. I have noticed that, until the last year or two, it has been very much guided by the state of the hay crop in Holland. When the hay crop is short they are obliged to send the store cattle away, and we bring over then immense numbers. When they have a good hay crop, so as to winter the animals, they do not send so many. For the last two years we have brought a very great number.

3281. Are your ships exclusively for the cattle trade, or are they ships carrying ordinary merchandise?—We carry merchandise in them as well; we have one or two that we use exclusively at times for cattle; at other times they carry merchandise as well.

3282. Do you take any precautions in foreign ports previously to shipping cattle, to see that they are in a healthy state?—Very great.

3283. What do you do?—In Friesland we have the cattle examined by a Government inspector, first at the inland market, which is where they generally come to, and then we have them carefully examined before they are shipped by the Government inspector. At Rotterdam and at the ports of North Holland we have them examined by a Government veterinary surgeon previous to shipment.

3284. You make an application to the authorities of the place to look at the cattle before they are shipped?—Yes; we have an arrangement with them, and we pay them.

3285. Have you had any cattle stopped on arrival in England?—A very few.

3286. What for?—Foot and mouth complaint.

3287. Have you had any stopped for cattle plague?—No, not one case.

3288. Did this foot and mouth disease begin on the voyage?—Yes, I think it did from the fatigue. They said they were suffering from foot and mouth complaint. They were principally German beasts that came down by railway to Rotterdam.

3289. Why did the inspector pass them if they had foot and mouth disease; why were they shipped?—It did not develope itself sufficiently, and they did not consider it a disease that would affect their landing here. In fact, it was not until lately that they did stop them. You may recollect the Committee which sat two years ago with reference to the Bill; they recommended that the cattle which were merely suffering from foot and mouth complaint should not be stopped. Previously to that time we were rather more particular about them than we were after, on that account. They did not stop the whole cargo; they only stopped the diseased animal itself, as they do now, and, therefore, the inspector at Rotterdam, unless the animals were suffering very much indeed, would allow them to pass.

3290. He allowed the particular animals to be put on board, although he saw that they had the foot and mouth disease?—Yes, slightly.

3291. Would he have allowed them to come on board with the cattle plague?—No, nor with pleuro-pneumonia.

3292. Where do you bring your cattle to when they come to London?—Up to the British and Foreign Steam Wharf.

3293. Where is that?—At Lower East Smithfield, just below St. Katherine's Dock.

3294. What becomes of them then?—If it is daylight they are inspected by the veterinary surgeon, and driven to the lairs, or the market. If it is night they are kept till daylight, and then examined and sent to lairs.

3295. Where are they kept?—On the wharf.

3296. Under cover?—Yes.

3297. Are there sheds there?—Yes, the wharf is a large one.

3298. What do you do with regard to the cleansing of your ships, after each voyage bringing cattle?—We wash and clean them out. Generally speaking, where they carry cattle principally, they go back in ballast; and they are washed clean out with hot water from the engine; it is pumped down, and then the engine pumps the water out into the sea, then we whitewash them and sprinkle them with chloride of zinc and chloride of lime.

3299. Have you always done that?—We have only sprinkled them lately with the chloride of lime, but we have always washed them out.

3300. You did not use disinfectants until the cattle plague broke out?—We always used to wash them with lime water.

3301. After every voyage?—Yes.

3302. So that the holds of the ships were rendered quite clean and disinfected, in fact?—Yes, our ships are iron. We used it in order to prevent the urine from the cattle affecting the iron in the bottom of the vessels where it had run down. We always had them washed out, and were very particular about that.

3303. Have you any particular regulations as to the space that is to be allotted to each beast in your ships?—In the Dutch trade we calculate to put five in a pen of 9 feet by 8 feet. Of course, in the Oporto trade, and the Spanish trade, and German trade, where the beasts are larger, they get about four of them in 9 feet.

3304. The trade from Oporto is a small one, is it not?—Yes; we carry that on ourselves, there is such risk attending it. We purchase the cattle on our own account.

3305. In Portugal?—Yes.

3306. Have you got pens or lairs there?—No, they are all brought in pairs. They are worked oxen; they are bought in pairs, and are brought down a day or so before the ship sails, and are put on board. We have a shed there for them.

3307. Do you bring any dead meat to London?—Very little, a mere nothing. We bring a little from Holland in the depth of winter, but a mere nothing, I may say. In fact, we have a great difficulty in the summer time to keep the butter cool; it is so soft sometimes, that if a cask turns on its side it will run out; we are obliged to load it in the night and discharge it in the night, the heat is so great.

3308. As a general rule, do the cattle that you carry to England arrive in good condition?—Yes, with very little loss.

3309. You have not had any complaints of their condition upon arrival?—Oh, dear, no!

3310. How long are they on their voyage from Oporto?—From Oporto they will be four or five days to London.

3311. Do they stand all that time?—They lie down as they please. They are fed and watered, and they lie down on the deck when they are tired.

3312. Do those in the hold lie down also?—Yes.

3313. Is there room enough for that?—Yes.

3314. Do not the others trample upon them?—Somehow or other they manage not to hurt one another; they are accustomed to lie in stalls.

3315. Mr. Hunt.] You are now speaking of the Spanish animals?—Yes.

3316. You find a great many of the foreign animals have been worked?—With the exception of the cattle from Holland, the bulk of the animals that come over here are worked; the German and French, I think, always are.

3317. They are much quieter when they have been worked, and are more easy to be fed and watered?—All foreign animals are quiet, they are handled so much. The Dutch animals are shut up six months out of the 12, and they are in the habit of being handled by the women and children. You never see a man drive a beast in Holland; he always leads it by the head.

3318. What is the nature of your Irish trade; is it in fat or store stock?—Fat cattle.

3319. I suppose, in the case of animals lying down, if there is rough weather they get injured, do they not?—No, I do not think they do.

3320. Do not the animals trample on them, trying to keep their legs?—I do not think they suffer much; they suffer more when they get thrown down and knocked off their legs by the ship giving a heavy lurch.

3321. Do you have any loss in rough weather?—Coming from Oporto we sometimes lose a few, but from Holland very seldom.

3322. From Oporto, how do you lose them; do they break their legs, or do they suffer from sea-sickness?—They suffer from the severity of the weather, I think; they are very delicate animals.

3323. Are they not affected by sea-sickness very much in bad weather?—They do not show it if they are; they do not show it like pigs; pigs discharge their stomachs.

3324. They do not vomit, because they have four stomachs, have they not?—Yes; but you can see that they suffer.

3325. They suffer in a different way?—Yes.

3326. Chairman.] Is your trade an increasing trade?—Yes; it is largely increasing.

3327. You find you can always fill your ships with as many cattle as you like?—We do not always fill them; but we find it is an increasing trade, and we keep adding to our fleet.

3328. Sir M. W. Ridley.] You spoke of the animals being inspected abroad; are the inspectors who inspect them foreign inspectors?—Yes; in Holland the Dutch veterinary surgeons hold diplomas from the Government.

3329. You have nobody acting as inspector for you or your interest, or on behalf of those whom you represent?—This inspector is acting for us, and we pay him.

3330. Do you think that the inspection of cattle at foreign ports by officers appointed by the foreign Governments would be as efficient as the inspection by officers appointed by our own Government as a further check on them to secure the health of the animals you import?—I think it it would be quite as efficient. The foreign Governments are far more strict in their regulations than we are. They think nothing of locking a man up and imprisoning him if he disobeys them.

3331. So that it is your opinion that the appointment of any officials, on the part of our home Government, would not be attended with good results?—No; I do not think it would. I think if our home Government would put themselves in communication with foreign Governments, and get the regulations which are now municipal made Imperial, there would be no necessity for it. Even now, I do not think there is any necessity for it; they are so particular.

3332. You spoke of the cleaning of your ships, and said that some of these vessels of yours did not take cargoes back, but went back in ballast; I understood you to say, that the ballast was put into the ship before she set sail, and that then you commenced the purification and washing?—The ship does not carry ballast; it goes back empty.

3333. I understood you to say it went back in ballast; I must have misunderstood you?—I spoke as a shipowner, when I said "in ballast"; it meant empty. It is a phrase of shipowners.

3334. Chairman.] You trade with Harlingen now, but you do not bring any cattle from there?—No.

3335. Is there any cattle plague in the district of Harlingen?—None whatever; none near it.

3336. There is no cattle plague in Friesland?—No; nor in Gröningen.

3337. Still you are not allowed to bring cattle from there?—No; we are prohibited.

3338. The Dutch Government have very strict regulations for preventing the spread of contagion from South Holland to Friesland and Gröningen?—Very. The Friesland Government and the Gröningen Government do not admit cattle into their provinces from any other province; so strict are they, that during the winter time they would not allow Gröningen cattle to pass through Friesland; we were obliged to bring them round by sea in schuyts and in sailing vessels. They allow us to embark them in the harbour, but they will not allow them to be landed in town. They do not admit any cattle from one province to the other.

3339. Do you think there would be any danger in allowing the importation to be resumed from Harlingen?—I think not the least.

3340. It is quite as free from cattle plague as Tonning or Hamburgh?—Quite; there is less risk than in Hamburgh or Tonning. In Hamburgh the cattle come in from everywhere.

3341. So that we allow cattle from Hamburgh which may perhaps have been brought from Holland?—Yes; they may have been.

3342. Have the Hamburgh authorities no regulations about the cattle plague?—I am not aware of any; we do not run to Hamburgh.

3343. Where do you run to in Denmark?—To the north of Denmark.

3344. What sort of cattle do you bring from thence?—Fat cattle.

3345. Nothing but fat cattle?—No.

3346. No store cattle?—No.

3347. Do you bring milch cows from there?—We do bring a few from Holland, but very few lately, because I rather avoided that, fearing what actually did happen; I foresaw that the cattle would get the plague after they came here, and then the Dutch would get the credit of it, and so I avoided it, I did not carry them, I stopped it some weeks previously; we brought a few in other vessels, but not many.

3348. You thought if you brought these Dutch cows they would catch the plague when they got here, and then it would be attributed to their being brought from Holland?—Yes; and I would not allow them to come in a ship with fat cattle. One day a man wanted to bring two over in a cargo where I had 400 or 500 fat cattle, and I would not allow it, simply on that account; that I knew, if they caught the plague a month after they arrived here, the Dutch cattle would get the credit of it.

3349. Mr. Hunt.] Where was it you forbade these cows being put on?—Harlingen and Rotterdam.

3350. Were you over there?—No, I was here.

3351. You sent over orders from England?—Yes; I sent over positive instructions not to carry milch cows with fat cattle.

3352. Chairman.] But you would carry them by themselves?—Yes; we carried them by separate vessels, after a time. At first we did not carry any at all, but other people brought them, and they said, if you will not carry them over other people will; you must accommodate us with our Dutch cows, otherwise we will not give you fat cattle to carry.

3353. You would rather not bring milch cows at all?—I would not have brought any if other people would not have done so.

3355. Tell us what proportion of the cattle, which you bring in your ships to England, have been stopped by the inspectors?—I could not do so, but it is a very small per-centage.

3356. What do you call a small per-centage?—Perhaps not one per cent., not half per cent., or quarter per cent. for any cause. I had cattle stopped some years ago from Oporto for an alleged foot and mouth disease; I kept them myself at great expense, and it cost me 60 l. in veterinary inspectors' fees to have them examined. I had nearly every veterinary surgeon in London, and every one, except our Government inspectors, pronounced them free from the complaint; I kept them for 10 days, and not one of them showed it. I complained to the Customs, and I think to the Board of Trade, but I never got any redress. I paid over 60 l. for inspectors' fees for examining that particular lot of cattle.

3356.* Mr. Carnegie.] Is there any inspectors at Oporto?—No; I kept the cattle I have mentioned 10 days.

Mr. A. G. Robinson.

3357. Mr. Hunt.] How many years ago was that?—Four or five years ago, I think.

3358. Mr. Banks Stanhope.] How long has this system of inspection been carried out?—Since we have had the pleuro-pneumonia so bad; about three or four years ago, we have had our cattle inspected for three or four years.

3359. You have full confidence in the inspectors at the Dutch ports, have you?—Yes.

3360. What are the other Dutch ports from which beasts come besides Rotterdam?—They come from Dort, New Diep, Amsterdam, Harlingen, and other places.

3361. What place would Schiedam lie nearest to?—Rotterdam.

3362. You say that the inspectors there are men whom you can trust?—Yes.

3363. In 1865 did you ever hear anything of any cattle having been imported into Holland from this country?—Yes; there was a lot of cattle which they said brought the plague over, which were taken back from here.

3364. I think they were landed at Rotterdam?—Yes.

3365. They were inspected at Rotterdam, I presume?—I am not certain.

3366. You think the inspectors that are so particular as to cattle going out of Holland, would not inspect cattle going in?—I do not know the regulation with reference to the inspection of cattle coming in, but I rather think they are carefully inspected also.

3367. Have you ever heard the opinion stated that those animals were thought to be ill when they left London?—No, I think not.

3368. Supposing they were thought to be ill when they left London, and were passed by the inspectors at Rotterdam, would you then have equal confidence in them?—No, I should think not; I would take nothing by supposition after what I have before explained with regard to my importation of beasts; for I had positive proof of three Government inspectors declaring them to be diseased, when they were not.

3369. Do you mean to say the disease generally breaks out after they are inspected?—No; that does not follow.

3370. Supposing these animals are passed at Rotterdam as being healthy, and afterwards spread the disease in Holland, how do you account for it getting abroad?—They most likely have the disease; for the veterinary surgeons say it remains in the system for 10 or 12 days before it developes itself. They may have taken over the seeds of the disease from here, which is only presumption, because they did not know of the disease there until after those cattle arrived there.

3371. Then your confidence in the inspector is merely to this extent: that he will not let an animal pass with the disease actually apparent?—My experience of these inspectors in Holland is, that if they even suspect an animal, they do not allow the animal to pass. We had repeated cases of suspected lung disease in Holland, which they did not allow to pass.

3372. Supposing Dutch cows are passed in Holland, and passed here, might it happen that they may have the disease, but do not show it?—It is quite possible, I believe.

3373. Could any system of quarantine be carried out in Rotterdam?—No, I think not; they have no space for it.

3374. That is, there is no space at the wharves at Rotterdam?—No; nor is there in the town or anywhere about.

3375. Supposing we ascertain that the inspection at Rotterdam is only good for animals which clearly show the disease, do you think that you could not prevent the disease coming over by the quarantine?—It is quite possible to frame a quarantine at enormous expense and trouble.

3376. Where would be the expense?—You would have to have places specially built for it, and fields specially arranged, and kept away from others. There is only a ditch between the fields in Holland; and, therefore, the germ of the disease, which they say flies in the air for some distance, might affect them. You would have to keep a tremendous cordon round the place.

3377. Chairman.] If the disease is in the air, the poison might affect the animals the very day they came out of quarantine?—It might. I think you could quarantine them far better in England than in Holland, at least as to store cattle.

3378. Mr. Banks Stanhope.] You think that one reason for quarantining in Rotterdam would be the danger that might happen in the country from the diseased beasts spreading the disease from the quarantine trench through the air?—I do not think quarantine at Rotterdam would be efficient, on account of the difficulty, supposing the disease to be in the neighbourhood; from the difficulty of preventing communication.

3379. Do you think it can be done here?—Yes; I think in a place like London it could, because we have such space.

3380. Chairman.] The quarantine to be of any security ought to begin from the time the animal has been in contact with the disease. If you want to see whether the disease is going to break out, you ought to start from the time when the animal has been in contact with the poison, ought you not?—Yes, you ought decidedly.

3381. Mr. Banks Stanhope.] You imported some Dutch cows in separate vessels, I think you said?—Yes.

3382. Does that occasion any great inconvenience?—No; it happened that those particular vessels sailed on the day of the market; they do not get many cattle, on account of not coming in for the market day here, and, as far as we were concerned, it occasioned us no inconvenience; but it occasioned the importer considerable inconvenience. They arrived here too late for the market; in fact, they were not in the market at all. They were sold at the wharf, and taken to the stables, at least I believe so; I do not think they went to the market at all, because the vessel did not arrive here until it was too late to send them there.

3383. You do not think there can be any system of separating fat stock and store stock, so as to prevent infection?—No; the store stock comes very irregularly; there is not a steady demand for store stock. As I said before, it varies according to the state of the hay crop.

3384. Do the inspectors give you a report in writing?—We have a certificate signed by the foreign inspector, and legalised by the British consul on the other side, which comes over here.

3385. Sir M. W. Ridley.] You are well acquainted with the construction of vessels employed in this particular trade; could you make any suggestions, from your own knowledge, as to the construction of those vessels, that you think might be improvements in them?—We have constructed constructed a great many, and I have brought plans of one ship we are building, and one which I have lately built, but really there is very little improvement upon the ship that we built 20 years ago; I do not see that we have improved upon it. We have a vessel here that I suppose does not lose one in 5,000 head of horn cattle in transit. I do not think that we can improve on that. Then there is another great point: if we do not bring an animal we do not get any freight. Again, if they are lost on the voyage, the shippers expect us to compensate them, to a certain extent, also, and we lose the freight.

3386. Chairman.] It is your interest to bring the cattle in as good a condition as possible?—Yes; because the trade is such a bare one in the import of cattle to this country, particularly from Holland, which is the largest, that if the shipper loses any cattle he is not able to bear it; his profit is so small on the transaction; the shippers of cattle are not capitalists, as a rule.

3387. Sir M. W. Ridley.] Then it would not be your opinion that it would be an advantage that such vessels should be under Government inspection in the same manner as the emigrant ships are?—No; I do not think there would be the slightest use in it. You may lay down a rule that you shall only put in so many cattle, and no more; one of those beasts may weigh 4 cwt. and another may weigh 15 cwt. or 16 cwt. We have one particular vessel in the Dutch trade which will carry from 500 to 700. We send her over to Bremen to bring those large Vienna beasts, and she is more crowded with 400.

3388. You think that the interests of the parties concerned in the trade would be a sufficient inducement to convey cattle in a fitting and proper class of vessels without Government restriction in the matter?—I do. My experience goes to show that where owners do not take care of cattle, and bring them in good condition, or where any particular vessel gets a bad name for carrying them, the evil is cured by the public refusing to ship by them.

3389. Then I presume the Committee may infer, from what you say, that there have existed and been employed in this trade, at an earlier period of time, vessels which were not at all adapted for the purpose; but that those are now in the gradual course of being superseded by more improved vessels sufficient to meet the requirements for the passage of the animals?—Yes.

3390. They have not been what they should be; but they are now improved?—When the trade was a young one; it has all grown up within a few years; and when the numbers carried were not to be compared with what are carried now; when, in fact, vessels not specially constructed for it were put into the trade, vessels not properly fitted, it was another matter.

3391. Vessels which were converted?—Yes; but now the trade has settled down into a steady regular trade; the vessels are required to be perfectly fitted, carefully provided with all means for the safe conveyance of the cattle. I do not think that any Government inspection would improve the present system.

3392. Then you say the ship constructed for the purpose is the rule, and the ship converted is the exception?—Yes.

3393. Chairman.] Has your trade been much affected by the regulations in force with regard to the cattle plague; I am not speaking of the import from Holland, but generally, your cattle trade?—We have scarcely imported a beast from Oporto in consequence of the regulations. When there was a chance of their being killed at the wharf we would not import one, and stopped it. It has been very much affected by the different changes in the regulations from time to time.

3394. Supposing it was a permanent rule, that all foreign fat cattle imported should be slaughtered at the port of arrival, and conveyed into the country in the form of dead meat, would that have a prejudicial effect on the foreign cattle trade?—It would.

3395. Would that lessen it considerably, do you think?—It would check it.

3396. Was it that argument that induced you to stop the trade from Oporto?—It was; the country demand for foreign animals here is increasing.

3398. Sir M. W. Ridley.] As to the trade in pigs; have you any acquaintance with the bringing over of pigs?—Yes; we bring a good deal from Holland in certain seasons.

3399. Is their comfort considered as well as that of the beasts, as far as circumstances allow?—Yes; they are more delicate than cattle, and they require greater care; we have to take care to put them in a place where the sea cannot get on them, and we avoid it as much as possible.

3400. They are always below deck?—No; they are generally on deck.

3401. Penned?—Yes.

3402. So many in a pen, according to the size?—Yes.

3403. I infer from what you say, they are protected from the sea washing over them?—No; not on deck.

3404. They are not protected?—No.

4405. Mr. Leader.] Do you import any cattle direct from Ireland to London?—A few, not many, from Waterford and Dublin.

3406. You are not aware of the condition in which they arrive in Smithfield?—They arrive in very good condition.

3407. The evidence here was, that they suffered very severely under the hands of the drovers?—I do not think that.

3408. Sir M. W. Ridley.] Could improvement be made in the arrangements for the passage of these pigs; could improvement be made in the treatment of them?—I do not think it could; the difficulty of putting pigs down below in the vessel consists in getting them down, and getting them up again, although we have ladders to walk the animals up and down; pigs are such difficult animals to handle; they get knocked about a great deal more putting them in and out than than when we put them on the deck, and put them in the best part of the ship as we do to carry them; they lie more comfortably and get more air.

3409. Do pigs come to you from Ireland?—Not many; we bring them over in baskets from Ireland.

3410. We used to hear they were shot into the holds?—No. Years and years ago I was at Liverpool; I have been engaged in carrying cattle all my life in these boats, and at Liverpool, years ago, they carried them the same way as they are carried now. They could not shoot them down into the holds, for that would kill them; and the same thing happens there as here. The jobbers are poor, and if you kill their animals they want compensation, and we do not get the freight. We never got the freight on a dead pig 30 years ago.

3411. There are a large number of pigs imported from Ireland into this country?—An immense number.

3412. How are they shipped?—They are driven on board the vessels from some of the ports, such as the port of Drogheda and the north. From Dundalk the largest number of pigs come, and they are obliged to be driven into the holds; 30 years ago I have turned 2,000 out of a vessel.

3413. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] How is the ventilation of your ships managed; have you any special plan for ventilation?—In this plan you will see the hatchways; we have iron pipes four inches wide which go down through the stanchions into the hold. (The Witness explained the Plan to the Committee.)

3414. Mr. Carnegie.] Do you put the cattle with their heads to the sides?—With their heads to the sides, and these parts are wide enough to walk them up and down. This is a plan of the deck of the ship. (The Witness described the Plan to the Committee.)

Mr. William Simmonds, called in; and Examined.

Mr. W. Simmonds.

3415. Chairman.] What is your business?—I am a Veterinary Surgeon.

3416. Are you inspector to the Customs?—Yes.

3417. What has been your experience with regard to the import of cattle from foreign countries?—I have had an experience of 21 years.

3418. When cattle arrive from abroad, what is your course of proceeding?—To examine them.

3419. You get notice?—I get notice, and I attend as soon as possible to examine the cattle.

3420. Describe to us what takes place?—They are landed on the wharf, and I examine them one at a time, and if any have infectious or contagious diseases, we put them on one side from the healthy ones; we put them up in a separate place; those that have any infectious disease, I order to be marked by clipping them on the hip with scissors.

3421. What do you do with those animals that have been in contact with the infected ones?—Those we deliver with the sanction of the Commissioners of Customs.

3422. Supposing a lot of beasts arrive, and a few of them have got some infectious disease, you separate those from the rest?—Yes.

3423. What do you do with those that are healthy?—We deliver those.

3424. In all cases?—Not in all cases; not in cases of cattle plague.

3425. In what cases do you not deliver them?—In excema, foot and mouth disease, and lung disease; those that we do not deliver we have slaughtered.

3426. Do you now stop all animals who have arrived in the same cargo as those animals that have foot and mouth disease?—No; only those that are affected.

3427. Chairman.] The rest you deliver?—The rest we deliver.

3428. In cases of cattle plague, the whole of the cargo would be slaughtered?—Yes, the whole of the cargo would be stopped.

3429. As to pleuro-pneumonia, is there the same rule?—Pleuro-pneumonia we have had but little of for many years past: our rule with regard to pleuro-pneumonia is that we should take away those that were actually diseased, and let the others go.

3430. In fact it is only in the case of cattle plague that you would slaughter all?—That is all.

3431. Have you had occasion to have all the cargo of a ship slaughtered in consequence of cattle plague?—Yes; in September 1865, the "Maas" arrived with some 200 and odd beasts; she had three milch cows, and one in calf, making four; one cow showed symptoms of the rinderpest; that was immediately slaughtered, and a post-mortem examination made by myself and my colleague, Mr. Holmans; there we found traces of the disease through the alimentary canal; that was properly disposed of by carbolic acid and lime, and sent to the knackers in charge of an out-door officer of the Customs. The other three cows were still detained; some few days afterwards one of the cows showed symptoms of disease and died with it; the other cow showed symptoms of disease, but subsequently recovered. The cow which was in calf, calved some few days after she was landed; she took the disease and died, and also the calf; so that out of the three cows and the in-calver, there was only one that recovered from the disease; the whole of the fat cattle were killed.

3432. And not sent to the Metropolitan Market?—No; killed on the wharf, and examined post-mortem by myself.

3433. And then sold as dead meat?—Yes.

3434. They were all healthy, I suppose?—They were all healthy at the time, except some few quarters, which had to be taken away: but there was no disease.

3435. What is your opinion as to the condition in which the cattle generally arrive; I am not now speaking of contagious diseases affecting them, but their general condition in reference to the treatment they have had on board?—I think, generally speaking, very good; there is, sometimes, overcrowding, but very seldom.

3436. What is the effect of their being overcrowded?—They get down, and are trampled upon; their legs get broken, and sometimes they are suffocated.

3437. Is the effect of the over-crowding to produce any form of disease which might become contagious?—No, I think not.

3438. You do not think that any improved mode mode of treatment of the cattle on board ship would tend to lessen the chance of the spread of contagious diseases amongst them?—I think it would be advisable to have sufficient room for the cattle not to be overcrowded; it would be far better for the cattle than otherwise.

3439. But should you say, from your own observation as a public officer, that the overcrowding was so general or so serious as to need the interference of the Legislature?—I think a little more space ought to be given to them.

3440. That is not the question. The question is, is it so pressing a matter that you think the Legislature ought to interfere to compel a certain quantity of space to be given to cattle by law?—I think it would be quite advisable.

3441. Do you think it is necessary to do it?—No, I do not, according to my experience, as far as that goes.

3442. You do not think it is necessary?—I think the parties belonging to the vessels take it at their own risk if they place too many cattle on board. The General Steam Navigation Company from Tonning to Denmark, I believe, insure the whole of their cattle from there.

3443. What I want to get from you is this: whether there is a grievance now existing which it requires a legal remedy, or an Act of Parliament to prevent?—As to over-crowding, I think there is.

3444. You think there is that amount of overcrowding?—At times.

3445. But you do not think the effect of that overcrowding is to produce any contagious diseases?—I think not.

3446. What is the effect of the overcrowding?—It produces suffocation, by bullocks getting down and being trodden upon. It produces injury to the cattle, and it is a loss to the importers.

3447. It is a loss to the importers, but has no effect upon the general stock of cattle in the country?—I think not. If a bullock, sheep, calf, or pig, has a broken leg, it is right, for humanity's sake, to have them killed on the wharf, and we do so; they never go away.

3448. You would not pass an Act of Parliament to take care of the particular persons who imported cattle, if there was nothing of a public nature to be accomplished by it?—I think not.

3449. Is it not the best thing for them to suffer the loss, and to find out by suffering that loss that the overcrowding ought not to go on?—I think they do find it out; they go to each party and say, you have overcrowded the cattle, and they have to pay sometimes dearly for it.

3450. Is that not the best penalty to be inflicted on them?—If they could get them over without overcrowding them it would be better. There is a want of ventilation in the holds. A great many of them are over-crowded, and the air becomes much heated.

3451. What sort of legal regulations do you think would be desirable. How would you put them into the clause of an Act of Parliament?—I think that each bullock, sheep, pig, and calf, ought to have a certain space.

3452. Mr. Hunt.] And a certain space over-head?—A certain space over-head, as I wrote to the Commissioners of Customs a few years ago. I gave them my ideas about it then.

3453. Chairman.] What would be sufficient for a small beast would not be sufficient for a large one?—I wrote to the Commissioners as to a large beast, and a small beast also.

3454. That according to the beast shipped so should the space allotted vary?—It would be sure to vary.

3455. I suppose you would subject the shipper to a penalty if he took in more beasts than corresponded to the allotted space?—Of course I should.

3456. There would be two scales?—Yes: a small scale and a large one.

3457. Would not that make it a complicated affair?—I think not; because from Rotterdam and Spain, and many other ports from which we have cattle imported, the cattle are smaller than others. From Hamburgh and Oporto they are much larger beasts. For instance, the "Lion" might bring up between 500 and 600 beasts, if she was only loaded with cattle from Harlingen, whereas she would only bring up between 300 and 400 from Hamburgh and Bremen, because they are much larger beasts and want much larger space.

3458. Would you make any other regulations, except with regard to the space to be allotted to each animal?—I think they require both water and hay.

3459. Do not they give them hay and water?—Not at all times.

3460. Every beast should be provided with a certain quantity of hay and water, according to the length of the voyage?—I think so.

3461. Would you have any other regulations?—I would have each vessel properly cleansed.

3462. After each voyage?—After each voyage.

3463. Do you mean cleansed with some disinfecting liquid?—Yes.

3464. Would you do anything about ventilation?—I think they try, now, all they know, to get proper ventilation, and I think they are open to any suggestion.

3465. You do not think they require to be looked after, in that respect?—I think not. I think it is for their own credit, and their own pockets' sake, to have it.

3466. Would there not be considerable objection, on the part of the steam-ship interest, to this amount of Government interference with their trade?—In what way?

3467. Would they not object to be put under these strict regulations as to the way in which they are to carry on their trade?—I think not. I think the importers would allow them to have hay and water; and I think the importers would rather like to have a certain quantity of room for their cattle.

3468. You think they would not object to having these regulations laid down by Act of Parliament?—I think not. I think, perhaps, the shipowners might, but not the importers.

3469. Why would the shipowners object?—Because they would not be able to bring so many over. It would lessen the quantity on board.

3470. Might they not make it up by an increased freight?—They might do that.

3471. Still, that would have a tendency to lessen the trade, would it?—Oh, yes.

3472. Is it your opinion that the foreign cattle trade has been the cause of the cattle plague?—I do not think so.

3473. You do not think these contagious diseases were brought into the country?—I do not believe the rinderpest was brought into this country by a living animal.

Mr. W. Simmonds.

3474. How do you think it was brought in?—I think it was brought in by some other means.

3475. In the air?—No; I think more by clothes or skins, or something of that sort. We have no direct communication from any part of Russia, with the exception of Revel; and in the Revel case, the greater part of those cattle went to places where the disease has not shown itself. I believe some part of that cargo from Revel went to Manchester, and I believe there are no cases of disease there at all.

3476. Still those cattle might have been in contact with other cattle in the Metropolitan Cattle Market?—Those cattle never went to the Metropolitan Cattle Market that went to Manchester; I believe not; they went direct from Hull to Manchester.

3477. How long is the cattle plague latent in an animal before it developes itself, after it is infected, do you suppose?—I should wish for 14 to 21 days before I could decide.

3478. If a beast had been in contact with the poison you could not be sure it had not got it, unless you kept it for 21 days?—I could not.

3479. Do you think the quarantine would be a security?—I think for store cattle it would, I think for fat cattle it would not; I think the four days would be quite sufficient; four days before sending them to the market to be killed.

3480. Would you suggest that all store cattle should be kept in quarantine?—I should; they should be kept in quarantine for 14 or 21 days; I should be satisfied with 21 days myself.

3481. If the cattle plague has not been imported into this country without quarantine up to this time, why should you think quarantine necessary?—I say if you wish to have quarantine.

3483. You, as a professional man, ought to guide others in the matter. If the thing is not a necessary thing, because persons who know very little about it, the public generally, would be satisfied, that is not a reason why it should not be had. Is it your opinion that it is a necessary thing?—As far as stores are concerned I think it would be necessary; if we examine them they may be in an incipient state, and there may be the seeds of disease in the animals, and we could then take the proper precautions to see whether the disease was there or not.

3484. You would keep the store cattle 21 days?—Fourteen or 21; I would rather have 21 myself in order to be perfectly safe.

3485. But hitherto you think we have done without it with impunity?—We have but a very few stores only at times; they are generally fat.

3486. Would you have any new regulations with regard to fat cattle?—No; I think the regulation as to their benig killed in four days and sending them to the market would be quite sufficient.

3487. Would you make it a permanent law, that all imported fat cattle should be killed within four days after their arrival?—They are killed now without the law.

3488. But would you like to have that law?—I think so.

3489. Where would you keep all these cattle that are in quarantine for 21 days?—I should keep them at the wharves.

3490. Would you have buildings erected?—I think if there were quarantine of store cattle they would not send them, and therefore we should have but very few cases to stop.

3491. Would it not be better at once to prohibit the trade if the effect would at once be produced, and to do it directly instead of indirectly; if you think the quarantine would stop them, had you not better stop them at once rather than go to the expense of erecting all these buildings for the purpose of receiving them?—I think quarantine would stop the importation of lean cattle.

3492. Mr. Carnegie.] Do you think it would stop the import to London or to the whole country?—I think if it would stop it to London, it would stop it to the whole country.

3493. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Do you not think that there is great want of store cattle, and that they would come at the price?—Not if you had a quarantine.

3494. It is a question of price surely?—There is the price to pay.

3495. It is only 1*s.* a day?—Yes, 1*s.* a day and night; the wharfinger would charge so much for husbanding the animals.

3496. Would 1*l.* cover the outlay?—I should think 1*l.* would cover it.

3497. If the value of store cattle should increase in England to the extent of 1*l.* over what it is now, would they now come over there?—We have no stores, generally speaking, except from Denmark and Tonning. We have a great many milch cows come over; those are the very worst we can have.

3498. With regard to quarantine, would you except certain countries where the cattle plague is known not to exist, such as Sweden, Denmark, and Spain, from the necessity of having quarantine?—I certainly should.

3499. And as to all other store animals coming from other countries, you would subject them to quarantine, or stop them altogether?——

3500. Chairman.] Places that could not give a clean bill of health to the cattle, so to speak?—Yes.

3501. You would subject them to quarantine?—Yes.

3502. We have gone further than that, because we have prohibited them from coming altogether?—Yes, for the last six months we have had none from Holland; but there are places in Holland that are particularly healthy; cattle that we have never had to stop come from certain parts; the Harlingen cattle are particularly healthy; so is Nieu Dieppe, and so is Amsterdam; I cannot say the same for Rotterdam, for there is a good deal of foot and mouth disease. In former years there was pleura-pneumonia, but not lately.

3503. Chairman.] The foot and mouth disease might come on after a good deal of travelling, might it not?—Not in the cases I have seen where they have arrived here, because, in some cases, their feet have been right off, and their mouth in such a state that you might strip it; some of them were in a fearful state.

3504. Mr.

3504. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] The diseases which cattle are subject to have not been brought from abroad?—Not the cattle plague.

3505. Do you consider that the foot and mouth diseases were originally brought from abroad?—That was before I was appointed; 21 years ago; we have always stopped animals with foot and mouth disease.

3506. How long has the foot and mouth disease been known in this country?—Twenty-three or 24 years.

3507. That was before the general importation of cattle?—Yes.

3508. You consider the foot and mouth disease to be a disease that animals are liable to if they travel much coming from close stables; travelling in spring, for instance, after being confined in close stables; if they travel either by road or rail, do you think it would produce foot and mouth disease?—I think travelling would bring it out quicker; but where we have it direct from the farmers at different ports, we seldom have foot and mouth disease. Where they are sent to different markets, such as Hamburg and other markets, they are sure to come with foot and mouth disease, because those very markets are hotbeds for foot and mouth disease; when they come round, we have no disease at all, and they come just as fast.

3509. Do you think it desirable that the foot and mouth disease should be prevented from coming into England?—Oh, decidedly; the foot and mouth disease, they say, is a curable disease, but it has not been in the cases I have seen; they die, many of them, through excitement.

3510. Sir M. W. Ridley.] I think you said that you do not believe legislation would be requisite on the score of protection to persons engaged in the trade; but do you not think it necessary for the protection of the animals themselves, that Government regulations should be proposed?—For the quarantine, do you mean?

3511. No; I am talking of the conveyance of cattle in ships; I am not putting the question as regards the persons interested in the trade, but merely with reference to the protection of the animals themselves?—Out of humanity, of course it would be required.

3512. Have you known animals, as cargo, having suffered frequently, to any extent, from the want of hay and water?—No, I cannot say that.

3513. Have you seen cattle damaged in value, on their arrival, from that circumstance?—Yes, many thousands.

3513*. Damaged in value?—Yes.

3514. Then if they were damaged in value, they probably had suffered?—That might be caused by the voyage and roughness of the weather.

3515. Can you mention any case of any particular animals where you observed this effect to have been produced in the port of London?—Yes; the case of the "Germania," I think was one.

3516. Whose vessel was the "Germania"?—That belonged to the General Steam Navigation Company; then the "City of Norwich," the "Tonning," the "Tiger," the "Trident," and several others.

3517. Those sufferings were attributed to the want of hay and water on the voyage?—No, I do not attribute it to that altogether; I think a great part of it would be caused by the roughness of the weather.

3518. That you ascribe to the want of sufficient ventilation?—No, I think not; because the shipowners try and do all they possibly can to give them the best ventilation, and they stand at no expense; they endeavour to do all they possibly can. If you were to say to them, "Put so and so down to a vessel, to give them more air," they would do it. I must say the owners of the vessels try to save the cattle as much as they possibly can.

3519. Then we must infer that they suffered only from the passage; because it does not appear, from what you now tell the Committee, that it is clear they suffered from want of hay and water, or from want of ventilation?—I think it would be quite right that they should have hay and water; they would then be able to stand up against more exertion.

3520. Is it your opinion that the quarantining of the store stock would improve them in value?—I think not.

3521. Would not a cattle jobber coming into the market give more money for a certain number of head of beasts that had been in quarantine, for which he would receive the veterinary surgeon's certificate that they were clear from disease, than he would to buy in the dark, as it were?—I think not. I think they would fall away in value, and would not have that attention which they would receive at home.

3522. Why would they be deteriorated in value?—They would fall off in condition.

3524. Then it is your opinion, that a man wanting to buy 50 head of store cattle would not be disposed to give an advanced price for the 50 head of stock in virtue and condition of their having a clean bill of health given by you, and your passing them as sound stock?—I think not; they will pass them if they consider they are free from disease, and will chance the rest. As to milch cows, I think they ought to be stopped.

3525. Mr. Hunt.] You are for quarantining milch cows?—Yes, and calves under a certain age.

3526. Do you consider the milch cows would fetch a higher price at the London dairies if they had passed under quarantine?—I think they would, very likely.

3527. Why do you think the milch cows would fetch a higher price, but the lean stock would not?—They would be paid greater attention to.

3528. Why?—The parties belonging to the milch cows would pay greater attention to milch cows than to lean stock.

3530. That we are supposing; we are not supposing you would subject these animals to quarantine at Brown's Wharf, but I suppose there would be no difficulty in finding space lower down the river?—I think, lower down the river; if any disease came from abroad it would be more likely to spread it by coming in contact with the grazing country. Cattle going through

3531. I am supposing there is a place for quarantining lower down the river than the present place, and that there is every accommodation for them?—It would be in the marshes then.

3532. Would there be any difficulty about that?—I think there would, in making a quarantine place of a grazing country. I think they should be kept in the towns, and so as not to go out of the towns. I think they should be kept in the metropolis, where there is no infection going on.

3533. Do you think you could not find a place down in the marshes, where they could be kept quite separate from all other cattle?—I do not know where.

3534. The Isle of Dogs, for instance?—That would be in the metropolis.

3535. Is that in the metropolis?—That is in the metropolis; there is no breeding going on there.

3536. Could you not find space in the Isle of Dogs?—I think so, if it is not already taken up by docks.

3537. If you could find a place in the Isle of Dogs, there would be no difficulty in feeding and watering milch cows and lean cows?—If you had the premises extensive enough there would be no difficulty at all.

3538. Do not you think that the purchasers of lean cattle would give a higher price for those which had the guarantee of being free from disease, by reason of having undergone quarantine, than chancing it as they do now?—I think not; I think that the expense of keeping the animals 14 or 21 days would be too great for the importer, and, therefore, he would never send them at all. I think they would lose by that means; they would not send them over.

3539. Are you aware that in some foreign countries they have such a regulation?—I believe they have.

3540. Do you know whether it stops their coming in in those countries?—I do not.

3541. Do you know that in Austria all animals coming from foreign parts do undergo a quarantine of 10 days?—I believe they do.

3542. You do not know whether great inconvenience has arisen from the practice?—I do not.

3543. Do you think it would be advisable, that instead of fat animals going to the London market they should be slaughtered down near the port?—I think it would not promote cattle coming if you slaughtered them at the port of landing, because then you would not have the competition.

3545. Supposing the foreign market day was a different day to the market day at Islington, would that make any difference?—I think the foreigners would rather have it on the same day.

3546. Supposing it was a different day, they would have a monopoly of that day, would they not?—I think not. I think the monopoly would be on the English side.

3547. Supposing the English market day was Monday and Thursday, and the foreign market day Tuesday and Friday, the foreigner would have a monopoly of the Tuesday and Friday, would they not?—I think Monday and Thursday would have a monopoly, and Tuesday and Friday would lose.

3548. You think they would have no one to buy?—I think not; it would interfere with their trade to a great extent.

3550. Would you have a regulation with regard to the passage from those ports?—I think so.

3552. Would the animals come over in better condition, if they were so supplied?—I should think so.

3553. Why is it not the interest of the persons in the trade to require that that should be done?—I suppose the journey being so short, they think they may as well save the money.

3554. Do you think the meat is in worse condition, when the animal is killed, after having come over in that state of starvation and thirst?—I think so, decidedly, if it is killed at once.

3555. Then, according to that, the beast ought to fetch more money in the market if it has been well cared for during the voyage?—Yes, I think that must improve the animal.

3556. Viscount Cranborne.] What is your ground for saying that you do not think the cattle plague was introduced by any living animal?—The case of Revel was the only case in which they were imported from Russia, I believe. The inspectors at Hull delivered them free from disease, after a careful examination, and I, having had several cargoes from Russia, found no disease in them.

3557. Then by that you assume that it could have come from nowhere else than from Russia?—I think that the disease is a highly contagious disease, and may be brought in in many other ways than by the living animal.

3558. Is it not the fact that there is a railway communication now with Hungary, and that the disease exists in Hungary?—Yes.

3559. I believe a great many Hungarian cattle occasionally find their way to the Metropolitan Market?—A great many.

3560. You have no knowledge that the Hungarian cattle might not have come in with the disease incubating upon them?—I have an idea that the Hungarian cattle, or cattle from Russia, are quarantined in several places as they travel through for 10 or 14 days, and therefore the time that they would be coming from one place to to another until they got to England would be over the time of incubation.

3561. Do you know of any quarantine that is imposed upon animals travelling by railway through Germany?—I am told there is.

3562. Have you any distinct knowledge of it?—Not myself.

3563. You do not know even at what frontiers the quarantine is imposed?—No, I do not.

3564. But your belief, that the cattle plague was not introduced by a living animal, is solely founded on the fact that you do not believe the Revel cattle were infected?—I believe that the Revel cattle were not infected.

3565. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Do you not think that with a living animal, although it may not itself take the plague, yet after it has been in contact with other animals, it might convey it to other animals in the same way as a man might carry it over in his clothes; an animal inspected on landing and found perfectly sound, and never having had the cattle plague itself, might be in contact with other animals, and not take it but yet infect others?—Yes.

3566. Is it not very possible that these Russian animals, themselves being sound and remaining sound, might have been in contact with others which had the cattle plague, and convey the cattle plague on to others in that way?—Time will show.

3567. Is time any question in the matter?—Yes, I think so.

3568. How long do you think a man may carry it in his clothes?—If the clothes are shut up in a box and not taken out of the box from the time he leaves Russia until the time he wishes to put those clothes on to go into the market and buy and sell cattle, of course you get the infection; but if you cleanse those clothes as other men would cleanse their clothes, the infection is done away with.

3569. Was there sufficient time in that case?—I think so; I think there were some 20 days between the time they were shipped at Revel and the time they got to Hull.

3570. That is not a 20 days' passage?—No, it is not a 20 days' passage; but from the time they were bought and sent to Revel and from thence shipped, and their being hayed and watered and so on, was some 20 days.

3571. The Hungarian beasts might not have been so long?—The Hungarian beasts I state, without fear of contradiction, to be particularly healthy.

3572. There never has been disease in Hungary, has there?—Yes, there has been disease there; but I assure you every animal is minutely examined, one head at a time, and the Hungarian beasts come over particularly healthy; I have had several killed in consequence of broken legs, and those have been examined post mortem, and I have found no disease in them.

3573. Viscount Cranborne.] Are you still of opinion, as I think you were on a former occasion, that you can detect the disease at a glance when the animal is only in the incubated stage?—Not in the incubative stage.

3575. You would not say that the inspection alone would show the animals were in a condition to escape carrying infection with them?—Not without quarantine; but the inspection has been a safeguard in this country, and I am sure we cannot be more strict than we are; at times I have thought we are too strict.

3576. Do you not think with a larger staff you could be more strict?—I think not. The only thing is to ask the importers if we are strict enough. We have stopped 300 or 400 beasts with eczema and foot and mouth disease. It is impossible for any two inspectors—I am now speaking of myself and my colleague, Mr. Holmans—to be stricter unless you quarantine the animals.

3577. Mr. Hunt.] You would have a better opportunity if they were quarantined?—Yes, decidedly; it would be a safeguard to us.

3578. You must risk sometimes passing an animal with disease, in consequence of the exhausted state it is in from the voyage?—No; I think we take sufficient time about it. If we think it is necessary, after the animals have suffered from a severe voyage, to detain them till the next morning, we do so.

3579. There is great pressure put upon you not to detain them?—There is great pressure, but we are guided by our own feeling in the matter.

3580. Still it is very much against the opinion of the owners?—We do not care for that.

3581. Viscount Cranborne.] Did you ever calculate the time you give to each animal?—It is according to circumstances. The "Maas" arrived either last Saturday or last Wednesday; she only had 250 beasts, and it took me five hours to go through those beasts.

3582. In the course of the winter you examine them more rapidly than that?—No; I have never altered the time from the time I first commenced. As I said before, as to the Tonning beasts, and the Harlingen beasts, and the places I have mentioned, I can go and examine two of them in a minute. At other places where they come from a diseased district, where the disease shows itself from the general appearance, it takes me from 10 minutes to a quarter of an hour.

3583. You regulate your opinion by the country from which they come?—No, from the state of the animal. I see these animals land, and after they have been drawn so as to get them lot from lot, and I see them before they go away, they pass my eye sometimes 20 or 30 times.

3584. Then an inspection conducted on that principle would be clearly no security in cases where animals had picked up the disease in the course of embarkation or on the voyage?—I do not know how they could pick it up on the voyage.

3585. They might pick it up from a foul ship?—I think the ships are so cleansed that it is impossible; of course I can only speak as far as my own station goes. The General Steam Navigation Company, Phillips and Graves, and Russell's, place men on board the vessel as soon as the cattle are landed, in order to get every bit of filth out of the holds and on the deck. Some of them wash the deck, and others scrape them as clean clean as possible, and place disinfectants there. I am thoroughly satisfied, as far as the cattle ships go, that they are cleansed.

3586. What disinfectants do you use?—Each one has his own disinfectants.

3587. Each consignee?—No, each owner of a vessel.

3588. You leave that to them?—Yes.

3589. What do they generally use?—I think chloride of lime and chloride of zinc; I believe those are the two disinfectants.

3590. You strongly adhere to the opinion that it would not be just to the foreign importer, nor practicable, to separate the two markets?—I think not.

3591. Would it be possible to bring the home market to the foreign market at the water's side?—I think so, in the metropolis certainly; I think if you landed them so as to go into the market on Monday or Thursday, all fat beasts sent into the market and there sold, and then order them to be killed within three or four days, that would do; as to the stores, I should like to see them done away with altogether.

3592. You would like to see stores done away with, and milch cows quarantined?—Certainly, milch cows quarantined, and calves under a certain age; calves under six weeks old.

Mr. Stephen Giles Holmans, called in; andExamined.

Mr. S. G. Holmans.

3593. Mr. Hunt.] You have heard Mr. Simmonds' evidence?—I have.

3594. You are his colleague?—I am.

3595. Do you examine at the same wharves as he does?—No; I examine at the upper or London station, the St. Katherine's Wharf, and British and Foreign Steam Wharf. We assist each other in the event of any pressure arising. I frequently go to his station, and he comes to mine. We do it in order to help each other, if necessary.

3596. How long have you been an inspector?—Nearly nine years.

3597. You differ from Mr. Simmonds as to one point, do you not?—I differ from him slightly with regard to the foot and mouth disease.

3598. What is the point of difference between you?—I do not attach quite the importance that he does to the disease; and, at all events, I do not think the method carried out at present of stopping all animals afflicted with the foot and mouth disease in any way tends to check or stop the disease; it goes simply to place an impediment in the way of the cattle trade without, in my opinion, doing any equivalent good.

3599. You would allow all fat animals with foot and mouth disease to go into the London market?—I certainly would.

3600. In whatever stage of the disease they might be?—When they were very bad indeed, on the score of humanity only I would slaughter them. On the score of humanity I would have them slaughtered at the wharf, or taken away in conveyances. I do not think the practice at present adopted at the wharves, of stopping animals afflicted with foot and mouth disease, tends in any way whatever to exterminate the disease in this country, the disease is so prevalent and common.

3601. Do you believe it is a foreign disease altogether?—No, I do not; it is well understood that the disease existed in this country before the importation of the foreign cattle.

3602. Do you know that "foot and mouth" disease is an exact translation of the name which it bears in Germany?—Yes.

3603. Then does not that fact lead you to suppose that the disease itself is of foreign origin?—It does not; it might have visited Germany at the same time that it visited this country.

3604. Is it not your experience that when we have the translation of a foreign name for anything, that that name generally represents a foreign article altogether?—Well, to a certain extent it is so; but I can hardly say so in this case.

3605. When you find a thing in this country which has a foreign name, or a translation of a foreign name only, do you not jump to the conclusion at once that it comes from a foreign country?—It would appear so; but I am hardly certain it is a translation.

3606. But the inference is not a very unreasonable inference?—It is not.

3607. It is the general opinion of people concerned in agriculture in this country, that it is a German importation, is it not?—It is the opinion of agriculturists, but it is not the general opinion of members of my profession.

3608. Is it your opinion that rinderpest is a foreign disease?—I think it is a foreign disease.

3609. You agree with the general opinion upon this point?—Yes.

3610. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] What did you call the foot and mouth disease before?—The term we use for it is eczema.

3611. Eczema is a term that is confined to professional men, is it not?—It is.

3612. Viscount Cranborne.] Human beings have eczema in this country without its being imported, do they not?—They do.

3613. Mr. Hunt.] Have you any suggestion to make as to any improvement that might be made with regard to the treatment of cattle on board ship?—None whatever.

3614. You think they are treated as well as you could expect them to be?—As well as they possibly can be treated; it would be very desirable, certainly, if animals could have food and water, but I can hardly see how it is possible for 500 tied up in the hold of a vessel to have it; even if you legislate for them to have it, I do not see how it can be carried out.

3615. Suppose the animals were put head to head in the hold of the vessels, a man could walk between the rows of animals to feed them?—He could do that, but the probability is a great portion of the food would be wasted, and they would not be able to get it.

3616. The animals would not be able to get at the food?—They would not; they would trample it under their feet. It certainly would bo most desirable if it could be practically carried out.

3617. It is done on board some vessels?—It is done on board vessels coming with small quantities of cattle from distant places, such as Oporto, where they can be put into the hold and lie down; here it is done, and the animals are benefited by it.

3618. Do you find the food wasted in those vessels?—No. There they have an opportunity of of eating it up; here there is a large space for them, and they can get up and lie down as they choose. When you put 400 or 500 in a vessel, packing them in in that way, I think it is impossible they could be fed and watered; I do not think it practicable.

3619. Do you think the animals are ever overcrowded on board vessels?—I have seen some few cases, but from the general fresh manner in which the animals arrive in this country I think there is nothing much to complain of.

3620. They arrive in pretty good condition?—Exceedingly.

3622. How do you think it reached Holland from this country?—No doubt from some cattle that stood in our market which were sent back again to Holland in consequence of the owner of them not realising the price he put upon them.

3623. Have you investigated that case at all?—It is pretty well known my colleague saw the beast go away from here, and he could have told you about it.

3624. Supposing the beast which took the disease to Holland had been subjected to quarantine in the port of Holland, I suppose it would be your opinion that the Dutch cattle could not have got it?—Quite so.

3625. Is it your opinion that that which would prevent rinderpest going into Holland would prevent it going into England?—Yes, of course it would; but unless you show a necessity for it I do not know what would be the use of it, and I do not at present see that there is a necessity for it, excepting as to animals from Russia direct.

3626. You would like to subject animals to quarantine which came from any country where you knew cattle plague existed?—Precisely so.

3627. With regard to the animals that come from the Dutch ports, you do not know where they come from in the first instance?—We do not.

3628. A great many of them come from Hungary?—They do.

3629. Do many of the beasts put on board at the Dutch ports come from there?—They used to do so till the trade was stopped by the Order in Council.

3630. The ordinary course of trade is that the animals come from Hungary and Germany to the Dutch ports, and that those who import them do not know what countries they come from?—Exactly.

3631. Would it not be desirable, when we are in that state of ignorance as to the place they come from, that they should be subjected to quarantine?—I may state that the cattle that are coming now, and that formerly used to come through Holland, come by the way of Bremen; and I am told it is quite a fortnight from the time they leave their homes before they get here. When I see cattle coming, as they do, so remarkably healthy—for no case has been brought to my attention of disease having been discovered after the beast has left us—I think I may take it as a pretty good rule as to the general freedom of the Continent from cattle disease, excepting in Holland; and Holland, as I said before, became infected, as it is pretty well understood, by having some of their cattle sent back from this country.

Mr. Hunt.
Lord Naas.
Sir M. W. Ridley.
Mr. Banks Stanhope.
Mr. Alderman Salomons.

THE RIGHT HON. T. MILNER GIBSON, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. JAMES JOHN RATCLIFF, called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. J. Ratcliff.
31 May 1866.

3632. Chairman.] WHAT is your occupation?—I am a Butcher.

3633. Are you connected with the Butchers' Trade Protection Society?—Yes.

3634. Are you a member of that society?—Yes.

3635. What effect upon your trade as a butcher have the recent regulations with regard to the cattle plague had?—As far as I am individually concerned, they have had very little effect upon me at all, because I am supplied principally from Newgate Market, and buy mostly at Newgate Market.

3636. You do not slaughter on your own premises?—I do not; I have a slaughter-house, but I prefer buying the dead meat myself.

3637. But you have a private slaughter-house of your own?—Yes.

3638. Mr. Dent.] In what part of London are you?—In Shepherd-street, Mayfair.

3639. Chairman.] Were you present at a meeting of the Butchers' Association at which they passed some resolutions on the 24th April?—I was not.

3640. You have seen those resolutions?—Yes.

3641. The second resolution was to the effect that the recent legislation and restrictions have caused great loss to the trade, and unnecessarily increased cost to the public?—That affects those who live a short distance from town, say at Richmond, or that distance from the Metropolitan Market. I have no doubt, in fact I know, it has been a great inconvenience to these butchers living at a distance out of town, say eight or nine miles round.

3642. How has the loss been occasioned to the trade generally?—It is a very great deal more trouble and extra expense. For instance, I have an uncle living at Richmond, and he has been in the habit for years of having his beasts home and killing them. First he killed them in London, and then he got them as far as Hammersmith; he sends men to kill them in the afternoon, and the next morning he has to send them again to fetch them.

3643. What addition in the price of meat has been occasioned to the consumer?—I think very little. I think meat would have been nearly as dear if there had been no restrictions put upon it at all. Meat at the present time is very high indeed, higher than I ever knew it.

3644. You do not attribute that increase of price to the restrictions that have been put upon the trade?—I do not myself.

3645. When did that increase of price begin?—The increase of price has begun in this last month.

3646. What is the difference in price?—Last week sheep made, in Newgate Market, 10½*d.* per pound whole; that I know for a fact.

3647. What is the difference of price for consumption?—At the west-end of the town, although it may appear strange, I declare, upon my word and honour, we have not stocked our meat this last month. I do not believe I have got one penny towards my expenses during this last month, on account of the high price of meat. All the families are dissatisfied, and every one thinks they are paying an enormous price, at the same time we pay as much or more for the meat at market.

3648. What addition in price on mutton and beef, and so forth, is there to the consumer who buys of the butcher; how much in the pound during the last month?—There has been no rise. It has risen in the markets, but not to the consumer.

3649. Do you mean to say that you buy the meat dearer in the markets, but do not make any additional charge to the customer?—Exactly so.

3650. Mr. Edward Egerton.] May we take it that the price quoted in the papers as the price at Smithfield Market is the real price?—Certainly not. At Smithfield and Newgate the prices are very unjust. The prices I think ought to be quoted by six salesmen and six butchers. There is no question that the salesmen put those prices in the papers to answer their purposes.

3651. Do you not know as a fact that the price quoted is larger this year than it was last year in Smithfield?—I do not know that. I know the meat is dearer at Newgate Market within the last month than I have ever known it. We have been giving 10*d.* a pound for our hind quarters of beef; 10*d.* per pound for sheep, and 10½*d.*

3652. Mr. Hunt.] In your last answer but one, you meant to say that the salesmen endeavoured to keep down the prices in the return sent to the newspapers?—Yes, I think so, in order to satisfy the senders.

3653. The country customers?—Yes; I think it would be more just if there were six butchers allowed to join in quoting the price, as well as the salesmen.

3654. The buyers in London, as well as yourself, have to give a higher price in Newgate than is advertised?—Yes.

3655. Chairman.] Have you ever considered the question of what would be the effect of prohibiting the slaughter of animals in private slaughter-houses, and compelling the slaughter in public slaughter-houses?—I do not think it would affect the people a short distance round London, as it would farther away, because I believe anyone living within three miles can be supplied from Newgate Market, but beyond that distance people find great inconvenience. When animals are killed at a public slaughter-house, you must have some one to watch them, or you lose your fat. There are a great many losses attending it. You cannot go and kill an animal when you require it, the same as you can at private slaughter-houses.

3656. You think that the inhabitants within a distance of three miles would not be affected by it, if you had these public slaughter-houses?—I think not.

3657. But at a greater distance they would?—I think they would find a great deal of inconvenience.

3658. Would there be any greatly increased traffic in the streets, of carts and horses, and people carrying this meat about, if all the slaughtering took place at certain public slaughter-houses?—I consider there would be a slight increase of traffic.

3659. You do not think there would be any material inconvenience from that?—I do not.

3661. But you do not think much of the other statement?—I do not think much of the other statement.

3662. Do you think that the metropolis could dispense with a live cattle market altogether, and that the whole town could be supplied with dead meat sent from the country?—In my opinion, what I think would be best, would be to have a separate market for the foreign cattle, both sheep and beasts and calves, and have them slaughtered close to the market; not allow any of them to come into our Metropolitan Market, and have that market alone for our own stock; I think that we should do away with a great deal of the disease.

3663. You think that it would be a security if they were always kept separate in the market?—I think so; a market established for foreign stock. A person who wanted to purchase foreign stock would attend the foreign stock market. Very few purchase in both. Either the butchers have a trade which requires the best meat, or a trade for which foreign cattle will do.

3664. You do not think that a market for the sale of live animals could be dispensed with altogether for the metropolis?—It could be done if they were to allow small markets, a few miles' distance out of town, such as at Southall or Croydon, or any similar distance around, because those butchers who require to buy would then go to those markets and purchase.

3665. Do you mean that the cattle might be bought in the small markets in the neighbourhood, and then sold, and the meat sent into London?—Yes.

3666. Do you think that London could be supplied with meat without a Metropolitan Cattle Market?—Yes. For instance, at the Southall market, already established, I believe the London buyers would go there and buy their cattle, and have them brought to their different homes and slaughter-houses, in the same way as they would go to the Metropolitan Market and buy them.

3667. But you could not rely upon a supply of meat from any distance, during the hot weather, for London; those markets where the live cattle are purchased must be near at hand?—Yes, within five or six miles round London; Southall is nine miles away.

3668. Would it not be very inconvenient to the buyers to have a number of small markets instead of one great one; would they not have less choice?—I think it would not affect them greatly. I do not think it would affect them much, because most of them attend all markets now. I think that would be best, if it is the wish to do away with the Metropolitan Market.

3670. Sir M. W. Ridley.] Which market are you speaking of?—The Metropolitan Market. If you only kept them alive for three or four days they would be sure to fall with it; I believe that is caused by the foreign cattle coming in. If the market were thoroughly cleansed they might go in and out with every safety, and travel everywhere without any restriction being put upon them. I think that would meet the wishes of the trade better than anything else.

3671. Chairman.] Your proposition is to have a separate market for the foreign cattle?—Yes, and to have them slaughtered within a certain distance of the market.

3672. Where would you have this separate market for the foreign cattle?—As near to the port of landing as possible; have slaughter-houses established in connection with the market, and have them killed there. They frequently come over in a heated state, and the animals might be perfectly sound when they first set out, but when they arrive here they are diseased; there is no question about it.

3673. Do you ever do any business yourself in foreign cattle; do you ever buy foreign stock?—No.

3674. You have had no experience, yourself, of the quality of the meat?—I have seen a great deal of the quality of the meat.

3675. You sell no foreign meat?—None whatever.

3676. Mr. Hunt.] You supply some of the first families at the West-end?—Yes, I do.

Mr. J. J. Ratcliff.

3677. And the quality of the meat which your customers expect is of the very highest?—Yes.

3678. The quality of the foreign meat that comes into the London market is inferior to the home-fed meat?—Yes.

3679. A different class of buyers buy the foreign meat to the class of buyers buying the English meat?—Quite so.

3680. Therefore you think that there would be no inconvenience or difficulty to the trade in separating the two markets?—I think not.

3681. Do you know in what parts of the town and country the buyers of the foreign meat principally reside?—In all parts.

3682. But those who buy it supply a lower class of customers?—Yes, and can afford to sell it cheaper.

3683. And therefore, practically, the foreign beasts do not compete with the English beasts, but they compete with one another?—They do not compete with the English.

3684. You do not depend only upon the dead-meat market of London for your supply?—Yes, I do.

3685. I thought you were in the habit of having meat up from Scotland?—Yes, but that comes into the dead meat market; into Newgate Market.

3686. You are chiefly supplied from Scotland, are you not?—Chiefly.

3687. With beef?—With beef and mutton, both.

3688. What part of Scotland does that supply principally come from?—From various parts: some from Inverary, some from Elgin, and some from Aberdeen.

3689. Chairman.] During the summer months?—During the summer months.

3690. Mr. Hunt.] And throughout the year you are in the habit of having beef from as far as Aberdeen?—Yes.

3691. Mr. Dent.] Is that consigned to you, or do you buy it in open market?—I buy it in open market.

3692. Mr. Hunt.] Is it consigned to salesmen?—It is consigned to different salesmen.

3693. And you go and purchase in open market?—Yes, of any salesman whom I see has anything to suit me.

3694. Had this been going on before the restrictions upon the movement of cattle?—Yes.

3695. For how long?—Ever since I have been in business; for 14 years.

3696. For 14 years you have been in the habit of buying Aberdeenshire beef?—Yes.

3697. What proportion of your whole supply comes from Scotland?—Nearly the whole of it.

3698. Is that in the summer?—Yes.

3699. In what condition does the Scotch meat come to Newgate Market?—As a general rule it comes in as good condition as the other meat. If the weather is very hot indeed, some of it is spoilt; but so is meat which is sent into the country a short distance from town.

3700. If the meat is properly dressed before it is put on board the railway, does it as a rule come very well?—Yes. If the meat is killed in the morning, and is sent to us, it will keep as long in our shops as any meat killed in the town the night before.

3701. Although it may be killed a day or two sooner?—Yes. If it is sweet in the morning we buy it; it will keep as long as if it had been killed in the town last night.

3702. Does the length of time it will keep, depend very much on the way it is dressed, and the time it is slaughtered?—A great deal.

3703. If sufficient of the inside is cut away it will, as a rule, keep very well during the railway journey?—Yes.

3704. Do you know whether the consignees of this meat from Scotland have had much loss during the summer months?—At times they have had a heavy loss. Sometimes they have had hampers of sheep sent, and when they have arrived at Newgate Market they have been quite spoilt.

3705. Is that owing to the heat of the air at the time the meat comes, or the condition of the air?—The heat of the air has great effect upon them; but frequently it is from bad packing.

3706. Do you not think, during the greater part of the year, if meat is properly dressed and packed, it can come perfectly sweet from as far north as Aberdeen?—I do.

3707. Supposing that your suggestion was adopted, and there was a foreign cattle market opened near the port of London, with slaughter-houses attached, and direct railway accommodation from that place to the dead-meat market in London, do you think that the supply would be at all decreased to the consumer; do you think there would be a less supply of meat than there is at present?—No.

3708. Do you think that, after the trade had made all the new arrangements, the trade would surer at all?—I think not.

3709. What we are told by those opposed to it is, that buyers would be unwilling to come down to the new market to the water side to purchase, and that the foreign trade would languish; is that your opinion?—I think not.

3710. A great many of the foreign beasts are bought by Whitechapel butchers, are they not?—Yes; in fact they buy some in every neighbourhood now. The foreign meat is improving very much.

3711. With regard to the Whitechapel butchers, they would be nearer the market down at the port than they would be at Islington?—Yes.

3712. Is it not a great nuisance to the inhabitants lying between Blackwall and Islington markets, that the beasts should be driven through the streets?—I believe it is.

3713. You would get rid of that inconvenience?—Yes.

3714. With regard to private slaughter-houses, have you ever, in the course of your business, slaughtered at your own slaughter-house?—Yes; I have a license at the present time.

3715. But you have given up slaughtering at your own slaughter-house now?—Yes.

3716. When you slaughter there, I suppose a great deal of the offal has to be taken away, because you cannot use it in your trade?—Yes.

3717. Tell us what it is that has to be carried away?—We do not require the sheeps' heads and plucks in my neighbourhood, and there is the inside, the paunches and that sort of thing, has to be taken away; then we pay to have the blood taken away.

3718. Of course the skins have to go away?—The skins have to go away next morning.

3719. Is it the same with regard to a bullock?—It is just the same with regard to a bullock also.

3720. The

3720. The consequence is, as to that which is killed at your own house, a great deal of that which walks there alive has to be carted away dead?—Yes.

3721. Which is no use to you in trade, but is used for manufacturing purposes?—Yes.

3723. The skins and hides could be collected much more readily if the animals were all killed at one building?—Yes.

2724. Instead of their having to go round to the different places to collect them, they would find them all at one place, and so far that would save the cost of collection?—Yes.

3726. The same with regard to the hides and skins; you might have tanneries erected near the place, where they could be converted without travelling any distance?—Yes, that could be done.

3727. That would be, of itself, a great advantage?—Yes.

3728. And you would get rid of the nuisance to the inhabitants of the blood and offal at the slaughter-houses?—Yes.

3729. I suppose you are of opinion, that the present dead meat markets of London are wholly insufficient?—Quite.

3730. They will not hold the meat?—No; in fact it is dangerous about 7 or 8 o'clock; you can scarcely get along in the morning.

3731. There is not sufficient room for the traffic, and there is not sufficient room for the meat?—No.

3732. Supposing a new market is provided, as is contemplated, I suppose a great deal of that evil will be remedied?—Yes; a great loss of time would be saved if the railway ran right into the market, instead of having the meat removed from the trucks into the vans, and from the vans into the market.

3733. Should you object to there being slaughter-houses at the proposed new cattle market, and at the Islington Market, also, in which all persons in the trade could slaughter, and lines of railway laid direct from those slaughter-houses into the central dead meat market?—I think the butchers living a further distance from town than myself would find it a great inconvenience not to be able to take their cattle home and slaughter them.

3734. Those that were living out of London, you mean?—Yes.

3735. I am speaking now of London and the metropolis. Should you object to butchers being prohibited from killing in the metropolis, provided butchers living in the suburbs were also prohibited?—Butchers living five miles off serve a lower class of people, and the offal is a great thing at that distance. Those who live nearer do not require the offal.

3736. You would not object to the prohibition against slaughtering upon the people living within three miles of Newgate Market, but you think that they ought to be allowed to slaughter?—Yes, I think so.

3737. What is your opinion as to the desirability of having one dead meat market in preference to having several in different parts of the town?—I think one would be preferable.

3738. Will you give us your reasons for that?—I think, if there were several, the butchers might attend one, and find nothing there; and perhaps at the one they did not attend, there would be a great deal of meat, and there would not be sufficient time in the morning to go from one market to the other.

3739. Whatever change is made, you would wish to have one central dead meat market?—Yes, I think that would be the best for every one.

3740. Are you in the habit of seeing carcases of foreign beasts cut up?—Yes.

3741. Do you think that the state of the market is at all prejudiced by the way the animals are treated on the voyage, and the way they are driven about on landing?—There is no doubt the meat suffers from it.

3742. Can you tell us in what way it suffers?—The animal is upset, and the consequence is, the meat does not eat so tender.

3743. Can you tell, upon looking at the meat, whether the animal has been so treated or not?—Yes.

3744. What difference of appearance would it show?—The meat has more of a bloody appearance.

3745. The animal is heated and exhausted by the fatigue it has undergone, and that shows itself in the appearance of the meat?—In the skin of the meat.

3746. You can at once tell the difference with your practised eye, in a quarter of a beast that has been killed in a quiet state, and a quarter of a beast that has undergone a good deal of harassment on the voyage, and been driven on board at the landing place?—Yes.

3747. The beast so treated, when it is slaughtered, will not keep so long, I suppose, as one that has been killed when it was cool?—No, it will not.

3748. Sir M. W. Ridley.] Are you aware that the butchers' trade entertains serious objections, or would entertain serious objections, to the establishment of district slaughter-houses, as it were?—I think the general feeling of the trade shows a preference to their own private slaughter-houses.

3749. They are in favour of having their own private slaughter-houses?—Yes; for instance, they could go and kill a few sheep or bullocks for the next day at 10 minutes' notice if they required them, whereas if there were public slaughter-houses they would find great inconvenience in doing so.

3750. But if these slaughter-houses were systematised, and a fair fee paid by them, and those slaughter-houses placed in certain portions of the town, which would enable those in the trade, within a comparatively small radius, to get easily to those public slaughter-houses, would they not then, considering the facilities of disposing of the offal collected in one place, be very much much reconciled to using those public slaughter-houses, instead of those which are now used in out-of-the-way places, and sometimes not with very good ventilation?—I think it is the feeling of the trade that they prefer their own private slaughter-houses, because, for instance, they may kill a bullock, some may have 12 stone of fat, and others 14; and if they are not there to see it killed, or have some of their men about, they may lose a great deal of the fat, and the fat would get mixed with other people's.

3751. You have spoken of the condition of the carcasses of the foreign cattle, and you say you can detect the difference in the meat, by its being flabby, and not in a desirable state for your customers. Has it not occurred that you frequently can observe the same condition of the meat in the cases of cattle which have been driven, in hot weather, through the streets of London?—Yes; it has the same effect as the other, if an animal is over-driven; because, from my small experience, I find that meat that has been killed in Aberdeen, either sheep or cattle, gives much better satisfaction to the consumer than the animal that is sent over alive. Some Scotch sheep are sent over alive, and killed in Newgate Market. I never buy them. If I do, I am sure to find some fault found by the customers; but if they are killed and then sent over, they give very great satisfaction; and I find it is the same with beasts. I have been in the habit of buying animals since I was 15 years old, and sending them down into the country, and I have found that those that are sent away dead are better than those which are sent over here alive, and killed after their arrival.

3752. Do you think that that occurs from the Scotch people taking more pains to allow the carcasses to stiffen and cool after slaughtering?—No; but because the beast is killed when it is in a quiet state.

3753. You suggest that there should be sundry cattle markets at a certain distance from the metropolis?—Yes, if the Metropolitan Market was done away with.

3754. But those cattle then would have to be driven from the outskirts of London into the centre of London, to these private slaughter-houses?—Yes.

3755. I presume you think it very disadvantageous to cattle to be driven through the streets of a crowded metropolis like this?—I consider that the meat is preferable when it is killed in a quiet state to its being over-driven.

3756. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Do you get dead meat from any other place besides Scotland?—Sometimes from various places in the country.

3757. From the West of England, or from the North of England?—From all parts of England, in fact.

3758. In the middle of the summer?—Yes.

3759. Have you ever had any from Bristol?—Yes, it comes from all parts.

3760. You find it travels well in the middle of summer?—Yes. A great deal depends on the packing. In some cases where they are careful with the packing, it comes in a very good condition. In other cases you would fancy when the hampers were unpacked, the only object had been to get the meat in, and as if they did not care about the condition in which it came out.

3761. You think the meat comes better from Aberdeen, where the climate is colder, than from other parts where the climate is hotter?—I think it is so.

3762. An animal that is killed in a colder climate in the north of England will travel better than an animal that is killed in the south, where it is hotter?—Yes.

3763. Do you find that the meat which comes by rail is much bruised?—No.

3764. Is not meat that travels by rail very much discoloured. I have seen meat hanging in shops that has been discoloured?—No. I have frequently seen some as to which you could not tell that it was not killed at home in my own place. They have greatly improved the packing in Scotland.

3765. Mr. Edward Egerton.] It depends a good deal on the packing?—Yes. At Aberdeen they make them up in large sheetings from the top of the neck to the bottom of the leg, and when the sheetings are cut open they come out very nice. Some senders of sheep lay layers of cloth between the sheep, and that comes up in good condition. Other men put the sheep into the hamper bare, without any cloths at all, and the consequence is that in hot weather they are spoiled.

3766. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Do you think there is any objection to this, that the animals brought to the Metropolitan Market should not be allowed to live beyond a certain time?—I think they should be allowed to live; but I believe it would be a beneficial thing to all if the foreign cattle were not allowed to come into the Metropolitan Market; I believe those are the beasts from which the disease comes.

3767. Mr. Edward Egerton.] What is the object of this Trade Protection Society, of which you are a member?—To look after the interests of the butchers, and to prevent their doing away with the Metropolitan Market.

3768. Does it regulate the price of meat. Do you all agree what price you shall put upon meat?—No.

3769. It has nothing to do with the price of meat?—Nothing whatever.

3770. Is it simply a review of the market?—It is simply a review of the market; but, I am sorry to say, we are not united enough for anything else.

3771. You talked about the rise of price within the last month; was not meat, some five months ago, and all throughout the winter, very much on the rise?—No; it was very high indeed up to October; since October it has been lower, but not to the extent that the newspapers have put down; they have done the trade very great injustice; they made the public very much dissatisfied, and I know for a fact many buyers wrote letters, and stated where they had bought the meat, and the prices of it, but not one letter appeared.

3772. Who puts in these quotations; is it a society of salesmen, or how is it managed?—They go round and ask the salesmen; and the salesmen say, put it down so and so.

3773. There is no official record?—No.

3774. Is there any return to the Board of Trade the same as there is of oats and wheat?—I do not think there is.

3775. Is there no officer appointed?—No; they go round and ask two or three different salesmen.

3776. I want to know whether there is any authorised person whose quotation is the proper quotation of the price, or whether it is left to the individual caprice of any man?—I believe it is left to two or three salesmen.

3777. Mr.

3777. Mr. Hunt.] There is an inspector of the market, is there not?—I do not know; it may be the clerk of the market, perhaps.

3778. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Your opinion is that foreign stock is very much inferior to English stock?—Yes; but still it is improving in quality.

3779. I suppose you have not read the evidence given before this Committee by some of the men connected with the foreign trade?—I have not.

3780. Mr. Dent.] Have you ever bought any French meat?—No, I have never bought any foreign meat.

3781. Mr. Edward Egerton.] There is not much foreign meat coming to the West-end?—No; West-end butchers who supply good families would not attempt to supply foreign meat.

3782. Do you believe the foreign meat is bad from the deterioration the animals receive on the voyage?—I do not believe it would be nearly so good if they were killed without going any voyage at all.

3783. Mr. Dent.] Some witness talked of the Spanish beasts fetching as much as 46*l.*, is that so?—I have no doubt they have fetched that price. They are very large beasts.

3784. Chairman.] Do you know Mr. Crouch?—I have heard the name.

3786. You do not agree with Mr. Crouch?—Not quite.

3787. Not at all; because what I understand him to say is, he thinks it would be utterly impossible to supply the metropolis with fresh meat?—He means the whole of it. I said that part of it could be supplied, but not the whole.

3788. Then you agree with him, to a certain extent?—Yes. For instance, anyone that can get home, after they have loaded their van, within half an hour, or three quarters, from Newgate, can get home in time, but anyone who has to take the meat for an hour, or an hour and a half, in the vans, would find the meat bad.

3789. Mr. Carnegie.] Would it not be possible for those suburban butchers to get consignments of meat direct from Scotland?—No, I think not. It would be very beneficial to the trade, if they could.

3790. I think you say you buy the meat in the market, but you do not have any consigned direct to you from the Scotch butchers?—No.

3791. Is that the general custom of the trade?—Yes.

3792. It is not customary for the Scotch butchers to consign to individuals at all?—I do not know one who consigns to individuals at all.

3793. To your knowledge has there ever been any time when you have been unable to get Scotch meat in the market owing to the weather?—In very hot weather we have found great difficulty, but by being there early, we have generally got a supply. There are certain times when things have come very short.

Mr. J. J. Ratcliff.

3794. Do they send much less in hot weather?—At times; after a very hot week when perhaps a little of it has been spoilt, we have found they have been very shy for the next three or four days or a week.

3795. Do you know whether they communicate much by telegraph on the subject of the meat trade to Scotland?—Greatly.

3796. Does all the Scotch meat come packed in cloths?—The whole of the Aberdeen beef comes principally in sides or three parts of the animal; the sheep are in hampers.

3797. I suppose by the term "Aberdeen beef" you include the whole of the beef from the north of Scotland?—Yes.

3798. Mr. Hunt.] Supposing there was a division between the foreign and English cattle markets, as you suggest, would you wish to see that market held on a different day to the Islington Market?—I do not think one would affect the other, because those individuals that buy always buy from the one market; I do not know a single individual in the private trade that buys from the two.

3799. You would see no objection to having the market on a different day?—Not at all; possibly that would meet the wishes of most of the trade to have it on a different day.

3800. You said the animal coming into the Islington Market got foot and mouth disease, in consequence of the foreign beasts coming there?—I think the foreign beasts first brought it in.

3801. But it is now very prevalent in this country?—Yes, and has been for years.

3802. I suppose the English beasts with foot and mouth disease come into the Islington Market?—If they were free from it when they went in they were sure to have it when they came out.

3803. Do many English beasts come into the Islington Market with foot and mouth disease?—No, not now.

3804. Do you visit the Islington Market?—At times.

3805. But not for the purpose of purchasing?—Yes, for the purpose of purchasing for my father, who lives some distance in the country.

3806. Is it your opinion that at this time there is more foot and mouth disease among the foreign beasts than among the English beasts?—Yes.

3807. At this period?—Yes.

3808. Do you think if a foreign cattle market was established at a part of London distinct from the English cattle market, the price of foreign beasts would be at all lowered thereby?—I think not, myself.

3809. You do not graze any beasts yourself?—No, I do not.

3810. Does anyone connected with you?—Yes, I have a brother-in-law who grazes his.

3811. Is he a farmer or a grazier?—A farmer and grazier.

3812. Do you think it would be the wish of the English grazier that foreign store stock should undergo a quarantine before they are sent into the country?—I think so.

3813. It is the impression of the public engaged in that pursuit that a great many of the diseases that have come amongst our herds have come from abroad?—Yes.

Mr. J. J. Ratcliff.

3814. And they think there should be steps taken against a fresh introduction of the disease?—Yes; there was a case in Northamptonshire, not long ago, of some merino sheep going down there having the small-pox; I think it was two months ago. Those were brought down from the Metropolitan Market, and the man's whole flock fell with it.

3815. That was in the neighbourhood of Weedon?—Yes; it was a man of the name of Clark. They killed them all, and the neighbours made him a little compensation.

3816. If there had been a system of quarantine, perhaps that would not have happened?—No.

3817. Chairman.] Have you gone into the question of the cattle plague, yourself, at all; have you formed any opinion how it arrived in this country?—I believe it was first brought over by the foreign animals, and I believe it first sprung from the Metropolitan Market.

3818. But you think it was first brought to the Metropolitan Market by foreign beasts?—I do.

3819. What facts have induced you to arrive at that conclusion?—From the condition that many of them were in when they landed.

3820. Do you think that beasts that have been landed with a disease upon them have been allowed to go to the Metropolitan Market?—Yes; they have not known it; the disease has been upon them, but it has not been sufficiently developed for them to tell.

3821. But it has been latent in them, and sufficiently developed to infect other beasts; that is your opinion?—Yes.

3822. Mr. Dent.] Have you made any personal inspection, yourself, of the foreign cattle you have spoken of; have you seen them landed yourself?—Yes.

3823. To any great extent?—Not to any great extent.

3824. You say that you have formed an opinion that the disease was introduced from the foreign cattle which were landed and brought into the market; I ask you the question, have you formed that opinion from your own personal inspection of them, or merely from report?—From seeing them.

3825. Mr. Carnegie.] Do you think the inspection is properly carried out?—Yes.

3826. Mr. Banks Stanhope.] You think that no system of inspection could prevent diseased animals from being landed, and communicating disease by mixing with others in the Metropolitan Market?—No; I think nothing would prevent that.

3827. Mr. Hunt.] Your opinion is that animals may have disease in a latent state, may pass an inspection, although that inspection is properly conducted, and within two or three days show symptoms of being in such a state as to communicate the disease to other animals?—I do.

3828. But, supposing there was a proper quarantine, that could not happen?—No, it could not happen.

3829. Mr. Banks Stanhope.] Do you know any localities of London, or near London, that might be adapted to quarantine purposes?—I do not.

3830. Do you know any fields out at Bow?—No, I do not know much of that part.

3831. Do you know any instances in which foreign cattle have communicated disease in the metropolitan markets?—It would be almost impossible to tell.

3832. Do you know instances, of your own knowledge, of animals communicating disease to others from the Metropolitan Market?—I know that any beast bought in the Metropolitan Market, when they come home, are sure to fall with the foot and mouth disease; and if they are bought in the country market, they do not.

3833. Mr. Graves.] Do you know many instances where animals coming from Scotland have been affected with disease by being exhibited for sale in the market?—I do not.

Dr. Henry Letheby, called in; and Examined.

Dr. H. Letheby.

3834. Chairman.] Have you in the course of your calling had to do in any way with the cattle trade and its effect upon health?—I have, to a very great extent. I do not know that I have been practically concerned with respect to the influence of the cattle trade upon health; but we have a very great deal of meat sold in the City markets, and the question of diseased meat may probably be one that has an important bearing upon the public health, and the same may be said of the slaughter-houses of the City.

3835. Do they come under your cognizance?—Yes. They quite come under my cognizance.

3836. First of all, with regard to the collecting of live animals for sale in a metropolitan market, do you consider that that bears at all upon the public health of the metropolis?—No, not if it be well regulated. I think there should be a limit to the collection of animals in the metropolis. I think that encouragement should be given, as far as is possible, to the bringing of dead meat into London, rather than to the bringing of live animals; but still there must always be a certain number brought here, in consequence of the fluctuation of the public demand for meat, and there must be a means of meeting that fluctuation by the existence of a live market. I think, indeed, that a live market in the metropolis is only required to meet such fluctuations as may occur in the course of trade, from the somewhat uncertain supply of the dead meat; but, so far as my experience at the present time goes, seeing that the practice of bringing of dead meat into the city markets is becoming greater and greater every year; that, in fact, it is found that meat can be sent to the city markets from the most distant parts of England, even in the warm weather, without undergoing any particular decay or deterioration, it is a prime consideration, with regard to public health and public convenience, whether every encouragement should not be offered for the sale of dead meat, rather than for the bringing here of the live animals.

3837. You think, then, that the collecting of animals to an unlimited degree in a metropolitan market may have a prejudicial effect upon the public health?—To an unlimited degree, and to an uncontrolled degree, it may.

3838. I only want to know from you whether you consider that the collecting together of live animals in a metropolitan market for sale has a prejudicial effect upon the public health?—No, I cannot go so far as that.

3839. I am speaking of the collecting by the cattle cattle trade of live animals in the Metropolitan Market; has that, by itself, a prejudicial effect?—Independently of the slaughter-houses?

3840. Yes?—No, I do not think so. I have seen no indication of that.

3843. You think, in fact, that the slaughtering in a crowded city in private slaughter-houses, is very injurious to the public health?—Yes, it is injurious, I think.

3844. You would recommend, I suppose, that the slaughtering should be carried on in public slaughter-houses, under proper regulations?—Under proper regulations, and with all the appliances for disposing of the offal and manure. At the present time such regulations and appliances do not exist, or they are not in a proper condition in the private slaughter-houses.

3845. What becomes of all the blood which flows from the animals, when they are killed in the private slaughter-houses?—It is disposed of in two or three ways. The sugar bakers take a large quantity for the purpose of refining the sugar. In the next place, there is a great quantity collected for the manufacture of manure; it is collected in pans, and sent to the manure makers. In the third place, the albumen of the blood is required as a mordant for certain dyes; but all the blood, or nearly all the blood is collected, and does not go into the public sewers.

3846. It does not flow into the drains and sewers of the town?—Not to any large extent, a little of it gets away in the washing of the slaughter-houses.

3847. So far as it does get away it would have an injurious effect?—Getting into the sewers it would give rise to a putrefactive decomposition, which would be very objectionable.

3850. What has the rest been seized and condemned for?—Animals that have died from natural causes or from disease, 48,777 lbs. in five years; diseased meat, 505,000 lbs., in round numbers, and putrid meat 385,000 lbs. making 939,000 lbs. altogether.

3851. Mr. Hunt.] I should like you to explain the meaning of the word "putrid"; is the putrid meat the meat of animals which have been healthy and kept too long, or does it include the meat of animals which have been diseased and kept too long?—No; it means good meat that has become putrid on its road to London.

3852. Chairman.] Is this putrid meat, as a rule, part of that which comes to London from the country?—Yes; some of it was slaughtered in London, but most of it came from the country.

3853. We were told that when meat is slaughtered in London it does not keep so long as if it had been slaughtered even a day sooner in the country?—Yes; I think that is true.

3856. The rapid means of communication furnish facilities for this dead meat supply which could not have existed in former times?—Yes, that is so; and again, the animals are slaughtered in a better condition than when they are slaughtered in the London slaughter-houses, for they are not fevered by fatigue; they are not killed while they are in an improper condition, when in a febrile state, or when their systems are charged with food in an imperfect state of digestion; and such meat putrifies putrifies less easily than the meat of animals which are killed in an improper condition.

3857. Before the cattle plague it was the custom to purchase fat beasts in the Metropolitan Market, and send some of them into the country, there to be slaughtered, but since the restrictions have been in force they cannot be sent alive, but only in the form of dead meat. Has there been a perceptible increase of slaughtering since that regulation?—I think that must be so, but I am not prepared with any exact figures on that point.

3858. You have not seen any effect produced by the increased quantity of slaughtering carried on in London?—No. I have seen this; that in consequence of those regulations, the officers and veterinary surgeons attached to the Customs and Revenue Department will not permit animals tainted with any disease, or the sign of any disease, to leave the wharves at the present time; and in some of the ports of importation they have not the proper means of slaughtering, and there has been complaint of the annoyance and inconvenience occasioned by the slaughtering of animals under those circumstances, where there has not been proper provision for the slaughtering. They have set up a place, for the moment, without any appliances at all, which has been a subject of great annoyance to the neighbourhood.

3859. Supposing the private slaughter-houses were put an end to, and people compelled to slaughter in public slaughter-houses, could you exercise a more effective supervision over the meat sold if such were the case, than you do at present?—Yes, unquestionably. There is no effective supervision all over the metropolis, except in the City of London; outside the City they can slaughter animals in the most diseased condition and sell them, and it is the subject of complaint by the butchers on the borders of the City, that they are treated differently from the butchers outside the City; practically, indeed, there can be no supervision of animals, where slaughter-houses are scattered all over different parts of London; whereas, if the animals were in the public slaughter-house, and there was an officer appointed to inspect the meat, that is to say, if the animals were inspected before they are slaughtered, and again after they are slaughtered, there must be pretty nearly perfect protection to the public, as to the quality of the meat, and that is the practice on the Continent.

3860. Then you think the consumers in the metropolis would be benefited by putting an end to the private slaughtering system, and having public slaughter-houses?—Yes; I think all parties would be benefited.

3861. The public health would be benefited?—Yes.

3862. And the consumers of meat?—Yes.

3863. But what would the butcher say to it?—Ah, there is the difficulty. You have to deal with vested interests, and with huge prejudices. I know, as matter of fact, that those are great difficulties.

3865. How long has that system been established in Paris?—It was, I believe, established by the first Napoleon.

3866. Has the butchers' trade suffered in consequence of these state regulations in Paris?—No. There have been other regulations in regard to the butchers' trade, in Paris. There was a great monopoly some years ago; the Emperor has broken through that, but I do not think the butchers' trade has been affected.

3867. The butchers' trade is still a flourishing trade in Paris, notwithstanding those state regulations; and in Edinburgh?—Just the same.

3868. How long has the system been established in Edinburgh?—I saw it three years ago, and I suppose it must have been in existence six or seven years.

3869. Have you heard that the fleshers in Edinburgh have been affected, at all?—No; it does not at all affect them, as far as I can learn.

3870. They acquiesce in it now, I suppose?—Yes. I believe they rather like it; because at the present time it prevents a great deal of inconvenience, which they were obliged to submit to formerly.

3871. Independently of the nuisance of these different trades going on in the neighbourhood of the slaughter-houses, the fat boiling, the gut twisting, and all the rest of it, there is a great amount of labour in having to cart away, from different private slaughter-houses, offal of the different kinds, in order to be turned to account in other ways?—Yes, and on occasions like that of the rinderpest, there was no regulation in respect of the disposal of the offal, it was taken away, and cast broadcast over the land, which, I believe, had as much to do with the spread of the disease as anything; whereas, if there were proper regulations, there would be the means of disposing of that most dangerous source of infection.

3872. In fact, in case of necessity; in case of cattle plague, or any other extremely contagious disease, if you had a central slaughter-house, everything that came from the animals required to be used for manure could be properly treated before it was removed?—Yes.

3874. Chairman.] You would allow buyers of fat beasts in the metropolis to take them away alive into the country, within a certain distance of London, or, if convenient, to have them slaughtered in a public slaughter-house?—I think it would be unwise to make any regulation with regard to what is to be done with the animal. It would be impossible, in point of fact, to make any regulation as to what is to be done with the animal bought in a public market. You can make regulations prohibiting private slaughtering, but you you cannot make regulations with regard to the disposal of the animals.

3875. The principle you advocate would be a principle you would like to see applied to all large towns, or to towns of a certain population?—Yes; my experience extends beyond the City of London, and I may venture to say that in every large town in the kingdom, there is the same ground of complaint. The public suffer great inconvenience, and above all, there is the danger of having no supervision of the quality of meat sent into the public market.

3876. At whose expense would these public slaughter-houses be constructed?—Probably at the expense of the municipality, but they would always maintain themselves. Their maintenance would be always in themselves.

3877. But then, would not the private slaughter-house proprietors claim compensation?—No doubt; and they ought to be compensated, there is no doubt of that. You cannot break up an old trade without considering that. But, at the same time, the public would be so much benefited by the establishment of public slaughter-houses, that I do not think the public would have any objection to give a reasonable compensation.

3878. Mr. Hunt.] Would you not be able to compensate them out of a fund to be created out of the letting of accommodation in the public slaughter-houses for the purpose of slaughtering?—It might be so.

3879. And it would be a paying concern?—I think it would.

3880. Chairman.] Would it not be very difficult to estimate the loss that a man really would suffer in money, by not being permitted to slaughter in his private slaughter-house?—The mode of ascertaining that must be arrived at in the same way as railway companies arrive at the value of people's property and business; I do not know how else it could be done.

3881. Mr. Hunt.] If a railway company wanted to go through a slaughter-house, they would take possession of the house, and compensate the owner, I suppose?—Yes, certainly they would.

3882. Mr. Edward Egerton.] There is a fee of 4*s.* for each animal slaughtered now?—I forget the price, but there is a fee at the public slaughter-houses at the Metropolitan Cattle Market. Until recently those have not been used at all. The Corporation provided very extensive and very commodious slaughter-houses; but so strong was the prejudice of the butchers, that they would not take the slaughter-houses.

3883. What was the fee?—My impression is 2*s.* 6*d.*, but I am not sure.

3884. Chairman.] You would like compulsory measures to be adopted?—With regard to public slaughter-houses, compulsory measures in regard to the doing away of the private slaughter-houses should be adopted. Certainly, I have no two opinions on that point.

3885. Mr. Dent.] In all the large towns of England?—In all the large towns of England.

3886. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Would you make it illegal for a man to have any private slaughter-house?—Yes; for that would be the only way of dealing with the matter.

3887. Chairman.] Whatever slaughtering is to take place should take place only in these licensed public slaughter-houses, under the regulations of the law?—Certainly; at the present time, in most of the municipal Acts, in the Local Self-Government Act, and in the Sewers Act of the metropolis, it is laid down that it is illegal to slaughter in certain places, and a very little extension of the Act would make it apply to other places.

3889. Is his examination a good one?—His examination, I believe, is pretty perfect; but then, looking at the amount of work to be done, and the large collection of animals, however diligent and careful a man may be, something may escape his observation.

3890. Chairman.] I see the butchers say, in one of the resolutions, that if they are prevented from slaughtering in their private slaughter-houses, and have to go to a public slaughter-house, they could not exercise a proper supervision over their property, that they would not have the same control over their property that they now have when it is in their own private slaughter-houses?—The answer to that is to be found in the fact that wherever there are public slaughter-houses, the supervision is found to be very complete; there is no difficulty of the kind in reality existing where there are public slaughter-houses; there is no such difficulty in Edinburgh or in Paris, and I undertake to say there is no such difficulty in any of the large slaughter-houses on the Continent; it is a fancy, not a fact.

3891. Mr. Hunt.] Supposing a man went to a public slaughter-house for once in a way, to slaughter an animal, he might be under a difficulty?—No doubt.

3892. But when it had grown into a system, arrangements could be soon made for proper supervision?—Undoubtedly; there would be no difficulty about it at all.

3893. I suppose one might expect that the trade would rather re-arrange itself; you would have more of the slaughtering butchers, as distinct from the dead meat butchers?—Yes; it is quite likely we should have, to a large extent, another class of men entering the trade; at the present time the large butchers must be men of capital; they must purchase the living animals and sell them, and so, if they had the opportunity of purchasing the dead animal at once in the markets, it would bring into the field another class of dealers.

3894. Mr. Banks Stanhope.] There would be less monoply?—There would be less monoply.

3895. Chairman.] Have you any returns in the City, showing the gradual increase in the supply of dead meat to the metropolis, for some years past?—No; we have had a good deal of difficulty in getting at a knowledge of the dead meat sold in our city markets. At the time the inquiry was put on the part of the Corporation, before this House, with regard to the formation of the new Smithfield Market, I, with the late Mr. Pearson, took a great deal of pains to ascertain the quantity of dead meat, but there was a difficulty about it that was almost insurmountable; I believe at that time the proportion of dead meat was about 80,000 tons a year, and that is not more than five years ago; it is now double now at 150,000 tons?—Yes, I put it down at that; we can only learn from the number of carts that come from the several railways, and we give the quantity of meat sent by the railways to the public markets; but we could get no information from the butchers themselves. Of course I am only speaking now of the City of London markets, and they are the great meat markets of the metropolis.

3896. Mr. Edward Egerton.] You put it down now

Dr. H. Letheby.

3897. Chairman.] Your experience is that it forms a larger proportion of the whole than the dead meat sold in London a few years ago?—It is nearly double.

3898. It is a larger proportion of the whole?—Yes, no doubt of it.

3899. Mr. Banks Stanhope.] There would be no difficulty, I suppose, in a private butcher hiring a portion of a public slaughter-house for his own exclusive use?—Not at all, and the slaughter-houses of the City market have been made with that object.

3900. And he might exercise as much supervision there, as if he was in his own slaughter-house?—Yes; I think so.

3901. Mr. Edward Egerton.] I suppose the hours are limited in the public slaughter-houses?—No; the slaughter-houses are open at all times; I do not know that they are open in the middle of the night.

3902. How long are they kept open?—I really cannot say; the market inspector could tell you that.

3903. Mr. Banks Stanhope.] I think these private slaughter-houses are very often in the most crowded localities, are they not?—They are mostly so.

3904. Did you give evidence before the Smithfield Committee some five years ago?—I did.

3905. Am I right in stating that the new meat market at Smithfield was partly made with reference to the public slaughter-houses at Islington?—Yes.

3906. But the object was, that the animals should be killed at Islington, and brought by the Underground Railway to the Smithfield dead meat market?—That was a very great consideration indeed.

3907. You gave evidence then, if you remember, that the private slaughter-houses, with all the appurtenances, were most obnoxious to the health of the metropolis?—Yes, we have 58 slaughter-houses in the City of London, and there is not one of them which is not more or less a nuisance to the neighbourhood.

3908. You have mentioned the blood going to the sugar refiners; where do the sugar refiners generally live, as a rule?—The sugar refiners are mostly in Whitechapel.

3909. There is a large blood manure manufactory on the banks of the Thames, is there not?—There are several on the banks of the Thames, and several at Bow Common.

3910. Where do the hides generally go to?—To Leadenhall market or to Bermondsey, and they are there bought by the tanners.

3911. If it is possible to have a foreign meat market on the banks of the Thames, would not that be better, for all these purposes, than Islington?—For foreign cattle it would be advantageous to have them slaughtered at the port of importation.

3912. That is, to have the foreign slaughter-house and the foreign cattle market separate from the others?—Yes.

3913. You think that would be an advantage to the health of the metropolis?—When I say a foreign market, I do not think it would be desirable to have another market; I think it would be advisable to have all the meat brought together, as far as possible, for the accommodation of the butchers; because the higher class of butchers have to make a choice of a large assortment of meat, and it would be well to give them an opportunity of taking their choice of the whole meat of the Metropolitan Market; it would be very advantageous to have the slaughter-houses at the place where the animals are imported, and the carcasses might be then sent to the dead meat market.

3914. I meant to say, animals could be landed there and slaughtered there, and the carcasses conveyed by rail to the central markets?—Yes, I think it would be an advantage to the metropolis in many ways; it would certainly, with regard to the prevention of the importation of disease, be of great advantage.

3915. Will you mention again the different trades that come to the public slaughter-houses?—In the first place, there is the tallow melting trade, that is, generally speaking, close to the slaughter-houses. Then we have what are called gut spinners and sausage-skin makers; they are very offensive trades, both of them. Then there are the bone boilers, although in consequence of the sanitary regulations they are driven to Whitechapel and Bow Common, and elsewhere; and there are also the collectors of the blood. All the blood is collected at once, and taken to some neighbouring place, where it is converted into a material as the first step, so to speak, of its manufacture into something else.

3916. Mr. Hunt.] There is another trade, the boiling down of the hoofs?—Yes, and the tripe-dressing. I forgot that.

3917. And there is the making the glue?—That takes place near the outskirts, but there is tripe-dressing and boiling of tripe in many localities.

3918. Mr. Banks Stanhope.] Am I right in supposing that on the banks of the Thames you might find ample accommodation for all the trades which are at present in these crowded localities?—Yes, I think so.

3919. You were talking about having seized a quantity of putrid meat in summer in the dead meat market?—Yes.

3920. Has there not been for some years in the country a system of killing animals to prevent their dying?—Yes, a great number of animals in the last stage of disease are slaughtered to save their lives, as it is called. There is no doubt of that, and it comes, moreover, into markets where there is no supervision, and is sold for human food.

3921. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Is there any penalty on the man who sells such things?—Yes, the amended Nuisances Removal Act gives power to the Sanitary Inspector to seize such meat and take it before a magistrate.

3922. What is the fine?—The fine is now 20*l.*

3923. That is the maximum?—That is the maximum, but there are difficulties about it, especially in proving that the meat was exposed for sale.

3924. Mr. Banks Stanhope.] Might not a good deal of the putrid meat you seize in summer belong to animals that have not been healthy when killed?—Oh yes, it might be so.

3925. Is it not the fact that a great quantity of meat of animals killed in that way comes up to London?—Yes, a great quantity.

3926. That is never detected?—No doubt, it is never detected; because, as I say, there is no proper supervision of the butchers' shops and slaughter-houses on the outside of the city.

3928. If a dead meat market becomes more general, would there be any difficulty in the country trade learning how to do it properly?—No; they would soon get to know. At the present time they have learnt a great deal upon that point. We do not see so much putrid meat as we used to see formerly, in proportion to the whole quantity seized.

3929. Have you ever turned your attention to the supply of meat to the dead meat market in London?—Yes, it is a matter that has occupied my attention for some time.

3930. Is it your opinion, from what you have seen, that it would be possible, as a rule, to supply London with dead meat?—Not altogether. I think you must have public slaughter-houses to provide for any uncertainties, so to speak, of the supply in the dead meat markets.

3931. That is to say, having no live meat market but all foreign cattle coming alive being sold dead?—Yes.

3932. And the same with live animals that come up from different parts of Great Britain; they would not be allowed to go alive out of the metropolitan market?—I do not say that. I do not think you can make any regulation, except under particular circumstances, by an Order in Council; you cannot interfere with the disposal of an animal after it is sold; but you can interfere with private slaughter-houses.

3933. A fat animal could not be killed in London, except at the public slaughter-houses?—No. You could make such a regulation as that, but there could be no regulation to prohibit animals leaving the market except under such circumstances as its having disease, and being likely to propagate it.

3934. Would you have no provision of that sort for foreign fat cattle?—No; I do not think you could make a regulation of that sort. You might make regulations with regard to the inspection of animals when they are landed, but as a large number of foreign animals are bought for stock, I do not see how such a provision could be enforced.

3935. I mean a fat animal?—Yes; but who is to define exactly when the animal is a fat one, and when it is not.

3936. Could you not define it as being fit for the butcher?—I think not.

3937. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Will you tell me the cause of the great delay that has taken place in the erection of the market of Smithfield, since the Committee sat with regard to it; why has the City of London slumbered for these seven years?—I cannot answer that, although, I believe the delay rested entirely with the railways. I have been told, indeed, that the City could not commence the market before the railway had done their part of the work.

3938. Is there anything now doing to carry out the arrangements?—Oh, yes; I cannot speak with any authority on the subject, but I believe so.

3940. Some mention was made about the hides of the animals being removed to the immediate neighbourhood of Leadenhall Market. I dare say you have frequently been to that hide market, where the hides are laid out during the process of cutting off the horns, and so forth?—Yes, very often.

3941. Has it not appeared to you that that is an extremely improper place to expose those hides; and have you not frequently observed that the effluvium was extremely objectionable, and very prejudicial to health?—I have reported again and again on the improper practice that is followed in Leadenhall Market, namely, the salting of the hides. The hides are sold by weight; they are therefore anxious, before they are sold, to have them as heavy as possible. After they are sold, they have to be conveyed to the tanner in the country, and to prevent their becoming putrid, they are salted on the public way. Every hide loses on an average a quart of serocity, of the nature of decomposing blood. I have known a thousand hides so salted on the ground of Leadenhall Market, and the whole ground of Leadenhall Market is so saturated with decomposing matter, that the very wells of the neighbourhood are actually impregnated with it. It is so bad a practice, that I have again and again remonstrated, and suggested to the authorities the necessity for altering it; but I do not go so far as to say that it is an improper thing to sell hides in Leadenhall Market. I think, with proper regulations, it is a very good situation for a hide market; and, with proper regulations, it need not be an annoyance or offence to the neighbourhood; but, under existing circumstances, it is a monstrous nuisance.

3942. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Surely the Nuisances Removal Act applies to a case like that?—It does not. I have no real power to deal with it. The City Lands have control over the market, and they make regulations, but the dealers in hides break them.

3943. Would not an indictment lie for a public nuisance?—I think not.

3944. Sir M. W. Ridley.] You are aware that there are no less than five of these abattoirs at Paris?—I think there are five.

3945. I suppose your view would be this, that there should be abattoirs at certain different parts of London, taking a radius from a certain centre. You would have so many of them established, but you would not have one general public abattoir?—I would. I think I would have the abattoirs at the Cattle Market, excepting those where the cattle are imported. I do not think there there are so many cattle killed in London, because the trade is mostly for dead meat, as to call for the existence of more than two or three abattoirs.

3946. You would hardly consider it possible that certain trades which have been alluded to, connected with the slaughter-houses, such as the fat-boiling and that sort of thing, could be carried on at those places; the blood, and so forth, would have to be removed, if there were more than one public abattoir, and that established on the banks of the Thames; you could not carry on these fat-boiling and other processes immediately close to and in connection with the slaughter-houses, because you would then be creating what I take it would be an offensive and dangerous nuisance to the particular locality of which that slaughter-house would be the centre?—Yes; but it would be more easy for the removal of the fat from the one central slaughter-house than it would be to gather it up from a great number; and then it would be taken to this locality, where the operation might be carried on without its being a nuisance.

3947. Have you had opportunities of seeing the condition of many of these private slaughter-houses?—Oh yes, I have had very frequent opportunities.

3948. You consider their condition bad in general?—Yes; in my opinion many of them are unfit for the work done in them.

3949. Have they been more scrupulous in cleaning them within the last six or seven months?—I do not think more so than usual; they keep them as clean as they possibly can; they carry out all our regulations in regard to the slaughter-houses as far as possible; but the situation of the places, the confined character of them, and so on, prevent the thing from being done effectively.

3950. Have you ever known a butcher kill a sheep actually within the premises or the house in which he himself was living?— They live sometimes over their slaughter-houses; in the Newgate Market slaughter-houses, for instance, cattle and sheep are killed on the ground-floor below, and it may be looked upon as the dining-room of the place as far as the situation is concerned.

3951. The man and his family inhabiting the apartment above it?—Yes.

3952. I ask the question, because I myself have seen such a thing?—Oh yes, it is so.

3953. Viscount Cranborne.] With reference to the processes you mention, that were carried on in the neighbourhood of the slaughter-houses, is it absolutely necessary that they should be offensive?—No; I think with proper regulation they need not be offensive. I think if the fat is melted directly it is taken from the animal, it need not be a source of annoyance; but if it is allowed to remain until it is putrid, it may be; and that is the case now, because the butchers do no not send their fat away immediately. It is gathered up, and they keep it until they have a sufficient quantity of it for the people to take away. In that way it becomes putrid, and is often a source of annoyance. Of course, it is their interest to manipulate these things while they are as fresh as possible; but still from the difficulties attendant on the management of private slaughter-houses, these things are frequently putrid before they are removed.

3954. It would be possible, I suppose, by Parliamentary provisions, to enforce the observation of such precautions as should prevent it?—I do not think Parliament could deal with the details at all. I think if public abattoirs are made, the regulations of the abattoirs must rest entirely with those having the control of them. I do not think Parliament could deal with the details connected with the treatment of these matters in the slaughter-houses.

3955. It would be necessary that that authority should in part consist of persons who had some direct charge or interest to be careful for the public health?—Yes; the municipal authorities, or the Local Board of Health, or whoever it may be.

3956. I was not here at the commencement of your evidence. Have you given any opinion as to the extent to which diseased meat is unwholesome to the human system?—I have devoted a great deal of attention to that subject.

3957. Are you of opinion that it is unhealthy?—There are certain kinds of diseases in animals which are unquestionably dangerous to the public health; parasitic diseases of animals, diseases in pork, and so on. Parasites produce disease undoubtedly in the human subject. It is a matter of doubt whether animals afflicted with febrile disease or with pleuro-pneumonia, produce any injury to the public health; it is my opinion that they do; but there are others who think that in the early stages of the disease the meat is not unwholesome, although it may be unwholesome in later stages of disease.

3958. And the same with the rinderpest?—The rinderpest, for example, and common fever, and pleuro-pneumonia.

3959. Is it your opinion that putrid meat in itself is injurious to human health?—When it is used entirely as an article of diet, I think it is. A little venison, as we know, is not unwholesome; a small quantity of putrid meat is not injurious, but if you were to make a meal altogether off putrid meat, it would be so.

3960. That is a matter of controversy in the profession?—Yes; some believe that the human stomach has great power of destroying what may be termed diseased material of meat; but there are others, who, from great observation, have come to the conclusion that diseased meat of any description, if the animal is killed in an active or acute stage of disease, is unwholesome.

3961. And the same with regard to healthy meat which has become putrid by over keeping?—Yes; it unquestionably acts injuriously on some people, although it may not on others.

3962. Mr. Dent.] I understood you to say that outside the boundaries of the City there was no systematic inspection of meat; is that correct?—That is so.

3963. The diseased animal might be killed by private butchers outside the City, and there would be no inspection of the meat?—It would be an accident if it were inspected.

3964. Is it not the duty of any public officer outside the City to inspect it?—Yes; it is the duty of the inspector of nuisances to make inspection of the meat; but these officers are in the first place very rarely qualified for such work, and in the next place they have a great deal to do in the inspection of pavements, houses, &c., and in looking after common nuisances, and they have no time for the inspection of slaughter-houses; therefore, practically, there is no inspection.

3965. The inspection which takes place in the City

City is at Newgate and Leadenhall Markets?—Yes, exactly; but we have inspectors to do nothing else than examine into the condition of meat in the markets and butcher's shops in the City; there are not many butchers' shops in the City.

3966. A great portion of the animals which are killed to save their lives go to the dead-meat market?—I believe so.

3967. There the meat is exhibited?—Yes.

3968. You do not find any difficulty in getting convictions; you get a good many convictions, do you not?—We do; I forget how many we have had. The salesmen give us a good deal of assistance; the salesmen inform the inspectors, now, when they open a basket of meat and find it diseased; we are much indebted to the salesmen for the way the work is performed.

3969. You think, on the whole, in the City of London there is a satisfactory inspection of meat which is sent in?—I do.

3970. But outside the boundaries of the City of London there may be a great deal of unfit and diseased meat exhibited for sale?—It not only may be, but it is so.

3971. Mr. Hunt.] You think that, for London, slaughter-houses at the Islington Market, and at the waterside down the river, would be sufficient?—I think so.

3972. For what radius?—I think for the whole of London: I do not know that there would be any necessity on the western side; the Metropolitan Market and Copenhagen Fields are accessible for all parts of London; possibly on the Southwark side of London it would be advantageous to have another slaughter-house.

3973. Do you think they would want another in the Borough?—That is the only place; one looks upon it in this way—there is a little difficulty in crossing the bridge.

3974. You think one would be required in the Borough?—Yes.

3975. Further out, in Kensington, do you think you would want one?—No; because the butchers at Kensington and the West-end, come to Newgate Market.

3976. We were told by a practical butcher just now, he thought there would be a difficulty if people had to go more than three miles to the dead-meat market; do you agree with that?—I do not agree with it; because it is a matter of fact that the meat in Newgate Market is fetched by butchers from all parts of London.

3977. From how far?—From the very extreme parts of London; you find butchers' carts from every part of London, standing in the neighbourhood of Newgate Market every morning.

3978. Still, some animals are slaughtered in the suburbs?—Yes; no doubt that is so.

3979. Independently of the question of London, do you think it advisable that all slaughter-houses, in all places, should be licensed and subject to regulation?—I will hardly go so far as to say that that would be necessary throughout the country; but I think it necessary in all large towns.

3980. What sized towns would you say?—We might say a town of some 2,000 inhabitants.

3981. There are villages of 2,000 inhabitants?—I admit that is a subject that requires consideration.

3982. I suppose you would put it in this way; that wherever the population is crowded together to any great extent, there you would require the slaughter-houses to be licensed?—Yes.

3983. Do you think in the large towns, such as Birmingham, Manchester, and Leeds, it would be desirable to have public slaughter-houses?—Yes, I do; I think in all the large towns of England it would be desirable.

3984. Lord Naas.] Do you think the establishment of public slaughter-houses in those towns, would affect the price of meat much?—Not at all.

3985. Have you examined the question closely?—Oh yes. One must look upon it by the light of the practice on the Continent and the practice in Scotland. It does not seem to affect the price of meat at all, where there is a public slaughter-house. I should be disposed to think, if it had any influence at all, it would have a tendency to diminish the price of meat.

3987. It is possible that the consumer might be benefited by it?—Certainly. He could not be worse off, and it might be he would be very largely benefited.

3988. Have you given your attention as to which is the best locality where a dead-meat market for foreign stock could be established in the neighbourhood of the Borough?—No; I did some time ago look into it, but I really forget the particulars of the inquiry, the locality should be some little distance down the river. Blackwall would be a very good situation.

3989. You do not think there would be any difficulty in finding a locality where railway and other accommodation would be available?—I do not think there would be the least difficulty.

3990. With your knowledge of the trade, do you think the butchers would, after a short time, find it as convenient to go there as to go to Islington Market?—Yes; I think, when the present routine system, as it were, is broken down, and the prejudices about it are overcome, the butchers would find it to their advantage, and would have no objection to it at all.

3991. Mr. Hunt.] In the event of a foreign cattle market and slaughter-house being established down in the port of London, do you think that ought to be under the control of the municipal authorities of London?—I hardly know; but I should think that might be done under the authority of Government or under the authority of the Customs.

3992. Would not the City of London lose a certain amount of the market dues which they now get?—I do not think they would. I think if the abattoirs were at the market, they might make the same arrangement with regard to the live market, as at present; and the dead meat would be sent to the City market.

3993. At present there is a certain sum paid per head with regard to every animal that enters the market?—Yes.

3994. Supposing the foreign cattle were no longer allowed to come to the Islington Market, that payment would cease?—Certainly, as far as the live animals are concerned.

3995. Would not the City of London regard with some jealousy a legislation which would deprive them of that part of the market dues?—They ought to be heard upon that point, for I should hardly like to express an opinion upon it.

Dr. H. Letheby.

3998. Are there any other conditions that accelerate it?—Not that occur to me at the present moment.

3999. Are there any atmospheric conditions?—Yes, we know the meat is disposed to putrify in electrical conditions of the atmosphere. In such cases meat putrifies; as beer sets up its fermentation, meat sets up its putrefaction under what we may call electrical conditions of the atmosphere.

4000. You have never reduced those general notions to anything like arithmetical definition?—No, and I do not know that anybody has ever done so.

4001. Mr. Hunt.] With regard to carcasses sent up from the country, a great deal depends on the way the inside of the animal is treated?—Yes.

4002. If the internal fat is cut out and cleaned, and the inside well wiped out, is it not less likely to turn putrid?—It is not so likely to turn putrid, but if the intestines are allowed to remain in the animal for a few hours after it is slaughtered it becomes green in the inside, and decays.

4003. Then a great deal might be done with antiseptics?—One does not like to encourage the practice of putting anything on the meat.

4004. But there are certain antiseptics which we are in the habit of putting on meat for the purpose of giving it a relish?—Yes, salt.

4005. And pepper?—Pepper and flour.

4006. And ginger?—Yes.

4007. Those things I have mentioned could not possibly be deleterious, could they?—No.

4008. Have you had any experience of the effect of charcoal on the meat?—Yes; we have made a great number of experiments with charcoal on meat. Charcoal has a tendency, when put on meat, to absorb the vapours given off, and to oxidise them. Little by little it will eat up the meat as it were.

4009. Viscount Cranborne.] Does it not consume the meat itself?—It may be said that it does. There is the sulphite of potash or hyposulphite of soda which might be put upon the meat, and which has a tendency to check decay.

4010. Have you known the outside limits on each side, the maximum or minimum of keeping the meat. Assuming the extreme conditions in each case, what is the maximum and minimum time of keeping the meat?—I do not think, even in very warm weather, that good meat will show any unpleasant effects of decay in less than a couple of days.

4011. How long will it keep the other way?—In cold weather it will keep three weeks or a month.

4012. Mr. Hunt.] In fact, there is hardly any time it will not keep in cold weather?—No.

4013. You said you thought a live cattle market was necessary for London, in order to meet any deficiency in the supply of dead meat?—Yes.

4014. Do you suppose the demand for meat in London varies much from week to week?—I cannot say the demand varies so much as the supply.

4015. But at present the trade is in rather a disturbed state in consequence of these cattle plague regulations?—No doubt.

4016. Supposing a new system was introduced, and London more extensively supplied with dead meat than it is, do you not think the supply might become regular and uniform?—It might become very regular.

4017. Supposing the London butchers were dependent on the country for their supply, in these days of quick trains and telegraphs, I suppose an order might be conveyed down to a country butcher to send up a quantity of carcasses just as quickly as it could be conveyed to a London slaughter-house?—No doubt by a proper system of that sort. There is no reason why the supply of London should not be very steady, perfect, and complete.

4018. In all large towns the demand is pretty regular, is it not?—I cannot say the demand is so very irregular as that the supply is rather uncertain. It is rather an uncertain supply than an uncertain demand.

4019. I suppose you could ascertain within a few tons, if you had the means at your disposal, what the daily demand of the Metropolis is?—Yes, I think the daily proportion of meat used in the Metropolis, is somewhere about four ounces per head per day; hardly so much perhaps, about 25 ounces in a week.

4020. I suppose in the case of a great strike, that would affect the consumption?—It must be a very large and extensive strike all over England.

4021. In the case of London, supposing there was a strike in any trade?—Yes, if there was a strike among the butchers.

4022. I am speaking of a strike among the masons and the carpenters of the metropolis; would that affect the demand at all?—I do not think that it would be observed much.

4023. Is there much variation in the consumption between the summer and the winter?—No, I think not. I think it is pretty steady.

4024. Supposing the demand is regular and the system in time settles down and becomes perfect, I suppose we might then expect the supply to be as regular as under the old system?—Yes, one may conclude so. I see no difficulty in the way of it at all. The difficulty is to start it.

4025. Lord Naas.] With regard to the question of killing cattle in the country, do you think that the offal that it was found impossible to dispose of in the country towns, could be brought to the large large towns and disposed of to advantage?—It is not a common practice to send the offal to the markets of London or the country.

4026. Then if the offal could not be disposed of in that way there would be a certain loss occasioned by killing the beasts in very large numbers in districts where the non-existence of those particular trades prevented a good market being found for them?—They must be killed in large numbers not to find it possible to dispose of the offal, because it is found more advantageous to dispose of the offal in the neighbourhoods where the animals are slaughtered than in London and in large towns; and I can only imagine a case where large numbers of animals are being slaughtered and there is no use for the offal in the immediate neighbourhood.

4027. Take one description of offal. I suppose the offal could hardly be disposed of unless there was a large population of poor?— The greater part of the tripe of London is not sold immediately to the population, but is sent abroad.

4028. Where is it sent to?—It is sent to Holland and to Switzerland. A great deal of it is cured and boiled in the usual way. At least two-thirds of the tripe of the metropolis is sent abroad, therefore there would be no difficulty in disposing of the tripe wherever the animals are killed.

4029. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Is there a duty put upon it?—I do not know the particulars of it.

4030. Lord Naas.] Do you know what the value of the tripe is in comparison to the animals?—No, I do not.

4031. With regard to the other portions of the offal, the blood and so on, there would be no difficulty in disposing of that?—No difficulty; in agricultural districts the blood is always available for manure; manure works would be formed to dispose of the blood; the tongues would be salted, and they would be sent away; as to the hearts and livers, and so on, I do not know what part of the animal in fact could not be immediately disposed of in the locality.

4032. You think that if large establishments were formed, even in small towns in the country for slaughtering, these trades would immediately rise up in the neighbourhood, and persons would be found to enter into arrangements to buy the offal for the purpose of sending it away?—I think so.

4033. Mr. Dent.] Would it not occasion distress to the poor of London, if they were in want of the offal?—I think things would soon balance themselves. At the present time it does not pay to send the offal to London, because of the small sum realised by it; but if there is a demand created on account of the wants of the poor, it might be met at once by the offal being sent here.

4035. And certain inferior portions of the meat?—The heads of bullocks, or rather the flesh taken from them, can be sold anywhere, and sheeps' heads.

4036. Mr. Banks Stanhope.] Would not the foreign market, according to your plan, give sufficient offal to supply the lower class in London?—I should think so.

Dr. H. Letheby.

4037. Taking the foreign animals slaughtered here, they would be enough?—I think so.

4038. Are any of these diseases evident in the dead animals?—Yes, in the measles in pork it is very evident.

4039. In beasts can you detect any of these diseases in the dead animals?—We can detect diseases in the fat of meat, but we cannot always detect the particular kind of disease.

4040. You can tell that the disease has been there?—Yes.

4041. Are you aware whether the rinderpest can be detected at all?—Oh yes.

4042. If it was inevitable that all cattle should be inspected by a public officer, when dead, would not that be a check upon the inspection of them when alive?—No doubt it would.

4045. Would you have any rule that all animals which are sent up dead from the country should pass through a public inspection before they went into private hands?—Yes, that would be in the public dead meat markets.

4046. Would you have the rule that no animal should be sent from the country direct into a private hand?—Not for sale; that no animal should be sent into private hands for sale.

4047. That no animal should be allowed to be sent from the country to a butcher or any person having to sell it without being examined?—Yes; there would be no difficulty in that; on the continent it is done.

4048. At what other places on the continent besides Paris have you known such regulations?—I have seen the regulations in Switzerland, and some in Prussia, and I have seen the regulations from the Government of Austria, and elsewhere; they are all on the same basis; animals are inspected when they are alive and after they are dead.

4049. Sir M. W. Ridley.] Are the carcasses stamped as passed?—No; a certificate is given.

4050. In Paris they are stamped?—Yes.

4051. Mr. Edward Egerton.] What is the relative price of meat in Paris as compared with London?—I do not know.

4052. Generally?—Generally meat is a little cheaper in Paris than in London, I believe.

4053. Mr. Banks Stanhope.] Am I to understand that practically those towns are supplied very much by the dead meat market?—Yes, or if not supplied by the dead meat market, they are supplied by the butchers, who have their animals slaughtered at the public slaughter-houses.

Mr. CHARLES HICKS, called in; and Examined.

Mr. C. Hicks.

4054. Mr. Hunt.] YOU are concerned in the Foreign Cattle Trade?—Yes.

4055. Are you chairman of the Foreign Cattle Trade Association?—I am.

4056. You come to represent their interest before this Commitee?—Yes, to a certain extent.

4057. You heard Mr. Hönck's evidence, did you not?—Yes.

4058. Do you wish to add anything to that with reference to the interest of the foreign cattle trade?—I do not think he expressed his views so fully as I should have wished to have them expressed.

4060. Why do you think that you would be in the hands of a few buyers?—Because, if the principle was to be adopted that all foreign cattle should be sold two or three miles down the river and be there slaughtered in abattoirs, the whole trade of the retail butchers would no longer attend the market.

4063. You are supposing that under the new system the trade would go on as before; but do you not think it very possible that if animals were required to be slaughtered at the markets, the trade would be altered, and that one man would buy for slaughtering, that another man would buy the dead meat, and that the two would become wholly distinct?—Undoubtedly; that is the system in France at the present time, and the sellers of cattle find very great fault with it. They say the authorities of Paris do all they can to make the price less, and that the owners of animals receive a less price.

4064. Then do I understand you find fault with the authorities of Paris for endeavouring to keep down the price of meat?—Manifestly; it is the interest of my employer to get the highest price for his goods. They are bought at a certain price, not a cheap price; and if they did not receive a higher price here than they receive there, the trade in foreign cattle would fall away.

4065. You say the authorities in Paris do what they can to keep down the price of meat?—Decidedly.

4067. There is another view to be taken as well as that with regard to the cattle plague?—No doubt both sides must be compared and weighed.

4068. Your opinion is, that if you were confined to the markets by the water side, the price of meat would be lowered?—It would to us, most undoubtedly. It would be an unfair advantage also to the owners of the English stock.

4069. I suppose you have given us rather a good reason for wishing to see it established?—I hardly follow you.

4070. You have given us rather a good reason for wishing to see the change take place, that it would lower the price of meat?—I think there should be no law by which a man's property should be sold for less than it is worth.

4071. Have you anything further to say to the Committee?—Yes. There was also the question of the complaint itself, and how it was brought into this country; and that has been the occasion for an onslaught upon the foreign cattle trade. I should wish to state that the attacks which were made upon the foreign cattle trade, and the statements that were made when the cattle plague first broke out, that it was brought from foreign countries here, is grounded upon entirely false premises; because if you take the present theory that the cattle complaint is such, that within two days from the time the animal is attacked or infected, the animal's blood is in a state of infection, that in two days more the complaint itself is manifest, that the animal weeps from the eyes, drops from the nose, and has the complaint, I should say this: it has always been understood and and agreed that the cattle from such places as Sweden, Schleswig-Holstein, Denmark, Holland, France, Portugal, and Spain, were free from the complaint; that it did not exist there; and therefore, according to the theory that it could not arise of itself, it could not have come from these places, but it must have come from the distant parts of Hungary or Bohemia, where it has existed in former times. These cattle are upon the road about nine, 10, 11, or 12 days; therefore, if cattle had left those countries with the complaint, it must have been apparent before they arrived here, or they must have infected the districts upon the road as they came along. That has never taken place. Out of 100,000 cattle that have been sold here in the course of the year, there has never been found one at the place of debarcation affected with the complaint.

4072. Then you say it is a physical impossibility that we could have got the rinderpest from abroad?—According to the present theory, from the time the animal is affected with the complaint, or infected, it would be apparent in four days; whereas these animals are upon the road from nine days to 14.

4073. Mr. Banks Stanhope.] Whose theory is it?—That is what I believe is the theory of Professor Gamgee and Professor Simonds.

4074. Mr. Hunt.] That it is only four days in a state of incubation?—Only two days, that is from the time the animal is first infected; in two days the blood is in a state of putrefaction, and that the animal shows an increase of temperature of from 2° to 3°, but in two days from that time the complaint is apparent.

4075. I was under the impression that the profession thought that 10 days was the ordinary period?—Of death.

4076. But is it the opinion of the veterinary profession that about 10 days is the ordinary period of incubation?—No; I think that would be about the time of infection and death; that after 10 days had passed an animal was supposed to be quite safe.

4077. Do you know that Professor Simonds says that the period may extend to a greater length than 10 days?—He says that, but I think the evidence he gives of it is very unsatisfactory.

4078. You do not agree with those who put it at more than four days?—No. I give no opinion myself. I merely state the opinion I have heard as being put forward by the Commissioners.

4079. Where do you find four days stated as the period?—I read it in "The Times" as an abstract from the Report of the Commissioners upon the Cattle Plague.

4080. Do you know which Report it was?—The third Report.

4081. Mr. Banks Stanhope.] Did you happen to hear Mr. Simonds' evidence two days ago before the Committee?—No.

4082. Would you be surprised if he had said that he would not be satisfied with anything less than 21 days' quarantine?—I believe he did say so.

4083. Then if he said he required 21 days' quarantine, am I wrong in supposing that it shows after two days?—Upon that point there has been no opinion given which you can take with safety.

4084. Mr. Hunt.] Do you know of your own knowledge how long animals take coming from Hungary to the Dutch ports. The cattle that leave there come through Vienna, do they not?—Yes; and they cross the frontier at Bodenbach.

4085. That is upon the Saxon frontier. When they leave the estate of the owner there is a certificate given by a veterinary surgeon, saying that the cattle herewith are free from all complaint; there are so many black, so many red, so many dappled, and so on; that these are cattle from such an estate, or from such an owner; that they are sold to such a buyer; that they are free from all complaint, and that no complaint exists in the neighbourhood from which they come. They are then taken through the Austrian dominions, and examined after by the Saxon police at Bodenbach. Then there is a fresh certificate given at Bodenbach that they have been examined, and that they are sound. They are then allowed to continue their route, and that generally will take, from the time they leave the owner's estate in Bohemia to the time they arrive here, about 10 days. I suppose there have been sold, in the course of the year just passed, about 130,000 head of cattle and 500,000 sheep, and perhaps 30,000 calves; and there has never been found any infected with the complaint, except those few from Holland; and the complaint was taken from here to Holland in the month of July last.

4086. Mr. Carnegie.] I suppose you have had no practical experience in the cattle plague?—I have not.

4087. Mr. Dent.] Do you sell any foreign cattle to the first class London butchers?—Not to the first class butchers, but to all others.

4088. The objection would be, that if you are confined to a market by the river side, the better butchers would not think it worth while to come to buy your beasts in the foreign market?—The best buyers would be all shut out.

4089. And the wholesale buyers would get the same class of cattle?—At their own price. There would be a complete want of competition.

4090. Mr. Banks Stanhope.] Have you ever heard that it was known that diseased cattle were imported in July, from Holland, very largely?—The case was this, that about the beginning or the middle of July, a salesman here received 23 head of cattle from Schiedam that cost about 19 l. a piece here, and after being exposed in our market for three days, he could only get 13 l. a piece for them. He received a telegram from the owner to send them back. They were then exceedingly ill. When they arrived in Holland, I believe they died of the complaint, and infected animals all round. After that time, a few cattle arrived from there; I believe they were all cows, but at that time all the cattle in Holland were placed under embargo, and cattle were not allowed to be sent away from any part in which disease existed. There is no doubt there were about five or six during the three months that arrived from Holland infected with the complaint, but there were exceedingly few.

4091–9. Have you ever heard that Dutch beasts are generally those that have the disease most in the month of July?—No; the fact is, that in the month of July the whole of our market was affected with this complaint, and the cattle that were exposed for sale took the complaint. Upon that there is no question. These foreign animals are very much bought by country buyers, and were taken from our market into other parts of the country. By that means they took the complaint along with them, but at the time they arrived in the market for sale, they were perfectly free. I have had at my own house, where I live, some 2,000 or 3,000 cattle grazing on the land, taken from the ships to my land, and kept there till the time of their being sold.

4100-2. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Where is your house?—At Tottenham. There I have my own two cows, but they have never taken the complaint; and I have never heard of any instance in which foreign cattle that have not been exposed in the Metropolitan Market have given the complaint to any others.

4103. Mr. Banks Stanhope.] May I ask this: If the cattle come cheaper on the banks of the Thames than those at Islington, would not that fact be soon found out by all butchers?—I believe that even if that were to be the case the trade would fall off.

4104. Would not the fact of cattle being cheaper in one place than the other at once attract a large number of buyers?—Most undoubtedly it would attract buyers; but there might be such difficulty in carrying on the trade that small men would not attend.

4105. But is it not the case that people always follow the cheapest market?—Not exactly so.

4106. Comparatively speaking?—Comparatively speaking. We have cattle quite as good as the English, but still buyers prefer buying the English at the higher price; they do not buy our cattle, though they are cheaper.

4107. If there were nothing but public slaughter-houses, would the same rule apply?—I think if you had any slaughter-houses of the kind, the trade would go out of the hands of the smaller men into the hands of the larger men.

4108. Does that apply to the public slaughter-houses?—If it were to be the rule; if you form only public slaughter-houses; that is the case in Paris. There are in Paris, now, 1,500 butchers; and, of them, under 500 attend those beast markets, and of those about 80 are wholesale.

4110. These men come to Paris and buy the living animals, and take them to these towns for slaughter?—Yes; and it is the same here. For instance, we have the counties of Surrey and Sussex. In those counties there are no cattle bred; there are a few, of course; but Kent, in particular, is entirely supplied by the metropolitan market. I suppose we have attending our market in the autumn of the year some 200 or 300 buyers, and they very often buy and take away something like 400, 500, or 700 beasts per week.

4111. Do you mean to say that the buyers of Kent cattle at the foreign cattle market buy wholly foreign meat?—They buy mainly foreign cattle, but they buy all sorts. Kent is almost entirely supplied from our markets.

4112. Mr. Banks Stanhope.] Am I to understand that public slaughter-houses in your opinion would throw the trade into very few hands?—Certainly.

4113. Am I right in supposing that if the trade is thrown into few hands, there would be more monopoly?—Undoubtedly.

4114. Am I to understand that if there is more monopoly it would raise prices?—I think not.

4115. Do you say the more monopoly the cheaper prices are generally?—If there was a monopoly of the kind you mention, it would depreciate the value of the grazing stock.

4116. If there were a monopoly, would it tend to make meat dearer or cheaper?—That is very difficult to say, but I should think cheaper.

4117. Why?—By reason of there being a monopoly. We have now 4,000 buyers.

4118. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Do you mean seriously to tell us that in your opinion a monopoly generally makes things cheaper?—A monopoly of buyers, not of sellers. We have now, for instance, 6,000 head of cattle on a Monday, and we have 4,000 buyers. If a man comes to buy in the market now, as soon as he begins to bid for his lot, there are two or three more immediately behind him, and he must give the price. If we had 3,000 or 4,000 head of cattle with only 60 or 70 buyers, there would be no competition.

4119. Mr. Banks Stanhope.] Assuming that all the foreign cattle are bought by this small monopoly, where would the other butchers buy?—Of the wholesale men, and they would get their profit at the expense of the farmer.

4120. You suppose that a few butchers would buy their animals, slaughter them there, and send them to the dead-meat market?—Yes, no other buyers would do it; it is a very curious trade, but I believe it would be as you say; that the cattle, instead of being bought by 4,000 men, would be bought by 500 men, of which some would be retail men.

4121. What do you call a fair purchase for a retail man?—It varies; from 1 up to 15.

4122. Would it not be worth while for a man to buy 15 beasts, and kill them there?—It would all depend; but I can just give you my experience of a common slaughter-house.

4123. Mr. Edward Egerton.] You mean of a public slaughter-house?—A public slaughter-house, where the master cannot always attend. I received 19 oxen from a person in Hamburg about six weeks since. Of those, six were stopped at the wharves. I sold 13 in the market at 20 l. a piece, and they weighed about 100 stone each, to the best of my belief. The man I sold them to said, "You have got six down at the wharf, you may as well allow me to take charge of them as anybody else." I said, "Very well; do the best you can." He went down to get them slaughtered, and to see after the fat and offal; but when he arrived, one had been killed before. The five which he had, weighed about 98 stone a-piece, and came to 16 l. each. The one that nobody ever saw, that was killed for me by Heaven knows who, came to 11 l. 10 s., and it weighed 74 or 75 stone. That was never my ox, although I could not find out who did it.

4124. Mr. Banks Stanhope.] What was the reason of the animal being killed by "Heaven knows whom," as you express it?—They were stopped at the wharf on account of their having the foot and mouth disease. I should like to make one further remark, and that is upon the cattle being killed at the wharves. My experience upon that point is very large. It is undoubtedly doubtedly true, that the animals we have killed and sold for us, we invariably lose from 2 l. to 4 l. each upon.

4125. Mr. Edward Egerton.] The effect of your evidence comes to this, that you are very much against the public slaughter-houses?—Yes.

Mr. C. Hicks.

31 May 1866.

Mr. A. E. HIRSCHLER, called in, and Examined.

Mr. A. E. Hirschler.

4126. Mr. Edward Egerton.] WILL you state to the Committee the nature of the evidence you propose to give?—I propose to give any evidence you ask me upon, as to how the trade is carried on in Austria, and how it is carried on in foreign cattle, so far as I am concerned in it.

4127. Are you an exporter of cattle from Austria?—Yes.

4128. Are you a buyer or breeder of cattle on your own account?—A buyer and a feeder; I am not a breeder of cattle.

4129. Where do you reside?—In Vienna.

4130. Whereabouts is your trade?—The places we feed our cattle most at are Bohemia and Moravia.

4131. We have heard from several of the witnesses that there is a very large trade in cattle coming from Hungary, exported out of Austria by the railway, and coming to England by way of Rotterdam?—They come now by way of Bremen, not by way of Rotterdam.

4132. You say you reside at Vienna, and that you are a large feeder of cattle; tell us where you feed those cattle?—There are many beet-root sugar manufactories in Bohemia and Moravia, and the environs of Vienna. We send the lean cattle to those manufactories to be fattened.

4133. They are fed up there?—Yes, always. We sell the lean cattle at a certain price, and buy at the same time the fat ones; it is generally done in one transaction.

4134. How long are they kept on the average?—We send them in the months of October, November, and December, and begin to take them away in February, March, April, May, and June.

4135. Upon an average, they are three or four months?—Something like that; it depends how they get fat.

4136. What is the age of these cattle?—It differs very much; the cattle are generally from five years to seven or eight years old; there may be some also that are older.

4137. They have been used for the purpose of draught, have they not?—Yes.

4138. What is the size of those animals, are they large bullocks?—We have many different breeds of animals. Generally speaking our animals are larger than those you find in this country. They are heavier animals generally speaking, and a different kind of breed. We have what is called the Tyrolese or Swiss breed, that is the short-horn; then there is the Styrian breed, which is considered a superior breed. The Hungarian breed is the long-horn breed.

4139. Are they as large as our English and Scotch beasts?—Decidedly they are.

4140. Do you reckon by the stone?—I can tell you by the English weight. We have animals imported which weigh, I should say, from 80 to 120 stone; because if they were smaller it would not pay to send them here.

4141. The Committee want to gather from you, not only what the course of trade is as regards these cattle, but what your sanitary regulations are; and how the regulations affecting the transit of these animals through the country are conducted. You have brought us to the place where they are fattened. They are fattened at these beet-root sugar manufactories?—Yes; out of the offal. First the sugar is made from the beet-root, and afterwards, with what remains, they are fattened.

4142. Who buys these cattle, are they the butchers from Vienna?—No; the export dealers mostly buy them, those who send cattle to foreign countries.

4143. After the animal is sold, describe to the Committe what is the course of dealing with the animal supposing it is bought for export?—After the animals are bought for export, they are put into the railway, and sent through Germany.

4144. Germany is rather a wide field?—They go by Passau.

4145. That is in Bohemia?—No, it is in Germany, in Bavaria. It is the frontiers of Austria and Bavaria.

4146. How long are the animals on the transit?—My cattle leave Vienna every Saturday and arrive on the next Saturday morning.

4147. That is seven days?—Yes.

4148. Lord Naas.] How do they come?—They go from Vienna without stopping to Eisenach; I am able to tell you the towns.

4149. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Where are these animals fed and watered during the seven days?—At Eisenach; that is at a distance of 36 to 40 hours from Vienna railway travelling; they are taken out of the railway waggons there, and fed and allowed to remain there for about 12 hours.

4150. Whose duty is it to see to these animals?—It is my duty.

4151. You have nothing to do with the State regulations?—At Passau, the frontier of Austria, there is a State regulation.

4152. Is that a regulation of the Custom-house?—No, it is a sanitary regulation; as well we have to give a kind of passport for our cattle, to state where they come from, and that they are all sound, and so on.

4153. Would there be the means of stopping the animals if they were not sound?—Most decidedly.

4155. At whose expense are those cattle fed during these 12 hours?—It is done at my expense.

4156. What is the charge for feeding each animal?—About 1 s. each a day.

4157. Are they put in lairs or turned into a field?—They are generally put in stables; I have not been to Eisenach myself, and I do not know know what the accommodation is there, but my men tell me it is first-rate.

Mr. A. E. Hirschler.

4158. Are these trains made up entirely of cattle?—Entirely. We have a separate train for our transports; we have from 16 to 20 waggons of cattle. We have to mention it about 12 hours before, and a train is put at our disposal.

4159. Are the waggons your own, or are they furnished by the railway?—They are furnished by the railway.

4160. What becomes of the cattle after they get to this place where they are watered and fed?—They are put into waggons and we send them to Gestemunde, a port near Bremen. They generally arrive about Wednesday morning, early, and they are well fed and watered. As far as I am concerned, I have an extra regulation to give them some corn there, and then they are embarked on board ship.

4161. When are they embarked, on the following morning?—They generally leave there on Thursday according to the tide; sometimes at eight o'clock and sometimes at one. They arrive in London generally about eight or nine o'clock on Saturday, or on Friday night.

4162. Are these vessels at Bremen fitted up entirely for the carriage of cattle?—Yes, most of them.

4163. Fitted up with stalls?—Yes; most of them are made for the trade.

4164. What port do they come to?—They come to London; my cattle, for instance, come to St. Katherine's and Dublin Wharf, and to Blackwall generally.

4165. What is the expense of sending these cattle from the place where you say they are fed, to this port?—I can only tell you the expense from Vienna. The distances are so different from Vienna.

4166. Just take Vienna for the starting point?—From Vienna they come for 5*l.*; in fact I always put 5*l.* upon the original price.

4167. The 5*l.* from Vienna to London includes everything, the freight of the vessel, the expense of feeding them, and every single thing?—Yes. Then we must take the damage we have by some cattle breaking their legs, and accidents that will happen.

4168. As a general rule, have your cattle been subject to any accidents?—I can say, I generally lose one on an average in every transport, by the breaking of its legs.

4169. How many come at a time?—I send 140 or 150; you may say about one per cent.

4170. Is that generally from some accident on board the steamer, or by railway?—It is generally in embarking or disembarking at the railway; by putting them into the railway carriages, or letting them out.

4171. Have you heard whether there is great difficulty in unshipping them from the different trucks, and getting them in again?—No, there is no difficulty whatever.

4172. We have been told, that in England there is a great deal of difficulty in getting the cattle out of the trucks and putting them in again?—It is an expense and trouble; the cattle get knocked about; you cannot call it a difficulty, but the animals suffer very much by it.

4173. Have you any means of watering or feeding the animals in the trucks?—No.

4174. They are always taken out?—They are always taken out.

4175. In Germany have they adopted the means of watering and feeding them?—I have not heard.

4176. We need not follow the course when they come to London, we merely want to know the arrangements through your country; do you find any difficulty in taking these animals out for 12 hours and having them fed?—No, I do not.

4177. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Do you feed the animals in the boats during the passage, with hay and water?—Yes; of water they get very little.

4178. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Have you any inspector at Bremen, on your own account; you are the shipper of the cargo?—Yes, we have a doctor, who inspects all the animals before they are shipped.

4179. In the State of Bremen have they also an inspector?—They have not; it is for our security we have them, in order that no animal with mouth disease should enter the ship. They would be stopped in London, and therefore it is our interest to have them very carefully examined.

4180. You say, upon an average, one per cent. of your animals receive some injury: that loss always falls upon you?—Yes.

4181. What is the price that you generally receive for these animals upon their arrival in London?—In London, for bullocks, the price according how the market is, is from 18*l.* to 28*l.*; 28*l.* is the price I realised to day for some fine beasts. It depends entirely how the market is; but I believe I am very near the mark when I say from 18*l.* to 28*l.* is the price for the primest.

4182. Do they range generally from 85 stone up to 125 stone?—Yes.

4183. Mr. Dent.] Is that the stone imperial or the London stone?—The stone which the butchers use here; the 8lbs. That is the way they always sell in London.

4184. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Have you had much of this foot and mouth disease among your cattle?—In Austria, very little; scarcely any: in fact, I have only had it once with cattle coming here.

4185. How many years have you followed this trade?—This is the first year I have followed it in London, but I sold previously to dealers who went to London.

4186. Did you sell them to Germans or to Englishmen travelling about?—It was a very curious sort of trade. For instance, when it began that Holland and northern Germany supplied England with meat, they had to go further south to supply themselves with meat.

4187. You mean that the Dutch had to go further south?—Not the Dutch exactly, the northern Germans. The trade is now carried on directly from Vienna to England. I believe I was among the first who had a direct trade from there.

4188. You have some very fine pasture land down on the Hungarian side?—Yes.

4189. All about Buda and Pesth?—Our finest pasture land is in Styria, in the mountains.

4190. Can you fatten animals on the grass?—Yes, but we cannot send those animals here.

4191. Why not?—Because they cannot stand the journey; they lose too much in condition.

4192. You think the animals fattened on the beet-root stand the journey better?—Decidedly.

4193. Lord Naas.] They get some corn besides?—Yes 2 lbs. of corn a day, and sometimes we go as far as 20 lbs. a day.

4194. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Indian corn —maize?—

—maize?—Sometimes Indian corn, and sometimes something else.

4195. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Are there large breeding establishments, or are they brought up generally by the small proprietors?—By the small proprietors.

4196. There are not three or four large landed proprietors?—Yes, in Hungary there are large landed proprietors, but in Austria proper our cattle are mostly bought at the large fairs, where there are 3,000 or 4,000 head of cattle.

4197. Lord Naas.] Do you send any cows?—No; all oxen. No milch cows can be sent; it is too long a distance.

4198. What is the furthest point of Hungary, or to the east of Vienna, that these cattle come from?—The furthest point would be Grosswardein, a railway station.

4199. But still the cattle that would be brought to Grösbaden would come some little distance on foot?—No; because further east they have not so good a place as further west. The finest breeding country lies exactly between Grosswardein, and Pesth. There we have it again, and also in Transylvania. But that is too far for cattle to travel, and there is no railway going there.

4200. Are they subject much to pleuro-pneumonia, the lung disease, in those districts?—No.

4201. Very little?—Very little.

4202. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Have you got the rinderpest in your country?—We had it in some parts about three or four years ago.

4203. Lord Naas.] Have you ever had rinderpest in these places where the cattle are fed upon the beet-root and the corn?—Not to my recollection; but I must say there was enormous care taken there. For instance, I know instances where those who attended to the cattle were not allowed to leave the stables, and they did not allow even their wives to visit them. They took the very greatest care.

4204. Where was that?—In those beet-root stables.

4205. What towns are they near?—They are near Brünn, in Moravia, and all over the country, in order to produce in the agricultual districts manure, and so on, for the soil; therefore they are scattered about.

4206. Are there any of these in Hungary?—Not further down in Hungary; on the frontiers there are some.

4207. It is not common at Hungary?—Not further down than that. On the frontiers of Austria there are some beet-root factories.

4208. There have been cases of the cattle plague having broken out in these beet-root manufacturing places?—I do not know of it. I do not like to say no, because there might have been, but I am not aware of it.

4209. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Do I understand you to say, the first time you knew of the rinderpest was four years ago?—Yes, I think so. I think 1861 was the first time. There were all sorts of precautions taken.

4210. How was it considered to have had its origin there?—There are many reasons given, but I think one has been as wrong as the others, or perhaps as right.

4211. I should like to hear some of them?—Some said it was in the air; some said it was imported from a place in Turkey, or on the borders of Russia and Turkey; then it was proved that it could not be imported from there, because the districts bordering there were free from it, and in others far away they had it; it was very irregular in its course, and I dare say it was in the air.

4213. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] I suppose your pelisse was a sheep skin?—No; it was a very fine pelisse, too. It was a sort of Russian sable.

4214. Lord Naas.] What district was this in?—In Croatia; and I was going from one district to another.

4215. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Can you give us any theory of your own about this rinderpest?—No, I cannot, indeed. I have seen people keeping their animals alive in small districts where there has been rinderpest, and other people, where there has been scarcely any rinderpest, have lost all their animals at once; I do not know the way it came; nobody else caught it, but perhaps the person who had the very best and most properly kept stables. I can say, as a matter of fact, they have got rid of it in about 18 months, and it was only in consequence of their severe measures.

4216. Do you know anything of the regulations of Vienna, as regards public slaughter-houses?—Yes.

4217. Tell us what they are?—In Vienna we have a market similar to the one you have in England.

4218. A live cattle market?—Yes; only a live cattle market.

4219. No dead meat market at all?—No dead meat market at all; beasts are brought to the cattle market, and there are public abattoirs close to it.

4220. Are there any private slaughter-houses allowed?—No; it is now about 15 or 20 years since they have been abolished.

4221. It is a penal thing to have any private slaughter-house?—It used to be the case that every butcher had his own slaughter-house, but since the new market was established, and the abattoirs, they are all killed there, and the meat brought into town in carts.

4222. The police would stop any private slaughter-house?—Of course they would not allow it. We have got strict police regulations.

4223. That has only been established 20 years?—Yes.

4224. Have you heard objections made on the part of the people of Vienna against it?—I am too young to remember it at the commencement. I dare say they did at first.

4225. Have you heard it said whether it has raised the price of meat, or had any effect on the supply of meat?—I have not.

4226. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Is there only one market at Vienna?—Only one market.

4227. Is that for cattle, sheep, and pigs?—Yes.

4228. Mr. Edward Egerton.] What is the population of Vienna?—650,000 inhabitants.

4229. Mr. Dent.] Is there any rinderpest in Austria proper?—No.

4230. Has there been this winter?—No; there has not been for three years, I should say. There are all the statistics about it.

4231. Mr. Banks Stanhope.] Were there not some cattle lost in Vienna in the year 1864?—There might have been in some places.

4232. In a place called Kliesdorff?—That is near Vienna.

4233. Is the rinderpest there?—Not now. There might have been some cases of rinderpest there in 1864.

4234. Do you send any Hungarian cattle or German cattle to Holland?—No; we used to send them viâ Holland to England.

4235. Now you send them entirely by Bremen?—Entirely by Bremen, Gestemunde, and Hamburg; but individually we send them by Gestemunde.

4236. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Is there any prohibition in Holland against sending them?—This country prohibits it.

4237. It has been since the prohibition of this country?—Yes, since the prohibition of this country. We never send cattle to Holland. Holland does not want any cattle to be sent there.

4238. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Holland has a superabundance of cattle?—Yes, of course.

4239. Mr. Dent.] In coming from Vienna, what frontiers have they to pass?—In the way they travel now, they pass only the Zollverein. They go through the Zollverein.

4240. At the Zollverein frontier there is a stringent examination?—Yes. If there is the slightest suspicion of rinderpest being in Austria, they are not allowed to pass the Zollverein. In Austria the same thing is done.

4241. They would not stop them for foot and mouth disease, or for pleuro-pneumonia?—No, they would not, I think; but there would not be such cattle found with foot and mouth disease. The case has never occurred yet.

4242. Mr. Carnegie.] They have no food or water except at Eisenach and Bremen?—They have not.

4243. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Are the form of your cattle trucks the same as ours. Have you observed whether the cattle trucks in England are identically the same kind of cattle truck as you have in Germany?—Yes.

4244. There is no improvement, they are much the same?—Yes, they are much the same. I should think, on the whole, the cattle trucks in England are better.

4245. You stated the markets in that part of the south of Germany; what are the markets in which live stock are gathered together from the principal farmers in Austria?—There are a great many fairs in Austria on certain days. The days are not fixed. For instance, the first Monday, or third Monday in certain months, there is a fair at such and such a place, and so on. It is regulated by the months. We resort to those fairs to buy, but mostly store cattle.

4246. Are they very large fairs?—Some of them are very large fairs indeed. There are as many as 4,000 or 5,000 head of cattle at some.

4247. That you call a large fair?—Yes.

4248. That is only like our weekly market?—Yes; but you must remember that we have every week three or four or five fairs like this in the different provinces.

4249. Is that every week, or twice a month?—You might say almost every day in the week there is some fair, and we are, of course, obliged to send different people to the different fairs. One takes one province, and the other the other, to buy store cattle at.

4250. But they get a quantity of cattle over and above the wants of the population?—Yes.

4251. Cattle for export?—Yes. We have not been tried yet. The trade is only beginning now; but up till now the influence was not so large, so that we could say we had got enough cattle. The draft upon Austria from England and Germany has not been felt yet.

4252. You say that you sold cattle in the market to-day at a price of from 18 l. to 28 l. Are those the cattle that come from those distant parts?—Some of the cattle I have to do with are Styrian cattle. They come from near Vienna. But when I say 28 l. that is an exception, even for such cattle.

4253. What is about the average price for lean cattle at the markets you speak of?—The prices vary so much that it is difficult to say.

4254. I wanted to ascertain whether they were large or small beasts?—They are very large beasts; you might say that the lean cattle are from 1,000 to 1,400 lbs. alive, or something like that.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Mr. Edward Egerton.	Mr. Holland.
Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.	The O'Conor Don.
Mr. Dent.	Sir M. W. Ridley.
Mr. Graves.	Mr. Alderman Salomons.

MR. HUNT, IN THE CHAIR.

MR. BENJAMIN BLOOMFIELD BAKER, called in; and Examined.

Mr. B. B. Baker.

5 June 1866.

4255. Chairman.] YOU are a Meat Contractor, are you not?—Yes.

4256. You take Government contracts for the supply of meat?—Yes.

4257. What do you supply for Government?—Both beef and mutton.

4258. Do you supply the victualling yards?—I supply the victualling yards, and the army and navy.

4259. Will you tell us what you supply at present under your existing contracts?—My largest contract, at present, is for the troops at Aldershot; say four tons daily of meat; independently of that, I supply about 20,000 people and different institutions

4260. Do you supply any victualling yards down the river?—I supply 5,000 men at Dover.

4261. I thought you also supplied Deptford?—The Deptford victualling yard contract is finished; we used to supply them. We supply three months there for the whole 12 months supply, and they pickle it. We supply 5,000 beasts in three months.

4262. And you supply about 20,000 people besides?—Twenty thousand or 30,000 people and institutions, such as Colney Hatch Asylum and Middlesex Prison; large public institutions, asylums, and blue-coat schools.

4263. Do you supply the trade besides?—No.

4264. Do you purchase live animals, or do you purchase carcases?—Both.

4265. Where is your place of business?—In Newgate Market.

4266. Have you a slaughter-house?—Yes, I hire.

4267. How many beasts on an average do you kill a week yourself?—Perhaps 60.

4268. All at one slaughter-house?—Not always; chiefly; I cannot kill them always at one slaughter-house.

4269. With regard to the dead meat you buy, where do you purchase it?—Generally in Newgate Market.

4270. Where do you purchase your live animals?—At the Metropolitan Cattle Market.

4271. Do you purchase them there solely?—Nearly solely.

4272. Do you principally buy foreign animals or British animals?—Mostly foreign.

4273. Do you purchase of any of the gentlemen who have been examined here as witnesses, Mr. Hönch and Mr. Hicks?—Yes.

4274. Have you done so for many years?—Yes.

4275. When you purchase carcases, do you purchase foreign carcases?—Yes, chiefly; those that have been killed in London by other people.

4276. You do not buy the carcases of many English beasts?—No, not many.

4277. With regard to sheep, do you buy chiefly foreign or English sheep?—The English sheep I buy mostly dead; foreign sheep alive.

4278. Are the English sheep that you buy, sold in Islington market alive, or do you have them up from the country dead?—Partially; in hot weather there is very often mutton from the Metropolitan Market. In cold weather they come from the country to take advantage of the market.

4279. What is your opinion of the existing slaughter-houses in the metropolis; do you think that they are convenient?—Yes, I am sure they are very convenient.

4280. Should you object to slaughter-houses being attached to the Metropolitan Market?—Solely, do you mean?

4281. Yes?—I should.

4282. What would be your objection to it?—In the first place, I should be tenacious about killing there on account of getting my numbers; and I am bound under penalties to get a certain number killed for the morning supply, under contracts for differ institutions. I should never like to trust to it; in fact, I would not, unless I saw how things would work; but at present I could not depend upon them or trust the men.

4283. You think you could not trust to getting them slaughtered there?—No.

4284. Why not?—Because there would be many other people trying to do the same thing, and I think it would want all the exertions of master and men to crowd on and get the animals killed within proper time.

4285. Supposing there was great accommodation made for the slaughter-houses; supposing there was double the accommodation for slaughtering that now exists in the whole of the private slaughter-houses in London, would there be any difficulty then?—Yes, I think so.

4286. How so?—There would be the time of killing, and so many little things connected with it, that it would want the master's eye there continually, not only to order the thing to be done, but to see afterwards that it was done.

Mr. B. B. Baker. 5 June 1866.

4287. Do you personally superintend the killing at your own slaughter-house?—No, I place it under a certain man, who I know will do it, and then sometimes I have to go round once or twice to see if it is done.

4288. Your slaughtering takes place under the supervision of a man whom you can trust?—Yes, and I go myself two or three times a week.

4289. You yourself very properly take general superintendence?—Yes.

4290. What would prevent your doing that, supposing there were large slaughter-houses attached to the Islington market?—There would be the distance, for one thing.

4291. As regards supervision, I mean, you say you could not trust to things being done properly; why not?—It would entail the consequence that my confidential man would have to be there continually, to see that it was done, and it would be my business to go up there just to say, is so-and-so all right; because things are so risky with me, that I might lose a very large and very good contract if things were neglected.

4292. You would have to make, in fact, fresh arrangements?—Quite.

4293. They are making preparations for erecting a market at Smithfield, are they not?—Yes, a dead meat market.

4294. Do you propose to transfer your seat of business to that market when it is completed?—I think so.

4295. You think you shall?—I think so.

4296. Supposing that there was direct railway communication from the Islington market to this new dead meat market; I suppose that would do away with a good deal of the difficulty that you anticipate?—I do not think it would. Do you mean, in bringing the slaughtered cattle down to the dead meat market?

4297. Yes?—No. If I killed my own cattle up at the Metropolitan Cattle Market, I should certainly send vans for it, rather than put it in the railway truck.

4298. Supposing that the railway trucks could run right into the slaughter-houses, with sidings into the meat market, should you then still wish to use vans?—Unless I could command the railway truck to bring it into my place at a certain time, I should.

4299. Supposing you could have a meat truck to run into the slaughter-houses at Islington, and to run into your premises at the new market, I suppose then you would not use vans?—No, not unless it would be to expedite it; that would be the question.

4300. I mean, if you had the control?—Yes, if I had the control, and could say, do this, and do that, at the particular time I liked.

4301. Under present arrangements you have to cart the meat from your slaughter-house to your premises at Newgate Market?—Yes; in fact, I cart it to the Nine Elms station, which is its destination for Aldershot camp.

4302. You do not bring it into Newgate Market again?—Some, I do.

4303. There is great difficulty with the traffic, is there not, in the approaches to Newgate Market?—Yes, there is a little difficulty there.

4304. Is there not very great difficulty; a great block in the morning?—Yes; the approaches are narrow.

4305. So that now you carry on the trade under very great difficulties as regards traffic?—It is rather difficult; that will be obviated at the new market as to the approaches.

4306. You say you are in the habit of having sheep up from the country, ready killed; what parts of the country do they come from?—Generally, they are Northampton sheep; and in the winter, from Yorkshire. In summer time we are very tenacious about buying such sheep. This morning I tried all round the market a great many times, and found a great many tainted.

4307. In consequence of the weather?—Yes; I bought some and sent them back again; I could not see with the first cast of my eye that they were not quite sound.

4308. Where do those sheep come from that you found tainted this morning?—I think they mostly came from Devonshire. We can generally judge where they come from from the appearance of them.

4309. How long had they been killed, do you think?—About four days.

4310. How long had they been in the market?—They came in yesterday.

4311. Is not that an unusually long time to elapse?—No; they might have come into the market yesterday after the morning trade was over; probably they did.

4312. Yesterday was Monday; do you suppose they were killed on Friday?—No; I should think on Saturday.

4313. When would they be forwarded; on the Monday?—Yes, I should think so; they might have been killed late on Saturday night, or on Sunday morning.

4314. Do you think they were sent by rail?—I should think perhaps they got them on the line on Monday morning very early, or on Sunday late.

4315. When would they be in Newgate Market?—They might have been there at eight or nine in the morning; they could have been there at six in the morning, and they ought to have been there at six.

4316. This morning, you say, you found them tainted?—Yes.

4317. You would have had no opportunity, I suppose, of buying them yesterday, if you had wanted them?—Yes.

4318. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Is not the great market on the Monday?—Not the dead meat market; that is the live market. It is not a very great market on the Monday morning. Butchers generally clear out, as well as they can, on the Saturday. In the market on Monday, in the summer time, there is generally a great drop, and they cannot keep the meat longer than Tuesday, because it is necessary it should be taken up and put on the gridiron directly, very often.

4319. Chairman.] Were these sheep far gone?—Yes; particularly the hind quarters.

4320. Had they been properly dressed?—Yes, I could see nothing wrong. In fact I did not detect myself they were gone, and I did not suspect it until I got them to my own place, and my man called my attention to one of the hind-quarters. I had to return them.

4321. Have you found that to be the case this year before to-day?—Yes.

4322. Frequently?—Not very frequently; now and then.

4323. Not often?—Not often.

4324. But, as a general rule, sheep come very well from the country if they are properly set before they are packed?—They could always send send them. I have a right to suppose I could see for myself whether they are right or wrong before I buy them. That is the way, I say, I do not buy them often.

4325. Do you often reject those which you would otherwise buy?—Yes, frequently; in summer time we pass over a great deal.

4326. I suppose it is the case that the animals killed in London will not keep very long in hot weather?—Not so long, but better than country meat sometimes. If you kill in the country I should impress on everybody killing them to kill them in the cold weather, and let a draught of air go through the meat for 12 or 14 hours. Sometimes the meat will keep longer than meat killed in London.

4327. It is the case in the country that they send the meat off before it is set?—Sometimes the butchers have resorted to that practice.

4328. It depends very much upon that fact, does it not?—Yes; if they can get the meat once to set it is very beneficial.

4329. And then it will keep very well?—Much better. There are risks attached sometimes; sometimes the meat will not set, but if the meat can be set and kept for 12 hours, as I have said, it will keep considerably longer; on the other hand, you may kill a ripe bullock that will never set in the summer time.

4330. In consequence of the state of the atmosphere?—In consequence of the nature of the bullock. For instance, I killed 15 beasts to-day intending them to go to Aldershot camp to-morrow morning. I said to my man, if there is a hot-natured one do not send it; if there is a loose one do not send it, because if you do it will stink to-morrow.

4331. Is that in consequence of the state of the animal's blood, when it is killed?—No, I do not know that it is the blood; it is in the nature somewhere.

4332. The nature of the animal, or the treatment it has been subjected to?—The nature of the animal.

4333. And is that so with a perfectly healthy animal?—Yes; the most healthy animal, in fact.

4334. I suppose you are of opinion that animals that have been killed while cool will keep much longer than those that have been driven about before killing?—Yes, certainly; we always keep them, and never kill a bullock at once. If I buy any beast here in London, I never think of killing the beast to send away into the country on that day. I let it rest. I see that it is properly fed and watered, and I keep a man solely for that purpose. I let them lie comfortably and not be fatigued, so that they cannot be overheated.

4335. You remember the time when the Act of Parliament came into force prohibiting the movement of cattle by railway?—Yes.

4336. That was the 20th of February?—Yes.

4337. I suppose when the prohibition was in force the foreign cattle had almost a monopoly of the London market, had they not?—Yes, pretty nearly.

4338. Very few British beasts came in?—No.

4339. What was the effect of that upon the price of the foreign animals?—Well, they were higher certainly.

4340. Had you to give a higher price for animals at that time?—Yes.

4341. What is your opinion as to the possibility of having a foreign market and slaughter-houses attached down at the port for imported animals?—I think it would be most inconvenient, and must be attended with more expense, which must be paid by somebody in the end.

4343. Supposing there were telegraphic communication between the two markets, would you be able to learn the prices and the number of beasts in the two markets?—We should know the number, but the trade wants watching; to be a large buyer you must always be watching, otherwise you would lose your turn.

4344. If there were telegraphic communications between the two markets, you would know the number of beasts?—We should know the number of beasts then as we do now.

4345. Do you think you would have to give a higher price?—Yes, decidedly.

4346. A higher price for the foreign beasts?—Yes, and for the others also, whatever market you attended.

4347. The dealers in the foreign animals seem to think they would get a lower price for their beasts. You do not agree with that?—No, I do not quite agree with that. I think it would sometimes militate one way, and sometimes the other.

4348. You think sometimes you would have to give more, and sometimes get them much cheaper?—That might be so, possibly.

4349. Do the same persons buy the foreign animals, as a rule, who buy the home-fed animals?—Not as a rule.

4350. As a rule, a different class of customers buy the foreign?—The rule, perhaps, may be so.

4351. As you principally buy foreign animals, I suppose you would not so much mind having a different foreign cattle market?—Yes, I should mind it more, because I am sometimes obliged to leave the foreign cattle, and fly to the English cattle. Otherwise, if I continued solely among the foreign cattle, I should raise the price, particularly when I had contracted to supply such places as Deptford, where I want 500 beasts a week.

4352. If you do not get the foreign beasts now, you have the option of going to the other side of the market?—Yes, on the same ground. Perhaps I buy a few on one side. Then I return to the foreign market, and if they find they cannot get on, they will be glad of me as a customer. If, however, I find on the other hand their market rising, I go and make an advance.

4353. What would be the effect of having the foreign cattle market on a different day to the English?—I think it would be bad altogether.

4354. On what account?—I think for the same reasons. I, as a large buyer, would feel it very much against me, if I was in full swing of contracts.

4355. Do you mean there would not be the same same competition?—I do not know about the competition.

5 June 1866.

4356. You would say, as a buyer, that would be against you, is that your opinion?—It would take double the time to do it. I could not do so much business; I could not take so many contracts. Instead of taking three or four very large contracts, I should have to say, No, we cannot do this. Monday is quite sufficient for buying; we do not mind giving up the whole of that day for buying; but to have three or four days buying, we could not do it.

4357. If there was a distinction between the two markets, you would prefer having them for the same day?—Do you mean if they were miles apart?

4358. Yes, I am supposing there were a market and slaughter-houses, and every convenience for slaughtering animals, down by the river side. Supposing that that was established, should you prefer having the market on the same day as the Islington market?—I should prefer not.

4359. You would prefer having them on a different day?—Yes, because I could not attend the two.

4360. But you think it would be against you as a buyer to have a distinction between the two markets, and have the two separate markets?—Yes, it would be, if I wanted to do the same amount of business I do now.

4361. I mean as regards prices?—It would be, if I were to want such a thing as 500 beasts a week, it would be against me.

4362. It would be against you as regards prices?—I think so.

4363. As to those who are concerned in the cattle trade, it would be against them as sellers?—Yes.

4364. It could not be against you as buyer, and against them as sellers, at the same time, I suppose?—I do not know that it could not be. It would take up the men's time, and men's time is so valuable.

4365. Do you mean you would get more, and they would get less?—I should fancy it would militate against us both, because you would lose so much of your time. We should not know where we could do the business, and those few hours lost going about the market would be invaluable, in fact.

4366. Where do you send off your meat from; principally from Nine Elms?—Yes.

4367. Mr. Edward Egerton.] That is for Aldershot?—Yes; and the Bricklayers' Arms Station for Dover.

4368. Chairman.] I supppose, as regards the Aldershot contract, it would be more valuable for you to have animals slaughtered down at the port?—No, down at the camp, if I could. They used to slaughter them at the camp.

4369. Why was not that continued?—On account of the prohibition of the movement by railway.

4370. In consequence of the cattle plague regulations?—Yes.

4371. You only mean since the regulations as to the cattle disease came into operation?—Yes.

4373. You put yourself under the protection of the law of the country immediately?—Yes, if they persisted in my doing a thing which the law said I should not do.

4374. Have your contracts been of less advantage to you in consequence of the prohibition?—Yes.

4375. You have not yourself made so much profit?—There is more expense in sending them down dead meat than live meat.

4376. The expense has been in carting the meat to the railway station?—Yes, and the rail expenses. A bullock used to go down alive for 3 s., and it now costs something like 7 s. or 8 s.

4377. But then you do not send the same weight as you would have had to send alive, because you retain the offal?—Yes.

4378. That is about one-third?—Yes.

4379. All that you send now is meat which forms a part of your contracts?—Yes.

4380. How did you dispose of your offal when you killed at Aldershot?—I sold it all by contract. It used to come back to London.

4381. Then, I suppose, if it all came back to London, there must have been considerable loss somehow if it had to go down and come back again?—Yes, they make about 1 s. a bullock.

4382. It was not an economical arrangement, because one-third of the meat that went down came back again?—Still making a bargain to sell the offal in London, a party yesterday offered me 1 s. only difference. I asked him the question, and he said it only makes 1 s. a bullock difference, if you sell it at Aldershot or in London.

4383. To you?—To me. He offered me 1 s. a bullock more.

4384. Then did he bring up the offal for 1 s?—That is excepting the hide; the hide costs 8 d., making 1 s. 8 d.

4385. Did the hide come back?—Yes.

4386. And that cost 8 d.?—Yes.

4387. Making 1 s. 8 d.?—Yes.

4388. Then you have to add that 1 s. 8 d. to the 3 s., making 4 s. 8 d.?—Yes.

4389. What do you say the carcase would cost going down there?—It costs first, 4 s. to kill it, which it used not to do. The soldiers used to kill it in the camp. I pay 4 s. for that, and they will not allow me anything for it.

4390. Was it in the terms of the contract that the soldiers should kill?—Yes.

4391. That was a peculiar circumstance, owing to your supplying it to the camp, but what you send to Colney Hatch, I suppose the inmates of the asylum are not allowed to kill?—No, it is already killed for them.

4392. With regard to Colney Hatch, do you ever kill down at Colney Hatch?—No.

4393. You always send carcases?—Yes.

4394. How do you dispose of your offal in London?

London?—We send the hides to be sold, and we send the skins to the hide salesmen.

4395. Some person takes all your hides?—Yes, and another party takes all the fat.

4396. Do they go to Leadenhall Market?—I believe they do.

4397. What becomes of the blood?—Another person takes all that.

4398. And the horns, and so on?—The horns, the tripe, and so on, go to another person.

4399. Sir M. W. Ridley.] The hides and tips go to one person, I suppose?—Yes.

4400. Chairman.] The different parties who take these things from you bring their own carts and take it away?—Yes, at a certain time they call for them.

4401. What does the blood go for, for sugar refining, or for manure, or what?—I think for manure.

4402. Where does that go to, do you know?—I have understood to Bow.

4403. It has to go some distance from your premises?—Yes.

4404. I suppose it is not an economical arrangement, is it, that all these things should have to be carted away from where they are carried, and to be placed at some distance for the purpose of manufacturing?—If they did not fetch them I should have to send them.

4405. Supposing you had a slaughter-house in a less populous part, and there was plenty of space to carry on these different trades connected with different parts of the offal to be turned to manufacturing purposes, there would be a considerable reduction in the expense of so connecting them?—Yes; providing your tripemen lived near to the place, and your tanner lived near to the place, and your hide salesman, and your tallow-chandler, and melter.

4406. If you had all these trades in the immediate neighbourhood of the slaughter-houses there would be a considerable saving?—Yes, I should think there would be a little saving in the carriage.

4407. And there would also be a saving of nuisance?—There would be a concentration of nuisance.

4408. There are great complaints in crowded places as to the smell that arises from the boiling down of fat, and the tripe-dressing, and gut-twisting, is there not?—I have not heard of any.

4409. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Do I understand you to say that your only objection to these public slaughter-houses is in consequence of the increased running about you have spoken of, and the increased time it would take?—That is one thing; but of course there are many other objections if I were to state them.

4410. What is your objection; I thought you told the Chairman that was the only objection?—That is, as far as I am concerned.

4411. I suppose you represent the feelings of the trade?—No, I do not know that I do that.

4412. Do you belong to the Butchers' Trade Protection Association?—No. As a contractor, I am not affected as the butchers might be. Butchers would be affected, perhaps, worse than I should by this scheme.

4413. Will you tell the Committee what the objections are?—Do you mean what I believe the objections of the butchers would be.

4415. Then you think it would be impossible for him to fulfil his engagements?—I think so.

4416. What are the terms in which your contracts run?—For six months.

4417. At a given price?—At a given price.

4418. What is the proportion of foreign meat that you buy; the proportion of foreign to English?—I should think five-sixths.

4419. Can you give us any idea as to the relative price of the foreign to the English. We have had different accounts in this Committee. As a general rule, is the foreign price lower than the English?—Yes.

4420. How much in the pound, a halfpenny?—From a halfpenny to three farthings. I should think fully three farthings.

4421. Is that from its being a worse description of food?—Yes; it is not quite so tasty or so silky and nice as the English meat.

4423. A very much lessened supply of foreign meat coming in within the last six or seven weeks; have you known that?—Yes, there has been.

4424. What do attribute that to?—I attribute it a great deal to the chance of getting them passed at the wharf, for one thing.

4425. Have you found any meat which you have been obliged to reject on account of the foot and mouth disease?—No.

4426. Never in the course of your experience?—Of late years I have not.

4427. When you say "of late years," do you mean the last two or three?—Yes, I have not found any.

4428. Should you be able to detect it. Would your eye distinguish it at once?—Yes, by a little examination. I have seen it in the summer time among English beasts.

4429. I am asking you as to the meat you have bought, which you say is dead meat; have you ever been able to discover in that way any traces of it?—No.

4430. Have you made any application to the Government to be allowed to bring cattle alive to Aldershot?—No.

4431. You are aware that there are attempts now being made to get beasts taken by railway again?—Yes; I did sign a petition to get them from the Metropolitan Market.

4432. I understand you to say you have made an application?—Yes; I did that so as to go as far as Portsmouth, Aldershot, and Plymouth, because I do not see how they can send dead meat down to Plymouth. I never before missed tendering for the navy, and I missed yesterday with reference to the Victualling Yard at Plymouth; I let it go. I came away from Somerset House, and I said, I dare not fill up the tender; I could not do this dead meat contract.

4433. What has been the result of those applications to be allowed to take cattle alive?—I have not heard.

4434. Have you been a member of any deputation which has gone up to the Board of Trade on this subject?—No, not for this purpose.

4435. You did sign a memorial to the Board of Trade?—Yes.

4436. You have had no answer to that memorial?—No, I did not present it.

4437. Chairman.] Perhaps you could let us have a copy of that on another occasion?—I will.

4438. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Do you know whether similar memorials are coming from other parts of the country, to relax the rules?—Yes.

4439. You have spoken of the Plymouth tender; would not Bristol and some other places be more likely than London to tender for the supply of Plymouth?—No; I do not think they would get a tender from Bristol.

4440. We have heard there is a very large meat market at Bristol?—Yes, but the thing would be so hazardous. I do not think there would be a man at Bristol who would for a moment attempt such a thing.

4441. What is the amount of supply that is wanted for the Plymouth Victualling Yard?—About 70 beasts a week.

4442. That is merely for the yard, and has nothing to do with the ships?—Oh yes; it is for the ships; it goes from the yard to the ships.

4443. Has it ever occurred to you to have beasts landed at Plymouth yourself, and kill them at Plymouth, and supply the yards there?—Yes, it has occurred to me, but I have only done it once, and for this reason. A vessel holds about 300 or 350 beasts, and they would only take about 100 beasts; you could not land two weeks' supply.

4444. The supply would be about 100 for a week?—Yes, occasionally; about, say 70 on an average.

4445. And the cargo would consist of upwards of 300; therefore you would have upwards of 200 on hand?—Yes.

4446. Mr. Dent.] And no competition?—And no competition; it is so in all the ports; there is just a supply for one-third of a vessel.

4447. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Have you ever had any cattle from Ireland?—I have not.

4448. Your experience has principally been in foreign meat?—Yes.

4449. There is a great quantity of English meat comes into Newgate Market, besides foreign meat, is there not?—Yes.

4450. Is there any separate department where the foreign meat is killed, or is it all mixed up together?—It is all mixed up together.

4451. Mr. Dent.] You were asked a question, whether Plymouth might not be supplied from Bristol; have the London contractors usually been able to compete successfully for the Plymouth contracts?—Yes, for the last four or five years, all has fallen into the hands of the London people.

4452. If you supplied 70 beasts per week, you would send them down there alive to be slaughtered?—Yes, under the old regulations.

4453. If you had dead meat to be supplied, it would have to be supplied every morning, I suppose?—Yes.

4454. When you supply the camp, and when you supply Plymouth in ordinary times, it is not a daily supply; you send it down once a week, I suppose?—Yes, once or twice a week.

4455. You have it delivered into the hands of the camp authorities, and they are answerable for its being fresh for the soldiers?—I keep men to watch it down there.

4456. With regard to your Deptford contracts, you say you supplied 500 beasts a week there?—I believe it was 330 at Deptford per week; 110 every other day.

4457. What time of the year does that take place?—That was from January until the last day in March.

4458. Have you anything to do with the slaughtering of those beasts?—Yes.

4459. You slaughter them all?—Yes.

4460. At Deptford?—Yes.

4461. Those are all bought at the Metropolitan Market?—Yes, nearly.

4462. You are not an importer of beasts yourself?—Yes; I imported two cargoes to Deptford.

4463. Were those bought by an agent abroad for you?—Yes, at Oporto.

4464. At present you send down every morning to Aldershot?—Yes.

4465. Where do you keep those beasts before you slaughter them; at your own lairs?—Yes.

4466. You buy foreign cattle very largely?—Yes.

4467. Have you found much disease among them?—No.

4468. Have you found any?—Yes, we found a little foot complaint; that is a disease, I suppose.

4469. Have you found any of them suffering from the rinderpest during the late weather?—I have not found them so; but I have had one or two which have been obliged to be killed afterwards.

4470. After you have bought them you have suspected them?—I have suspected they had it in an incipient state.

4471. That is what I meant. I did not suppose you would buy them in the market while they were actually suffering from the disease?—I have seen an animal poorly, and judged that it might be then coming on. If we see one hang its head we order it to be killed.

4472. Mr. Holland.] In slaughtering you allow a certain number of hours to elapse before you send away the animal?—Yes.

4473. About 12, I think you said?—Yes, I think 12 hours.

4474. If the market were a single market, and butchers had to send to the market, and they lived two, three, four, or five miles away, they would have to take into consideration the number of hours, would they not?—I do not quite understand the question.

4475. You stated the inconvenience of a butcher living a certain number of miles away from a single market, and you also stated that it was necessary to have the animals sent, and that they would be about 12 hours?—Yes.

4476. Then the butcher, in giving an order for the slaughter of an animal, would have to take take that into his calculation?—Yes, he would have to know that it was killed at a certain time.

4478. Mr. Edward Egerton.] On account of the state of the atmosphere?—Yes.

4479. Chairman.] That has been very prejudicial to the keeping of meat for the last two or three days?—Very much so for the last two or three days.

4480. Rather unusually so?—Yes.

4481. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Is all the meat inspected by some Government officer?—Yes; the Commissary General has three officers in the camp to inspect at one o'clock in the day. The order is issued the next morning.

4482. For all the meat to be ordered for the day?—Yes.

4483. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] How many slaughter-houses have you; have you more than one; I understood you to say you went round to two or three?—I had two when I had the Deptford contract; I have only one now. For a short time, perhaps for three or four weeks, I delivered dead meat at Deptford. It was not a very large quantity then; instead of 300 a-week I delivered 100 a-week.

4484. If you had only one slaughter-house, what would be your objection to having a shed set apart among a number of those other slaughter-houses?—Only my place of business.

4486. Supposing foreign animals were slaughtered where they are landed, and that was near your place of business; you say you deal with foreign animals; supposing they were slaughtered adjoining the place where they landed, you might have your slaughter-house there, and remove your place of business there?—That is according to where it was; for instance, if it was down at Blackwall I should not think of removing my business down there, I would rather remove it up more north.

4487. Nearer the Smithfield Market?—Yes; it is central where it is now, and it would be central in old Smithfield, where they are going to erect the new market, that is the only central place.

4488. If you buy at both markets you must get your animals brought to the slaughter-house at a considerable distance either way; you would have a considerable distance to bring them from the foreign wharf where they are landed?—Yes, but still we could drive them in the cool of the evening, at a certain time, and that would not hurt them, for when we got them to our own place they might rest as long as they liked.

4489. In fact, you are in favour of a central market, into which both English and foreign cattle could come?—Yes, decidedly.

4491. Sir M. W. Ridley.] As a buyer of imported cattle, do you think that the supply, that is, the number of the foreign cattle, would be lessened, if it was required that all of them should be slaughtered at the place of debarkation?—I feel sure it would.

4492. Why do you think so?—Because, at present, the very idea of anything being slaughtered there deters the foreigner from sending. I have sometimes myself been down and bought some cattle there which have been touched with the foot complaint; I think the party, the owner, was saying, they would lose him so much, and said, "I will not send any more for a month, Mr. Baker." I said, "I hope you will continue sending some, they are very good, and they come into our market." But he said, "They come in at a deterioration of price."

4494. Do you send orders out to any agent on the Continent representing you, stating that you require so many beasts; is that your course of proceeding; do you telegram to the Continent, saying, send so many beasts?—No; I only get them to keep me advised about the price, and when I think it will allow a scope to import, I give an order.

4495. Can you calculate, at present, upon your demand being complied with from the other side of the water, in point of numbers?—No, I cannot.

4496. The consignments, in point of fact, are independent of any order that you might yourself give?—Yes.

4497. The supply is regulated by the demand on this side of the Channel; they have the prices, and they are so regulated?—Yes, that is it.

4498. Then, you think that if the cattle were slaughtered at the time of debarkation they would no longer be satisfied, inasmuch as they could not be regulated by the ascertained prices at this side of the water, and they would be more scrupulous, and perhaps, therefore, shorter in the number consigned?—Yes.

4499. Do you rent the slaughter-houses that you use at present?—No, I do not, at present.

4500. Then, are they of your own erection?—No, I contract to pay so much each.

4501. For each beast?—Yes; when I am very busy I contract with them, and still keep the whole of the slaughter-house to myself; that is, because I will not have a large quantity of other people's beef hanging up with mine, so that I cannot get proper ventilation.

4502. The Committee understand that, as a Government contractor, you are in a very large way of business; but does it appear to you that the establishment of slaughter-houses in districts of London would be disadvantageous to the butchers' trade in those different districts?—Yes, I think so.

Mr. B. B. Baker.

4503. Do you think that such a system would be as disadvantageous to them who were in a much smaller way of business as it would be to yourself?—I think so.

4505. Would not that equally apply to his trade if they were killed at a public slaughter-house instead of a private one; he renting a portion of this public building, it would be under his own control if he rented it, the same as his own private existing slaughter-house?—Yes, excepting that it might be a great distance from his house or his shop. It might be some distance from his trade, and he could not bring his trade to the slaughter-house. I think that would be the difficulty with a butcher.

4506. But in the butcher's business the slaughter-house is, in some cases, below the premises in which he lives, surely that is very objectionable?—Yes, that is bad. I do not know of anything of the kind myself.

4507. If a butcher living in, we will say in Mount-street, has his slaughter-house in Oxford-street (and I happen to know a case of that sort), and that slaughter-house is as far off of him as the New-road from Mount-street, surely the difference of the distance from the New-road to Mount-street would not be an objection to him in his trade, as regards the transport of the dead carcase; supposing that the New-road were about the site of a slaughter-house, for that district, that distance could not affect it?—Not so much, but it would be a difference to a butcher who lived a mile the other way from Mount-street.

4508. But I am assuming there would be one slaughter-house for one particular district, taking a centre and a radius of not more than a certain distance?—It is according to what radius you would take.

4509. A radius which would embrace a certain tract in London, and that the beasts should be exclusively slaughtered there?—Yes.

4510. Chairman.] You apprehend great inconvenience to the trade, as I understand from your evidence, if you are confined to public slaughter-houses?—Yes.

4511. Are you aware that in many of the continental capitals they are confined entirely to public slaughter-houses?—I am told so.

4512. Do you know that it has been the case in Paris since the year 1810?—I know it has been so; I was not aware how long.

4513. Are you aware it is the case in Paris?—Yes; I am told it is.

4514. And you have never heard there is very great inconvenience to the trade there, have you?—I have never asked the question at all. I have always thought that the consumption was so little, as compared with London, that that was the cause why there was no inconvenience from it, if there was none.

4515. The French army is vastly larger than the English army, is it not?—I think it is.

4516. I suppose if the contractors supplying the French army were confined to public slaughter-houses for slaughtering the cattle, the English contractors could supply the English troops in the same way?—One would think so.

4517. You are aware that it is the general rule, in foreign capitals, that there should be public slaughter-houses only?—I believe it is on the Continent.

4518. One would naturally infer that what could be done in one capital could be done in another?—Yes; but I think that if the quantity of meat that is consumed in London more than in those places, could be ascertained, that would make a difference.

4519. Supposing you were confined to public slaughter-houses, I suppose you would have telegraphic communication between the slaughter-houses and the dead-meat market?—There ought to be, and no doubt there would be.

4520. I suppose it would be just as easy, supposing you employed a slaughterman at the public slaughter-house, to telegraph to him to kill 10 oxen, as it would be to send a message now?—Yes.

4521. The inconveniences you spoke of would most of them be removed if an entirely new system were inaugurated with all the modern appliances?—A great many of them might.

4522. In fact, with reference to any change, I suppose the trade concerned in the change always suffers at first, until the trade settles down again?—That is very evident.

4523. With regard to supplying Plymouth, you say that only 100 beasts were wanted at Plymouth, and that those vessels bringing them would carry 300?—Yes.

4524. Would there be any objection to a coasting vessel coming round and landing the quantity that was wanted at each port?—That would entail expense; of course, it could be done in that way, if it could be done, at less than in the other way.

4525. Supposing these restrictions on the movements of cattle were likely to be permanent, I suppose new arrangements would be made?—Yes, I dare say there would be. It is very seldom that one contractor has two ports. If one contractor had the whole, he might do it.

4526. Do not you think, supposing these restrictions were likely to be permanent, the importers would land 100 beasts at Plymouth to supply one contract, and another 100 at Portsmouth to supply another?—I have never heard a person make an offer of that kind.

4527. But these restrictions have only been in force for a certain time, and are expected not to be permanent?—I have often put a price down to a gentleman for 100 beasts to be delivered at a certain port at a certain price.

4528. And have you never got an answer to it?—No.

4529. Have you since these restrictions have been in force?—No.

4530. Do you think if these great restrictions were removed from the cattle, you would find that offer responded to if you made it?—You would have to put out a very tempting offer, and one that you could not afford.

4531. This is Dr. Letheby's evidence with regard to the proportion of meat used in the metropolis: "It is somewhere about an ounce per head, hardly so much, perhaps, about five ounces in a week; in Paris it is about three ounces in a week; I think we are about double that." Have you turned your attention to that, as to the quantity of meat that is consumed by the inhabitants of the different capitals?—No.

4532. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Do you supply Woolwich?—Not now.

4533. How are the troops at Woolwich supplied, do you know?—They are killing their meat there now; that being in the Metropolitan Board of Works district, the cattle travel down there.

4534. Are they killed in slaughter-houses down there?—Yes, in the Government slaughter-houses.

4535. Not supplied from Deptford?—No.

4536. Chairman.] How do they get across the river?—When we speak of Woolwich the Army is there, and at Deptford there is the Navy.

4537. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] I do not know whether there are arrangements made by the victualling yard there as to supplying live meat as well as dead meat?—They never send anything from the victualling yard to the army, only to the navy.

4538. With regard to the slaughter-houses, supposing it was thought right that there should be public slaughter-houses, it would not do to have slaughter-houses at only one corner of London to supply all this great metropolis?—No, it would not.

4539. You would require slaughter-houses planted at different districts of London for the convenience of the inhabitants living there?—Yes, in preference to one.

4540. There is a prejudice about one market, is there not; there is an idea in the trade that one market is a right thing with a view to establishing the price?—Yes, one live market.

4541. Do you think that you could supply the whole of the capital with dead meat from one set of slaughter-houses at the live cattle market?—No, I do not.

4542. Why not?—I do not think they would get it all killed in proper time.

4543. You could not get it killed and distributed?—No; particularly for the two or three days at the latter end of the week in summer time.

Mr. B. B. Baker. 5 June 1866.

4544. There are about, on the average, 6,000 beasts per week killed?—About 6,000 or 7,000.

4545. And about 3,000 sheep?—Yes.

4546. You think they could not be all slaughtered at one market?—No, I think it could not be done without spoiling some of them.

4547. You do not think that in a large capital like London, with 3,000,000 of inhabitants, you could supply the whole of it with one central set of slaughter-houses?—No; I do not say it could not be done, but I should think not.

4548. I suppose the establishment of the slaughter-houses alone would be something very large?—Yes, of course it would be.

4549. Then whatever the opinion might be with regard to private slaughter-houses, it would be requisite that there should be slaughter-houses planted at some points round London, convenient for the inhabitants, with a view to provide them with wholesale killed meat?—Yes.

4550. Were you ever at Paris?—Yes.

4551. Do you know the abattoirs at Paris?—I am not well acquainted with them.

4552. You do not know whether there is more than one set of abattoirs?—I am not certain about that; I think there are more.

4553. I believe they are planted around Paris, in various places?—Yes.

4554. Do you know the number of slaughter-houses in the City of London at the present time?—I do not.

4555. According to the table I have before me, there are 58 in the City of London; and 5,400 sheep, 1,800 beasts, 420 pigs, and 4,000 calves, are on an average received here every week?—Yes.

4556. I suppose if there were 58 slaughter-houses at the Metropolitan Market, the same number of animals could be slaughtered there?—Yes, there is no doubt about that.

4557. It is only a question of accommodation, is it?—The slaughter-houses and the lands to do it, will be of course only a question of accommodation.

4558. It is only a question of having accommodation enough, and as regards removing the meat, it is a question of having sufficient railway accommodation?—Yes; and the question is in what state would the meat be after it had been removed.

Mr. JOHN GIBLETT, called in; and Examined.

4559. Chairman.] YOU are a Cattle Salesman in the London Market?—Yes.

4560. And have been so for 38 years?—Yes.

4561. Do you receive cattle from different parts of this country?—Yes; from every county in England.

4562. And also from foreign countries?—Yes, from almost every place from which cattle are sent.

4563. You sell on commission?—Exclusively; I never have any of my own, under any circumstances.

4564. Do you get cattle from France, Germany, Spain, Denmark, and Portugal?—Yes.

4565. They are consigned to you to sell on commission?—Yes, entirely.

Mr. J. Giblett.

4566. You have heard the questions that have been put to the last witness with regard to the desirability of having slaughter-houses attached to the Metropolitan Market; what is your opinion on that?—I feel quite sure that it is impracticable, without an immense expense, at any time; and in summer I am quite satisfied it is absolutely impossible to supply so many people with meat in proper condition.

4567. Let me understand you. Do you mean that it would be impossible to slaughter animals at the Metropolitan Market and to supply London?—In summer it would be impossible, and at any time it would be impracticable, except at an immense expense. I can state my reasons in detail.

Mr. J. Giblett.

5 June 1866.

4568. Give us the reasons, if you please?—I have no hesitation in affirming, and it is the opinion of the trade, that every ox is worth, on the average, taking the large oxen and the smaller ones together, about 30*s.* a head more to be killed on the butcher's own premises and under his own inspection, where he feels his property safe, than those which would be killed in public slaughter-houses. Sheep and lambs would be worth quite 3*s.* a head more killed on their own premises than at public slaughter-houses. This is received as the opinion of the whole trade. Taking the calculation of the number of stock that comes to the market, or something below the number, say 6,000 oxen per week, 30,000 sheep, 500 calves, and about 1,000 pigs, and you would find that, according to the calculation we have made, it would come to 14,000*l.* in a week, which extra amount the public would have to pay, and then they would not be supplied with meat in a proper condition. It is the butcher's interest to guard against nuisances, although there may only be a few slaughter-houses in the City of London; the City of London is but a speck compared to the suburbs of London. It is the butcher's interest to guard against all kind of inconvenience as to the slaughter-houses. In his own premises he could employ his young men to see that the meat is killed properly. He could take care of his own property, which he has a right to do, and without being compelled by law to send it to a public slaughter-house, where he cannot identify it. When I say he cannot identify it, he cannot identify the fat, and it is sometimes scarcely possible to identify the meat after it is killed. These are some of the reasons. Some oxen carry 20 stone of fat, some only five; and it is proverbial, I am sorry to say, that these common persons, who are entrusted to kill the oxen, are in the habit of robbing the butcher of the fat; while, if he has it on his own premises he could take proper care of it. He can do that which he has undertaken to do, namely, supply the public with good and proper meat, in a clean and wholesome state. He can make a just and proper use of the offal, in a clean and proper state, for it is comparatively useless if the offal has to be sent a great distance in the way you sometimes see it carted about. These are some of the reasons. I feel it is my duty, having stood in a public position for 40 years, to bear faithful testimony to the honourable way in which butchers conduct their business. They certainly have very much improved and are improving in intelligence. I have done a large amount of business with them for the last 40 years, and I have hardly lost anything through the butchers; the business is done in perfect good faith between us; we have no receipts passed; they get up very early in the morning and are a most industrious class. They have the meat at their own houses in a beautiful and good state, and it would be a confiscation of their property to take away the power of killing the meat on their own premises.

4569. Have you inquired at all into the system of public slaughter-houses in other countries?—I have been to Paris, and I am aware, by report, there is not only one, but four public slaughter-houses there.

4570. There are five in Paris?—I thought it was four.

4571. Are you aware that there is that system also in the city of Edinburgh?—Yes, but not entirely so. They are not entirely abattoirs in Edinburgh. I think they are private slaughter-houses.

4572. No, I think they are public slaughter-houses?—Some of them are let to private individuals there.

4573. Mr. Edward Egerton.] The evidence before us was that they were all public slaughter-houses. I suppose a private man may hire them?—Yes, I believe that is the case.

4574. Chairman.] They may hire private slaughter-houses at the public abattoirs?—I believe that is the case in Edinburgh.

4575. You would not object to having these public slaughter-houses, provided individuals could hire portions of them?—Oh yes, it would be very inconvenient to the butchers; very much so indeed.

4576. Why do you think that the butchers of Edinburgh would submit to it, but not the butchers of London?—I presume they are bound to submit to it; but I have seen most disgusting instances in Edinburgh of the meat being trailed along the public streets, and also the offal.

4577. When was that?—When I have been in Edinburgh, on several occasions.

4578. About what year was that?—I have been there eight or ten times in several years.

4579. Was it in the course of the last ten years?—Yes, in the course of the last five years.

4580. The Edinburgh Slaughter-houses Act, prohibits the slaughtering of any animal, or the dressing of any carcase within the bounds of the police, or the distance of one mile within such bounds elsewhere, than at the slaughter-houses established under the Act?—Yes, that may be so; some are let to private individuals.

4581. Do you think a system which is good for Edinburgh would be bad for London?—It could not be applied with such ease in London as in Edinburgh, because the suburbs of London extend such an immense distance. How could persons in the south of London go to public slaughter-houses in the north, or three millions of people be thus supplied.

4582. No, but supposing there was a public slaughter-house on the north side of the river, or two or three, you would not object to that?—I object to the principle of the meat being consigned to other people's care, where it would not be safe.

4584. At the present time the butchers from the suburbs go with their carts to Newgate Market; that is the common practice of London. All the local butchers of London, or in the suburbs, cart away their meat from Newgate Market?—Yes, and a great nuisance it is to have so many carts in London; but a butcher going to the dead market cannot always depend upon getting the best meat; with every intention to purchase the best meat, they cannot get it. Many personal friends of mine are most anxious to have the best meat, and they cannot always get it at the dead-meat market, and they do not get it. I do not know one that deals exclusively in the dead-meat market who can always serve the richest customer with the best meat, or the poorest with sweet meat, and I have been connected with business all my life. I was a butcher in Bond-street when I was a boy. There is also one other point I wish to speak of, and that is, if you will allow me, I wish to speak of the transit of cattle. I consider that many of the laws are very unnecessary and useless as regards the restrictions.

4585. You mean the temporary restrictions?—Yes.

4586. We are not inquiring into them?—It is a most important matter if you knew the situation in which the butchers are placed.

4587. We are not inquiring into the temporary restrictions owing to the cattle plague, but to the permanent arrangements of the trade?—Allow me to speak of the butchers of Kent, for instance.

4588. We are only concerned with the transit of cattle, and how they are treated during the transit. Have you anything to say on the subject, as to whether they ought to be supplied with food and water during a railway journey?—I do not think it would be desirable to give them much water; a little food on long journeys from Scotland, but not much water.

4589. Do you think if they come up from the north of Scotland they ought to be fed during the journey?—A little hay would be desirable.

4590. And no water?—Too much water would be worse than none at all.

4591. I suppose too much of anything is a bad thing?—No doubt.

4592. But still they would not eat much hay, if you gave them no water during the long journey, would they?—They might, but not much, I presume.

4593. Do you think it necessary to supply animals coming from the north of Scotland with water, as a rule?—It is not absolutely necessary, but it is desirable.

4594. Would they come in a better condition for killing, if they were supplied with water?—No, they would not.

4595. Then why do you think it is desirable to give it?—For the sake of humanity.

4596. You think it is cruel to keep the animals without giving them water for so long?—Yes; where they are detained sometimes at railway stations most unnecessarily and unfairly, I think in such cases water should be given them, most certainly.

4597. How would you suggest that should be done?—By the man who is in charge of the cattle taking water to them when they stop.

4598. You would water them in the trucks, would you?—Yes.

4599. We have had contradictory evidence as to the possibility of doing that; do you think Scotch cattle would drink water out of buckets in trucks?—I think they would; I am sure they would if they were thirsty.

4600. Are you acquainted with the way in which cattle are treated on board the steamers?—Yes.

4601. Have you any suggestion to make as to the improvement of their treatment?—I know it is the practice for gentlemen who send me a quantity of cattle, Mr. Robinson, for instance, who was examined the other day, to send the best hay he can find with his steamers, and give them water on the passage; he has large quantities from Oporto, fine oxen, worth sometimes nearly 30 l. a-piece, or at all events 26 l. or 28 l. a-piece, and we shall be more dependent upon the trade from abroad now than ever we have been before.

4602. Do you suggest any alterations as to the treatment of animals on board ship?—I would suggest that his plan be universally adopted; I think it is very desirable that hay should be sent with them, and some water.

4603. Do you think they have sufficient space allotted to them in the holds of the ships?—In some cases I believe they have not; I think there ought to be due inspection in that case.

4604. Would you approve of a law that vessels should be licensed to carry a certain number, and only a certain number?—I would approve of an inspector being appointed to allow vessels of a certain size to carry a certain number of beasts in proportion to the size of the beast.

4605. You would approve of vessels being licensed to carry a certain number?—That can hardly be done, inasmuch as some animals are twice the size of others that come from the same country; some animals sent from Tonning are worth 14 l., and others worth 35 l.

4606. You would leave it to the inspectors to say what number of animals should go on board?—Yes.

4607. Do you not think that system would be liable to abuse?—I think the owner is interested in having no more sent than could be sent safely; and the larger importers go down with the cattle themselves.

4608. Now, to go to another subject: have you considered the question of the quarantine of foreign animals?—Yes.

4609. What is your opinion upon that?—I think to quarantine fat animals would be most unjust and unfair. As to fat animals pronounced by competent inspectors to be sound, to keep them crowded together until they necessarily become heated and subject to the foot and mouth disease, would be most unjust. They would depreciate so fast that it would be quite unreasonable.

4611. There has been a suggestion here that fat animals should be quarantined for a certain number of hours; do you see any objection to that?—I think it is undesirable. I do not attach any importance to the foot and mouth complaint; in fact, I consider nature has provided that as a remedy against more serious illnesses. I do not believe it is a complaint at all; I believe it is the effect of fever in the animal.

4612. Do you not think it is catching?—Yes, I think it is catching.

4613. Then how can you say it is not a complaint if it is catching?—It is not a complaint in itself, but it is the effect of fever in the animal; it is, no doubt, caused by fever engendered in the animal.

4614. Do you mean to say another animal can catch the effect without catching the disease?—One

5 June 1866.

—One animal can catch the fever from another animal.

4615. The other animal catches the fever from treading on the ground on which the first animal has trodden; is that your view?—Very likely; not only by contagion but by atmospherical influence.

4616. Then how do you say it is not a complaint?—I do not say the foot and mouth disease is a complaint itself; I believe it is the effect of fever in the animal. I believe, from extreme heat, change of air, and atmospherical influences, the animal becomes affected, and by change of diet he becomes heated in the system; and I think this is a remedy which nature has provided, to prevent it attacking some vital part. I wish all those animals affected with the cattle plague had had foot and mouth complaint; I think they may have escaped. I am sure that in the case of the lung complaint, where they had the foot and mouth disease, it sometimes had the effect of saving them. It is a curative process, provided by nature, the same as gout in a human being.

4617. Has the foot and mouth disease been always known in this country?—Yes; some 35 years ago, before any stock came from abroad, I have seen 40 oxen a day killed in Smithfield Market, because they could not walk out to the nearest slaughter-house; and those slaughter-houses were in close contiguity to Smithfield Market.

4620. Explain what you mean by its being against the public interest; do you mean that the price of animals would be raised?—There would not be that facility of trade altogether; the market price would not be quickly determined; sometimes you would be left in England with only half the quantity you required.

4621. Would it be as against the buyer, or against the seller?—Against the seller; against the buyer and against the public without a doubt. That which is against the interest of the seller and the interest of the buyer is against the public; it must be.

4622. How could it be both against the seller and against the buyer?—Because it is convenient for the buyer to come where he can within a short time learn the actual market price, because the buyers that come to one market want some foreign beasts or some sheep, some of one kind and some of another. The majority of the buyers (say, two-thirds of all that come to the market) buy stock of a different character, and not all of it from the English. As to having a market down at the water side for our foreign cattle, I have come to the conviction in my own mind, that it would be a serious evil: it would increase the price of meat; it would partly prevent the foreigners from sending, and be more disadvantageous to the English interests than to the foreigner, for the majority of the buyers would attend to the foreign market. I believe we are more dependent now on foreign supply than we are upon the English, and will be for some time. Yesterday I saw one man who had 20 good French oxen at 33 l. 10 s.; I had a quantity worth about 29 l. each, and so we have every week; in fact, the trade from France is increasing very much. Some of the cattle only two years old are worth 25 l. each. Every year our trade from France is increasing, and that is why I impress on the Committee the propriety of having every arrangement made for the traffic so sent. From France, where there has been no cattle plague at all, what can be the harm in allowing the beasts to come free from Southampton? The trade is going to commence from Normandy in about six weeks; they are not able to come across at present from Havre or Honfleur to Southampton. As a practical man, I say there would not be any harm at all in allowing those oxen to come by rail from Southampton into the public market; neither do I believe there would be any harm in allowing free traffic of stock from the public market into a town. If Honourable Members knew the painful position in which the trade is placed, they would know more than I am satisfied they do at present. I have lately come up from Kent, and there they do not know what to do for meat. In many counties in England they do not create one-twentieth part of what they want to consume. A man came up last week and bought a heifer of me at 7 ½ d. lb.; he came 34 miles to buy it; 34 miles to go back, making 68, and then sent his man to have it killed and again to bring it home; so that it was three times 68 miles to get that one heifer, which cost a crown a stone. By the time he got it home, it stood him in no less than 9 d. a lb.; and if he could have sold most of it at 10 d., he would have lost by it.

4623. But all that is owing to the trade being disturbed by the temporary restrictions connected with the cattle plague, is it not?—Yes; and I believe that many of those restrictions are no good at all. Many places in England require an immense quantity of meat.

4624. Now you say that; have you heard of any customers being unable to get a joint of meat since these restrictions have been in force?—Do you mean the consumer.

4625. Yes?—I have; it is a common matter. They have not meat enough in many places.

4626. Will you tell us any town in which the supply has fallen short?—I was at Sevenoaks, in Kent, the other day, and I went about to see what I could there. It was not a matter of pleasure to me to go and make these inquiries. One party assured me he had come from Newgate Market, where he had bought some legs of mutton the morning before, and at eight o'clock that morning the legs were quite green. He said, "I gave 10 d. a pound for these legs of mutton; did you ever know such a cruel thing in your life."

4627. Where had these green legs of mutton been killed?—I do not know; he bought them the morning before in Newgate Market.

4628. But how do you trace the greenness of these these legs of mutton to the restrictions?—Because he could not get his sheep down to the country alive, and he was obliged to go and buy the dead meat at Newgate Market.

4629. Let us follow this out. How far is Sevenoaks from the metropolitan market?—It is about 24 miles from the metropolitan market.

4631. Do not go into that. Is there any law in force to prevent sheep travelling by railway?—Yes.

4632. Then tell us what the law is?—They could not get them away from the Metropolitan Market then; the railway refused to carry them.

4633. But what law is there to prevent sheep travelling by railway?—There was a law, I believe.

4634. When. What law was there to prevent sheep going down by railway to Sevenoaks?—It was the case, that the railway refused to carry them, either because there was a law, or under a misinterpretation of the law.

4635. What was the date of your visit to Sevenoaks, when you found this man there who complained of these green legs of mutton?—It happened to be at the time of the steeple-chase, about a month ago.

4636. Can you tell us of any law which prevented the Sevenoaks butcher getting a sheep down alive to Sevenoaks?—This man complained that he could not; as regards the beef, I know he could not.

4637. Then, I presume, he was a very ignorant man, and had not taken the trouble to inquire?—I cannot undertake to say that.

4638. Will you undertake to say that, with regard to these sheep, he could not have taken them down alive?—As regards the beasts, he could not.

4639. I am not speaking of the beasts; you told us that the legs of mutton were green at Sevenoaks, and that the reason was that this man could not get live sheep down there in consequence of the restrictions; now, I want to know, what restrictions the law put a month ago upon the sheep travelling by rail?—He said he could not get them down.

4640. Do you think he told you accurately?—I do not generally meet with men whose word I doubt.

4641. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Is it not a likely thing that he was trying to get the dead meat cheaper at Newgate Market than he could have got it alive in the country?—Yes, and quite right too. The next butcher I went to see, the meat cost him 11½*d.* a pound; and while they are depending upon buying meat in the country they will be charged almost anything for it.

4642. Is it not more likely that the butcher, at Sevenoaks, hearing that the meat was cheaper in London tried to buy the dead meat in London, supposing he could get it cheaper than buying live meat in the country?—Very likely.

4643. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Are there not farmers in the neighbourhood of Sevenoaks in the habit of selling sheep to buyers?—Yes; I know that there are, but they have not got the beasts to sell.

4644. We are confining our attention to sheep; you said there was a man came to London to buy legs of mutton, and they turned green; he came here to buy them because he could not get them at Sevenoaks; are there not some farmers in Sevenoaks who would sell sheep to the butchers?—Yes.

4645. Then the man who came here and bought the legs of mutton, might have had the live sheep sent, and killed them and hung them up in his shop, if he pleased?—If he had paid a most exorbitant price, instead of buying them in London, and coming to one market as I should recommend.

4646. Do you think that all sheep should go through the market to supply Sevenoaks?—No; I advocate freedom of trade.

4647. If any butcher is able to buy sheep in the country, and send them to his own slaughter-house, is it not his own fault if his legs of mutton turn green, in consequence of his coming to Newgate Market for them?—It is not his own fault. He cannot depend upon where the sheep are killed.

4648. But if he has the power of buying them alive and killing them at his own slaughter-house, is it not his own fault if his legs of mutton turn green which come from Newgate Market?—If he has to pay 11½*d.* per lb. in the country, there is no wonder he prefers coming to London.

4649. Do not you know, sir, if you know anything about Sevenoaks, that at Tunbridge, close by, there is a large market for dead and live animals?—Yes.

4650. Do you mean to say the butcher could not go to Tunbridge market if he pleased?—I am quite content that he should.

4651. You are stating this as an instance of the hardship of the law, and I do not see that it is of any earthly avail. You say it is a hardship that this man was obliged to come to London and buy these legs of mutton which turned green. Then the moment I ask you, you say he did so because the market of Kent was not supplied with meat?—I alluded more particularly to the oxen.

4652. But we are not talking of oxen now; we are confining our attention to sheep. Tunbridge is a large market, and I think the prices there are cheaper than in the London market. He comes to London and buys dead meat, and the meat turns green; whereas, if he had pleased, he could have bought better live meat in the country; that is rather the fault of himself?—He was obliged to do so.

4653. Chairman.] I thought you said just now you did not wish to see animals slaughtered in London, but that people ought to be able to slaughter in their own private slaughter-houses?—Certainly.

4654. Then why do you want to drive the Sevenoaks butcher to Newgate Market, instead of allowing him to slaughter at his own slaughter-house?—I do not; but I suppose he wanted more legs of mutton.

4655. Let us understand. Do you wish every butcher to be able to slaughter at his own slaughter-house?—Yes, certainly.

4656. You say this Sevenoaks butcher could not slaughter advantageously at his own slaughter-house, because he could get it cheaper in London? —I do not know, as a fact, that he could get it cheaper.

Mr. J. Giblett.

5 June 1866.

4657. Why did he get it then; why was he obliged to have recourse to Newgate Market. You said it was in consequence of the dear prices of meat in his own neighbourhood; and now you say it was disadvantageous for him to come up to Newgate Market?—I suspect he wanted more legs of mutton than he wanted sheep.

4658. The probability is, that he bought some very cheap legs of mutton and over-kept legs of mutton in Newgate Market, with the view of being able to part with them before they got worse. That is the explanation of the Sevenoaks story?—Possibly, as regards the sheep; but as regards the beasts, you will allow me to explain it.

4659. All this arose out of the question I put to you to name any place where consumers could not have a supply of meat in consequence of the restrictions. We have asked the same question of a great many persons, and they have been unable to name any town in this country where they could not get it?—I would go on to say that there are many towns in Kent that cannot get any good beef at all unless they went to the London market.

4660. Now, I ask you to name any place in this country where the consumers have been unable to get a good supply of meat?—Meat includes beef.

4661. Take beef or mutton?—I will take beef, if you please. They have in Kent something like 1,000 or 800 oxen a week from our Metropolitan Market, and they have done so for years. Most of the people that go out of London to the watering places in Kent have their meat follow them from London.

4662. Do they get it alive or dead?—They used to have it alive, almost invariably.

4664. Have you known any place in Kent in which there has been any deficiency in supply? —Yes, in most places in Kent. There is not one-twentieth part enough for their consumption.

4665. Has the price risen in Kent since the 20th of February?—Yes; the price is very high.

4665*. I want to have the particulars. You say the price has risen since the 20th of February. The 20th of February is the day when the prohibition of meat being sent by railway came into force, and it lasted until the 16th of April. From the 20th of February till the 16th of April no lean cattle could be moved by rail. Now, between those dates, did the price of meat increase in any place you know of in Kent?—In the Isle of Wight.

4666. No; you picked out Kent. Point out any place in Kent where the price of meat rose between the 20th of February and the 16th of April?—I really do not know what the charges were.

4667. Then your statement that the price of meat rose in Kent you cannot establish?—I beg your pardon, I did not say the price of meat had risen in Kent.

4668. But you said they could not get one-twentieth part of what they wanted?—Yes, and no doubt the price has risen.

4669. If you cannot get a twentieth part of what is wanted, does not the price always rise? —Yes, and no doubt it did.

4670. Now, can you name any place in the county of Kent where the price of meat rose between the 20th of February and the 16th of April?—I am not so well acquainted with Kent as to be able to answer the question.

4671. Are you so cognisant of the circumstances in Kent as to be able to say they could not get a twentieth part of what they wanted?—Yes.

4672. If you know so much about Kent, that you know they were short nineteen-twentieths of the actual supply they wanted, can you not say whether the price of meat rose?—I cannot undertake to say the price they used to charge or do charge; I know that in some parts of Kent the price was higher.

4673. You stated they could not get one-twentieth part of what they wanted, but yet you cannot tell me whether the price rose in Kent. We do not want general statements here, but practical information. How is the price of meat in Kent or any other part of the country affected by the restrictions in consequence of the cattle plague?—There are many persons connected with the trade can tell you exactly; there is a petition that has been laid before you now from Kent upon that subject.

4674. We shall see the petition bye and bye, and find out what it says; but you stated to us that they did not get in Kent one-twentieth part of the meat they wanted. Can you establish that position?—Yes.

4675. How can you do so?—From their testimony, and from the fact that they came up here to buy the meat at extreme prices, and the assumption is natural, that they found the meat at home very much higher in price.

4676. You tell us they have not got one-twentieth part of what they want?—No, nor have they had for some years.

4677. Is it possible they could not have had one-twentieth part of what they wanted without the price rising considerably?—I have no doubt it did rise considerably.

4678. Can you give me any town in Kent in which that was the case?—I should say in all the towns.

4679. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Take Sevenoaks, what has been the rise in Sevenoaks?—I cannot say what is the price.

4680. Mr. Edward Egerton.] You came here to give evidence, and your evidence is worth nothing, unless you can give us facts within your own knowledge; you say the price has risen. We must take it relatively to what it was six months ago, and what it is now?—I can only say they came to the London market and bought it at much higher prices.

4681. But the London market has not risen much during the last few months?—Yes, it has been sometimes 4 d. or 6 d. a stone more than has been quoted in the papers, and the papers are not a correct criterion.

4682. Chairman.] How are the quotations supplied to the newspapers?—Most improperly.

4683. I am not asking you whether they are supplied right or wrongly, but by what means they they are supplied?—I know but one gentleman who supplies the quotations for the London market.

4685. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Do you mean to tell us that what we see quoted as being at Smithfield Market, beef so much a stone, and so on, is erroneous?—Without a doubt it is erroneous in many cases.

4686. You are prepared to state to the Committee that that information is entirely erroneous?—In many cases it is erroneous; I will not say it is altogether so.

4687. You say meat has risen 4*d.* a stone lately?—Yes; it has risen more occasionally, more than ½*d.* a lb.; I knew it to rise in one week 1½*d.* a pound or 1*s.* a stone.

4688. Was the statement in the paper then accurate or not; did the papers follow that rise in price?—No, not to the full extent.

4689. We want to come to facts; will you specify the time when the meat rose, and the amount; and then tell us exactly the statement that was made in the papers, and we shall be able ourselves to form some idea of it?—No, I cannot from recollection tell you the amount.

4690. Can you tell us any instance where you know that meat has been selling higher than what has been stated in the papers?—Yes; but I cannot recollect any dates.

4691. Chairman.] Can you tell us who the newspaper agents get their information from?—No.

4692. Do they get it from the salesmen or the butchers?—I do not know.

4693. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Is there no authorised person in the metropolitan market?—No; only authorised by particular papers.

4694. We are speaking as to dead meat?—I do not know; I do not know anything on the subject of dead meat.

4695. The price of live animals is a good deal raised by the price of meat in the carcases?—Yes, it is.

4696. Then the price which is in the papers is the price per carcase per stone of 8 lbs., sinking the offal?—Yes.

4697. To whom do the newspaper agents go for information as to the dead-meat market?—I cannot undertake to say.

4698. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] All your knowledge is confined to the live market?—Invariably.

4699. Chairman.] What is it you say that is inaccurate; is it the account which the newspapers give of what the live animals fetch?—Yes; that is very generally inaccurate.

4700. And why do you think they understate it?—I cannot tell the reasons; I think the cause of it is, that they do not take proper pains to learn the facts.

4701. Do you think the salesmen would tell them?—Yes.

4702. You think the salesmen would be willing to give them correct information?—Certainly they would.

4704. We have had evidence from a butcher that the salesmen do all they can to keep down the price stated in the papers?—No; it is the salesmen's interest to state the real facts of the case.

4705. But still you say that the price in the papers is understated?—Because they do not take the proper pains to inquire of the salesmen.

4706. Do you know the gentleman you mentioned who reports for the papers?—Yes.

4707. Have you often told him that his information is inaccurate?—Yes, often.

4709. Did you offer to give him the information if he would send at a later hour?—Yes.

4710. Did he refuse to do that?—He did not state his willingness to send at a later hour.

4711. Sir M. W. Ridley.] How would you suggest that the public should be informed correctly as to the market price; what would you suggest yourself on that subject?—As regards a live market, it is always a speculative thing what the price would be, because it is according to the judgment of the buyer and seller what the animal is worth, so that it is quite an estimated price.

4712. But what means would you take in order that the public should be carefully informed; would you have the information given by authority at the hands of salesmen and butchers conjointly, so that the public would be able to gauge what the price of the markets are, or would you have some public officer appointed to whom the information should be given; or should he himself collect the information and be responsible for giving it as accurately as he can?—Yes, I think it should be conveyed through the clerk of the market, and then we should know who was responsible for giving correct returns. I beg to suggest it should be conveyed through the clerk of the market, and he would be known then to be responsible.

4713. What is the name of the gentleman who is clerk of the market?—Mr. Baldry.

4714. Then, you think that both the salesmen and butchers would be willing to give the clerk of the market information as to the price of the day?—Yes.

4715. You do not doubt that?—Not the least.

4716. At what hour should such price be given in?—Not earlier than 11 o'clock.

4717. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Would that be an average struck of all the prices given during the day; how is it you could not get the price price earlier in the day?—Because some of the most active sales do not take place till late in the day.

Mr. J. Giblett.

5 June 1866.

4718. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] What regulates the price of the metropolitan market?—The supply.

4719. Nothing else?—The supply and the weather very often; because if the weather is very warm, the persons cannot attend the dead-meat market. In fact, from Aberdeen, where they send a good deal of meat during the cold weather, they cannot send it during the hot weather; and when the butchers want a large quantity of meat in the live market, it is because they cannot depend on the dead-meat market.

4720. I thought that the greater part of the business of the live-meat market was transacted before 10 o'clock?—It depends on the state of the trade; when the trade is very good, half the business is got over by 10 o'clock in the morning; when the trade is not good, it very seldom is. In summer it commences earlier than in the winter, for in the winter it is dark until half-past seven.

4721. Is it not the object of the Corporation of London that the trade should be done earlier in the morning?—They could have no control in the matter.

4722. Do they not control it by the price; is there not heavier stallage on the cattle that are not cleared by a certain time in the morning?—The municipal authority could not control the market in regard to market price.

4723. With a view to force the trade early in the morning, is there not a heavier price put upon that which remains late than that which is removed early?—No; it depends upon the supply, and the price obtained.

4724. I know there was an intention of the sort, and I ask whether cattle removed early do not pay less stallage, or a less market toll, than that which is paid upon cattle sold after a certain hour?—No.

4726. I thought there had been some regulations made with a view to help the trade, and that people should not be loitering all day long, to charge a larger price to the later trade than to the earlier trade?—Nothing of the kind.

4727. You say the supply regulates the price?—The supply and the weather, and the demand among the public; the number of people in town, and so on.

4728. In what way are the prices inaccurate that we have seen in the paper?—Sometimes they are a halfpenny a pound less then we really make, 4*d.* a stone less than is made in the market; and sometimes it is a halfpenny a pound more, and sometimes they give you week after week, in the leading journals of the day, nearly the same price, where there has been a difference in the market of from 6*d.* to 1*s.* a stone.

4729. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Have you ever written to the papers asking them to correct that?—Yes.

4730. Chairman.] Do you write to your customers in the country to say that there has been a mistake in these cases?—I constantly write to them to say they cannot depend upon them.

4731. When there has been a mistake in the papers as to the price of meat, do you write to your customers, who consign cattle to you for sale, stating that the price is higher than what the papers quote?—No, I have not time to pay attention to that.

4732. You do not do so?—I have often written to them to say their quotations are incorrect.

4733. Have you ever written to say that the quotations are incorrect, as being too low?—I do not know as to that.

4734. Will you answer the question. Have you ever done so?—No, it has not been necessary.

4735. You have not found it necessary to inform your customers that the prices had been higher?—It would not make any difference to them.

4736. I ask you the question whether you have done so or not?—No.

4737. Mr. Edward Egerton.] When you have seen the prices quoted wrongly in the paper, have you ever written to the editor of the paper, stating that that has been the market price of the day?—Yes.

4738. Has it been corrected in the next paper, and has your letter had the effect of causing proper quotations the next day?—I cannot say that it has.

4739. Do you state as a fact, that you have written to the paper to represent that the price quoted has not been the real price?—Yes. I have often written to do so.

4740. Chairman.] What have you written to state, that they have been too high or too low?—That they have been quoted too high, and that the prices have been altogether incorrect.

4741. Mr. Edward Egerton.] And you state there has been no correction in consequence of your letter?—No, I am not cognizant of any improvement; I am not cognizant of any pains having been taken to learn the true facts.

4742. Have you had any answer to such a communication as yours from the newspapers?—No.

4743. And they have continued to insert the erroneous quotations?—Yes.

4744. May I ask the name of any newspapers to which you have written in this way?—Would it be necessary to state that.

4745. Yes, because you come here to give specific facts?—I have written to the "Times," upon several occasions.

4746. You state positively that upon your writing to the "Times," no communication has been made to you on the subject?—Not personally in reply.

4747. I want to know whether there was any single correction the next day in the quotations?—I cannot undertake to say.

4748. Did they go on quoting the same prices, or did they adopt your quotations in the next report?—It is not my usual practice to pay attention to what they do, but my attention has often been called to the fact.

4749. You have stated, as a fact, that the quotations of a newspaper by which the public judgment of the prices of meat is concerned, have been been erroneous. I ask you, have you taken any steps to correct these errors; you say you have done so, and you specify the "Times" as one newspaper to which you have written. I ask you now, whether you, having written to the "Times," they have taken any notice of your communication?—Not by any communication to me.

4750. Have they corrected what, according to your view, was a wrong quotation?—They may have taken means to gain correct information.

4751. That is no answer to my question; did they, or did they not?—I have not necessarily watched it.

4752. Do you mean to say, when you were perfectly aware that the quotation was a wrong one, that you did not watch in the next paper, to see whether they had set it right; are the Committee to understand you persist in that answer?— Yes, I have seen the same kind of errors committed again.

4753. Have you taken no steps then?—I have written on several occasions.

4754. Can you give us the date of any letter you have ever written to the "Times" on the subject?—No, I cannot.

4755. Do you keep any journal, or any minute book?—No; I should not think of entering any little circumstance of that kind in a journal.

4756. Can you give us no month or year; because there is somebody from whom we probably can get information. Probably they would have your letters at the "Times" Office?—Very likely, my name is well known to them.

4757. Can you give us any year or month in which you have written to the "Times"?—No.

4758. Does Mr. Herbert supply the "Times" with that information?—I do not know.

4759. He does supply some of the papers?—He does.

4760. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Have you a range of prices to describe quality at every market?—Yes, it is the same phraseology as they have used for many years.

4761. As a fact, there is a range of prices from so much to so much, to describe quality?—Yes.

4762. Do you deal in all kinds of live animals, low class as well as high?—Nearly so.

4763. Mr. Edward Egerton.] You have told us in the first part of your evidence, that every beast that was slaughtered in a public slaughter-house was worth 30*s.* less?—Yes.

4764. Give me exactly how you arrive at that fact?—That is the conclusion of the whole trade.

4765. General conclusions must be founded on some facts. I want to know the steps by which you have arrived at that conclusion?—To a butcher who lives far away from the public slaughter-house, it is so much more convenient to him, and he can make much more of his offal, being in a cleaner state in his own house, and he can employ his own men to kill, his apprentices and the young men he has about him, instead of being obliged to send his men away to a public slaughter-house; besides, his property is safe, and in the butcher's estimation they are worth 30*s.* a head more to him.

4766. If your figures are of any value, there must be some means of arriving at that 30*s.* Is it simply because he can keep his men employed at his own slaughter-house?—That is one reason. The meat that is killed at his own slaughter-house is in a better condition; he can exhibit it, and it can be hung up, and get cool at his own place better than it can at public slaughter-houses.

4767. Why?—His sheep and lambs would look very different indeed if they were killed at home, to what they would if they have to be carted there. They make a very nice and neat show in a butcher's shop when killed in a proper state, and only removed from the slaughter-house to the front of the shop.

4768. I was asking you as to beef, and not as to sheep and lambs. I suppose you wish your evidence to be looked upon as of some value; and it cannot be looked upon as of any value, unless you give us the reasons for your statements. How do you arrive at that 30*s.*?—It would be so very inconvenient for the butcher to send a distance from his home to have a bullock killed at the public slaughter-house, and it certainly would be worth more to him if killed at his own place. It is the general estimate of the trade which I am giving now; on the average, it will be worth 30*s.* a head more to have them killed, with all the privileges of killing, at their own slaughter-houses, than they would by a compulsory arrangement to have them killed at public abbatoirs. Of course, the extra value they would be to him would depend on the distance it would be from the slaughter-house; for instance, if a butcher lived eight miles or more away, it would be a great inconvenience.

4769. Then that 30*s.* must vary in every case; it cannot be one given standard, according to your evidence?—I am speaking on an average.

4770. Chairman.] Take a particular case. Take a man who has to go three miles; give us the extra expense to him, of killing at a public slaughter-house, taking the killing first?—The killing would be 4*s.* at the public slaughter-house.

4771. What would it be at home?—Comparatively nothing; he would have his own premises, and the men whom he had engaged.

4772. How long does it take to kill an ox?—To dress it, do you mean?

4773. To kill it and dress it, so as to put it in a fit state to hang in the shop?—It takes half an hour.

4774. I say to kill it, and dress it, and quarter it; how long does it take?—They do not quarter them. They take half or three-quarters of an hour to kill them and dress them.

4775. You say it costs nothing at home?—Comparatively nothing; his young men can do it.

4776. And it would cost 4*s.* at a public slaughter-house?—Yes.

4777. At what do you put down the cartage for the three miles?—It would take him away from his business, and he would have to keep more horses and carts.

4778. I ask you what do you put it at for three miles?—I should say he could not send his horse and cart away for three miles and back again for less than 5*s.*, but a three-mile radius would comprise only a small portion of the butchers.

4779. We will put down 5*s.*; what else is there?—The offal would be much more to him in a clean state than if it were brought away from a public slaughter-house.

4780. Why should it come from a public slaughter-house in a dirty state?—It necessarily does.

4781. Have you ever been in a public slaughter-house?—Yes.

Mr. J. Gillett.

5 June 1866.

4782. Where?—In several about London.

4783. Where?—I have been in three in Copenhagen fields.

4784. Is there a public slaughter-house at Copenhagen-fields?—Yes.

4785. There is one that you can hire, is there not?—Yes.

4786. I want to know whether you have ever been in a public slaughter-house where people were forbidden by law to slaughter in any other place?—No.

4787. You never have?—No.

4788. Then do you apprehend that all the offal in the slaughter-houses of Paris and of Edinburgh comes away in a dirty state?—I do not know.

4790. An estimate must be based upon particulars, and I want to have the particulars. We have the price of slaughtering and the cartage; is there nothing to add to that?—I say his property would not be safe.

4791. What would not?—His fat would not be safe.

4792. That is to say, you suppose they would all be rascals at the public slaughter-houses?—It is a common thing for the fat to be stolen.

4793. You mean the inside fat?—Yes.

4794. What is the average amount of inside fat in an ox?—From three stone to twenty stone.

4795. What do you think would be the average loss on the fat?—I cannot undertake to say what would be stolen and what would not.

4796. Do you mean to say the butcher would risk losing a whole guinea by the purloining of his fat?—No, I am speaking of what they say themselves.

4797. I am not asking what they say themselves. You tell us that 30*s.* would represent the loss to a butcher, if he had to kill it at a public slaughter-house; you give us 4*s.* as the price of slaughtering and 5*s.* the cartage, which is 9*s.*, and then you tell us the only other item is the loss of the fat for which you have 21*s.* to account for. Do you think the butcher would lose the whole guinea on the fat that would be purloined?—He might do so.

4798. If you named that to a butcher, would he not burst out laughing?—No, I do not think he would. I think his practical information would bear out exactly every word I have said.

4799. You think it possible he might lose a whole guinea by the purloining of the fat?—No doubt many would think it possible, but I am alluding to the general advantage of having the ox killed on his own premises.

4800. Mr. Dent.] You are principally concerned as a salesman of live stock?—Yes.

4801. Not as a butcher?—No.

4802. Do you know anything about the consuming markets, not the metropolitan, but the consuming markets, in manufacturing districts and other districts; do you know anything of the prices?—In what consuming markets?

4803. In Manchester and Leeds?—I know at Manchester they are fearfully situated as regards the price of beef.

4804. Is it not a fact that for some time the metropolitan market has been the cheapest market for the butcher to buy in almost in England?—Necessarily, because the animals come from abroad to that market.

4805. For instance, the animals might have been bought at the metropolitan market and taken down to Manchester or Leeds, and then a considerable profit realised by the salesman?—If they could be taken immediately.

4806. Would you be surprised to hear that animals could have been bought in the metropolitan market and taken down to the Leeds Market yesterday, to make, on an average, a profit of 3*l.* per head?—No; that would realise exactly what I have been attempting to show the Committee.

4807. The price of butcher's meat in the metropolis ranges consideraby higher than the price of butcher's meat in those towns as to the retail price?—I think not.

4808. Quite as high?—I think lower, from the information I got. Of course being actively engaged here I am not there to see, but from information I have received, it is lower. In the Isle of Wight beef is worth 8½*d.* a pound.

4809. We are not talking of the Isle of Wight, but of Leeds, Manchester, and manufacturing towns?—It is much dearer there.

4810. Tell us the retail prices of the best joints in London now; take the retail prices of beef at the present moment; do you know what they are for sirloins, and ribs, and the best parts?—I should think from 11*d.* a pound the best beef.

4811. And for mutton, the best joints, legs and saddles?—The charge, I presume, would be about 10*d.* or 11*d.* per pound. I know the whole sheep has made 10*d.* or 11*d.* in the market.

4812. And veal and beefsteaks considerably higher?—No doubt, without the bone.

4813. The prices in the live market are at the present moment, you believe, considerably less than at Leeds, Manchester, and other manufacturing towns?—Yes; from the circumstance of the meat from abroad being two-thirds of our London supply. Out of the last 800 I have sold, though I generally sell more English than foreign, yet more than two-thirds are from abroad.

4815. And the retail prices are higher than ever was known in London?—Meat is a great deal dearer than I ever knew it in my life. The carcases of sheep I have known lately to fetch 10*d.* a pound, and if a butcher had got 13*d.* for his legs of mutton, he would not have made much by it. In some counties, where they have no stock at all, they are obliged to come to market and have it killed, and sent down at a dreadful expense. They tell me it is worth 50*s.* each ox instead of 30*s.* I have the testimony of men in Manchester, that they are worth 50*s.* a-piece more if they are sent down alive and killed in their own slaughter-house. I have the testimony of a large contractor in Plymouth; he is determined not to have another contract as long as he lives, for he has ruinously suffered by buying the animals here and killing them, and I believe they are worth 50*s.* more if he could get them home alive.

4816. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] You said that Manchester

Manchester was fearfully situated? — Because they cannot get the stock; they are obliged to go to Liverpool, to get the dead meat; stock is not allowed to be sent alive into the Manchester districts. That is why they are so awkwardly situated.

4817. Is that the case?—That is the case.

4818. No cattle can travel from Liverpool to Manchester now?—No, I think not.

4819. Mr. Edward Egerton.] You are wrong; they can go from Liverpool to Manchester, but they are not allowed to go to the adjoining towns?—Yes, I believe that is so, but not allowed to go from Liverpool after they have been in the market.

4820. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Explain your remark when you said that the Manchester markets were fearfully situated?—I mean the neighbourhood round Manchester; the large towns round about it.

4821. Are you aware that the Manchester market has not been supplied lately; is the price of meat dearer in Manchester than it is in London?—Yes, decidedly so; it has been much dearer. Of course, I am only giving you what I have been informed.

4822. Since when?—The last two or three months. They have come up to London, and they have bought some of the beasts here, and killed them here, to take down dead to Manchester.

Mr. J. Giblett.

5 June 1866.

4823. But they buy them cheaper here than they can in Manchester. That does not prove anything about the price of meat in Manchester?—It proves it is dearer there than here, or they could not afford to buy them here, and take them there.

4824. That is an open question, unless you speak from personal knowledge of the matter?—I am extensively engaged in business here, and I am not at Manchester, and therefore cannot give you that information. Will the Committee allow me to make one remark: standing as I do (a public man, to a certain extent); the loud outcries I have heard from Norfolk, not to be able to get their cattle up by transit——.

4825. Chairman.] We are going to have some Norfolk witnesses, and we shall hear of that from them. Your evidence has not been very satisfactory to the Committee, because we have had very great difficulty in getting a plain answer to a simple question. The value of your evidence to the Committee, I think, will be very slight in consequence of that fact?—I am sorry to hear you say so.

Mr. Thomas Woodley, called in; and Examined.

4826. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Where do you carry on business?—74, Aldgate High-street.

Mr. T. Woodley.

4827. In the City of London?—Yes.

4828. What are you?—Carcase butcher.

4829. Are you in the retail as well as the wholesale trade?—No, only in the wholesale.

4830. Are you the Mr. Woodley, a member of the Common Council of London?—I am.

4831. You are thoroughly acquainted with the wholesale carcase trade of London?—With the wholesale meat trade I am perfectly acquainted.

4832. How many years have you been in business?—Since a very early period of my life; all my life I may say, since I have been able to attend to it.

4833. You have been here several times, and you know the object of this Committee is to endeavour to see how far London can be supplied with dead meat, with a view to avoid the moving of cattle all over London; will you give the Committee your opinions with regard to the practicability of that?—There is an absolute necessity for a live market, and only one market; those two points are quite clear in my mind.

4835. Then you start on this principle to begin with, that there must be a large live cattle market for the metropolis?—There must be a large live cattle market for the metropolis.

4836. And only one?—And only one market.

4837. Why so?—That the butchers may have a place to go to to make their bargains and establish a price. It is competition that keeps up a supply to the market. A small diminution in price, or an increase in price, is a matter that is known all over the country, and prepares for the following market. If the consignments are profitable to-day, it brings more the next market day; if there is a loss they are at once withheld, and it is necessary that there should be only one market, and only one market day, to keep the business somewhat regular.

4838. Was not that the old doctrine when London only had a million of inhabitants, and do you think it still holds good when it has three millions of inhabitants, to have only one market?—I think there is the same necessity for one market now that there was then, and perhaps more so.

4839. If London increased to five millions of inhabitants, do you think there should still be but one market?—Still but one cattle market.

4840. Because you say it establishes one standard of price?—Yes, and enables the butchers to have prices similar.

4841. You think that by having one market, and therefore one standard of prices, there would be a large price?—There is a larger price, and there is a consumption of as much time as a butcher can spare. Monday is the most convenient venient day to leave the shops, in all ordinary cases, and he can hardly spare time for more. The Thursday market is almost neglected, because the time is then more valuable to the butchers; time is a valuable item.

Mr. T. Woodley. 5 June 1866.

4842. Do you mean to say as to the Thursday market, there is no fresh supply of meat to feed that market?—Yes; it is almost all fresh, but the demand is not so great, or the number of buyers.

4843. The Thursday market is not supplied by the remnants of Monday?—No; it is principally fresh stock.

4844. Then you have really two markets a week, but Monday is the general market day?—Yes.

4845. Practically there are slaughter-houses attached to the market?—There are slaughter-houses at the market, but very few in number.

4846. Supposing the number were increased, do you think all the cattle brought to that market could be slaughtered at those slaughter-houses? Certainly not; I take it to be wholly impracticable; I think it to be a question of such vast magnitude as to be wholly impracticable.

4847. Give us the reasons?—I shall have to go into some little particulars. On the average we have 5,000 beasts weekly and 30,000 sheep, and they would only be partially sold on Monday; whether sold or not, if they did not leave the market, they would take a very large space of lairage; they would require a great portion of space to be kept there some few days. Few animals are slaughtered in London when they are purchased; they are mostly kept two or three days by the butchers, and in hot weather the animals are chiefly kept until the latter end of the week, and then a very large number would be required to be killed on one day, either Thursday or Friday.

4848. Chairman.] What is the principal killing day now?—Thursday; it is ruled by the heat of the weather. If it had been as hot last Thursday as it was on Friday, it would have driven the killing to Friday.

4849. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Where is the lairage now?—At present a great many of them go into the metropolitan market lairage since the restrictions by which the cattle are compelled to be taken by the railway into the metropolis. They are not allowed to be unloaded, otherwise there are convenient lairs a mile or two from the metropolis; but at present they go to the Metropolitan Cattle Market, and although it is a beautiful cattle market, and the layers quite as large as the corporation could be expected to provide, yet it would not be adequate for the stock of animals to lie there day after day; at present they go there on Saturday night, and are in the market again on Monday morning.

4850. What quantity can be stored in the lairage attached to the market?—They sometimes have as many as 3,000 beasts in the lairs, but I think they have to lie inconveniently close.

4851. Mr. Edward Egerton.] What do they pay per night?—Three pence, and as much hay as they order or pay for; the 3 d. does not include forage.

4852. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Supposing there is a market on Monday of 5,000 beasts, there would be an average of 3,000 kept there till Thursday; is that so?—I think they would lie inconveniently close.

4853. But there would be lairage?—Yes, they can be stowed away there.

4854. What becomes of the other 2,000; could they be killed at the abattoirs of the market?—With the present slaughter-house accommodation, certainly not.

4855. Mr. Dent.] Supposing there are 5,000 beasts brought on Monday to the metropolitan market, what becomes of those 5,000 in ordinary cases?—They are removed as fast as they are sold; the drovers begin to leave with them soon after daybreak.

4856. Where do the butchers keep them till the end of the week when they want to kill them?—Each butcher has premises of his own, exceedingly well adapted for them, and the cattle are kept in stock, and taken as much care of as horses.

4857. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Then some of the 2,000 beasts are killed at the market, and the others are taken away to the Whitechapel Market, and killed there; and some are distributed to other butchers in various parts of London?—All over London and the metropolitan districts chiefly; they go through a wide radius.

4858. Now, go on to another branch; in your opinion, the butcher can more advantageously carry on his trade by having the live stock under his own care, and killing it at his own convenience, than at the public slaughter-houses?—Undoubtedly.

4860. Would he not very nearly do the same thing if the slaughter-houses were distributed all over London in various districts?—No.

4862. Is it not a fact now, dealing with the western part of London, that there are a great many of the large butchers who have slaughter-houses contiguous to their premises?—There are not a great many; but I believe it is so in some cases.

4863. What difference does it make when a man has his own slaughter-house or his own public slaughter-house; could it make any difference?—If he has not convenient premises adjacent to his own house, he has them as near as he possibly can can, and also has his property under his control to kill; for instance, in the weather we have just been passing through, it was desirable he should kill his animal as late as possible in the evening, and the butchers in London who wished to kill a bullock last Thursday or Friday, would require to kill something like 2,000 bullocks on the same day. That would apply to cold weather as well as hot. In the cold weather they wish to kill them early, in order that they may hang for two or three days, and in hot weather they wish to kill them late, in order that they may have them nice and sweet. It is a question of having sufficient accommodation to hang them well; to have them killed at one particular time, and that the best time for the butcher's own interest.

4864. Your own trade is in Whitechapel, High-street?—Yes.

4865. I suppose other butchers kill there; you let out your slaughter-house to other people, I suppose?—No; I use it entirely myself.

4866. What kind of animals do you kill?—I kill the best oxen.

4867. Nothing but oxen?—Scarcely anything but oxen.

4868. How many do you kill a week?—Some 80 to 100.

4869. What becomes of their carcasses?—They are all sold; I sell them myself on the premises.

4870. Do you sell them at home or send them to Newgate?—Nearly all of them at home.

4871. Do you send anything to Newgate Market?—Occasionally a few quarters of beef.

4872. How are the meat markets at Whitechapel and Leadenhall supplied with beef?—By a good deal of town-killed meat and a portion of country-killed, which varies with the weather and the time of year.

4873. There are no slaughter-houses for oxen attached to either Newgate or Leadenhall?—No, not now.

4874. How many years is it since that was altered?—It is not many years since the last beef slaughter-house was abolished in Newgate. I think I remember two or three that used to be there.

4875. Now they are served either by country meat or meat slaughtered in other parts of London?—Entirely so. I think it was an act of the Corporation to do away with the driving the cattle into Newgate Market. The sheep are still killed there in some few slaughter-houses, but I think the Corporation did away with the slaughtering of cattle.

4876. A few years ago?—Yes.

4877. In fact, there is meat sold both in Newgate and Leadenhall Markets, where the carcases are brought either from a distance or slaughtered in other parts of London?—Yes.

4878. Is there a market now in Aldgate, High-street?—Yes, a very considerable market.

4879. That is called a dead-meat market?—Yes, there is a great deal of meat sold there.

4880. Is the meat that is sold there meat that is brought from the country or slaughtered in London?—Most of it is slaughtered in London. We have also a supply of country-killed meat, and our customers live mostly in the eastern districts of the metropolis. There is a considerable shipping trade; it is the most convenient place for the East End butchers.

4881. There is a meat market in Aldgate, High-street, that is Whitechapel, and another at Leadenhall, and a third at Newgate?—That is so.

4882. How do you manage in those three markets for the standard of prices?—The prices keep pretty nearly the same. The distance is not great. We are within a mile of Newgate Market, and butchers soon tell each other. If there is a glut of meat at Newgate Market, they drive up and get a supply if they can buy cheaper. If, on the other hand, we hear that Newgate is short, a lot is forwarded from our market to that market for sale, or we have butchers come down occasionally from the northern districts and the south to buy meat of us.

4883. Does it occur that you could always get everything you want at one of these markets?—It frequently happens so.

4884. Are all those markets held on the same day?—Every day is the day for the meat markets. The demand is greater on some days than it is on others.

4885. It is a daily open market, in fact?—A daily market; necessarily so.

4886. I suppose Newgate Market is a very large market?—Very large.

4887. That being the largest market, does it regulate the supply?—I think it has more effect on the prices; the prices from Newgate Market have a great effect through all the country. They have an effect on both markets, no doubt. If the demand is good, then there is an endeavour to get the quantity of live animals at once to supply the demand.

4888. It is said that London is the cheapest market; how do you account for that?—We have the whole, or nearly the whole, of the foreign supply; we have the great bulk of them. No doubt that is the reason of it.

4889. How is it that the sheep market is cheaper in London than it is in the country; is that so, to begin with?—I think London is the cheapest place in the kingdom for meat, on an average.

4890. Mr. Dent.] Not to the consumer, I think, is it?—Well, that is a little way from my branch of the business; but I can give you a satisfactory answer to that.

4891. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] We only want your information and facts on which to judge; any information you can give will be of great value to the trade, no doubt, as well as to us?—Then, I would say, that the prices of the different parts of meat vary more in London than they do in the country. The butchers in London sell the coarser parts of the animal very considerably lower than in the country. I believe in very many parts of England you will find working men pay 2 d. a pound more than they do in London. That is one great advantage of the foreign supply. It is good, useful meat; it is not quite so handsome nor quite so high in price, and the coarse parts are consumed very much by the working classes, and that enables them to have cheaper meat; no doubt it is a great boon.

4892. Do you think the price to the consumer in London, generally, are influenced both by the dead-meat market being a large market, and there being a live market for the carcase butchers to go to?—Yes; I think they both combine to put the consumer in London on the best possible footing.

4893. Mr. Dent.] You buy a good deal of foreign stock as well as English stock?—Not much much foreign; it depends rather on the time of the year.

5 June 1866.

4894. You advocate a single market, as far as the English and foreign stock is concerned; you think that the fact of their both being brought into the same market causes a lower price in each?—I do not think it causes a lower price, the price is ruled by the demand.

4895. I rather understood you that the advantage of a single market was the competition there was between the foreign and English stock being brought into the same market, which would be an advantage to the buyer?—I only meant that the butcher had the advantage of competition in enabling him to get between the two.

4896. If he has the advantage of getting between the two, it must bring the foreign stock into competition with English stock?—Yes.

4897. You buy sheep also pretty largely?—No, mine is entirely beef.

4898. What class in the metropolis are your customers?—Retail butchers at the east end of the metropolis; not entirely, but mostly so.

4899. In your opinion, do the working classes, as a rule, get meat cheaper in London than they do in the country?—No doubt of it, very considerably cheaper.

4900. Mr. Holland.] Have you regular customers for your offal?—Yes, it is all contracted for, and removed off the premises the same night. I may say in reference to the offal, it is mostly consumed; the eatable portions of it are consumed, perhaps about within a mile. It is not taken far.

4901. In the same way the hides are disposed of, I suppose?—The hides are taken to Bermondsey; a gentleman there has had my hides for many years.

4902. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] What do you mean when you say the offal?—It is a general term. It includes everything but the carcase; the hide is part of the offal.

4903. A good deal of it is consumable?—Yes, and the foot is included in the offal.

4904. Chairman.] You use the word "offal" in two different ways, first of all, is everything but the carcase; secondly, the coarser parts of the meat that are eaten?—We do not use it with reference to meat.

4905. You use it with reference to the liver?—Yes, the liver, tripe, head, tongue, tail.

4906. And the trotters and so on?—Yes.

4907. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Those are all eaten?—Yes.

4908. Chairman.] Then you say so much, sinking the offal; then you include the hide, horns, and hoofs, but when you talk about consuming the offal you talk of that part which is eaten?—Yes, not about the hide, certainly.

4909. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] I suppose the consumption in London consists a great deal of foreign cattle; a very great portion.

4910. I observe now and then in driving along the eastern part of London, a great many Dutch cattle, black and white?—It used to be so, but the Dutch cattle are now stopped. You have no doubt seen a great many.

4911. They do form a large proportion of the consumption of London?—A very large proportion indeed.

4912. Mr. Edward Egerton.] What you talk of the consumption of London, you talk of the East End, not that the West End is supplied with the foreign meat?—The foreign meat goes into all parts of London.

4913. Mr. Holland.] Your carcases go everywhere?—Mine would keep very much to the East End.

4914. Mr. Edward Egerton.] We have had the testimony of a West End butcher, who told us he never had any foreign meat?—I think the inhabitants of the East End of London are as good judges of meat as the inhabitants of the West End, and as respectable men carry on business there.

4916. Tell us what class of animals have been the healthiest on an average during the last three or four years?—I have seen very few unhealthy animals at all; I buy a good description of animals; possibly there may have been some; I have not noticed; I think as a rule the complaints fall most amongst the poor cattle.

4917. Do any of the Jews slaughter at your slaughter-house?—Yes.

4918. The Jews have a critical examination of all the carcases?—A very narrow examination indeed.

4919. I ask you, therefore, judging by that test, whether the class of animals slaughtered at your slaughter-house are those which are so free from disease as that they would pass the Jews' examination?—The Jews would take mostly foreign animals; the foreign would meet their requirements in greater numbers than the English.

4920. What class of foreign animals?—The Dutch are very sound. The chief examination which the Jews make is as to the lungs of the animal, and the Dutch cattle are very sound in the lungs. They pass in greater numbers than any other.

4921. The Dutch cattle have been found the freest from lung diseases?—Yes.

4923. Where do you say the examination on the part of the Jews takes place; is it in the market, or where is it?—They provide their own slaughterer slaughterer to do the act of slaughtering, and the animal is also examined before it is finally dressed. It is dressed by my men in the ordinary way, and the Jews simply do the act of slaughtering.

4924. There is, in fact, a post-mortem examination?—Yes.

4925. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Has it been found that the Dutch cattle, on the average, have been freest from lung disease of all other cattle?—Quite so. I may say as far as pleuro-pneumonia, the lung disease, is concerned, it is a complaint that would show itself. We should not think of slaughtering one for the Jews.

4926. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Have you ever had any with foot and mouth disease?—Yes, the beasts are very subject to have a slight attack of foot and mouth disease.

4927. Does that affect the meat?—Not at all.

4928. Chairman.] It depends on the state in which they are killed. They may have it so bad as to affect the meat?—You can make out nothing in the meat to lead you to suppose that they have had the foot and mouth disease.

4929. Mr. Dent.] You would not be likely to buy a beast that is suffering from it?—There is never anything from which you can detect it; after the bullock's feet are cut off, I would defy you to find anything to denote it.

4931. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Fever?—Fever; just the same as anyone may catch a chilblain.

4932. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Will the animals having foot and mouth disease pass the Jews' examination?—Yes.

4933. Therefore it does not affect any vital part?—It does not; they lose the hoof in very bad cases, and then it is necessary to kill the animals.

4934. Chairman.] Do you sell by retail at all?—Not at all.

4935. Who are your customers; what class of butchers buy of you?—Retail butchers.

4936. West End butchers?—East End butchers principally.

Mr. T. Woodley.

5 June 1866.

4937. What is your opinion of the desirabilty or non-desirability of having a separate market for foreign stock?—I think we certainly ought not.

4938. You think not?—Decidedly not.

4939. Do you think it would interfere with the foreign trade?—I have no doubt of it.

4940. Do you think foreigners would cease to send their animals?—I think they would have less competition for their animals, and it is all a question of profit or loss. If a certain consignment did not pay the foreigners, they would be very loth to send another.

4941. You think they ought to come into the same market as the English?—The animals ought all to come into one market.

4942. That would be better for the buyer as well as for the seller?—Better for both.

4943. Do you think there is any evil in the present system of private slaughter-houses in the City?—I think not.

4944. I mean, as regards the comfort and health of the inhabitants?—I think not.

4945. Do not you think they are a nuisance?—I think they are not necessarily a nuisance.

4946. Mr. Edward Egerton.] You are member of the Common Council of the City of London?—I am.

4947. Perhaps you have read the reports of your own medical officer, Dr. Letheby?—Yes.

4948. You are aware of what his opinion is?—I am; like many learned men, he goes a great way; but I do not agree with him.

4949. Chairman.] Do you think that the animals being driven through the streets are a nuisance?—Trifling, compared with the evil you would create by stopping them.

4950. Then it is an evil, but you think you would have a worse evil if you stopped it?—I can hardly think it an evil; it is an inconvenience in some cases.

4951. Mr. Holland.] How do you dispose of the blood of your many carcases?—It is sold at so much per head, collected in barrels and taken away. We have various uses for it; a great portion of it is used by the sugar refiners.

4952. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] You are near the sugar refiners; the sugar refiners are close by you?—Within half a mile of us there are the largest establishments in London.

Mr. Thomas Pickworth, called in; and Examined.

4953. Chairman.] You are a Retail Butcher?—Yes.

4954. You live in Goodge-street, Tottenham Court-road?—Yes.

4955. You are a member of the Butchers' Trade Protection Society?—Yes.

4956. What is the object of that society?—It is for the protection of ourselves as regards keeping our own slaughter-houses, and having the privilege of going to the markets to purchase our own stock, because we think it very beneficial to the public at large, and especially for our own convenience for daily supply.

4957. Do you yourself slaughter any animals?—Yes.

4958. Have you a slaughter-house of your own?—Yes; behind my house.

Mr. T. Pickworth.

4959. What number do you slaughter in the week on an average?—About 10 beasts, nearly 100 sheep, and six or seven calves.

4960. Do you slaughter for yourself, or anyone else?—Only for my own convenience.

4961. You buy in the Metropolitan Market?—Yes.

4962. Do you buy foreign or English beasts, principally?—English. When I can get them of the very best. Sometimes I have been compelled in the autumn season of the year, when the stock comes out of the Midland Counties of a Thursday to buy foreign beasts: for instance, I might go to the market on Monday morning, and I generally want to purchase about 10 beasts. Perhaps I could not get above eight, and then I should have to purchase one or two on the following Thursday. I have gone to the market on a Thursday, and the supply has been so limited of English good beasts that I have not been able to get quite sufficient, and then I have been obliged to run over to the Dutch beasts and bought one or two of those of the very best to supply the immediate wants of my customers; but if English good beasts had been there I should have bought them instead.

4963. Do you buy any foreign sheep?—No.

4964. Do you buy your sheep in the Metropolitan Market?—Yes.

4968. Customers are very careful in buying in very hot weather, are they not?—Especially; and I, for one, cannot see how the wants of the public are to be met if the opportunity of killing at our own place is to be taken away from us.

4969. Is your slaughter-house licensed?—Yes.

4970. Who is it licensed by?—The parish of St. Pancras. I never keep stock in my own slaughter-house. I keep my beasts in one place, where I tie them up and feed them separately, and my sheep in another place.

4971. Is it a lair you have got?—It is a lairage about 200 yards from my own slaughter-house door; it is behind my house.

4972. When you buy in the Metropolitan Market you have the animals at once driven to your lairs?—Yes; sometimes I have turned my cattle out of the market at five o'clock in the morning.

4973. What accommodation have you in your lairs?—I have room to put in 20 beasts.

4974. Is it a yard, or what?—It is a shed; it will hold 16 or 17 beasts more comfortably than 20, and then there is a large place all round, and a loft over them.

4975. You keep them there to kill as you want them?—Yes; I fetch some out every morning. At five or six in the morning, if the weather is very hot, I say to my men, "Just send over only one bullock, or two bullocks." I never keep less than two in store, for fear I should get behind the demand.

4976. Do you buy dead meat?—Occasionally.

4977. Where do you buy that?—At Newgate Market.

4978. I suppose, like the rest of the trade, you are not very well satisfied with the accommodation in Newgate Market?—Certainly not.

4979. There is a great difficulty in getting at the market, is there not?—There is a great difficulty in getting at the market, and an immense amount of labour in getting the meat out of the market into our carts, and getting it home.

4980. Does the meat get much damaged by being carted away from the market?—In hot weather much of it is in a bad state, and it much disturbs it. I do not know that the meat will eat any the worse for the table, but it takes a certain amount of bloom off it; there is a certain amount of newness goes from it.

4981. That is from the surface?—From the surface; and it cuts up duller and deader.

4982. It gets a shabby appearance, in fact?—It gets a shabby appearance, whereas meat of our own killing looks clear, and bright, and new.

4983. You bring the sheep home in the carcase, do you not?—Yes.

4985. Is there much variation in the demand of your customers from week to week, except in very hot weather; I mean to say, taking the same customers, do you find the demand they make for meat is about the same, one week with the other?—About the same.

4986. There is about the same demand over the whole of London, I suppose, from week to week, if the weather is the same?—I should think there would be. As to a man's own trade, that depends on a man's energy in business; for instance, I could sit down and only do six or seven beasts beasts a week, if I pleased; but if I put my energies to work and bustle about, and put the meat before the public, I can sell more meat.

4987. When you sell more meat, some one else sells less?—I cannot say that, I am sure.

4988. Do you think the consumption of London is pretty much the same from week to week?—I think it is according to the season of the year.

4989. Mr. Dent.] There must be an increase in the season?—Of course there must.

4990. Chairman.] I mean the regular consumption?—Yes.

4991. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] What is your trade in Goodge-street; is it a mixed trade?—Yes, a family and chance trade.

4992. I suppose, by what you call chance trade you mean working-class trade?—Working-class trade, and the tradespeople out of Oxford-street and Tottenham Court-road, who come to purchase their own meat; there are a great many private people we serve all about.

4993. The working classes get their meat very much cheaper than families?—They have a different part.

4994. But they do, do they not?—Yes.

4995. Do you think that they got it cheaper by your being able to slaughter your own meat than if you were obliged to go and buy it at Newgate and other markets ready killed?—Yes, upon an average they get it at less per lb. than they would if I had to go to Newgate Market. Sometimes I can go to Newgate Market and get my meat at ½ d. or 1 d. per pound less than I can at others; sometimes it would cost me ½ d. or 1 d. per lb. more; and if I put the average together I can supply the public with meat of my own killing cheaper than I can if I have to go to Newgate Market.

4996. Then you think on the average that is so?—I am certain of it; materially so.

4997. You think your customers get their meat on as good terms as they would otherwise, and that the poorer class get it cheaper?—Yes; I am alluding to the best meat.

4998. Mr. Dent.] With respect to the retail prices of meat at the present moment, what are you charging your customers for the prime part, for the best?—It all depends how the meat is cut. You see you may come to my shop and ask me for the middle of a sirloin of beef and I would cut you the middle of a sirloin of beef. There is a great deal at the top of the sirloin, and you might say to me I want that cut off; you might say, I do not want any suet at all; in that case it would be 11 d. a pound; but if you had it cut right away, suet and all, then I should only charge you 9½ d. You might call for a neck of mutton, and say, I do not want any fat; if you were to say, cut me off all the fat, that would be a very heavy loss to us. Some customers will take meat just as the sheep or bullock grows, fat and bone, in a very different way from others. You might come to me for a piece of salt meat, and there might be a great quantity of bone with it; you might say, what is the price of that; it would be 8 d. to take it in round numbers, but if there is an immense quantity of bone, and you wish that bone cut off, it would be 9½ d. It is, in fact, just how the customers ask for it.

4999. Take ribs or sirloins of beef, as you ordinarily cut them for your customers?—I always cut them short, and many other butchers cut them extremely long.

5000. What do you charge for ribs and sirloins as you cut them?—Tenpence, 10½ d., and 11 d.

5001. What do you charge for legs and loins of mutton?—Tenpence halfpenny at the present time, and in some instances 11 d.; if they will have the fat cut off for every small leg of mutton of 6 lbs., I charge 11 d.

5002. What do you charge for beefsteaks?—Tenpence, 9 d., and 8 d.

5003. What do you charge for veal?—Fillets of veal now are 1 s., and pieces of loins of veal 10 d.

5004. If you want to buy your meat in the dead meat market, you would not buy the entire beasts, such as you sell to the working classes?—Yes, I should for this reason; if I can go to Newgate Market and buy an ox from the head to the tail, and bring it home and sell it all over my board, I have the advantage by buying the whole ox of serving all sorts of customers; I then have the advantage of selling all the other parts, for this reason, I can make more of the coarse parts if the poorer class come to me, than if I were to leave it behind.

5005. Then it would be no disadvantage, so far, to the poorer classes, that you had to buy dead meat than your having to buy live meat, as far as that goes?—No; but I certainly could not sell them the meat as cheap, taking the 12 months through, as I do if I slay my own beasts. I have the advantage of going to the market and looking round and buying my stock as cheap as I can.

5006. You say you have accommodation to tie up so many bullocks; have you accommodation for sheep also?—I have a separate shed for sheep.

5007. How many can you accommodate?—Fifty or 60 sheep. Then, if I have more, you understand, I turn them out into the Park, and say to the drovers, take this lot into the Regent's Park. Except at autumn time, when the beasts come out of the different counties, I then send them into the fields for a short time, three or four days.

5008. If there were public slaughter-houses, a considerable lairage would be required for beasts about those slaughter-houses?—Very large.

5009. It would not be merely the existence of the public slaughter-houses, but you would have to provide large lairage round those slaughter-houses?—Yes; and the great difficulty would be, whether we should be able to tell which was our own stock when 2,000 or 3,000 were together.

Mr. T. Pickworth.

5012. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] But suppose you could not do that?—Then the public must go without being accommodated.

5015. Do you not think that private slaughter-houses need necessarily be a nuisance?—No; I am confident that they are sweeter and cleaner than nine-tenths of the dwellings of the poor people. I am sometimes under the necessity of going into the poor people's dwellings, and their places have sometimes very bad stenches in them, while our slaughter-houses are made sweet and clean. With reference to public slaughter-houses, we should also have the wind and weather to contend with. Supposing we wanted our meat home on a pouring wet morning, and had to drag it through all the streets, see what a mess it would come home in. Then, again, at other times there may be a sharp frost, and if we had to fetch our meat away early in the morning, we could not do it; we should have to wait until the blacksmith got up to rough the horses in the morning before we could go out with them.

5016. Everybody has not got the accommodation behind his house that you have, I dare say?—Most of them have, I should think.

MR. HUNT IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. JOHN SIMON, called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. Simon. 8 June 1866.

5017. Chairman.] YOU are the Medical Officer of the Privy Council?—I am.

5018. Has your attention been at all called to the slaughter-houses in the metropolis, in a sanitary point of view?—Of late years, very little; but before I entered the service of the Government I was officer of health for the City of London, and then I saw a good deal of the system of London slaughtering.

5019. What is your opinion as to the desirability of continuing the present system of private slaughter-houses?—On its merits, I think it most undesirable that it should be continued.

5020. In what points of view do you think it objectionable?—As almost invariably a nuisance; as probably conducing to disease; and as giving facilities which, under a system of public slaughtering, I suppose would be restricted for the sale of bad meat.

5021. You think that the inspection would be more complete if all the animals were brought to public slaughter-houses?—Yes.

5022. There would be a great saving of time, I suppose, in the inspection?—A great saving of time, I should think.

5023. And a greater certainty of no bad meat finding its way to the market?—Yes.

5024. What was the system of inspection at the time when you had to do with it?—As I came here to-day without knowing on what points I should be examined, I have not looked up these matters, and may not be quite accurate in details; but, to the best of my recollection, the system was this: There was inspection of two sorts; on the one hand, of markets and matters exposed in them; and, on the other hand, of slaughter-houses and their contents. These inspections, at least to some extent, were in different hands. The inspection of slaughter-houses went wholly or chiefly with the district inspection of nuisances, and in practice scarcely, if at all, extended beyond questions of nuisance in the slaughtering, though the title of the officer was "inspector of slaughter-houses and meat," the City markets were at least in part inspected by other officers, who were not inspectors of nuisances. Reports of condemned meat were, in those days, not made to the officer of health, but to the clerk of the Commissioners.

5025. Was any notice required to the inspector when an animal was to be slaughtered?—No.

5026. Then how did an inspector find out when he had to visit a slaughter-house for the purpose of inspecting the carcase?—I believe that, practically, there was little or no inspection of meat till it was in market as exposed meat.

5027. There is no inspection of an animal immediately upon slaughter?—Of systematic inspection of that sort, I believe there was none.

5028. So that unless he could find any meat exposed for sale he could not be able to check the sale of improper meat?—I think not.

5029. Do you think a great quantity of meat unfit for human food has been sold in consequence of the Act being couched in those terms?—The Act under which these proceedings were taken (the City Sewers Act, 1851) was not in fault. Not particularly in the City, but generally, I dare say that a great deal of meat has been sold that I myself should be very sorry to eat. But, by "meat unfit for human food," no doubt you mean, particularly, meat apt to produce disease in those who consume it.

5030. Certainly?—I doubt if a great deal of such meat has been sold, owing to mere non-inspection of the process of slaughtering.

5031. You think that the inspection, so far, has been efficient in preventing a great deal of meat being sold, which was likely to cause disease?—The greatest activity shown in the City used to be in the stoppage of semi-putrid, or quite putrid meat.

5032. That is, the meat of healthy animals which has been kept too long?—Yes.

5033. Is the consumption of food, in a state of putridity, necessarily prejudicial to the human race?—Many people know, by their own experience of venison eating, and of game eating, that to eat meat which is "high" is not apt to be fatal to life, but it would disagree with some people, and of course the effect varies according to the degree and quality of the decomposition. There are some decompositions which are particularly apt to be injurious, and some meats which are particularly subject to injurious decomposition; as veal and pork.

5034. All the white meats, in fact?—I think some of them are peculiarly apt to get a dangerous kind of putrescence.

5035. But still any unprofessional person can at once detect meat of that kind by the smell?—Yes, certainly.

5036. It does not require professional inspection in order to secure the public against eating meat that is unwholesome from that cause?—No, I think not.

5037. Do you think that other than putrid meat has been sold to the detriment of human health, in the metropolis, under the present system of inspection; meat of diseased animals?—Animals, more or less diseased by the presence of parasites in their flesh or internal organs, are consumed somewhat considerably in England, and, in some cases, to the detriment of human health. The metropolis no doubt has its share of this.

Mr. J. Simon.

8 June 1866.

5038. Is that in pork, or in all meat?—Not exclusively in pork.

5039. Is that the trichina?—The trichina has hitherto made very little way in this country. My remark would apply rather to measly pork, but of course the trichina, where it exists, is of very serious danger under some circumstances. Hitherto it has been very little known in this country.

5040. You think there is a great deal of measly pork in the country?—Yes; I believe there is no doubt about that.

5041. You think that a great deal of measly pork is sold for human food in this metropolis?—Probably a good deal is sold, but not necessarily sold in a state in which it can injure health. In the first place, probably, a considerable proportion of the measly pork that is sold is sold in the state of ham and bacon, in which, very commonly, the parasites will have been killed by the process of preparation; in other cases, I should think that generally they are killed by the process of cooking; generally, but not universally.

5042. You think that in the case of cured ham and bacon, that, if properly cured, the curing destroys the ill effect of the disease in the pig?—It tends that way.

5043. With regard to the fresh meat of pigs, if it is properly cooked, that entirely destroys it?—If it is thoroughly cooked.

5044. With regard to any other kind of meat, do you think that meat in a state of parasitic disease, other than pork, is sold to a very great extent?—I think not, to a great extent; that it is to some extent, is certain. As a rule, every human being who has a tapeworm has got his tapeworm by swallowing a bit of meat (pork or other meat) with a parasite in it.

5045. There is no parasitic worm peculiar to the human body?—Certainly not, in the sense of spontaneous generability there.

5046. You think, on the whole, that the inspection of meat in the metropolis is tolerably satisfactory?—Well, I am not quite prepared to say that; but the dangers to be guarded against are avoided in accidental ways independently of the inspection. If trichina were prevalent among our pigs, the public would not have the smallest security against the sale of trichinous pork.

5048. And, therefore, from the mode of preparing their food, they are peculiarly liable to it?—Yes; that is to say, if there is a trichinous pig, they do not go the way to escape being injured by it. The most thorough cooking of all pork is the best popular safeguard against such accidents. In Germany there have been epidemics affecting scores of persons at once from the consumption of a single trichinous pig.

5049. Do you think, when cholera is prevalent, that the eating of putrid meat is liable to give a tendency to take the complaint?—It will tend to loosen the bowels. To take in putrid material, whether by breathing or by eating; either to breathe putridity, or to eat putridity; is apt to produce diarrhœa, which probably may be looked upon as giving facilities to cholera.

5050. Then, you think, supposing we had a great introduction of this trichinal disease into this country, there is no effectual protection against it?—In inspection, certainly not.

5051. Do you think the requiring all animals to be slaughtered, either at public slaughter-houses or licensed slaughter-houses, would conduce to a better inspection?—Yes, considerably. The examination of separate establishments in detail would, I should think, be very difficult; but if all slaughterings were brought to one establishment for each town, probably there would be no impracticable difficulty in the inspection.

5052. Have you at all considered what would be the requirements of the metropolis in the market?—No, I have not.

5053. You are not able to give us your opinion as to how many slaughter-houses would be wanted in different parts?—No, I am not.

5054. You have been examined, I think, by the Cattle Plague Commissioners?—Yes.

5055. In which report does your evidence appear?—In the First Report.

5056. Have you given any attention to the question of the treatment of the animals on board ship that are imported into this country?—I have never seen the unloading of a cattle ship myself; but I have looked at the evidence on the subject.

5057. Do you consider at all that the animals are predispoed to any disease to which they are subject, by reason of the condition they acquire on board these vessels?—That they must come over very often in a state of illness, I can hardly doubt, when I consider the crowding, the bruising, and the (to some extent, perhaps, inevitable) filth. The sufferings of the animals are said to be very great in some of the passages from the Continent.

5058. Have you any suggestion to make as to any regulations which could be adopted to prevent that state of things continuing?—Only in very general terms. I suppose if the cattle trade were to be regulated, that the conveyance of animals by ships would be included in the system of regulations. As to the detail of regulations, I have not considered the matter.

5059. Sir M. W. Ridley.] Have you had opportunity yourself of observing the condition of the animals and carcases that have come damaged, and in a condition likely to be bad for food from foreign ports in vessels?—No; not on a scale that would make my evidence worth quoting.

5060. Then what you state is more the impression on your mind as to what the state of things actually is, than conclusions you have arrived at from a personal inspection?—Quite so.

much ill-effect depends on the one, and so much depends on the other nuisance; but the slaughter-houses were very much complained of when I had to do with the City.

5062. By those living in their neighbourhood, do you mean?—Yes.

5063. Have you noticed that these slaughter-houses are ever placed in immediate contiguity with rooms in which people dwell?—My impression is, that I remember plenty of such instances in the City. I am speaking now of what I have not looked at for 11 years, but I believe there is no doubt of it.

5066. Was there sufficient or reasonable care taken to purify those slaughter-houses as far as your recollection serves you?—They stank intolerably.

5067. Were there no disinfectants used?—At intervals, under the regulations of the authorities which were brought to bear upon them, white-washing was practised; but it was not a matter of daily practice to use disinfectants.

5068. Has yours been a professional practice?—I am a surgeon.

5070. Are you aware whether they are under a better system at this moment?—In the city no doubt they are, and in other parts of London, where there are active officers of health. For the last 10 years the metropolis has had officers of health, and many parts of London have been greatly improved. In the days when I was in the city there was no other officer of health in London.

5071. Have you visited any public abattoirs?—No.

5072. Not at Paris?—No; I never visited them at Paris.

5073. Mr. Banks Stanhope.] Do you know anything of the foreign cattle that come into London at all, or whether they have to any extent introduced the disease?—On an occasion, some three years ago, when I went up to the cattle market, in order to observe the state of the beasts, I saw several animals that were unquestionably diseased.

5074. I am now talking of the rinderpest more especially?—No, I did not mean that.

5075. Have you ever directed your attention to any means of preventing the disease?—Yes; I have thought on that subject. We have been protected for a number of years against steppe-murrain by the quarantine regulations and vigilant stamping-out system of countries which are between us and Russia. At last that safety for us has broken down, and we must accept, as the result, that steppe-murrain will settle itself in this country, or that we must make up by other means for the absence of our former safeguard.

5076. I understand you mean, by the absence of quarantine, that they go through the intervening countries by railway now?—Partly, I suppose that to be the case, and also that there has been some direct importation from Russia.

5077. There was one cargo, was there not?—So I understand.

5078. Then you consider that without some change in our system we should always be in danger of what you call a steppe-murrain or rinderpest being introduced?—I have no doubt of it.

5079. Have you ever turned your attention to the feasibility of animals being slaughtered where they are landed, that is, on the banks of the Thames?—I have thought of it; not as a skilled person, because I have not skill in the sort of commissariat questions which have here to be considered; but looking at it so far as it is a medical question, it has seemed to me that that is what ought to be aimed at in respect of animals brought over for immediate consumption.

5080. Do you think that unless that system is adopted we shall be in danger of the rinderpest coming in?—Yes.

5081. Then, in a medical point of view, you think that killing the animals actually at the port of landing is absolutely necessary?—Yes, I think so.

5082. With regard to store animals, are there any means you can suggest, in a medical point of view, of preventing their spreading the disease through England?—Quarantine.

5083. For how many days do you consider, in a medical point of view, that quarantine ought to last?—The principle of quarantine is that the quarantined creature, man or beast, as the case may be, shall be detained and excluded till it has passed under observation, in perfect unsuspicious circumstances, and without showing any symptoms of the disease in question, at least as many days as the disease has days of incubation. There is the principle. Then as regards the incubation-time of steppe-murrain, scientific examiners would probably always pronounce with certainty, after six days' observation, as to the absence or presence of the disease; but unskilled observers would require a longer time. Continental observers seem not to approve of less than 10 days; but a quarantine of this sort would be the minimum; for you have to take into account a further point. If, among the store animals that are under quarantine observation, there breaks out a case of disease, then, of course, for all the other animals, the period of observation has to recommence. Suppose, that on a given Monday morning you find that one store animal out of 20, which you have in quarantine, is showing symptoms of the disease, you do not know but that in the few hours which have elapsed since the last examination, it may not have infected all the other 19; and you cannot tell that for some days at least.

Mr. J. Simon.

5084. Then, in your opinion, if a certain number of fat beasts were brought over and slaughtered in apparently good health, there would be great danger in allowing the store cattle which came over with them to be distributed through England or through the metropolis, unless we had a quarantine?—Certainly.

5085. You naturally do not know where you could quarantine animals. You have not directed your attention at all to it?—No, I have not.

5086. No quarantine on the other side would be available in the same way, would it. A certificate that the animals at the port of embarkation had been kept a certain number of days and were then pronounced free of disease would be of no use?—The trustworthiness of certificates is hardly a medical question, perhaps; but I suppose they are very slippery things to deal with, are they not?

5087. Yes, very slippery?—I should not expect it would answer if you quarantined on the other side of the water, and there would be chances of another kind. You could not always guarantee the non-infectedness of the ships which would convey the cattle.

5088. I presume that you would see extreme danger in foreign cattle being taken from the metropolitan market, or any large market, and English cattle being allowed to mix with them, and to go again into the country with the chance of propagating the disease?—Unquarantined foreign animals in the cattle market, you mean?

5089. Yes; if it were done without quarantine?—Certainly.

5090. Then quarantine, and killing them at the port of entry are absolutely necessary in a medical point of view, in your opinion?—Quite.

5091. And unless that is done we shall never be safe against the disease?—Never.

5092. Mr. Holland.] Do you happen to have studied the history of the former visit of the disease to this country?—Yes, I have read it all. I have not chapter and verse at my fingers' ends at present.

5093. It existed here, I believe, for about 12 years, did it not?—Yes.

5094. You have not studied its progress during those 12 years; what caused it at last to disappear?—A very active system of killing, and disinfection; what is called, now-a-days, "stamping out." Of course in those days the facilities for the diffusion of infection in the country were much less than they are now.

5095. The O'Conor Don.] When you say that all fat cattle ought to be slaughtered upon arrival in any port in this country, do you extend that remark to foreign cattle, no matter from what country they come, whether from a country that has the rinderpest, or has it not?—I understood the question to refer to the parts of the continent of Europe, where rinderpest prevails or is likely to prevail. I did not understand it to apply to unsuspected countries.

5096. Your answer to Mr. Banks Stanhope then applies to cattle coming from infected countries?—To infected or suspected countries.

5097. Mr. Carnegie.] Would you consider that cattle coming over from any German or Dutch ports, though there is no disease either in Germany or Holland, should be liable to quarantine on account of the possibility of their having come from Hungary?—The practical answer to that, I suppose, would depend upon what the regulations of traffic between Holland and the countries across Germany might be.

5099. Would you slaughter them if they were store animals; would you slaughter them whether they were fat or lean?—I suppose that is a matter on which generally some option might be given to the owner. If he were willing to incur the expense of letting the animals go through a fresh period of quarantine, it might, I suppose, be allowed.

5100. Mr. Banks Stanhope.] You were asked a question whether you would only have these rules as to quarantining or killing animals at the waterside, coming from infected countries?—Infected or suspected.

5101. What I understood you to say was, that that danger consists in the country where the port of embarkation is not having the same regulation that it had before to prevent infected cattle coming in?—That is it.

5102. Therefore you would have to look beyond the country where the port of embarkation is, in order to prevent infected cattle coming?—Yes; the healthy state of the port may be quite unimportant.

5103. That is to say, practically it would affect the principal German traffic?—Yes.

5104. Whatever the port might be?—Whatever the port might be.

5105. It would not affect Spain and Portugal?—Not unless they were suspected of infection.

5106. I understand you to say that quarantine should be universal in the case of all store cattle which come from the Continent, where there may be a chance of infection?—Yes.

5108. At the present time animals coming from these countries pass through land without any sufficient security against the bringing disease with with them? — Apparently so; from Eastern Europe.

5109. For that reason you think that even if Holland had no steppe-murrain within its boundaries, you must proscribe cattle coming within those ports?—Yes.

5110. Would you wish to leave it with the Privy Council to decide what countries should be quarantined?—I should think so. I hardly see how quarantine could be worked otherwise. If the statute were inflexible on the subject the case would hardly be met. Sometimes inconvenience would be caused which might be avoided.

5111. Have you given your attention at all to the arrangements that would be necessary for carrying out any system of quarantine at the ports with regard to where the animals should be kept and how they should be isolated, and so on? —The establishments would be on the same principle as the lazaret establishments that are provided for human quarantine.

5112. I mean, have you considered where a quarantine market or lairage could be provided in London, for instance?—No, I have not considered that.

5113. Lord Naas.] Would it be necessary, in case that plan were carried out with regard to the quarantining of certain countries, to have a certificate of origin sent with the cattle. Supposing the embarkation of cattle was interdicted from certain portions of Europe, would it not be necessary then to have certificates of origin, for healthy cattle to be allowed to come in?—I do not know how the Customs would work it.

5115. But as to cattle that were sent to ports of non-infected countries, would it not be necessary to have some certificate from them that they came from countries that were free from disease? —Would not the length of the voyage practically settle the question?

5116. I am not talking about the voyage; I am talking about the cattle that are brought from the interior of Europe to the port of embarkation. How would you show that they did not come from the infected countries?—I should assume that they did in all cases, unless the country which shipped them could show, first, that it had no disease among its own herds; and, secondly, that it had a thoroughly efficient quarantine system in regard of all suspected countries from which it admitted passage of cattle.

5117. Then in case the intermediate country did not take those precautions you would then be obliged to extend the restrictions to all cattle coming through that country?—Quite so.

5118. Then in case of an exporting district refusing to carry out measures of inspection and inquiry which might be thought necessary by our Privy Council, it would be necessary to carry out your plan, to get the Privy Council to interdict all cattle coming from that country?—Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM SLATER, called in; and Examined.

5119. Chairman.] YOU are a butcher in Jermyn-street?—Yes. Mr. W. Slater.

5120. Do you slaughter your own animals? — Not at Jermyn-street; my brother has a slaughter-house at Kensington.

5121. Do you depend for your supply upon the animals that are killed in that slaughter-house, or do you purchase in the dead-meat market?—We purchase in the dead-meat market to a large extent, but in very warm weather we depend chiefly upon our own slaughter-house.

5122. When the prohibition, by Act of Parliament, against the movement of cattle by railway was in force, did you experience any difficulty in getting a supply?—Yes, slight. There was a difficulty certainly.

5123. Were you driven more to the dead-meat market then?—Yes, much more.

5124. Do you kill principally home-fed, or foreign animals?—All home-fed; no foreign.

5125. Do you find that many butchers are in the habit of buying both foreign and home-fed beasts?—No; I think the trades are distinct. The West-end trades are home-fed trades.

5126. Does a different class of butchers buy the foreign animals?—Yes. We cannot buy them at all.

5127. Do you yourself attend the Islington Market? — I do not attend it personally. My brother, who is in business at Kensington attends it, and also my partner. Our firm is Slater & Cooke.

5128. Do you think it would be prejudicial to the trade if the foreign and English market were distinct. Supposing there was a foreign cattle market down by the river side, and that imported beasts were not allowed to come into the Islington Market; do you think that that would be prejudicial to the trade? — To the West-end butchers, do you mean?

5129. We will take the West-end butchers. Would it be at all prejudicial to the West-end trade?—You see, the prices are quoted together, and the prices for the best home-fed English meat are never quoted sufficiently high. The public take from these quotations a price which is not at all near the mark.

5130. But supposing that you had two distinct markets, one for foreign animals, and the other for English, and that each was quoted distinctly, according to the prices of the day, should you see then any objection to the West-end trade having such a separate market?—I do not, if held on different days.

5131. Do you think it would be prejudicial to the butchers at the East-end of the town?—Not being in the foreign trade, I cannot answer the question.

5132. Can you tell us how the quotations are obtained?—I have heard that certain gentlemen go to one or two of the salesmen, and get the quotations of the prices of the markets; gentlemen interested in the newspapers.

5133. You think that those who are interested in the newspapers depend on the salesmen for the prices?—Just so.

5134. And that those prices are not communicated to the buyers?—Quite so.

5135. Does that operate injuriously on the buyers, do you think?—It operates injuriously to the sellers of the meat, namely, the butchers.

5136. I speak of the butchers as the buyers of the the live stock; do you think it is injurious to them?—Yes.

5137. Do you think it injurious to the owners of the cattle which are sent up to the salesmen?—No doubt. If the price is not quoted correctly, of course it must be.

5138. You think it tends to mislead the owners of stock in the country?—Yes.

5139. Have you any suggestion to make as to how the prices could be ascertained with more correctness?—I believe there is a clerk of the market, and I think if he got three or four butchers, and three or four salesmen, to give the prices, that would be the best way.

5140. Would you have a sort of committee of each to give the prices, or would you require them to go to the clerk of the market and give him information?—I think that the clerk of the market might make it his business to obtain of five or six butchers their opinion.

5141. At present it is entirely in the hands of the newspaper agents?—I believe so.

5142. The newspapers employ persons to ascertain the prices for them?—Just so.

5143. Why do you suppose that these gentlemen, who are employed by the newspapers, do not go to the butchers?—They have not been in the habit of doing so.

5144. Can you give me any reason why they go to the salesmen?—The salesmen are always on the spot, and they do not, perhaps, know where to find the butchers.

5145. Do you buy any meat in the dead-meat market, which comes from the country ready killed?—Yes.

5146. Have you been in the habit of doing so for long?—Yes.

5147. For many years?—Yes. Our firm has done so for many years.

5148. Do you continue that practice throughout all the summer months?—When we are able to do so. For the last three days we have not been able to buy any good Scotch beef.

5149. Not in the dead-meat market?—Not in the dead-meat market.

5150. In consequence of the state of the weather?—I expect so.

5151. You have found none exposed for sale?—There has been none exposed for sale good enough.

5152. You have found some, but nothing good enough for your customers?—I think there has been very little.

5153. Do you think, that during the hottest days, there is a difficulty in supplying the dead-meat market from the country?—Just so.

5154. Where does the meat that you purchase principally come from?—From Scotland.

5155. Do you go yourself to the dead-meat market to buy?—Occasionally, or my partner.

5156. Do you hear complaints from the salesmen there, as to the meat having been spoilt in coming?—We can see sometimes that it is not in such good order as at others. Sometimes we try it, and it will not do.

5157. Independently of that which is exposed for sale, and which you say within the last few days has not been good enough for you, do you hear complaints of any that is so bad that they cannot expose it for sale?—No, I have not heard. I do not think the meat has come during the last few days.

5158. You think they have not sent it?—No.

5159. Mr. Carnegie.] Has there been any meat sent from Scotland at all during the last few days?—Very little, in comparison to what we usually get.

5160. Chairman.] Do you think it depends on the judgment of the people at the other end, whether they send it, or whether they are advised by the people at the market?—The telegraph is very much used, I believe.

5161. You go to Newgate Market?—To Newgate Market.

5162. Is this meat consigned to salesmen at Newgate Market, on account of the senders, or is it purchased by carcase butchers on their own account?—It is consigned to salesmen, and the buyers buy it in the market.

5163. In Scotland they consign it to salesmen to sell on account of the senders?—I believe that there are men in Scotland who go round and buy, and kill and send to the salesmen at Newgate Market.

5164. It is consigned to Newgate Market on account of the owners in the country, is it not?—I believe so.

5165. Then that being the case, I suppose it would rest with them in the country, to decide upon whether they would send up a quantity of meat or not?—Just so.

5166. Have you considered the question of having public slaughter-houses in the metropolis, instead of private slaughter-houses?—I think from our own trade, that we could not do without private ones in the very hot summer weather. Monday would be a very awkward day.

5167. Supposing you had a public slaughter-house at Kensington, that would be almost as convenient for you as your own private slaughter-house?—There is not that care taken in public slaughter-houses that there is in private slaughter-houses.

5168. Are you acquainted with any public slaughter-house?—Yes, I have been to them, and seen the meat that has been slaughtered there.

5169. Where?—I have been to Copenhagen Fields.

5170. Have you ever had beasts slaughtered there by any of your men?—No.

5171. You have never been in the public slaughter-houses at Edinburgh?—No.

5172. Or at Paris?—No.

5173. Sir M. W. Ridley.] If public slaughter-houses were established in districts, would the west-end trade not employ their own men to do their own work, renting the slaughter-houses or paying so much per head, and have their animals killed and dressed by their own people at no greater expense than they are at now?—No, it is the supervision of the master's eye that is necessary. It is very different to having slaughter-houses on the spot.

5174. The one on your premises at which you have a large quantity of meat is in Jermyn-street?—No slaughter-house in Jermyn-street.

5175. It would be no more trouble to you to remove your meat from the public slaughter-house, if there was one established at Kensington, to Jermyn-street, than from your own; it is about the same distance?—But there is my brother at Kensington, who is part owner.

5176. You have an establishment there?—Yes.

5177. So that your brother is on the spot?—Yes.

5178. At present the meat that you are supplying plying to your customers is all fresh killed; animals that you buy in the market?—Not all.

5179. You still have some dead meat?—We still have some dead meat sent to us.

5181. Have you not known slaughtering carried on in situations very contiguous to dwellings, so as to be in all probability very prejudicial to health?—Not in the suburbs.

5182. Have you not known any in your own immediate neighbourhood?—No, I do not know of any.

5183. Have you known or seen the slaughter-house attached to a shop that existed a very few years ago nearly opposite St. James's Church?—Yes; that is some years ago; I know where it was.

5184. Are you aware that the sheep were decoyed into that shop by a familiar of the man who conducted the business, that he went out into the street when they were brought from the Park, or wherever they came from, that they followed him in and were then shot down a ladder, or something like that, and slaughtered immediately on the premises at the back, and over which the dwelling-rooms of the house were situated?—I believe that was the case, but it is all done away with now.

5185. Surely you would think that plan very objectionable?—I think any slaughter-house under a dwelling or in a cellar would be wrong.

5186. Where does the best meat that you buy, the best dressed and killed, come from?—We buy the Scotch meat, and the Bury meat, in Norfolk and Suffolk; what is termed in the market Bury meat.

5187. That is the best?—Yes.

5189. Where do you get your cattle for slaughtering?—Chiefly privately, but we go to the large markets sometimes. Of course we have a large private connection, and when gentlemen have many beasts ready they write to tell us.

5190. Where do you principally get them from?—Lord Talbot and Shrewsbury is a very large sender.

5191. You get them from all parts of the country?—From all parts of the country; they are Scots, Herefords, and Devons.

5192. Do you find any greater difficulty in getting prime beasts now than you had formerly?—We still get them, but the price is dear. We are paying more for beef.

5193. Do you think there are fewer of them?—I suppose there must be fewer beasts in the country.

Mr. W. Slater.

8 June 1866.

5194. With regard to sheep, do you buy any dead meat in sheep, or do you entirely kill your own?—We buy some of them dead.

5195. Has it ever occurred to you to be unable to buy dead meat in the hot weather fit for your customers?—Yes, we have; that is where the great thing is. Sometimes we want to stock our shop in warm weather, and when we go to Newgate Market we cannot get it; but we must have our own slaughter-house, and the live market to fall back upon.

5196. How long would it take you to get meat from Scotland by telegraphing?—I have not studied that. We do not know anything about the consignees. It is the Newgate Market salesman's business to get the meat there.

5197. You have no direct communication with any of the Aberdeen butchers?—We have no direct communication with Scotland.

5198. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Do you get any Welsh mutton up dead?—Only the hind quarter, no whole sheep. Chiefly hind quarters of Welsh mutton.

5199. Sir M. W. Ridley] How many beasts and sheep do you kill on the average in a week?—At Kensington, in the slaughter-house, about 20 beasts, and nearly 200 sheep.

5200. Is that your only slaughter-house?—That is our only slaughter-house; but we depend so much upon others; for instance, to-day is Friday, we shall require a lot of roasting beef in to-night for to-morrow; perhaps, the roasting out of 20 or 25 beasts. That we get from private slaughter-houses. We dare not trust to Newgate Market to-morrow morning, and, therefore, we must get private butchers to let us have their roasting beef.

5201. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] You mean the prime beef?—Yes, the best.

5202. And, therefore, you buy from other butchers?—Yes. We sell so much prime meat, in comparison to what we sell of coarse meat. Our trade is chiefly in the prime parts, and we have to depend on the roasting beef from private butchers, and the private slaughter-houses.

5203. Sir M. W. Ridley.] You say it would be impossible for the West-end butchers to supply their customers and carry on their trade without the existence of private slaughter-houses?—I believe so.

5204. That the butchers of large practice like yourself must either have his own private slaughter-house, or must go to the butchers who have private slaughter-houses, and from them buy that which is to meet the emergency of the close of the week, or any special occasion?—Yes; we have to depend upon others who can supply us.

5205. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Do you think the foreign beasts in the metropolitan market keep the price of English meat down?—They do in a measure, no doubt.

5206. Do you think that if the foreign beasts were sold in another market that would affect the price, and equally keep the price down in the metropolitan market?—Yes; according to the supply, so the prices would be regulated.

5207. We have been told that if the markets were separated it would not keep the price down in the same way as at present; you do not think it would have that effect; as long as the cattle come into the country you do not think it matters whether they are slaughtered and exposed in a separate market, or whether they are sold in the metropolitan market?—I think it is the opinion that one market would be better.

8 June 1866.

5208. For what reason?—It makes one place for all butchers to come to select. There are butchers who buy of both, and of course it would be inconvenient to them.

Mr. JOHN BANNISTER, called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. Bannister.

5209. Chairman.] You are a City butcher?—Yes.

5210. Is yours a wholesale or a retail trade?—A retail trade.

5211. Where do you depend upon for your supply?—The dead-meat markets.

5212. Entirely?—Entirely.

5213. Do you purchase the meat of home-fed or foreign beasts principally?—Home-fed; not foreign: both country and town-killed meat.

5214. You purchase of the salesmen in Newgate Market?—Yes, and Leadenhall; and sometimes from private slaughter-houses.

5215. Are you aware of the Act of Parliament, passed on the 20th of February, prohibiting cattle being removed by rail for some time?—Yes.

5216. Did you discover that that had any influence on the supply of meat at Newgate and Leadenhall Markets?—I think so; I think it made it dearer.

5217. Had you to give a higher price for your meat?—Decidedly.

5218. Do you know when the restriction came to an end?—I think, within a few weeks only.

5219. Was it on the 16th of April?—On the 16th of April; it was confined to the metropolitan districts then; everything was brought in, but nothing allowed to go out of the metropolitan districts.

5220. Between the 20th of February and the 16th of April no live stock could be moved by rail through the country?—No.

5221. After the restriction came to an end, did you find the price of meat at all lower in the market?—I think not, in consequence of its being a time of year in which the markets are badly supplied; at this time of year they are always very short; there is a greater demand and less stock at this time of year than any other.

5222. Has meat risen during the months of May and June?—Very much; I have given as high as 10½*d.* per lb. for hind quarters of mutton, and 11*d.* for legs, for great quantities of them, in Newgate Market.

5223. Is the meat that you buy principally from the country, or is it town killed?—Both town killed and country killed.

5224. Which is the greater part?—I like the country-killed meat if I can get it.

5225. Why do you prefer the country-killed meat?—We fancy it eats better. Most of the meat is killed in Scotland, and the Bury sheep are generally of a very excellent quality, killed in Bury and sent up dead; some from Devonshire and various parts of the country. We fancy the country meat eats better than town-killed meat.

5226. Is that in consequence of the animal being cool when it is killed?—I think so.

5227. At this time of year when the weather is as hot as it is to-day, is it possible for meat to be sent up?—Not at all; it was a very short market this morning in consequence of the state of the weather. I am driven to the town-killed meat for two or three months of the summer weather from necessity.

5228. Does that raise the price of the town-killed meat?—Great portions of it. The hinder parts and the prime parts of the animal make a much larger price.

5229. Lord Naas.] Is there a proportionate reduction in the inferior parts?—Decidedly. There is not the demand for the inferior parts at the earlier part of the week, because those parts are eaten more by the poor people who can only purchase meat at the end of the week. At the earlier parts of the week the prime parts are very dear in consequence of their not being able to sell the inferior parts.

5230. Chairman.] Does the meat get at all damaged in appearance by being packed and sent up by rail?—Yes; it does not look as well as town-killed meat.

5231. Is that the case both with beef and mutton?—Both.

5232. Do your customers object to it on that account?—Not at all; they are used to it. They know country meat as well as I do, and always prefer it if they can get it.

5233. Is there more difficulty in packing the beef in hot weather?—In some parts the beef will not bear packing in very hot weather. During nine months of the year they may pack it, and send it from almost any place, but during the three months of hot weather it is almost impossible to send it in a fit state and properly packed for the dead-meat market. I have seen quantities of carcases of animals taken out of the cloths as green as possible.

5234. Have you seen any of the meat vans which are in use on some of the lines?—I have heard of them, but I have not seen them.

5235. Have you ever seen any meat come up in them?—Yes, in very good condition.

5236. Does it come in better condition than the meat that is packed in cloths and hampers?—It looks cleaner.

5237. Do you think if the system were adopted on all the railways it would lead to your having meat up in better condition?—I think it would, during certain months of the year.

5238. Do you know anything about the way in which the newspapers obtain the price of the markets?—I have merely heard from hearsay that they go round to the various salesmen at the markets, and obtain the prices from them. It is a very imperfect way of doing it, I think.

5239. We are told that it is not accurate Is it generally inaccurate by reason of the price being stated too low?—Frequently so.

5240. Do you ever find that the prices are quoted too high?—No.

5241. The fault is always on the side of their being stated too low?—I think so, 5242. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Do you think that an average could be struck between the highest and the lowest price?—The highest priced meat fetches so much more than the middle-class meat that of course that is the best price. As it is stated in the papers, it is impossible for the public to get at the real state of the case.

5243. Do you think that the highest price or the lowest price should be quoted, or that an average should be struck between the two?—Hardly an average. I think rather the second quality of animals.

5245. Then how would you like to see the quotations made?—I think the fairest way would be to have a committee consisting of butchers and salesmen, and let them arrange the prices, or let the parties whose duty it is to go to the butchers, ask clearly and positively from both parties their opinion of the price.

5246. You think your customers are misled by the prices that are quoted in the papers?—No doubt of it. They merely take the 4*s.* 8*d.* per stone as the real value of the meat they consume, forgetting it is quoted as the price of the whole carcase; and the 4*s.* 8*d.* for the whole carcase may bring the parts they consume to 6*s.*, or 6*s.* 4*d.* or 6*s.* 8*d.*

5247. Then taking it at that, you get the offal in for nothing?—Taking it at the price they assert, decidedly so.

5249. For meat to be kept properly it ought to be killed when the animal is cool; it ought to be kept afterwards until properly set, then the inside ought to be wiped quite dry, and then it ought to be carefully packed with cloths round each side of the animal, or each carcase, as the case may be?—Yes; round each side of the animal. They are very expert at Saffron Walden, in Essex, in packing calves in that way. They come in as fair a quality as if they were killed in town.

5250. Have you ever been in the habit of buying live animals in the market?—Yes; I did when I first came to London, in some quantity.

5251. That was in the old Smithfield Market?—That was in the old Smithfield Market; I was living in Threadneedle-street at the time, with a slaughter-house in Norton Folgate, nearly a mile distant. It was so inconvenient that I was obliged to give it up, and was driven into the dead-meat markets.

5252. Have you any opinion as to the desirability of having public slaughter-houses?—I think they would do exceedingly well during nine or ten months of the year. I have no objection to public slaughter-houses at all, as far as I am concerned, but I think that to many of the West-end people it would be almost their ruin.

Mr. J. Bannister. 8 June 1866.

5253. Would it be their ruin if they had public slaughter-houses in their part of town?—Yes; I think there would be such a congregation of butchers and butchers' men, that they would get immensely robbed by the parties who frequented the public slaughter-houses, because there are many persons who have no business at all there; and that is winked at by the men, and a great deal of property is lost, no doubt.

5254. But do you not think if public slaughter-houses were established the trade would re-arrange itself, and that one man would become a slaughtering butcher, and the other a retail butcher?—We have that now.

5255. But would it not be the case to a greater extent than it is at present; we have had witnesses here who depend partly upon what they slaughter themselves, and partly on Newgate Market; do you not think if the public system was established, that the trade would be more completely divided?—I think you would destroy competition, and that senders would not get so much money for their goods; competition is the great thing, no doubt. One market for all descriptions of meat, and everybody to go to it, is I think the best for the seller and the consumer.

5256. Do you think that the foreign cattle compete at all with the English cattle in the market?—They are getting very much better than they were, and we have had some of the French beasts, extremely fine animals; if they continue to improve they may compete with the English, no doubt.

5257. Up to this year the foreign cattle have been purchased by a different class of purchasers to the English?—Yes, they have; they are very much improving; they send them now as steers, instead of working them 10 or 12 years; they send them as steers of four or five years old.

5258. Sir M. W. Ridley.] Is that from France?—From the south of France. We have some very fine beasts from Jutland.

5259. Chairman.] Do they not work their beasts so much as they used to do?—No, there is a good market for the beasts; I have seen as much as 40 guineas a-piece give for the foreign beasts.

5260. They can turn their beasts now to much better account than working them?—Yes.

5261. Sir M. W. Ridley.] With respect to the market prices which were given in, the Committee were told the other day that the hour at which those prices were given in was too early, about nine o'clock in the morning?—Yes, when they cannot judge of them; it is too early, there is no doubt about that.

5262. Have you ever had dead meat consigned to you from the west of England, by the Great Western Railway, by which, we are told, a great deal of meat is brought to London?—I have not. I always attend the public markets. I have many friends who send to me, but I advise them to send it all to the market; there the meat fetches a fair price, and they get their money directly, and it is the best place for them to send it to, I think.

5263. Do you find that the quantity of foreign cattle now sent over for slaughter is diminishing; is your supply restricted at all?—I do not know much of the foreign cattle, I buy so little of it; perhaps I buy a little roasting beef now and then, then, but nothing more; they are very good and young.

Mr. J. Bannister.
8 June 1866.

5265. Mr. Carnegie.] Do you have any direct dealings with Scotland?—None.

5266. Is there any Scotch meat in the dead-market now?—There was a little this morning, but very little. The hot weather made them afraid to send it.

5267. Do you think it is entirely the fear of the hot weather, or is it owing to the fact that in Aberdeenshire the cattle are fed principally, during the winter, on the turnips, and not so much in the summer, but on grass?—I think the weather is the reason why we do not have the country meat in. Scotland is the best place for it, it is so very cold. There it sets very quickly, before it is sent away. We never get the meat in such good condition as we do out of Scotland.

5268. Mr. Holland.] I think you said you commenced first of all as a live-stock butcher?—Yes, I bought some dead and some alive.

5269. At that time you say your slaughter-house was a mile from your place of business; but that you found to be so inconvenient that you gave it up?—I did. When I wanted my men they were at the slaughter-house; and some parties there, who used to watch them, said the things used to be taken away. I was robbed very much.

5270. Do you imagine in a public slaughter-house there would be the same thing going on?—Yes, it would be very injurious, I think.

5271. Lord Naas.] As to these private slaughter-houses, is there a trade that is conducted by people who buy the beasts alive and kill them, and sell them again to the retail trade?—Some do. There are men called carcase men, who go to the markets and purchase beasts of every description, the best Scots and the best Herefords, and the best foreign beasts they can find. They will vend it to various classes of people. Their business is to keep an immensely large slaughter-house, where their animals are slaughtered and dressed, and sent to the public market for sale, and they will serve private butchers with any part they want.

5272. Do these carcase men generally send their meat to Newgate or Leadenhall Markets, or do they sell it directly to the retail butchers?—They send it more to the market than direct to the retail butcher. Some there are who serve retail butchers with what they require, but in very few cases.

5273. Where are these large private slaughter-houses situated?—Many of them are situated in Whitechapel, and some of them in Spitalfields.

5274. Tell the Committee the number of beasts that are weekly slaughtered in one of these private slaughter-houses?—I should think as many as 300 or 400 might be killed there in a week.

5275. How are they conducted generally?—The beasts are slaughtered and hung up for the air to go through them; then they have their vans, and the hind quarters go to one place, and the fore quarters go to another. They send their hind quarters to the best markets; to Leadenhall and Newgate.

5276. Are these places kept clean and well conducted?—Yes, they have inspectors.

5277. Then they are kept clean and well conducted?—Very much so indeed; they used not to be, I think.

5278. You said there was an objection to public slaughter-houses; can you see any very great difference between a public slaughter-house and a slaughter-house of the description you have just now given to the Committee?—Very great. There would be an inconvenience in this way. The man who has his private slaughter-house has his own men; he can kill at what time he chooses, and the meat can be carted away clean and in a proper state to the various dead-meat markets; but if you were to have a public slaughter-house and kill a great many animals, particularly at this time of year, you must commence killing the beasts and sheep at a certain hour in the afternoon. They would be nearly all night before they were finished, and at two or three o'clock in the morning they would want their various beasts taken away. There would be such a very great confusion with the men, each one wanting to get his beasts away before the other, that it would be almost impossible for a man to know his own meat.

5279. Would it not be possible to have slaughter-houses erected in this way: partitioned off, and let to different parties, who would conduct their business in the different partitions?—That is what is done now.

5280. If it is done, would not other establishments conducted in that way be establishments precisely similar to these large private slaughter-houses you describe; what would be the difference?—The one I describe is close to the butcher's own home; it is at the back of his own house, and he can go there himself; but if these public slaughter-houses are put at the metropolitan market, they are as far from their slaughter-houses as from their places of business.

5281. Do you not think that these men who are engaged in this trade would find it for their convenience to live near the slaughter-houses, and make their arrangements accordingly?—Then what is to become of the trade and shop where all the business is carried on?

5283. Do you know the proportion of the general weekly consumption killed by these carcase men, and the retail butchers?—No; I have not thought of the question.

5284. You have no idea how that is?—I have not.

5285. You

5285. You do not know which kills most?—I have no idea at all.

5286. In the hot weather, such as this weather we are now enjoying, do not the carcase men's trade increase very much?—I think it does at the latter end of the week. We are driven to them in a great measure; for instance, I myself was obliged to order 15 sheep, and 10 lambs, and 8 or 10 quarters of beef on Monday morning. I order them of one of the salesmen I deal with at Newgate Market; one that I think is likely to suit my purpose, and I leave the price almost to him. In fact, we must do it.

5287. This meat is supplied in various portions over the remainder of the week?—After the Monday supply we can do better. The dead-meat market is more open to us, but to provide myself with good and wholesome meat on a Monday, sweet, I am obliged to give the order for it on Saturday.

5288. Does the consumption of the town vary very much in the hot weather; does the general consumption decrease during the hot weather, do you think?—No, I do not think it does. There is more sold alive than dead then.

2289. Then the proportion of meat killed in the City must be much larger in the hot weather than it is in the cold weather?—I think it is.

5290. What do you say as to the price?—The price depends upon the supply, and the season.

5291. Then the price does not vary very much in consequence of this large proportion of killing in the City?—Do you mean whether the price varies in the dead-meat market, or the live-meat market?

5292. First I want the price to the consumer?—There is very little change to the consumer at all, I think. If the shortness applied to the market, we go to the customers, and we request to charge more; in fact, we do charge more; and if the market becomes well supplied, the prices are reduced.

5293. You said you anticipated a great evil from the collection of persons who would be engaged in this trade in the public slaughter-houses?—I do.

5294. Will you explain that?—The congregation of persons, each interested in their own master's goods to get them killed first, and then to get them away in the morning first, would cause great confusion. Then, it is not a very nice school for men apprenticed to the business, to meet a congregation of butchers' men, who are not all Chesterfields; it is not a very nice school for them.

5295. Does not that evil occur very much in Newgate Market, as it is conducted now?—It does not in private slaughter-houses. You have got everything under your own control, and you may bring your son up there just as if he was in your own counting-house or parlour.

5296. The O'Conor Don.] You mentioned that the quotations of prices given to the newspapers were generally lower than they actually were?—Perhaps I was not justified in saying that they were lower, because I do not attend the live-meat markets; perhaps it is hardly fair that I should say that; but we are led to believe that some of our friends do not give quite so high a price to the newspapers as they make in the market.

5297. The complaint on the part of the butchers, I understand, was that your customers saw in the newspapers a lower rate than in reality was paid?—It is so; and it is the same with regard to Newgate and Leadenhall. They are sometimes quoted at 5*s.* 4*d.* when we have given 6*s.* for sheep; 9*d.* a pound for carcases of mutton, without the offal.

Mr. J. Bannister. 8 June 1866.

5298. The quotations you believe to be lower than the true prices?—Decidedly; very much lower than second-rate meat is. Where they get the quotations from I am not aware.

5299. Can you give us any reason why the quotations should be given lower than the reality?—If they asked the seller, the seller would very naturally, having to send the prices home, like the parties for whom he sold to think he had got the fair market prices.

5301. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] You mean that it is the interest of the salesman to make his customer in the country convinced that he has got a good market price for the animal?—Yes, that he has got as good a price, I will not say better, than other people.

5302. But if the salesman gets a lower price than that which is quoted in the papers, the customers in the country might be dissatisfied?—Yes, and that would be injurious to the salesman.

5303. Have you been speaking of the slaughter-houses in the City, or generally throughout London?—Generally throughout London.

5304. You are acquainted with them?—Most of them.

5305. Do you not think that there are some that are objectionable in their situation, being in the middle of crowded dwellings?—There may be, but there are very few in the City at all.

5307. Are you aware whether all slaughter-houses, not only in the City, but over the whole of the metropolis, are inspected?—Yes; an inspector is obliged to go so many days a week, to see that they are thoroughly cleansed.

5308. You speak of the French cattle improving in quality?—Yes.

5309. Is there generally less waste in cutting up the meat of French beasts; is there less fat in them?—Not at all; they get them very fat, and they they throw a great quantity of suet off; they have a great quantity of fat and suet.

Mr. J. Bannister.
8 June 1866.

5310. Lord Naas.] Have you seen any French beasts?—Yes.

5311. Are they very good?—They are getting better; they are fine animals, and the same argument will apply to them.

5312. Do they send them to England as steers?—Yes; and for the purpose of the London markets they are becoming better and better.

5313. Mr. Edward Egerton.] The older animals, that have been used as draught oxen, are not over-burdened with fat?—No, of course not, nothing will make them fat; they are very hard in the flesh too.

5314. Lord Naas.] Which do you consider the best of the foreign beasts?—The French. Some Jutland's you can hardly tell from our Scotch.

5315. What part of France do they come from?—From the south of France.

5316. Sir M. W. Ridley.] Is it not latterly that the French beasts have become the best?—Yes.

5317. The improvement is recent?—It is not very long since they come at all; during the last two years, I think.

5318. Lord Naas.] Are these French beasts corn fed beasts. Are they fed upon Indian corn?—Not upon Indian corn, I should think. The land is very good, I am told; their cereals are very good too.

Mr. Charles Hicks, called in; and further Examined.

Mr. C. Hicks.

5319. Chairman.] I believe you wish to add to the evidence you gave the other day?—I do, if you please. I remarked, among other things, that the cattle coming from Bohemia were furnished with a passport, and I have brought a couple along with me; I will, if you please, hand them in. (The Passports were handed in.—Vide Appendix). These cattle were sold in Smithfield Market on the 21st May, and they arrived in the port of London on the 20th. One lot left the estate where they were bought on the 9th May, and the others left on the 11th May; therefore, one lot was upon the voyage nine days, and the other 11 (as I said in my evidence); the passport describes the colour, the name of the estate that they were sent from, and also that they are sound, and that no disease is in the part from which they are sent; they are sent away from the estate, and they are examined again upon the German frontier, and then they put the seal to the passport. I believe, also, I said before, that Professor Gamgee and Professor Simmonds were the originators of the theory that the rinderpest appears much faster than was at first supposed; but I should have said Professor Gamgee and Dr. Sanderson. I believe I said in my last examination, that I never had a case of rinderpest; but I should like to observe, that on one occasion I received a cargo of cattle from Sweden, and they arrived, after seven days' passage, in a very damaged condition.

5320. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] At what time of the year was this?—It was either last August or September; August, I think. As soon as they arrived, which was at the time when attention was first called to the rinderpest, the veterinary inspector as soon as he saw two of my animals lying on the ground, not able to get up, became suspicious, and at once said they had got the rinderpest. He telegraphed to the Custom House and received orders to put the beasts into quarantine. This was at Thames Haven. I arrived soon after, and said they had not got the rinderpest; and I said I should like to have them opened, and a post-mortem examination made. That was not allowed; and the orders were that they were not to be touched by anybody. The end of it was that the animals were quarantined for 10 days; and I have no hesitation in saying that the inspector was quite aware that he was wrong. I believe he made use of some interest to get them released. I think there were 60 cattle, about 300 sheep, and some 40 pigs. The pigs were released in about two days, the sheep in about four days, but the cattle had to remain 10 days, and they eventually were released as sound. That cost the owners something like 400 l. by having these cattle detained and put into quarantine.

5323. Would you explain to the Committee how a loss of 400 l. could have arisen upon the live animals?—I have spoken off-hand; but I think I can show it to be so. At first the cattle go in quarantine for 10 days, and I should say that in 10 days' time they would lose to the amount of 4 l. each.

5324. They are fat cattle?—Yes, I think I might say they would lose 5 l. each; but still I would say, if you please, 4 l. 10 s. in money value.

5325. Where were they quarantined?—Thames Haven.

5326. But in what place, in sheds?—No, they were upon a piece of land about 4½ acres or 5 acres.

5327. Had they been stall-fed before they were imported?—Yes.

5328. Then they ought not to have been turned out to grass?—I believe the grass was, in point of fact, the best thing for them.

5329. Sir M. W. Ridley.]—In what month was that?—In the month of August. They might have had some grass, most likely they had, but still they came from Sweden where they had been stall-fed most likely from about Christmas until the end of May or middle of June.

5330. Chairman.] What was the occasion of their falling off to the amount of 4 l. 10 s. a piece?—That is exceedingly simple to explain. The animals come here, for instance, in a state of pain and and fever, and they are off their feed. When they are kept for something like ten days or much more, they do not feed, they eat but very little, they pine after their homes, and the loss in value from day to day is 5 s. to 10 s. We find, by experience, that if we have cattle up on a Monday, and by some bad management they are not sold, but kept till the following Thursday, which is only three days, there is a loss of 1 l. at least, and very often 1 l. 10 s., but if we keep them for a week, there is a loss of 2 l. to 3 l. The animals when they are brought away from their pastures, or the food they have been used to, we cannot keep together. They fall away from day to day.

5331. Chairman.] Supposing that a quarantine was a regular system, I suppose you would take care to have the food which these animals were used to supplied to them at the place of quarantine?—I do not think it could be obtained.

5332. What is it they are fed upon?—These animals had been fed principally upon wash.

5333. What is wash?—The refuse of distilleries.

5334. That is to be had in London, is it not?—Not in the quantity we should want it, certainly not.

5335. Do you not know it is what the London cowkeepers employ very largely?—Certainly. These beasts have a mixture of refuse corn ground, and sweepings of barley, wheat, rye, and so on.

5336. That is obtainable in this country?—Certainly it would be; but we should require such an immense quantity of it, if all the cattle that came here in the months of August and September were to be put into quarantine; and if you take the recommendation of Mr. Simmonds, as to 21 days' quarantine, you would occasionally have a four weeks' stock in quarantine.

5337. Mr. Symonds' requirement of 21 days was with regard to store animals, not with regard to fat animals?—If you take 10 days, you would have to have a supply for two weeks always in quarantine.

5338. You are alluding to fat animals?—Yes.

5339. But the proposition was not to put fat animals into quarantine for 10 days, but only store animals?—Certainly.

5340. Therefore your remark about the loss on animals put into quarantine only applies to fat animals?—Of course, most certainly.

5343. Mr. Carnegie.] What were those cattle worth originally?—Some of them were exceedingly good; some of them were worth 23 l. or 24 l. a-piece; but when they were all exposed for sale in the market, I sold almost all of them to a contractor for 14 l. 10 s. a-piece; and instead of their being fat, good animals, fit for the trade of London, they were such as they give to feed the soldiers.

5344. Chairman.] I suppose the trade in store animals is a very limited one, in comparison to the trade in fat animals?—Quite so.

5345. When I say "the trade," I mean the foreign trade?—I understand you. I mean to say it is the opinion of the trade we belong to, that, at present at least, cattle should be only imported for slaughter.

5346. Would you import any milch cows?—I am speaking of cattle for slaughter.

5347. You think the importation of cattle ought to be confined to fat animals?—At present.

5348. And no milch cows?—I think that milch cows might be introduced under certain restrictions, and also store cattle eventually. I think that they might be introduced and undergo a short quarantine of four or five days, and that then, if found healthy, they might be sold to the farmers; not sold to dealers to job about the country, but be sold to the farmer, or to somebody else for him, that they may go from the wharf to his premises, and there stop for a month or two; then, I think, you would have everything perfectly safe.

5350. Supposing animals were marked in that way, and sent to the Islington Market, would you allow them to go down into the country for slaughter?—Yes, I most certainly should; and I think that it might be arranged very easily. Supposing I sell three or four head of cattle to a country butcher, I should give him a certificate that I had sold Mr. So-and-so certain cattle, with a certain mark upon them, that he would show to the clerk of the market, and his signature would be a sufficient pass for the railway to take his cattle to wherever they were to go, and then there should be care taken that those cattle were not driven about the country to different markets; but that they sheuld be killed by the man whose bonâ fide property they are. I heard it said here, two or three days since, that the foreign cattle brought over foot and mouth disease. Now, my experience in the market is something like 30 years, or rather more, and I can say of my own positive knowledge that the foot and mouth complaint existed in our market in the year 1839, whereas the foreign trade commenced about the year 1843, and then only upon a very small scale; and in the earlier years of the complaint it was much more virulent than it has been since. I can remember well at that time we had some 40 or 50 head of cattle per day slaughtered in the market, on account of their having cast their hoofs from the action of the complaint; I think that hardly ever takes place now. With regard to the complaint itself, it does not always exist; there are times of the year when we hardly see it, and there are other times when all the cattle which come to the market are affected. The cattle that come from Scotland are as badly affected with the disease as any others, and perhaps worse. The Scotch cattle frequently leave the owner's premises, say, upon the Tuesday or Wednesday; they are put upon the train on the Friday or Saturday, and arrive on Sunday morning; and it is very frequently the case, that they are in a very bad state before they come into the market. I think I may safely say that, during last August and September, and even the beginning of October, I had not a case of foot and mouth complaint in all my cattle, but when we got towards Christmas it was universal in the English and foreign cattle.

5351. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] At what time of the year was the foot and mouth disease most prevalent?—That I cannot say; last year it was very prevalent about Christmas, but two or three months before we were quite free from it.

5352. Chairman.] You say you know something about the abattoir system in Paris?—Yes. I wrote to a correspondent in France, and I have his reply here. The reply is in French, but here is a translation of it.

5353. Perhaps the best way will be for you to hand in the translation?—If you please. (The letter was handed in.—Vide Appendix.) He quite bears out our supposition that the establishment of abattoirs drives the retail trade out of the market, and throws it almost into the hands of wholesale men, not entirely, but almost.

5354. Do the public suffer in consequence?—Yes, according to that; I will not say that myself. The fact is this, that by the trade being thrown into the hands of wholesale men, the owner of the cattle receives a smaller price. It does not follow that the public will pay a smaller price. If you take, for example, the case of an ox which the retail butcher buys in the market, that costs him, say, 15 l., but if he buys it as killed meat of a wholesale man, he must pay 16 l., because there will be a difference of 4 s. for the slaughtering; then the meat is sold in the wholesale meat market, by a salesman who charges a commission of 1 d. per stone, which, on a bullock weighing 96 stone, is 8 s. Then, you must allow a profit to the wholesale butcher, say 8 s. more, and therefore the retail butcher buying of him must pay 1 l. more than he can buy for in the metropolitan market.

5355. Is there any other point you wish to give evidence upon?—Nothing more than I have stated before. I think that will be all I wish to say. There is a statement of the number of cattle that I have sold in three months, it gives the number sold to each class of men.

5356. You will hand this paper in also to the Committee?—Yes, if you please. (The same was handed in.—Vide Appendix.)

Monday, 11*th June* 1866.

PRESENT:

Mr. Carnegie.	Mr. Holland.
Mr. Dent.	Lord Naas.
Mr. Edward Egerton.	Sir M. W. Ridley.
Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.	Mr. Alderman Salomons.

THE RIGHT HON. T. MILNER GIBSON, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. JOHN SWAN, called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. Swan. 11 June 1866.

5357. Mr. Carnegie.] I BELIEVE you are largely engaged in the cattle trade?—Yes.

5358. How many cattle do you generally have passing through your hands in the course of a year?—During the last two years, somewhere upwards of 20,000 head of foreign and home-fed cattle passed through our hands each year. This year the foreign trade commenced sometime in February. We passed last year, in the foreign trade alone, from 300 to 400 cattle weekly, and from 1,500 to 3,000 sheep, from May up to the end of October. Some would come after that.

5359. Chairman.] From 300 to 400 cattle weekly?—Sometimes; some weeks we have as many as 700; but I think, on the average, taking the year through, we have weekly between 200 and 300.

5360. Where were they landed?—At Leith and Granton; the large ports.

5361. From what countries?—All the cattle which come to Granton come from Denmark.

5363. You sell them at Leith and Granton, and they are slaughtered there, I suppose?—Yes; this season they have all been slaughtered at the ports of Leith and Granton; one or two cargoes have come to Granton. His Grace the Duke of Buccleuch has erected excellent accommodation for such cattle as come there to be slaughtered.

5364. Mr. Edward Egerton.] At the Port of Granton?—At the Port of Granton.

5365. Chairman.] You buy them to sell them there, and the butchers come down there and slaughter them?—All stock is consigned to us, and when the boat arrives we generally send information to Glasgow by advertisement or by hand-bills; and as to those which we cannot sell alive, we have a staff of butchers who get them killed, and forward them to Glasgow, and sell them dead there.

5366. Mr. Edward Egerton.] What was the course of trade before the cattle plague broke out; were they sent alive down to the different markets of Scotland?—Mostly all the cattle that came to us were sold in Edinburgh and Glasgow market.

5367. Alive?—Yes; I think last year, on the 4th September, we sent upwards of 100 in one day brought from Glasgow, and brought from Edinburgh to Liverpool. We sent them to three different salesmen in Liverpool, to Gibbons, to Roan, and Lamb; three different parties. I was myself in Liverpool market that day; I did not interfere with the sale, but I saw them sold.

5368. Mr. Carnegie.] Do you not also deal largely in Irish cattle?—We do mostly in the spring of the year and the forepart of the year; they are store cattle or Irish cattle; but after that time we deal also in fat cattle largely from Ireland.

5369. You deal both in store cattle and in fat cattle?—Yes.

5370. In the first instance, with regard to fat cattle, where do you sell them; do you sell them in Edinburgh, or do you consign them to London, and the other large towns?—We sell all the fat cattle that come consigned to us, either in Edinburgh or Glasgow market. If we send any to Manchester or Liverpool, we consign them to an agent who is accustomed to stand in those markets.

5371. In what condition do your foreign cattle generally arrive?—We have found the cattle from Denmark always in first-rate condition. We have scarcely ever found a beast touched with the foot and mouth complaint; that is the murrain as we call it. Cattle generally come from Hamburgh. We have found, to a very great extent, they are often very severely affected with the foot and mouth complaint. I do not know whether it is from the long journey they have to undergo before they arrive at Hamburgh.

5372. As to lung disease, have you often found lung disease in cattle that you have imported?—No, I never saw one affected with it. I have never seen one with the lung disease sold under our own inspection; and we have never had any complaint at all of the Danish beasts being affected with the lung disease; not one.

5373. What do you say as to the German beasts?—I do not recollect one. I know the German beasts are sometimes very bad of murrain in the market. We have always killed them at once as soon as this disease came out.

Mr. J. Swan.
11 June 1866.

5374. What inspection takes place at the port of Leith?—A very good inspection. There is Professor Dick and his assistants; there is Mr. Romanes and Professor Strangeways. The professor himself was the first that was appointed by Government; and since Professor Dick died a man of the name of Todd, a very excellent man he is, I believe.

5376. Do you import from abroad many store cattle?—Two years ago we imported a great many from Holland. I have seen as many as 500 store cattle come to Edinburgh in one week; part came through Yorkshire from Hull, and they come down in a very poor state.

5377. Did you import any foreign store cattle into the port of Leith?—Yes, a great many.

5378. Milch cows?—Yes.

5381. Mr. Edward Egerton.] How long has the trade between Denmark and Scotland been opened?—About three years; for the first two years almost all the stock was sent to our firm.

5382. Mr. Carnegie.] That is, all kinds of stock; both store and fat stock?—Yes. With regard to Danish sheep, last year we had on many occasions from 2,000 to 4,000 sheep and lambs a week; lambs and first-class sheep; and it is well known that the Merino sheep are not suitable for our Scotch and English grazing; but we sold many thousands of the cross breeds to graziers in the Lothians, and Forfar, and Fifeshire, and these restrictions has put a stop to that. Mr. Phinn wanted my sons to send him a ship-load, but, according to the restrictions of the cattle plague, the sheep were stopped the same as the cattle. We have had as many as 4,000 Danish sheep in a week last year, and very often 2,000 to 2,500 have been sold for keeping during the winter, and I believe kept uncommonly well.

5383. Do you think there is any danger of disease being brought in by the foreign sheep?—My own experience leads me to infer, no.

5384. Your idea, as I understand you, is this; that you would have different restrictions made in countries that are absolutely free from disease, from countries that are only under suspicion of disease?—Distinctly so.

5385. And you would also, if I understand you rightly, wish that the Danish stock, and no other, should go to Granton, and that the German stock should go to Leith?—Yes, that has been our opinion for a long time, that if that could be effected it would be an immense benefit to the graziers in Scotland, and we think that would set the minds of the Privy Counsel a great deal to rest as to the spreading of the disease by the foreign stock.

5387. At Leith there would be more difficulty in getting a quarantine ground, would there not?—I should not allow any portion of the cattle coming into Leith to be left alive. I think it would be safer to let all those be slaughtered either at Edinburgh or the port of landing.

5388. Mr. Edward Egerton.] What is the reason for that?—I think there is more risk of bringing disease from other places, than bringing it from Denmark. We have knowledge from the authorities in Denmark; we send our report every week; that they are quite ready to satisfy the Government of England that there has not been any disease in Denmark, and cannot be. No infection can be brought from there; they are so cautious.

5389. Mr. Carnegie.] Do you think that foreign lean stock should be slaughtered at the port of landing?—Decidedly not; at least, wherever there is the least chance of spreading the disease I should. No foreign fat cattle being allowed to go to Glasgow, which was our great market for the sale of it; beef has in consequence risen 7 l. a head within the last three weeks. We have two men from Glasgow buying cattle in the Metropolitan market. I saw them buy 20 good foreign cattle from abroad at 27 l. a head; and then they wanted to buy more to slaughter them and send them to supply the Glasgow people.

5390. Would it not have been easier for them to have got a supply in Edinburgh?—We have not got it.

5391. Are you importing no foreign cattle into the port of Edinburgh just now?—Yes; but while these restrictions as to the cattle plague are are going on, Denmark will not send their cattle there. In Denmark the cattle are better than the cattle have been at any other place.

5392. Are you importing no foreign cattle into Edinburgh at this moment?—Yes; I think there were 130 or 140 came the week before last, and about 100 altogether last week, into the two ports; I could not say to a few cattle, but I should think there were 1,400 sheep last week.

5393. Is there any importation of foreign cattle direct to Glasgow?—I have seen cattle there from abroad; I think they came first to Dublin; they came two years ago, but I think that was stopped.

5394. There is none to any extent?—No.

5395. There is a large importation of Irish cattle into Glasgow, is there not?—Yes, there is. From the month of August until Christmas, two-thirds of the cattle are from Ireland, but at this season of the year the winter cattle have all finished, and the grass cattle are not ready for killing; therefore very few cattle will come to Glasgow for the next two months.

5399. Mr. Edward Egerton.] You say there is scarcely a beast fed within 50 miles of Glasgow?—Yes, at certain seasons. Sometimes they have depended a great deal on foreign cattle. Lately there were three of the Government contractors came to me. They had heard I was coming to London. If these stringent measures are kept up it will ruin every one of them.

5400. What are the Government contracts for?—For the army and navy in Scotland. As to the cattle that we killed last week ourselves, my son sold them on Thursday at $7\frac{3}{4}d.$ per lb., old foreign cows.

5401. Mr. Carnegie.] Do I understand you that what you wish is that there should be a market established at Granton; that cattle should be sold for immediate slaughter, and not to be taken out of the market alive; is that what you mean?—No; to be sold there, not to a dealer but to a butcher, to take them direct to his slaughter-house, provided they have a clean bill of health.

5402. What guarantee have you that the butcher will not sell them again?—I should put the Government mark on it; any restriction which the Government think proper to enforce this; and fine them if they transgress.

5403. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Now you say there has been no disease of any kind in Denmark?—I do.

5404. The purport of your evidence is that you wish the Government to release the provisions as regards Denmark; that is what I understand to be the principal part of your evidence?—Yes.

5405. You say Denmark has been altogether free from this disease?—Decidedly.

5406. But that Hamburgh and other places in Germany have not been so?—No; we know the risk of it.

5407. You say for further convenience you would have two ports, one port you would use for the Danish cattle and the home cattle, and would give facilities for removing the cattle from the port, and at the other port (Leith), where the infected cattle come in, you would destroy them at once?—Decidedly; that is my view.

5408. Mr. Carnegie.] Could you not supply Glasgow and Airdrie, and the mining districts around, with meat slaughtered at the port of Granton?—I am afraid the season has come in when there may be a great deal of sultry and thundry weather, and one-half of the meat may not be in a proper state for killing. If it had all to be destroyed together it would ruin many men.

5409. You think it absolutely necessary that meat should be killed in those towns, such as Airdrie and Coatbridge, and other towns, and the mining districts about?—Distinctly. There is not a day but we have telegraphs from all parts of the west, about the men shutting their shops, and so on. They cannot get a pound of meat unless they go to Glasgow. They cannot buy and kill within four days, and they have men to send a long distance for it. It is impossible these towns can be supplied unless by live cattle.

5410. Mr. Edward Egerton.] How long has Scotland been dependent upon the foreign market?—About four years.

5411. Does that arise from there being less breeding on the part of the farmers of Scotland, or or the increasing population?—The population is increasing very rapidly, and trade has been very good. People, instead of eating beef once a-week, must now have it two or three times a-week; and they are getting high wages.

5412. Sir M. W. Ridley.] Has there not been a considerable increase in the weight of dead meat from Scotland to London during the last few years?—I think London will be better supplied than any part of the United Kingdom; sometimes we have so many cattle to kill in Edinburgh, and I send a cargo to one of the dead meat salesmen in London. We had been sending before the order came, and got always a very good price. I sent a cargo of nine slaughtered bullocks, and I could have had fivepence a-pound at home, but they only returned me one penny three farthings or twopence in London; at the present time they are always sure, if cattle can be got in the United Kingdom. to get them. Taking the midland counties of England, there may be a fair supply on some days and on some days not.

5413. Mr. Edward Egerton.] We have had evidence here to prove that meat can be got cheaper in London than in provincial towns?—Yes, that is so.

5414. You agree with that?—Yes.

5415. Sir M. W. Ridley.] I asked you this question: whether the weight of meat sent from Scotland to London has not largely increased of late years?—I am sure it has.

5416. Then may that not be a reason for the supply being so largely diminished to the Scotch people?—No; I do not altogether see that. I believe there is a witness from Aberdeen, one of the largest importers we have in Scotland, of fine meat to London, who can give better evidence with regard to that than I can; but I know that we are in a very bad condition.

5417. Mr. Carnegie.] There are live stock market in Airdrie, and Coutbridge, are there not?—Do you mean fat markets?

5418. Yes?—No; they all go to Glasgow and Edinburgh; there are no fat markets.

5419. Mr. Dent.] At the present time, do I understand that you cannot take any live foreign stock to Glasgow market?—Not a single beast; we cannot take a beast out of Edinburgh market, if it is once shown there, be it ever so healthy.

5420. Suppose you landed a cargo at Granton or Leith, could you not take the cargo to Glasgow maket, if it had not been disposed of at the Edinburgh market?—No; that would remedy a great deal if we could.

5421. Chairman.] How do those that are landed at Leith go to the Edinburgh market?—They do not go.

5422. Where do they slaughter them at Leith?—In the slaughter-house; they attend it in turns, both night and day, they have very bad accommodation; the authorities are willing and do all in their power to accommodate, but they actually have not accommodation for their requirements.

5423. Mr. Edward Egerton.] You have no private slaughter houses in Edinburgh?—None.

5424. They are not allowed by law?—No.

5425. Mr. Carnegie.] Are there any in Leith?—Not one.

5426. Chairman.] Have there been complaints in Edinburgh and Glasgow of the quality of the meat since the slaughtering of the foreign beasts?—They are glad to get any quality at all, if it is fresh.

5427. Has there been no complaint of the quality; I am not now speaking of the quantity; has it been stated that the meat killed is not so good as it used to be?—It does not go in the same state.

5429. But there used to be complaints?—Decidedly, and very serious complaints.

5430. You do not think, in fact, it is a system that could be generally adopted as a permanent rule, that all foreign beasts should be slaughtered at the port of shipment, and only sent into the country as dead meat?—I think not.

5431. You think that could not be adopted as a permanent law?—I thing not; it might be in the winter, but in the warm weather I am sure it would be a very serious inconvenience; if we had three or four hundred cattle come in, to be sold in three or four days, where could we send them to?

5432. Mr. Dent.] But supposing there was a restriction as to the immediate time of slaughtering, supposing they had not to be slaughtered within three or four days, could you supply the western districts of Scotland with dead meat slaughtered at Granton and Leith?—I do not see that it is practicable.

5434. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Could you give us any figures as to the number of foreign cattle imported into Scotland last year, before the restrictions imposed by the Order in Council?—If I had my papers, I could tell you every beast that was imported.

5435. Lord Naas.] Perhaps you could send them?—Yes, I can.

5436. Mr. Edward Egerton.] If you do so, you can take three months of last year, and three months of this?—Yes.

5437. You say the trade has now nearly ceased?—There have been about 100 cattle last week, and about 1,600 sheep. During the week before there were 130 cattle and 400 sheep.

5438. Have you letters from your correspondents in Denmark complaining of the restrictions imposed by our Government?—Decidedly.

5439. Where do you send the animals from Denmark now?—There are a great many parties from England in Denmark buying them at high prices. The cattle are all consigned through various parties at Copenhagen, and from Aarhuus consigned to us.

5440. Chairman.] How does it injure the foreign foreign trade; is it by their not being allowed to be sent to a late market, and not getting such good prices for their cattle; how does the restriction that they shall be slaughtered on their arrival at the port affect the foreign trade?—Most of the foreign cattle that used to come to Leith were consumed in Glasgow; I have seen as many as 300 hundred a day killed in Glasgow. Instead of going to the market there, the butchers have to go and buy them, and slaughter them at the port of Leith. They have to be at the expense of killing them, they cannot kill them at the same killing house. Perhaps there is the danger, if they happen to be away, of the property being purloined, and then there is the sending and packing, and repacking and carting, and by that the man to whom the cattle belongs is put to a good deal of extra expense; it must all come from him.

5441. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Does that arrangement apply to the public slaughter-houses?—Distinctly.

5442. You have had these public slaughter-houses for some years in Scotland?—Yes; the public slaughter-houses we have in Edinburgh and Leith are working very well.

5443. They are open to the same objection you have just mentioned, as to the chance of the things being taken away?—No; in Edinburgh all the principal butchers within the circle have a key, and they pay a salary. I do not know whether it is 8 l. a year. They have their own key, and they pay the town dues, 1 s. or 1 s. 6 d. a head for each bullock; but it is not so when we kill these foreign beasts.

5444. Mr. Holland.] Have you made any calculation of the quantity of stock you get from Denmark, store cattle, I mean?—There are none come.

5445. But if the trade were open, would they not?—A great many cattle would come then. A great many Danish store cattle and cows came last year, for the dairy.

5446. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Do you get any from Sweden?—Yes; we have had part of the stock from Sweden, but not a great quantity.

5447. Mr. Carnegie.] Have you had any from Norway?—My son went over there one year to buy some from Norway; but I do not know whether the country suited.

5448. Mr. Dent.] As I understand, you think that this summer there has been a very great loss to the Scottish farmers from their not being allowed to take the lean Danish stock, and Danish sheep?—From their not being allowed to take the Danish sheep; I may tell the Committee that the sheep in Denmark are many of them nearly as well bred as the English sheep. This year there are many thousand acres of first class land laying bare, with not a particle of stock to put on it.

5449. Lord Naas.] In what part of Scotland do these thousand of acres lie?—Nearly every farmer is not stocked, or half stocked. There was a farmer in East Lothian wanted some stock; I went to Peebleshire, and paid 20 l. a piece for 20 cattle to go to Aberlady mains. They were nearly fat, and they were to be left until the Monday; I came home and sent a message to the farmer about them; he went to Haddington, and the local authorities sent an order that he was not to receive them till the Friday following; and therefore it would be Monday week before these cattle could be removed. I went to Edinburgh to Mr. Walker, chairman of local authority, and said to him, Will you allow the cattle to come to my farm, which is within two miles of Edinburgh; he granted permission for the cattle to go there, and they came there on the Monday. The same farmer went to get the order to remove them from my farm; they said, certainly not; that the cattle were going somewhere else, and the man was not allowed to take the cattle home. There was another lot of 40 which I had for the same man, and they came from Westmorland. We have 200 beasts lying on our farm, keeping them on hay and water; they are lying there, and they cannot get away under the present restrictions. It is just one county fighting against another.

5450. Sir M. W. Ridley.] You said there had been an advance in the price of meat at Glasgow; what do you say is the advance per head in Glasgow?—It rose from 70 s. and 72 s. to 90 s. per cwt. within the last three weeks.

5451. Do you ascribe that to the foreign animals not being allowed to be passed through from Leith on their arrival?—Decidedly, in a great measure; I ascribe it also to the cattle plague; for instance, there were many thousand beasts killed when the disease came to Forfarshire; farmers were putting away their cattle in any condition from panic: and also in Kincardineshire, and all those animals that should be coming out fat now have been sold; that is the reason of it.

5452. I think you led the Committee to infer that these butchers in Glasgow, who go down and buy the animals at Leith or Granton, and there slaughter them, in consequence of there being additional expense put upon their business, are buying these animals at a lower price in the market; I rather inferred from your evidence, that the requirements, that foreign cattle should be slaughtered at the place of debarcation, would be a disadvantage to the foreign trade, and that you found it so?—Distinctly; the extra expense must come from the men who are sending the cattle.

5453. And therefore the butchers may buy their animals at a lower rate at Granton and Leith?—I do not see that they are buying the beasts at a lower rate. I distinctly agree with the Government Order, that all cattle of any description coming to Leith should be slaughtered; but I ask the Committee to advise the Privy Council to give orders for Danish cattle to come into the port of Granton.

5454. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] You think that Scotland will not be restocked unless they restock with foreign cattle; you think they would not be able to get sufficient stock in England?—If we do not get them more liberally from Ireland, I do not know what is to become of us.

5455. Sir M. W. Ridley.] Are there not many Irish cattle coming to Glasgow from Belfast at this time?—As I stated to the Committee before, at this season of the year the Irish cattle are always scarce; the fat cattle are done with, and the grass cattle are not come in; but we have been getting a few store cattle from Ireland lately.

5456. How soon do you expect the grass-fed cattle again?—In the course of six weeks or two months.

5457. Six weeks or two months would elapse before the cattle would come over from the west of Scotland, and from Ireland, fed on grass?—Yes.

5458. How has the importation of store cattle been from Ireland during the last few months?—There have been some from some parts of Kildare and beyond Dublin. There were 40 the last week, from a man of the name of Macdonald, very excellent cattle, and quite free from disease. There are a good many other people at Fife, and round Falkirk, who have been getting them ordered. There are no fairs allowed at the present time.

Mr. J. Swan. 11 June 1866.

5459. There are fairs allowed in Ireland?—Yes; but we have not got them in Scotland.

5460. Has the importation of foreign cattle from Ireland, increased very much in the last few months?—We have no foreign cattle from Ireland now.

5461. Mr. Dent.] Have you had more than the usual quantity at this time of the year?—No, for many years past, from the 1st March until this time, and till the month of August, we had never less than 500 to 1,000 of English and Irish store cattle a week in Edinburgh.

5462. Into Glasgow?—No; into Edinburgh. Glasgow is not a store market at all, it is entirely for fat cattle.

5463. Lord Naas.] Has not the price of Irish store cattle fallen very much?—The price of Irish store cattle is certainly cheaper than we have had it for the last two or three years.

5464. Has there not been a remarkable fall during the last two months in the price of Irish stock?—For anything I have seen, there has.

5465. Do you not think if that continues, it will bring a large number of cattle to Scotland from Ireland?—Yes; but by the Orders in Council, that would soon be put a stop to.

5467. Has not this occurred in many cases in England, that persons have gone over on commission, and bought large numbers of cattle for different parties?—I believe it has.

5468. Do you see any great difficulty in carrying out that system?—I think there is; it will have to be done; but a man who used to buy his own cattle must now employ an agent.

5469. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Why?—He cannot go himself into a strange country, and go into a fair there.

5470. Lord Naas.] You do not think that the fairs for cattle in Scotland could be held at present with any safety?—I am afraid not.

5471. You would not recommend such a course as that, I suppose?—I should not this season.

5472. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Have you any great fair for beasts in Scotland besides the Falkirk Tryst for sheep?—It is for both sheep and cattle.

5473-4. But Falkirk Tryst is principally confined to sheep, is it not?—Oh, no; I think the Committee should advise the Government, or the Privy Council, that they should not allow store cattle to be shown in the fat markets either of Edinburgh or Glasgow again. I was examined some two years ago about the Glasgow market, and the counsel said, "What was the dairyman to do if we allowed foot and mouth complaint in cattle to go into the market"? My advice or opinion then to the magistrates was to have a dairy-cow market. The disease is a great loss to the dairyman, because if there is disease at all it is found in the cattle market; at all events the foot and mouth complaint is. I have many times in Glasgow argued the same thing, that they ought not to have a store market along with the others.

5475-6. How would you distinguish the cattle; to whom would you give the power to distinguish the cattle that were to be exposed for sale in a market?—I should say, let no cattle which were allowed to be taken into the fat market be allowed to go out to graze on any condition.

5477. Would you have them slaughtered on the spot?—Decidedly not. Let the men who buy these cattle take them, say 30 miles, to where they can have the cattle kept on their premises, put them on a railway, take them and slaughter them at their own place. It is an extra expense to have to come to buy them, then to send a man to kill them, and then to have the expense of taking them to their own places.

5478. If a lot of cattle were brought to Edinburgh market, and marked to be sent 50 or 60 miles by railway to a country village, how could you find out that those beasts were not either put on a farm on the way or left somewhere as beasts to be fed?—I would put the Government brand on them, as I have always argued from the very commencement; and, if they are found in any field or any place, let the party pay a heavy penalty.

5479. You think that would be sufficient?—Quite.

5480. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Is the foot and mouth disease more prevalent among the fat cattle than among the store cattle?—Not at all; when the cattle come by boat or by rail, they are more liable to it. For instance, the cattle we have from Ireland in the fall of the year, bought in the Dublin market on a Thursday, cannot be shown in Glasgow till the next Thursday; and very often those cattle are touched with foot and mouth complaint. That is in all cases; it makes no difference whether they come from any part of Scotland. It does no harm to the beef, not the smallest.

5481. Mr. Dent.] I think the Irish store cattle are almost always affected with foot-and-mouth disease; I know that those we buy in Yorkshire nearly always are?—It depends very much upon the treatment in the transit.

5482. You would not exclude them from the store market, where your dairy cows were?—Do you mean the store cattle?

5483-5. Yes; Irish stores?—I do not see that that could be very easily done.

5486. Then your dairy cows would be as liable to take foot-and-mouth disease from them as from fat stock?—I think, since the cattle plague, the Irish have been much more careful than they have hitherto been. Looking at the new laws, and seeing the great value that cattle are, I think it will be very much modified, and that the foot-and-mouth complaint will not be so great as it has been; that is my own opinion.

5487. Lord Naas.] I want to ask you another question about the store market and the fat market: you have stated the provisions you would suggest for keeping the store beasts out of the fat market; but now, how would you keep fat fat beasts out of the store market?—There would be no harm in their going there at all, because the cattle, even when they come to our cattle market, are tied up under the sheds there. It is very seldom you will see a fat bullock that comes into a fat market with any foot-and-mouth complaint in him at all. It is by being sold and tied up in the market he takes it.

5488. You say you would not allow any fat beasts to be sold in the store market?—I say I would not allow the fat beasts to go where the store cattle were.

5489. You say you wish to have two markets?—Yes.

5490. You can very easily provide that all the animals sold in the fat market shall be sold for immediate slaughter?—Yes.

5491. But suppose you have a lot of fat or three-quarter fat beasts, how could the authorities prevent you from selling those beasts in the store markets, if you liked?—I would not sanction that; it is by taking the store cattle or cows into the fat market that they get the disease; and the reason I say so is this, when the cattle come to be kept very likely for three or four days tied up the foot-and-mouth complaint will come upon them; but in the store market, where the cows and store cattle are sent, the fat cattle would be sent there also, and take no disease at all. It is after the cattle come into the place that they catch the disease.

5492. Would not those evils be as likely to arise in the store market as in the fat market; would not those dangers of infection to which you allude be as great in the one as in the other?—I do not think so.

5493. Why not?—Because cattle that may have been travelling from market to market may catch it; but in the fat cattle market we scarcely ever want the foot-and-mouth complaint; we are scarcely ever without it at certain seasons.

5494. You say the great cause of infection is the fat cattle travelling from market to market; is it not the case that large numbers of the store beasts travel from market to market?—Very often they do.

5495. If a dealer cannot get his price in one fair, he will drive on to another, and that is a very common practice?—Yes.

5496. Is not that practice more in vogue with regard to the store cattle than with regard to the fat cattle?—I quite agree that we cannot make everything perfect; but I know that no store cattle or cows should be allowed in the stands where the fat cattle are sold weekly. We must submit to some of these things; we cannot help ourselves, but there are certain seasons in the spring of the year, in these fat markets, when we never are without the foot-and-mouth disease.

5497. Do you not think that this might happen, that the liberty that would be given to the cattle sold in the store market over the fat market, would induce a great number of persons who had cattle which might be fat for slaughter for a certain purpose, but which still it would be practicable to keep a little longer, to send these cattle to the market, and so in reality make the store market a much more popular place for selling cattle than the fat market?—I know it would be so; I have mentioned that at different meetings we have had. The very same question you are now putting to me has been brought forward. I should not object to any man sending a beast, however fat it was, because these cattle are not touched with the foot-and-mouth complaint; but if you put them into the fat market, and into the stands, they are very likely to take the complaint at certain seasons. If a man were to send his fat cattle to the store market, I should not see anything wrong in that.

5498. Why should the store market be more free from foot-and-mouth complaint than the fat market?—Because it might happen they might catch the disease in the fat market; but they have not the same chance to catch it where they are brought into the store market in the middle of Edinburgh. If there is disease at all, it would be sure to be in the Edinburgh fat market. If a beast is unwell, it is sure to be sent to that market; and if a beast is kept for two or three days it is sure to catch the foot-and-mouth complaint.

5499. Your reason for wishing the two markets is, that beasts in the incipient stages of disease are almost certain to be sent to the fat market?—Decidedly.

5500. And, therefore, you think you would get rid of the risk in the other market, of having beasts that were known or suspected by the owners to be diseased, exposed for sale there at all?—Yes, decidedly.

5501. Chairman.] Did the foreign cattle trade before these restrictions took place show signs of being an increasing trade?—Decidedly.

5502. In what condition do the cattle arrive when landed, that is to say in reference to their treatment on board ship. Do they appear to have suffered, or to have been over-crowded, as a rule?—A good many of the cattle from Hamburgh, the German cattle, do appear to be affected with the foot-and-mouth disease.

5503. Do they appear to have suffered from over-crowding in the ship?—Not often. The Danish cattle are very well carried, for there is many a stone of first class hay left unconsumed. They get water once every 24 hours. There is a staff of men we pay to attend to the wants of the cattle. We pay 8 d. per head for every bullock, and 1 d. per head for every sheep; so much for a pig, and so much for a calf, in order that the cattle may be properly looked after. They agree to that, and the greatest care is taken of the cattle sent from Denmark; but when we recommended this to Hamburgh, some of the senders demurred to it, so that the persons who have charge of the cattle get no emolument for it from some of the shippers.

5504. Do you think that their own interests are sufficient to secure good treatment of the cattle on board?—Decidedly.

5505. You do not think that there are any regulations required by law?—If we found good reason for it, we decidedly would wish to have an Act of Parliament to enforce it.

5506. If you found sufficient reason?—Yes.

5507. But you have not found sufficient reason?—No; at least not as to the cattle from Denmark. And it is a treat to go down and see them landing.

5508. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Are they fine cattle?—They are not heavy cattle. The cattle generally sell from about 16 l. to 20 l. This year they have been selling some of them as high as from 26 l. to 27 l. I think the last week they have gone at 72 s. per cwt. All those that were killed were sold at 7½ d. to 7¾ d. per lb. for the carcase of the beef, and the hide and offal beside.

5509. Lord Naas.] Do you get any grass beast from from Denmark, at the latter end of the year?—A great many during the last two years.

5510. They were pretty good?—They have not the same breed in the cattle as they have in the sheep. Usually the sheep were not be stopped from Denmark. Sheep are very dear in the fall of the year, and if a man has been able to get them, he has been quite satisfied. According to the present Order in Council, every sheep and lamb must be killed within four days.

5511. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Do you think sheep from any place should be stopped at the present time?—I think not. Sheep are animals that have been subject to very few complaints; but the veterinary surgeons can do little for them. There is the braxy in sheep, and there are two kinds of it; the braxy in the blood, which may be cured if taken in time by bleeding in the neck; but there is braxy in the intestines which cannot be cured, or seldom; that is, inflammation. It is mostly in young sheep in the fall of the year. Then, again, there is "Bratchy" which has the very same symptoms as the plague in cattle. Braxy in sheep may be cured if taken in time; but it is a very infectious disease; they cured it in our early days. I know something of the diseases in sheep up to the time I was 25 years of age; but since I was 25, I have learnt nothing; I know nothing more. There is the "Bratchy" in sheep, which may be cured if taken in time, by boiled sweet milk and common starch, with half a glass of port wine twice a day, or some laudanum; but generally it will spread, and it cuts them off.

5512. Mr. Edward Egerton.] What is "bratchy"?—It is a scour.

5513. Mr. Dent.] Is that something like the scour in lambs?—In my opinion the bratchy in sheep is what killed Mr. Harvey's sheep down in Norfolk last year. Then, again, there are two or three kinds of rot in sheep. There are two kinds incurable. If sheep that has the rot gets into a watery state it is incurable. The rot in sheep by flukes in the liver may be cured by American tar, say, half an ounce, put into flour or bean meal.

5514. Lord Naas.] There is also the scab in sheep?—Yes; the scab is a disease easily cured; if a sheep takes the scab, and it is not cured, it will destroy the stock altogether, but any shepherd can easily cure it; the best cure I have ever found for it is tobacco juice and spirits of tar.

5515. Chairman.] Have you formed any opinion how the cattle plague got into Scotland?—Yes.

5516. How was that?—It came from London.

5517. Sir M. W. Ridley.] Did you ever hear of another disease in sheep called by the name "Louping-ill"?—Yes, decidedly.

5518. The louping-ill is supposed to show itself in sheep after the winter is passed, and they have eaten too largely and freely from a particular grass, is it not so?—This has been a very bad year for louping-ill; there has been a great deal of loss from louping-ill this season; when the wind is in the east it comes on a great many different farms. There is also the "thorten-ill;" it is a disease in the spine or neck, which prostrates the sheep entirely; they fall down, and seldom ever rise again.

5519. What is your idea of the reason for the louping-ill?—It has been in many parts of Scotland; it arises from particular grounds. Near Melrose, on some grounds there, where there are particular springs, and when the wind is in the east, there is a great deal of loss from it.

5520. You do not ascribe it to the food which the animals eat?—Not at all. At some seasons when the large lots from the north of Scotland come to the Falkirk market there are great losses by the trimling or louping-ill; it is a disease that is natural to sheep on certain grounds.

5521. Chairman.] You said that you thought the cattle plague disease came from London?—Yes.

5522. In what way did it come from London to Scotland?—It came with some cows from the Metropolitan Market.

5523. With some cows that were bought in the Metropolitan Market and sent to Scotland?—Yes, sent to Edinburgh.

5524. Were those cows infected with the cattle plague when they arrived?—I did not see them when they arrived, but I saw them immediately after.

5526. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Do you remember the pleuro-pneumonia in Edinburgh, five or six years ago?—Very well.

5527. Where did that come from?—I am not sure.

sure. I was examined on that Commission also, I think.

5528. How do you think it got into the country; do you think the cattle plague was imported from abroad, originally?—I could not say whether the cattle plague was imported or not. I have said it was imported to us from London, but how it got to London I cannot tell. I do think there should be some notice taken about the restrictions on sheep.

5529. Chairman.] You say you proposed to put a cordon round the City of Edinburgh, and to slaughter all the cows that were then in the city?—Yes.

5530. A cordon merely to prevent animals coming out?—Yes.

5531. Supposing any persons had been in cow-houses, and been in communication with the animals; if those persons were allowed to come out, might they not impart the disease as quickly as by allowing the animals themselves to come out; you would not have kept everybody in Edinburgh, I suppose; you would have let the people out?—My opinion was this: that every cow ought to be killed that was seized with the plague, so as not to let the infection spread. Immediately after that the store cattle came from Ireland, and were shown in Edinburgh, and thus spread the disease into the country.

5532. How did the beasts travel that brought the plague from London to Edinburgh?—By rail, by York.

5533. On the Continent, I have been told that when they put a cordon round a place to prevent the cattle plague, they do not allow any living creature to pass that cordon, out of the infected district, either human beings or animals; would you propose such a strong measure as that?—I do not think that. My meaning at the time was not to that extent. I thought, the disease being newly imported, by taking stringent measures at the time, it might have been stamped out; but it is a very difficult thing to stamp it out now. I believe it is simply impossible.

5534. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] How would you do if the same thing were to occur again; supposing England could be entirely free from the cattle plague, and it broke out on the Continent again, what steps would you take?—I would propose at once, not to allow a beast to go from the place which was infected, and kill every beast that was infected with it.

5535. Would you propose there should be a general law, like that in Ireland, that the animals should be slaughtered, and that compensation should be made, to be paid out of the common rate, out of the union rate?—Decidedly.

5536. Would you propose that that should be applied to Scotland and England?—Ireland would be in a better position than we have been in, because they have had the experience of England and Scotland.

5537. Do you not think for the future it will be best to apply the same system to Scotland and England as has been applied to Ireland?—Decidedly.

5538. Mr. Carnegie.] Can you give us some information with regard to the Edinburgh slaughter-houses?—Yes.

5539. There are no private slaughter-houses in Edinburgh?—None.

5540. Is there one or more public slaughter-house?—One in Edinburgh and one in Leith.

5541. And one in Granton?—Yes. There is a new one erected in Granton since the new Orders in Council came out.

5542. What system of arrangement is there in these slaughter-houses in Edinburgh?—In Edinburgh, all the principal butchers pay a rent of, I think, some 8*l.* or 10*l.* to have the right to the slaughter-house; they pay city dues besides; I think there are three or four common slaughter-houses for men who may send in their beasts if they can find room to hang up a beast or a sheep. I know when the new restriction came out we went and took two of the slaughter-houses for our own use; we paid a rent for the time we were in there. In Leith it is similar. In Glasgow they have three slaughter-houses. But the magistrates wished to convert them into one at the cattle market.

5543. Lord Naas.] Are there any private slaughter-houses in Glasgow?—None. There are three public ones. They had what is called the "Market Bill" last year. The butchers demurred to it; and I gave evidence upon it. In such a place as Glasgow, where there are 400,000 inhabitants, I could not see that it would be convenient, as it would be very expensive, for the butchers to come from the other end of Glasgow, where they have a slaughter-house at present, to get up to the market. I pointed out, that a man killing eight or nine beasts a-week, and keeping an extra horse and cart to drive the meat there, and sending a butcher away to kill a pair of lambs, or some such other little things, would occasion considerable expense to be incurred by him. I did think it would be very much against the trade to congregate all the slaughter-houses in Glasgow at one large abattoir.

5544. It would be inconvenient?—Yes.

5545. What has been done?—The three slaughter-houses continue as before.

5546. They are all three public slaughter-houses?—All public slaughter-houses. There is no private slaughter-house. To day, in the cattle market, some of the salesmen were speaking to me about London; I said, I was afraid that they would never get every butcher to have his own private slaughter-house; that they could never get the Government to allow that state of things to continue.

5547. What did they say to that?—They thought it was interfering with the trade; but in such a place as London, I do not see that it could be managed without there were a good many different slaughter-houses around the city.

5548. But still, from your knowledge of the way it is carried on in Glasgow and Edinburgh, if there were a sufficient number of public slaughter-houses established in London, you think it might be done without interfering with the trade?—I think so in London; but they would require a good many slaughter-houses in London with such a population.

Mr. JOHN SWALES, called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. Swales.

11 June 1866.

5549. Chairman.] WHAT are you?—A Butcher.

5550. You live in Leeds?—Yes.

5551. The Leeds Cattle Market is the source of supply for Leeds and a considerable district around, is it not?—It is.

5552. What quantity of people have been supplied with meat purchased in the Leeds cattle market?—The number of inhabitants in Leeds borough is marked as 250,000, and the districts round about Halifax, Bradford, and other towns, bring it to nearly one million of inhabitants, we think.

5553. Where do the supplies of cattle come from which come to the Leeds market?—At this period of the year, chiefly from Scotland and Northumberland, and foreign cattle from Hull when they were allowed to come. Foreign cattle are not allowed to be removed from Hull to Leeds; we are now confined to Northumberland and Scotland.

5554. In other periods of the year, where do you get it from?—There are large grazing districts in the neighbourhood, Wharfdale and Airedale; and from the latter end of June to September and October, we have grass fed cattle out of those districts. This year is an exceptional year, and there are not the number of cattle in those agricultural grazing districts to supply Leeds that there have been in former years, owing to the cattle plague having been in those neighbourhoods. Farmers have been slow at purchasing cattle to graze during this year.

5555. Are the supplies from the north of England and Scotland sufficient for the Leeds cattle market?—No; cattle are only allowed to be sold now in Leeds, and slaughtered in the borough, and we require 500 weekly; the number in the market last Wednesday was 186.

5556. The supplies from Scotland and the north of England are very much lessened, are they not?—They are lessened, and they generally fall off altogether at the latter end of June.

5557. They are nearly exhausted now?—They are nearly exhausted now; last week there were 186, nearly all from the north; the week before there were 189, and in the previous week there were 280.

5558. Is there a prospect of a still further reduction in the supply of cattle in the Leeds market?—There does not appear to be any source of supply when they are exhausted in Northumberland and Scotland, in the district round about Leeds, the few cattle that there are are not yet ready.

5559. Can the deficiency be made up from other cattle markets?—We could have made up the deficiency last week, could we have been allowed to remove them from the metropolitan cattle market, or any other market, but that is not allowed at the present time.

5560. I did not quite understand what you stated about the cattle in the districts surrounding Leeds; did you say they generally come in at the end of June?—Leeds is a town which is on the borders of the agricultural districts on the one side, and the mining and manufacturing districts on the other; there is a great quantity of cattle grazed generally, and they are available for the butcher from the middle of June to the latter end of the year; say to October.

5562. Then you cannot look forward to a supply from the surrounding districts?—At present we cannot.

5563. And not at all if they have not got the cattle?—It will be very late in the year if we get it at all.

5564. How do you supply the deficiency of meat for the consumption of the people of Leeds?—The deficiency has been supplied by dead carcases of beef from Hull.

5565. Foreign cattle slaughtered at Hull?—Yes; during the cold weather, but now foreign cattle cannot come from Hull in a slaughtered state; a little while ago the Corporation fitted up a dead-meat market in Leeds, and this dead-meat market was supplied every Wednesday and Thursday with carcases of foreign cattle slaughtered in Hull; slaughtered on a Monday or Tuesday, and brought to Leeds on Wednesday; that is not now practicable, because it would spoil before it could be consumed.

5566. Cannot the meat be kept a day or two in summer weather?—It has to be killed in Hull on the Monday and has to hang from 12 to 24 hours to get stiff, as it cannot be removed as soon as it is slaughtered. Then it has to be conveyed by the train to Leeds, and is exposed there for sale; then it is bought by the butchers, and a great length of time is occupied; the meat would be entirely useless by the time it got exposed in the butcher's shop for sale.

5567. How long must it be between the slaughtering in Hull and the exhibition in the butcher's shop in Leeds?—At the very least it would be two days; it might be longer, but at the very least it would be two. In hot weather we kill them in one day and exhibit them in the butcher's shop the next day direct from the slaughterhouse, without the tossing about there is in the transit of a dead beast from one place to another, and that has a tendency to make it spoil much sooner than otherwise it would do.

5570. What is the difference in price to the consumers now, when they buy from the butchers, to what it was a year or two ago?—I can recollect when it was not half the price it is now.

5571. Mr. Dent.] Take this time last year?—I should think it would be 3*d.* a lb. as an average.

5572. Mr. Edward Egerton.] What do you sell it at now?—We are selling the best cuts of beef, that is loins and crops, by themselves, nicely dressed meat, at 1*s.* a lb. I sell them at 11 d. where I am; and I am not in the very best part of the town.

5573. Where do you live?—I live in Hunslet-road. This meat has been as high as 1 s., and I myself have sold it at 11 d.

5574. What was the price last year?—From 8 d. to 9 d.

5575. What do you pay for beef steaks at Leeds?—Fifteen pence a lb. the best.

5576. What was it last year?—Not more than from 10 d. to 1 s.

5577. Is there a lessened supply of the inferior parts of the animal for the poorest people in Leeds?—There must necessarily be, there is, in fact.

5578. Do you hear of any complaints in the town as to the want of a proper supply of meat?—Yes; people came to my shop last Saturday, when I told them the price, they went away, and said they would never buy any more meat at that price.

5579. Chairman.] Are you of opinion that it is necessary that foreign cattle should be allowed to be removed from Hull, and sold in the Leeds cattle market to be slaughtered at Leeds, for consumption there?—That is my opinion. I think it would be quite as safe as allowing them to come into the metropolitan markets here, for the same purpose.

5580. You would take precautions at Hull, that they were healthy cattle when they were forwarded to Leeds?—We do not want any but healthy cattle.

5581. You think there would be no injury to owners of stock elsewhere: any chance of spread the cattle plague by allowing the foreign beasts, if they are healthy, to be sent by rail from Hull to Leeds, to be slaughtered there?—I think there would be no danger, and from the report I have received from the cattle inspector, there has not been a single case of cattle plague at Hull, during the last 14 weeks there has not been a case at Leeds, nor within a radius of 10 miles round Leeds, during the last 19 weeks. We consulted the local authority, the cattle plague committee, as to whether they would have any objection to allowing foreign healthy cattle to come to Leeds, and be exhibited in the market for sale for immediate slaughter; and the local committee passed a resolution on the subject of which resolution I have a copy.

5583. You would not allow these cattle to leave the Leeds market alive?—We have no desire that they should leave Leeds alive.

5584. The foreign cattle are landed in the Thames?—Yes.

5585. And then brought to the Metropolitan Cattle Market for slaughter, but may be removed to any part of the district?—Yes.

5586. Do you see any difference between that and what you propose from Hull to Leeds?—I do not see any difference. The transit of live cattle from Hull to Leeds would occupy about three hours, and they could come direct to the Leeds market, and be sold there, and be slaughtered in Leeds; they would be slaughtered the same day, or the day following that on which they were exhibited for sale in Leeds, and consumed that week.

5587. Do you think that the prices will keep up, and the supply remain deficient, unless the foreign cattle are allowed to be brought from Hull to Leeds?—I think the supply will get less, and that the prices will consequently get higher.

5590. Have not any of these places got cattle markets of their own?—Some have, such as Bradford; but they are markets which have only been instituted quite recently, since the "Cattle Plague Act."

5591. Mr. Dent.] Bradford was entirely supplied from Leeds and Wakefield, until the cattle plague began, was it not?—Yes.

5592. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] There was no cattle market at Bradford?—No; the two markets of the West Riding, were Leeds and Wakefield.

5593. Chairman.] I do not quite see why the same mischief should not arise from sending the dead meat from Leeds to these districts, that arises from sending it from Hull?—Leeds is much more central; and the butcher could buy one or two cattle, or so many as he wanted at Leeds, alive, and then he would have the cattle in his own hands to slaughter.

5594. But, as far as the hot weather is concerned, the mischief arising from not slaughtering on the spot where it is sold, as it were, for consumption, would apply to the case of Leeds and its districts, would it not?—No, not at all.

5595. Mr. Dent.] How far is Bradford from Leeds by railway?—Eight miles.

Mr. J. Swales.

11 June 1866.

5596. Chairman.] It is a question of an hour or two, more or less?—Not at all; a butcher cannot get from Bradford to Hull to kill the cattle and bring them from Hull; there is no cattle market at Hull; and the cattle there are in the hands of persons to whom they are consigned. They sell them in large numbers, and they are slaughtered on the Monday, generally.

5597. Who is it that slaughters them there; who superintends that operation?—I have not been there to see.

5598. They would be butchers, I suppose?—Yes; but they buy and slaughter them there, and they have to bring them to another intervening market to sell; instead of bringing dead carcases to an intervening market to sell, the live animals would be brought, and, instead of being dead on a certain day, they would be alive on that certain day, and it would save two, if not three, days in hot weather.

5599. You think that this is a very pressing case?—I do think so.

5600. Supposing nothing is done, what do you consider will be the state of things in a month at Leeds?—We are very loyal at Leeds, and I do not think we should kick up a row or make any disturbance.

5601. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] You would not be strong enough for that?—I think we should submit to the grievance philosophically, and make the best we could of it.

5602. Chairman.] I want to know what would be your actual condition in a month's time, supposing nothing was done?—There would be no beef, or next to none, to sell.

5603. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] You would have mutton?—We have foreign sheep come, but foreign cattle do not. We have mutton, but it is 1½ d. lb. dearer than it is in London. Sheep come from the south, and go to our market in Leeds; when in the ordinary state of things they would come from Leeds to London.

5604. Mr. Carnegie.] Do you ever buy any meat in the metropolitan market to send to Leeds?—I do not. It would be worthless. The dead meat trade from long distances to the metropolis is almost entirely set aside in hot weather. Very little meat comes from Leeds in hot weather to sell at London.

5605. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Are you aware of the quantity of dead meat that comes from Scotland to London all through the summer?—I am not.

5606. Mr. Carnegie.] Did you hear the last witness state, that cattle had been bought in the metropolitan market for the purpose of supplying Glasgow?—I did not hear him say so. I did not hear his evidence at all.

5607. Mr. Dent.] In ordinary seasons you very frequently send meat from Leeds to London, do you not?—It is a very common thing.

5608. Do the better parts of the carcases come from Leeds to London?—They do.

5609. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Do not you think there will be some complaints on the part of the inhabitants of Halifax and different towns, that they cannot have the privilege of having the cattle, if you have that privilege at Leeds?—They would rather have it perhaps, but what I say is, they would be very thankful to get it at Leeds.

5610. The same arrangement would be good for those towns as it would for Leeds, and if we allow the importation of live cattle to Leeds, should it not be extended to the towns in the neighbourhood of Leeds?—I do not represent their interests.

5611. It affects them more than Leeds?—If they think proper to get the grievance remedied they are at liberty to do so.

5612. Mr Alderman Salomons.] Which is the nearest cattle market to Leeds?—Wakefield; but that is in exactly the same position as Leeds.

5613. How far is that from Leeds?—Eight miles.

5614. Mr. Dent.] Wakefield is not a consuming place, like Leeds?—No; Wakefield is a small place, and Leeds is a very large place.

5615. Chairman.] Do you ever get any dead meat from Scotland in Leeds?—There are some dead carcases that have come during the time the weather was entirely cold; the animals that otherwise would have come alive have been slaughtered there, and have come dead; but they could not come in hot weather.

5616. Mr. Dent.] Generally speaking, at this time of year you get a number of beasts from Northumberland and Scotland?—Yes.

5617. That supply is now almost entirely stopped?—It generally ceases at the latter end of June every year.

5618. And the grass-fed beasts from Wharfdale and all the grazing districts do not come in until July?—Not until July.

5619. There will be scarcely any beasts, therefore, to come in then?—It is thought not; none have come as yet.

5620. It is a fact that there are none?—Yes.

5621. You know that yourself?—I know it. There are very few to be seen in the fields about, and it is stated the farmers have not got any, or very few.

5623. Altogether, you say, the population is something like a million of people round about the West Riding?—Yes; I think so.

5624. When they bought these cattle formerly they took them away to their own place alive, did they not?—They did.

5625. They did not have them killed in Leeds?—They did not.

5626. Then you believe they would all have to be killed in Leeds?—Yes, the foreign cattle would; the cattle that we are asking to be allowed to remove to Leeds market, we are asking to be allowed to remove with the intention of killing them at Leeds.

5627. Formerly those cattle would have been bought by the butchers alive, and taken away to be killed at their own place?—They would.

5628. Would not that cause a great increase of slaughtering in Leeds?—It would.

5629. Would that be a healthy thing for the population in the hot weather?—The Cattle Plague Committee do not object, and they are the authority in the matter.

5630. I want to know whether causing such an increase of slaughtering in a crowded town like Leeds in the hot weather would not be prejudicial to the health of the public?—I do not think it would; I think there is nothing connected with the slaughtering of animals under proper restrictions and regulations as to cleanliness that is prejudicial to public health. I have been a butcher now nearly 30 years, and I never was a day from my work from illness all that time.

5631. By your plan you would concentrate the slaughtering of animals in Leeds, for a very considerable population all round it; in that way it would become very much greater than it ever has been?—It would.

5632. Would not there be a chance of an escape of blood or other animal matter, or decomposition, in hot weather, which might affect the health of the public?—I do not think it necessarily would be so.

5633. Would the local authorities of Leeds take care it would not be so?—I have no doubt they would.

5635. Is the blood purchased by sugar refiners, or people who want that article?—I do not sell my blood; I do not know what is the practice.

5636. What becomes of it?—It goes with the manure; the garbage is taken right away.

5637. Is any of the blood washed away into the sewers?—No, not with me. It is put among the garbage with the manure, and removed right away.

5638. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Do you sell it?—I sell the manure.

5639. The blood forms part of what you sell?—Yes. A farmer in the neighbourhood fetches it away, and supplies straw to me for it. I do not know how other people do. I have seen it at several slaughter-houses put into large casks and bunged up and taken away.

5640. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Is Leeds a weekly market?—Yes.

5641. What are the number of beasts brought into the market in ordinary times?—The weekly consumption in Leeds is 500 in ordinary times.

5642. Do you know the number that is brought into the market, supposing the cattle plague had not been there?—I have not the numbers, and I cannot speak positively.

5643. Mr. Dent.] Is it not from 700 to 900 a week?—I think about that; but I have not the numbers, and I do not wish to state any number that I cannot stand upon. 186 was the number exhibited last week.

5644. Sir M. W. Ridley.] What number are you getting from the Newcastle market?—They are all out of the North, or nearly so. They do not put them into the Newcastle market, and then remove them to Leeds; they do not bring them from one market to another.

5646. Do you have any dead meat from Newcastle now?—There were a few lots came under exceptional circumstances, and they came in a very bad state indeed. A dealer who was bringing them to the Leeds market, did not act according to the regulations; he did something he ought not to have done, and those cattle were stopped; they were killed at Newcastle and sent on to Leeds, and a butcher who bought some, said that they were worth 1*d.* per pound less to him.

5647. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Was that in consequence of the depreciation?—Depreciation by their being killed in Newcastle, and the carcases sent to Leeds. The weather was so bad.

5648. Chairman.] Do you belong to the Butchers' Association in Leeds?—Yes.

5649. Is that an association of all the butchers there?—It is the association of many of the butchers.

5650. Mr. Edward Egerton.] What is their object?—Their object is to prevent persons taking advantage of butchers. They defend one another in case of any lawsuit, which they think is an improper one, but more especially they look after the interests of the trade, as I am supposed to be doing now. Besides that, it is a charitable association.

5651. Has it anything to do with fixing the prices?—Not at all; such a thing was never mentioned at any meeting I have been at.

5652. Have you any book of rules?—I have not got it here, but I could send you a copy.

5653. Never mind that?—It is also a charitable association; we help persons that are poor, and contributions are given to the widows of poor deceased butchers.

5654. Mr. Dent.] You would not object, if it was thought requisite, that all these foreign cattle should be slaughtered in the public slaughter-house of Leeds?—We should not object.

5655. You would not object, if the Government thought it right, at the present time to have them all slaughtered in the public slaughter-house?—Not at all.

5656. Have you ever turned your attention at all to the question of having nothing but public slaughter-houses in Leeds?—I have not thought much about it.

5657. Do you think it would be a great inconvenience if you had proper slaughter-houses provided, and that each butcher should have his own compartment under his own control?—I do not think it would be a great inconvenience.

5658. Supposing it were thought right for the public health to do away with private slaughter-houses, do you think the supply of Leeds would be well conducted by means of public slaughter-houses?—If there were two or three of them in different localities, I should not see any objection.

5659. Would you be able in that way to supply the out-townships of Leeds, do you think?—The difficulty as to them would be, having to go to the long distances.

5660. Sir M. W. Ridley.] You spoke of the condition in which carcases sent to you from Hull would reach Leeds, and that it could not be done with advantage; has this meat been forwarded by special meat trains, or only by ordinary goods trains from Hull to London?—It has come generally by the trains running on the Tuesday night, and has been put on the Leeds market for sale early on Wednesday morning. The butchers in Leeds, and round about, have bought it in its dead state, and removed it in their carts to towns round about on the Wednesday.

5661. I think you stated it would only be three hours on, the journey?—I do not think it would be longer.

Mr. J. Swales. 11 June 1866.

5662. What is the distance from Hull to Leeds, direct?—About 60 miles.

5663. But it has not been forwarded by special train?—No; it is not the distance, but it is the time that is taken up in the sale of it. It has to be killed on the Monday night, and brought to Leeds, and then exhibited for sale on the Wednesday, and then taken by the buyer to his home to sell again by retail.

5664. You say it has come in an improper state?—In a very bad state.

5665. Was it brought in trucks, having proper ventilation; was it properly arranged in the trucks, and had it a fair chance?—I think so; the persons who brought it were the owners of it. They bought the cattle in Hull, and of course would do the best they could to bring it to Leeds in as good a state as it was possible, so as to get a good market for it.

5666. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] You say you would wish that all foreign cattle should be slaughtered at Leeds?—All that come to Leeds market.

5667. Should they be slaughtered by the butchers of Leeds, or by the butchers of the neighbouring towns?—There are a number of slaughter men at Leeds that would slaughter them, if the butchers who bought the animal desired it, or he might slaughter it himself. There is no compulsion.

5668. Would there be accommodation for the butchers of the neighbouring towns to slaughter the foreign cattle which they bought at Leeds?—We think there is; but if there is not, accommodation would be provided by the corporation at once, according to the resolution which I have placed before the committee to-day.

5669. You do not want to throw the profit of the slaughtering into the hands of the Leeds butchers alone?—There is no profit at all in the slaughtering, none at all.

5670. Mr. Dent.] You get no supply of Irish fat cattle at Leeds from Ireland, do you?—Not at present.

5671. In ordinary times you do not?—I have seen cattle from Ireland at Leeds market frequently.

5672. I mean cattle coming from Ireland?—Yes; they have been bought at Liverpool and Manchester.

5673. Lord Naas.] Could cattle be imported from Ireland, and sent to Hull and Leeds, if there was a large demand for them?—They do not come. I do not know what there is to prevent it.

5674. There is nothing to prevent it?—It does not come.

Mr. Samuel Higgins, called in; and Examined.

Mr. S. Higgins.

5675. Chairman.] What is your calling?—I am a Butcher and Cattle Dealer.

5676. Do you belong to the Butchers' Association?—Yes; and I am consignor of meat up to London market, occasionally. Of course I do not send now; I have not sent any for three months. It has been dearer in Leeds than it has been in London for some time. and that is the reason that we do not send any.

5677. You are not exporters but importers?—That is it.

5679. You say you do not want to slaughter in Leeds for the places in the neighbourhood of Leeds; you think that those places would be glad to have their cattle direct from Hull?—If they can get them, or from other parts.

5680. If the foreign cattle were allowed to be brought to Leeds, would not they all come there, as being the great market?—At present the Orders in Council prevent them going out of the borough.

5681. Supposing the Orders in Council were waived, would not the foreign cattle be all brought to Leeds for sale, that being the principal market?—Yes; if the restrictions were taken away, they would come to Leeds and Wakefield.

5682. And if you did not want them to be taken away from Leeds alive, the effect of the change would be, that the slaughtering for the district would take place in Leeds?—Yes.

5683. Although you do not wish it?—We are not so anxious about that; but we can give them any amount of accommodation they want. I believe we could accommodate all those places. The foreign cattle are a sort of supplementary affair. We want the cattle out of Northumberland; we have got them, as has been stated, up to this time. It is falling, and generally does fall, entirely at the end of June, or about that time; but we prefer that kind of cattle; in point of fact, we are really dependent on it, for the foreign cattle suit the rougher kind of buyers. For my part, I never cut up such a thing as a foreign bullock or a foreign heifer either. I cut up Northumberland beasts when I can get them; and when I cannot get Northumberland beasts, I endeavour to get Irish beasts from Liverpool. I prefer that. I have not cut up three foreign cattle for the last ten years; it is a rougher kind of meat, which does for the working classes. To fill up, we have already those 180 beasts that have been talked about; they are all fine, splendid bullocks, as good as any cattle that have ever come into any market in the world. They do for the

the best butchers; but it is the low class of cutters who are without meat, and who supply the working classes. The working classes cannot get it: they have to give such high prices for the rougher portions of the meat.

5684. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Where does that good class of meat come from?—From the North, beyond Newcastle; out of Berwickshire and Fifeshire.

5688. I suppose the working classes in Leeds are pretty well supplied now, and generally in the receipt of good wages; there is no lack of employment?—The working classes are very well off, generally speaking.

5689. They have plenty of money to get beef with, if there is beef to be had?—No doubt, and they want beef; they like good eating and drinking in Leeds, and they would prefer to lay out their money, but they do not like the high prices. They were very sore on Saturday, very sore indeed. In our town some of them rebelled, and would not have it. They believe in beef and mutton if they can get it, but it is too high for them now. We have to charge the working classes something like 9*d.* and 10*d.* for rough cuts. I have sold bodies of beef in Leeds for 8½*d.* per lb., which could have been bought in London, last week, at 6½*d.* per pound. There is a difference of 2*d.* a pound in the carcase. Beefsteaks are sold at a better price in London, in some parts, than in others; and beefsteaks are not a criterion with regard to the price of meat. Mr. Swale has sold beefsteaks at 1*d.* and 1½*d.* a pound less than I have, and at other times, perhaps, he has been able to make more. It is not a fair criterion. You want to take the live cattle market to draw your conclusions. We visited the Cattle Market here last Monday; we went into the live stock market previously to going to Mr. Bruce, and priced some cattle, and we found we could buy the very best at a crown a stone here at London, and could buy the best mutton at 8*d.* a pound. On the Wednesday following, that is two days after, I bought my beef at Leeds, at something like 6*s.* 4*d.* a stone, that is 2*d.* a pound more.

5690. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Had not the weather something to do with that?—No.

5691. It was uninfluenced by the weather?—Yes.

5692. Generally speaking, you say Leeds is a cheaper market than London?—Yes, it is, generally speaking. I have been in the habit of sending bodies of meat up, and bodies of lambs for a number of years, ever since the Great Northern and the Midland Railways opened; of course we could not send, unless we could make a small profit, but, at the present time, in consequence of the scarcity of beef, there is no such thing as sending it up to London.

5693. Mr. Carnegie.] Have you tried sending beef from London to Leeds during the present scarcity of it?—Yes, we had some down not long ago; a friend of mine, who is in the habit of sending large quantities of mutton up, sent for some beef down.

5694. Chairman.] How did it come down?—It came down in a wretched state, compared to what it would have, provided we could have slaughtered it ourselves in Leeds. The meat that is in Newgate and Leadenhall markets is often in a wretched condition when it gets to Newgate and Leadenhall.

5695. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] What do you mean by that?—It is musty, and looks badly; and unless the butcher when he gets it to his shop, trims it up, it would very soon be worthless to him. One half the meat that comes up is in a musty and stale condition, very often, when it gets to the butcher's shop.

5696. Mr. Edward Egerton.] But we have had evidence before us that the best meat in London is the Scotch meat?—Yes, Scotland can send the best quality of meat of any place in the world.

5697. And it generally arrives in perfect condition, does it not?—I have no doubt that the Scotch people have had so much experience, that they know how to send meat that looks as well as any meat in the kingdom, but in muggy weather they are put to flight; in muggy, warm weather they get a warming.

5698. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] I suppose, with regard to the Leeds journey, the meat that comes up to London, and goes back there, has two journeys instead of one, and that may have something to do with it?—I do not know more than this. We got some beef down last week; one of our salesmen in Newgate, Mr. Holmes, was kindly invited to send a few bodies of beef down, in order that we might try it. It was an experiment, and such an experiment as would not be repeated.

5699. Do you know how it was brought down?—It was brought down in baskets by the Great Northern Railway, covered in cloths, but we did not like it. It was landed on Saturday morning.

5700. Mr. Edward Egerton.] That was an exceptional ceptional case; could you not have had it arrive at a later day; why could it not have come on the Friday instead of the Wednesday?—Our live cattle market was on the Wednesday, and they provided the dead meat market according to the request of the Privy Council, on the Wednesday, to accommodate not the town, but the district as well, but it was a very great inconvenience.

Mr. S. Higgins.

11 June 1866.

5702. Chairman.] There is this question on the other hand as to the cattle plague; these restrictions, of course, subject the community to inconvenience, but if we were to risk the continuance of the plague by suspending them, we might, perhaps, consult the convenience of Leeds at too high a price?—There is one thing I think it my duty to refresh the Committee upon, and that is, that the Committee ought to know that no diseased cattle have been received in Hull for some time back.

5704. Mr. Dent.] Some of these places have established cattle markets temporarily, have they not?—Yes.

5705. And they might be sent to those towns under these restrictions alive, without the butchers coming to Leeds to buy any at all?—Yes, that would be the best plan.

5706. I suppose Leeds, Huddersfield, and Halifax go to their own markets; they do not take them from Wakefield?—No, they must take them into their own towns, and there be slaughtered. They have made their own arrangements. The mayor of Berwick-on-Tweed, Mr. Ruddock, is a very large supplier to these districts. He undertakes to supply those large towns, but he supplies them at a greater cost than they would have to give if they were pitched into the market. He dictates his own terms.

5707. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Who has undertaken to do that?—Mr. Ruddock, of the firm of Ruddock & Co.; he is the mayor of Berwick.

5708. Who has he given the undertaking to?—To the various butchers in various towns.

5710. Do you agree with the last witness, that the price of meat in Leeds is 3*d.* per lb. higher than it was last year?—Not quite 3*d.* a lb.; I think Mr. Swales would have been nearer the mark if he had said 2*d.* or a little over. I think that about this time last year we were giving somewhere about a crown a stone.

5712. There were 186 in the market last week; how many of these foreign cattle could you get from Hull, if you were allowed to bring them to Leeds?—Sometimes 200, sometimes double that quantity, sometimes more. It just depends upon how they arrive, and the price which will tempt men to send them over. It is a very uncertain trade. Sometimes none arrive, and sometimes a large quantity arrive.

5713. But you think upon an average you would bring the supply up to pretty nearly what it ought to be?—Something like 200 or 300 a week would fetch us up. The dealers would regulate it; if they brought too many one week, they would not bring so many next week; 200 or 300 a week is what we want in addition.

5714. You think you could get that?—Yes, I think we could.

5715. Mr. Dent.] Have you turned your attention to the question of having nothing but public slaughter-houses in Leeds?—I have thought of it.

5716. What do you think as to the practicability of it?—I have no doubt that it is practicable; but we do not want it, for we have got accommodation near at hand.

5717. Is there much slaughtering in Leeds in private slaughter-houses attached to the butchers' own shops?—Very little.

5718. Principally in these large registered slaughter-houses?—Yes.

5719. You may almost call them public slaughter-slaughter-houses?—They are in reality public slaughter-houses.

5720. You do not think there is any difficulty in the supply of a town like Leeds from public slaughter-houses?—Not at all.

Mr. J. Higgins. 11 June 1866.

Mr. James Stewart, called in; and Examined.

5722. Lord Naas.] What is your profession?—I am a Butcher.

5723. Where do you carry on business?—In the city of Aberdeen.

5724. Have you been long engaged in slaughtering meat for transmission to the London market?—Yes.

5725. What number of beasts have you been in the habit of killing per week during the last winter?—I have not a statement of the last winter, but during the year 1865, I had about 1,600 l. worth.

5726. Are there many butchers in Aberdeen who carry on the same trade?—Yes.

5727. Is it principally the primest meat which is sent up in this way?—Principally.

5728. State to the Committee what is the usual course of the trade from the time the beast is killed until the time it arrives in London?—If it was killed on Monday it would go away probably on Tuesday morning at nine o'clock.

5729. When will it be exposed for sale in Newgate Market?—On the Thursday following, I should think; it depends a little on the trade.

5730. Does the trade vary much between one part of the year to what it does in the other?—Yes; in cold weather it is more than double, I should say.

5731. When you speak of cold weather, how many months in the year is the weather sufficiently cool for this trade to be carried on successfully?—Eight months.

5732. Does it wholly cease during the other four months?—No.

5733. Is it carried on throughout the whole year?—Except it is very warm weather, it would be.

5734. I suppose the Committee may understand, that for the two months out of four to which you have alluded, it is carried on pretty briskly?—Yes.

5735. What becomes of the offal?—It is sold.

5736. To whom?—To the public.

5737. Is it consumed in Aberdeen?—For the most part.

5738. Is any of it salted or preserved for sending away?—No; part of it is sent to Glasgow and Dundee.

5739. In a fresh state?—Yes.

5740. Are any of the trades which manufacture different products from offal, such as blood-manure, and sausage-skins, and also preserving of tripe, carried on in Aberdeen?—Tripe, I believe, is preserved.

5741. Do you know the price that is obtained for the offal?—It generally ranges from 8 s. to 10 s. a beast.

5742. Do you know what price is got for similar products in London?—No.

5743. Or in Glasgow?—I do not.

5744. You cannot tell the Committee whether the price varies very much for offal, as between Aberdeen and Glasgow?—No; I could not say that.

5745. Have you any statement to make to the Committee generally about the trade. Have you any recommendation or wish to put forward to the Committee about the dead-meat trade?—No; I have nothing that I can say about it.

Mr. J. Stewart.

5746. Has it been an increasing trade lately? Yes.

5747. How long has the dead-meat trade been in existence, from Aberdeen to London?—I suppose nearly 30 years.

5748. Was it commenced almost immediately after the arrangements of the direct railway communication?—Long before that. We used to send up by the steamer.

5749. None goes by boat at the present time, does it?—Yes.

5750. That is principally in the winter time, I suppose?—Principally in the winter.

5751. It takes much longer going by boat?—It takes a day longer.

5752. What is the difference in the expense?—About 1 s. a cwt.

5753. In favour of the boat?—Yes.

5754. Have you ever considered the difference between the price of sending an animal alive to London from Aberdeen, and sending an animal dead?—It is cheaper by sending the carcase dead; there is less expense.

5755. Tell the Committee what is the actual difference between sending a beast of 8 cwt. to London dead, and sending the beast alive?—I could not state that.

5756. Mr. Dent.] What is the cost of a beast from Aberdeen to London, alive?—Twenty shillings by the rail.

5757. How much do you pay per cwt. for your dead meat to London?—We pay 3 l. a ton.

5758. Therefore 8 cwt. of beef would cost you 24 s.?—Yes.

5759. Then, as far as the actual cost between a live beast and a dead beast is concerned, the dead meat would cost rather more coming to London than the live meat?—Yes, if that is an average weight; but it is not an average weight.

5760. When you say that it is cheaper to send it dead than alive, how do you arrive at that conclusion?—Because if we send the animals alive, they have only to keep them one or two days here. We send them by the boat, which leaves on Wednesday; they arrive here possibly on Friday night, and they have to keep till Monday.

5761. Although the actual carriage by the rail of the animal may be something less alive, still the additional expense of keeping them in London comes to more?—Yes.

5763. Mr. Carnegie.] Does it include delivery? Yes, from my shop into Newgate Market; the price of meat taken out of my shop and put into Newgate Market is 3 l. a ton.

Mr. J. Stewart.

11 June 1866.

5764. Lord Naas.] Do you consign meat directly to a salesman at Newgate?—Yes.

5765. Do you buy the animal from the farmers?—Yes.

5766. Is it ever the case that the farmer consigns his meat through you to the salesman in Newgate, or do you always buy the animal from the farmers?—I have never had any consignments of the kind.

5767. Is that done according to your knowledge?—Not to my knowledge, but I know plenty of farmers consign their own cattle.

5768. Not as dead meat?—Yes; I mean that.

5769. Are the farmers in the habit of killing their own meat and sending it up to London dead?—Yes, many of them.

5770. Is that practised to a large extent?—I could not say to a large extent, but it is extending.

5771. The practice is increasing, is it?—Yes.

5772. As well for sheep as for beef?—I do not think it is for sheep.

5773. Merely for beef?—Yes.

5774. Do you send any mutton?—We generally send the sheep alive.

5775. Is there not a good deal of mutton sent up from Aberdeen?—No, not much.

5776. How do you send the beef, is it packed in sheets?—It is packed in sheets.

5777. Does the railway provide any particular description of carriage for it?—They prepare the trucks for it, and they only put a certain quantity of meat in them.

5778. Is there any particular dead meat carriage?—Not that I am aware of.

5779. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] They are cut in quarters and sewed into a sort of coarse cloth?—Yes.

5780. Mr. Carnegie.] Cut into halves principally, are they not?—Halves and quarters; most of it goes in halves now; but when the provision curers buy the fore quarters, they generally come up in hind quarters.

5781. If you are going to send a whole beast to London, what do you do?—We send it in halves.

5782. Lord Naas.] Are many of the prime joints sent up, and the inferior joints kept down in Aberdeen, or is the meat generally sent up in carcase?—Except as I stated, that if the provision curers purchase the fore quarters, it is generally sent either in hind quarters or in halves. We do not cut it less.

5783. Is there a large preserving trade carried on in Aberdeen?—There are two or three houses.

5784. For the purpose of sending to sea and abroad?—I do not know where it is sent, but they cure it.

5785. Mr. Carnegie.] What are called preserved meats are largely made in Aberdeen?—Yes 5786. Lord Naas.] Do they use the prime parts for that?—The fore quarters.

5787. Of those beasts, the hind quarters are generally sent to London?—Generally sent to London.

5788. Have you a trade to any other city in the United Kingdom, except to London; do you send to Glasgow?—I have sent to Glasgow, Edinburgh, and Newcastle; but only for a few months on the restrictions of the cattle plague being removed.

5789. That is a new trade?—Quite.

5790. Has there been a large demand from those towns?—It is very uncertain.

5791. Then you can only send, I suppose, as it is ordered?—I have not sent; I only made a trial at each place, and it did not suit, as I thought.

5792. Mr. Dent.] Has your trade increased very much since the restrictions, in consequence of the cattle plague; have you sent much more to London?—No.

5793. Not more than the ordinary course of the trade?—Not more than ordinary.

5794. Is the trade ever entirely stopped by the hot weather?—Yes.

5795. For how long?—I could not say; it might be a week.

5796. It would depend, I suppose, on the weather?—Yes; a week or a month, or something of that sort.

5797. Sir M. W. Ridley.] Are your consignments of dead meat going on at this moment?—Yes.

5798. Are you consigning to Newcastle at the present time?—No.

5799. Have you had many complaints of the condition of the meat that you have consigned to Newgate Market?—Very few.

5800. Or its condition on its arrival?—Very few.

5801. At any season of the year?—At any season.

5802. Have you had complaints within the last week or ten days?—No.

5803. How long a period of time elapses between the slaughtering of a beast and its being put into the trucks at this season of the year?—Possibly 12 hours.

5804. Is it so short a time in winter?—Longer.

5805. I presume you consider it very essential that the carcase should be thoroughly cooled and stiffened before it is trucked for Newgate market?—Yes; but we could not wait to take it this season of the year in that short time.

5806. Does not a good deal depend upon the condition of the animal at the very time of its being slaughtered, as to whether it will keep cool and make the journey satisfactorily?—I quite agree in that.

5807. I ask you if it is so?—It is; the beast should be kept a certain time before being slaughtered.

5808. Mr. Carnegie.] And should be kept in a quiet state?—Yes, it should be kept in a quiet state until slaughtered; and the meat will keep double the length of time then.

5809. Sir M. W. Ridley.] You would consider that an animal killed in a cool state of blood would keep as a dead carcase very much better than one that had been driven and heated?—I should think it would keep double the time.

5811. Although it had travelled?—Although it had travelled, if it is left after that to cool.

5812. It would keep longer than the animal driven, we will say, from the Metropolitan Market to the west end of London, and then slaughtered?—I do not think a butcher would do that.

5813. He would give the beast six or eight hours to keep?—Twelve or 24 would be better.

5814. Lord Naas.] Are there any foreign beasts brought to Aberdeen?—No.

5815. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] I suppose you have had great experience in meat that has been slaughtered?—I think I have.

5816. Can you tell unwholesome meat from wholesome meat by merely looking at it?—I think I could.

5817. Could you tell an animal that had been unhealthy from one that had been healthy?—I think I could give a pretty near opinion.

5818. Do you think you can tell by looking at meat whether it is fit for human food or not?—I think I could form a pretty good opinion.

5819. But do you think the opinion that you formed would be pretty accurate?—I should think so.

5820. Do you think that when the carcase of a diseased animal is sold, the butcher is aware that he is doing a great wrong?—I do.

5821. Mr. Carnegie.] Do you send any live cattle to London?—Yes.

5822. Do you send them at all seasons of the year, or at any particular season?—More particularly in the winter season.

5823. Do you make any difference in the qualities of the animals which you send alive and dead; do you send the primest animals alive or dead?—Just as we chance to get them.

5824. Do you send the heaviest animals alive or dead, or just as you chance to get them?—Just as they come.

5825. I have heard it stated that the primest animals are sent alive, and I have heard the reverse stated. I want to hear your opinion upon that. You buy largely all over the north of Scotland, do you not?—In the county of Aberdeen principally.

5826. Have you any trade in Banffshire and Morayshire?—I have been in Banff and Moray, both for sheep and cattle.

5827. When you buy cattle in the outlying parts of Aberdeenshire, do you bring them into Aberdeen to be slaughtered, or do you slaughter them in the neighbourhood of the railway stations?—I generally have turnips in winter, and grass in summer, and put them into the fields, or to the farmers; and I take them to Aberdeen as I want them.

5828. You take them by train?—Generally by train.

5829. Do you send many live cattle by sea to London?—I send them by sea, rather than by rail.

5830. For what reason do you prefer sending them by sea than by rail?—We have a chance then of giving them a little meal and water. We have none by rail.

5831. Do you consider that the arrangements of the railway companies for the transit of cattle from Aberdeen to London are good or bad?—They are the only ones we have, but I think they could be improved greatly.

5832. Do you think it would be advantageous if they gave the cattle food and water on the journey?—I think it would be to their advantage to give them water above everything.

5833. Have you seen any plan for giving the cattle water in the trucks?—No; I have heard of such a thing, but I have never seen the plan.

5834. Do you think it would be possible to give them water in the trucks?—Yes; I think it would.

Mr. J. Stewart. 11 June 1866.

5836. Sir M. W. Ridley.] Are the boats reasonably well fitted for the conveyance of those animals?—They are very well fitted up.

5837. Mr. Carnegie.] What is the cost of sending an animal from Aberdeen to London by the boat?—The same as railway, 1 l., only they are allowed hay and water.

5838. Do your agents in London use the telegraph much for informing you as to the state of the markets?—I never get a telegram, except I write to say, send me one; it would be a rather uncommon thing if I did.

5839. Then you trust entirely to your own convenience for sending cattle to the London market, and not to telegrams that are sent that meat is required?—We never trust to that; we do not get them indeed.

5840. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Is the meat trade entirely a ready-money trade?—Entirely.

5841. The same as the live-stock trade, that is also a ready-money trade?—The same.

5842. If you send up your meat for one market, do you get your money back the next?—We get the money back in the course of a day and a half afterwards.

5843. It is understood not to be a credit trade?—Yes; it is all ready money.

5844. Mr. Carnegie.] Have you had much loss by meat spoiling on the journey?—Very little.

5845. Have you had much loss by the railway detaining it longer than the ordinary time?—Sometimes we have suffered by that.

5846. Are they willing to give compensation in such cases?—Very unwilling.

5847. But do you get it?—Not always.

5848. In Aberdeen do you have private slaughter-houses or public slaughter-houses?—There is a slaughter-house which belongs to the Corporation, and I think there are six of what you would call private slaughter-houses where parties slaughter, themselves.

5849. Sir M. W. Ridley.] How do you transact the slaughtering for you own business; where do you slaughter?—In the slaughter-market.

5850. The public slaughter-house?—Yes; I do not know whether you could call it a public slaughter-house; but it belongs to the Corporation.

5851. You pay for using it?—I pay the shop rent, or the rent for two shops, if I like to take them.

5852. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Have you a retail trade yourself?—Yes.

5853. What do you suppose to be the fair difference between the wholesale and retail price; that is, selling a bullock wholesale, and selling it retail at the shop; is it 1½*d.* or 2*d.* a pound?—I should say it would be about 2*d.*, or hardly so much as that.

MR. HUNT IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. Robert Herbert, called in; and Examined.

Mr. R. Herbert. 14 June 1866.

5854. Chairman.] You supply the newspapers with accounts of the prices in the markets?—Yes; I supply a great number of them, and have done so for upwards of 30 years.

5855. Do you supply all the papers?—Not the whole of them. I principally supply the "Mark-lane Express," "Bell's Messenger," and most of the other agricultural papers.

5856. Mr. Dent.] I think you also supply the "Royal Agricultural Journal"?—I do.

5857. Chairman.] What prices do you supply; do you supply the prices of the live or dead-meat market?—Of the live and dead as well.

5858. The prices at the Islington Cattle Market, and the prices at Newgate and Leadenhall Markets?—Quite so.

5859. How do you obtain the prices?—From my own judgment, frequently. An inexperienced man would have great difficulty in ascertaining the state of the trade, either in Newgate Market or in the cattle market; and hence it is you frequently see a wide discrepancy between the prices quoted in the agricultural papers and the quotations in the "Times," and some other leading journals.

5860. Which are the most correct quotations?—I should say my own. None but a purely practical man could, by possibility, get at the correct state of trade in the markets.

5861. Mr. Edward Egerton.] We want to know how you arrive at it; it is fair to tell you there have been great complaints made of the prices on both sides?—I have heard them frequently.

5863. When there is a number of animals sold for so much alive, you, from your own judgment, estimate what the dead meat would be, and then you quote the price of the live animals at so much per stone?—I take it at a fair average; take, for instance, a bullock of 80 stone, which is a very favourite weight; it will fetch perhaps 5 s. 4 d. a stone, but a bullock of equal quality, weighing 120 stone, will not fetch more than 5 s., so that that would make the average top price 5 s. 2 d.

5864. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Will you tell us the cause of the difference between a bullock of 50 stone and a bullock of 120 stone?—Because it is not so saleable; it is too large for general consumption. If you have a sirloin of beef off an ox weighing 120 stone, it would weigh nearly 30 lbs.

5865. Chairman.] I take it you ascertain from the salesmen the actual price at which animals of different sizes and qualities are sold; you estimate what the dead meat weight of each of those animals on the average would be, and then in that way you estimate the price per stone by the carcase?—For 8 lbs.; that is the way we calculate.

5866. Per stone of 8 lbs.?—No; it is illegal to quote at "per stone" of 8 lbs. We are obliged to ride through the Act of Parliament by quoting 8 lbs.; not "per stone" of 8 lbs.; because every newspaper proprietor is liable to a fine of 5 s. for every copy of a paper that goes out of his office in which the meat is quoted at "per stone" of 8 lbs.

5867. Mr. Dent.] But you do calculate it at the stone of 8 lbs.?—Yes; and I do it on this principle; that the farmers, and graziers, and butchers know nothing about 14 lbs. When the Act was passed, they said we will still buy by the 8 lbs., and evade the Act of Parliament.

5868. Chairman.] You evade the Act of Parliament by calling it a quantity of 8 lbs., and not a stone of 8 lbs.?—Yes.

5869. Your quotation is so much for 8 lbs.?—Yes.

5870. Do you regulate your judgment in this, by going to the dead meat markets?—Certainly.

5871. Do you go to the butchers?—To the salesmen.

5873. What they complain of is this, that the prices are quoted lower than what they have to give: and that their retail customers complain that while they see in the papers meat quoted at such and such a price, they are paying so much more?—Yes; but the customers run their heads against the quotations in Newgate Market. If they liked to go into the live market they would find a different state of things. Observe the risks which the butcher has to run. There is a difference in the price of live meat and dead meat. In the price of beef there is a difference of 6*d.* to 8*d.* per 8 lbs; in the price of mutton in the wool there is a difference of 1*s.* and 1*s.* 2*d.*, and sometimes more, when there is a great quantity of wool and a very fine fleece; out of the wool the difference is about 2*d.*, and it goes on increasing as the wool grows.

5874. When you quote the price of mutton sold in the wool, do you reckon the wool in or not?—We reckon by the dead meat weight.

5875. Do you take into consideration what the purchaser will make by the wool?—No. I make the estimate the moment the sheep come into the market; some of them are out of the wool; and I make the distinction and say, "The old Downs in the wool have fetched 6*s.* 4*d.*, and out of the wool 5*s.*"

5877. Do you think that the prices are wrongly quoted?—Sometimes they are right and sometimes it varies very much.

5878. Are they ever quoted too high? — I think so.

5879. They are quoted both too high and too low, in your opinion?—Yes.

5880. Can you tell us how the daily papers get their information?—I presume they send some one to the market.

5881. Mr. Edward Egerton.] You do not supply the daily papers?—No.

5882. Chairman.] Do you know the gentleman who supplies the daily papers?—No, I do not.

5883. Do you ever ask the butchers?—Yes; and I put their opinion against the opinion of the salesmen, and against my own.

5884. Mr. Edward Egerton.] You arrive at the price by striking a sort of average?—Just so. If I find Down sheep selling at 6*s.* 4*d.* a stone, as an extreme price, I call it 6*s.* 2*d.*, and then I say, "in extreme instances 6*s.* 4*d.*," which I think is the fairest way of doing it, because it stops a good deal of murmuring on the part of those who are in the country.

5885. You do pretty well what is done on the Stock Exchange, with shares and other things; if you are selling consols you never get the price you see quoted in the papers?—But you ought to.

5886. Have you any statement here which you have sent to the papers in any one week?—No.

5887. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] At what time do you get your average prices?—About 10 o'clock in the morning.

5888. I asked the question, because fault has been found with you, that you do not get them sufficiently late, and that they cannot be properly obtained until 11 o'clock?—All the best stock, which regulates the price, is frequently sold before 8 o'clock in the morning.

5889. Chairman.] Have you been in the market this morning?—Yes.

5890. Have you sent your quotations to any paper?—Not yet.

5891. But you are going to?—Yes.

5892. Can you give us now the result of your morning's work?—The price is very firm, at about Monday's quotation; that is, 5*s.* 4*d.* for the top price for beef; 6*s.* for mutton; 8*s.* for lamb; 6*s.* 4*d.* for veal, and 5*s.* 2*d.* for pork.

5893. Mr. Dent.] What sort of supply is there to-day?—A very moderate supply.

5894. Chairman.] In the way of beasts, what is the principal supply this morning? — The returns had not reached me when I left; but I should think there were about 350 English bullocks, and the rest foreign.

5895. How many foreign?—I should think about 900 foreign.

5896. That is a short supply, is it not?—It is. The quality of the meat is inferior, and the weight is very small, although the number may appear large.

5897. The foreign beasts are, for the most part, smaller than the English?—Yes; nearly all the Dutch bullocks and the Holstein bullocks.

5898. The Dutch bullocks do not come in now?—No, not at present. They have a way of running them to Antwerp, and shipping them off from there a little. I can tell by the black and white.

5899. You think that we do get Dutch beasts, although not from Dutch ports?—Yes, exactly.

5900. Were there any Danish beasts there this morning?—I should think about 60.

5901. And Spanish?—About 20. The Spanish beasts are very light in weighing, very light indeed.

5902. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Not as a general rule, are they?—They are as bad as the Irish.

5903. We have had evidence here that they were the finest beasts in the market?—That must be evidence from a salesman.

5904. They were Liverpool butchers who said so?—I do not think it is the case.

5905. Chairman.] Do you mean they are light in flesh?—You estimate a bullock to weigh, perhaps, 100 stone, and he does not weigh above 90, or, perhaps, 85 stone, when you get him home.

5906. Mr. Dent.] They do not, to use a butcher's phrase, "die well"?—No.

Mr. R. Herbert.

14 June 1866.

5907. Chairman.] Is it the case that they are large in the bone in proportion to the meat?—I should say they were; the French are the largest in bone.

5908. You think the Spanish beasts are not so profitable, for their size, as other beasts?—I should say not; but the Spanish are very showy-looking animals.

5909. With fine branching horns?—Very fine; I have seen Spanish animals with a span of seven feet between the horns.

5910. They make a very good picture alive? Yes, they do, with their black eyes, and so on.

5911. Mr. Dent.] What do you say with respect to the French bullocks?—Some of them are very largely framed, no doubt, and some very good.

5912. Chairman.] I asked this question, because we have had conflicting evidence about it in this room. Is the class of customers who buy the foreign beasts quite a distinct class of customers from those who buy English, as a rule?—I have found lately that some of the foreign beasts go to the west-end butchers: formerly, when they were in a much worse condition than they are now, they went down to Whitechapel, for east end consumption.

5913. But latterly they have been better?—Yes; I have seen good bullocks come.

5914. And they have been more purchased by west-end butchers than formerly?—A great deal more.

5915. Some of the west-end butchers we have had here have told us they do not buy foreign beasts?—I dare say they would tell you that.

5916. You think that the meat of the foreign beasts is not so popular, that there is a prejudice against it amongst the higher classes of consumers?—The prejudice arises in this way. After having cooked a quantity of meat, you will find the foreign meat will shrivel up in cooking very much, and there is a great loss as compared with the Scotch and the best English breeds.

5917. It wastes away in cooking?—Yes.

5918. Can you give any reason for that?—I suppose it is in consequence of the inferior quality of the food?—I should say so.

5919. You think that is the reason why there is a prejudice against it?—Yes. They can sometimes trim those things up very nicely, and make the meat look very nice in their shops. If it has got a fair quantity of fat upon it, of course it sells at a fair price.

5920. The contractors for the Government establishments principally buy foreign beasts, do they not?—They buy a great number.

5921. The price of an English beast of the same size as a foreign beast, in the market, would be very much in favour of the English beast, would it not?—Of the same weight, I should say from 3*l.* to 4*l.*

5922. Now, about the hides. Would the hides of the foreign beasts be of more value, or less value than the English?—As to the bullocks that come from the north, their hides sell at a price varying from 15*s.* to 1*l.* Those that come from France sell for about 20*s.* or 22*s.*

5923. What do the Spanish hides sell for?—The Spanish hides sell for about 23*s.*; it depends upon the size of the hides.

5924. Do you hear of any complaints from those who consign cattle to salesmen at the London market that the quotations are wrong?—I have often heard very great complaints.

5925. They are disappointed at the price which they obtain?—Yes.

5926. Do you think that they have good grounds for that?—Yes, I think they have.

5927. Can you suggest any mode of arriving at a more correct quotation in prices?—I do not know. Supposing you had a committee in the market, consisting of salesmen and butchers, both parties would be interested in giving higher prices than probably the state of the market would warrant.

5928. What we are told now is, that those who furnish the prices are interested in keeping the prices down?—It depends upon the position and standing of those gentlemen in the market, and their customers.

5930. It has been suggested here that there should be a joint committee of salesmen and butchers, which should furnish the quotations, or which should furnish prices to those concerned, like yourself?—The accuracy of their statement would entirely depend on their position in the market, that is to say, if they had a large business they would be disposed to give you correct and proper figures.

5931. Do you think, supposing the best class of men, both butchers and salesmen, that the butcher element would correct the salesmen's element?—You would always have to strike an average between the two.

5932. But they might strike it themselves?—There would be no objection to that, certainly.

5933. Have you considered the question of having a separate foreign market to the English market?—My opinion is, that if we had had a separate foreign market in the first instance, when the present tariff was passed, we should never have had the cattle disease in this country; if we had had a separate market, it would never have been here.

5934. Your opinion is, that we got this cattle plague from the foreign beasts?—Yes; it is the very same description of disease that they have had in Holland for a great number of years; I call it gastric fever.

5935. Mr. Dent.] Have they had it in Holland for a great number of years?—For centuries; exactly the same description of disease.

5936. Rinderpest?—Yes.

5937. Do you not think it is the genuine rinderpest, from the east of Europe?—Possibly it may be.

5938. If they have had it in Holland for a number of years, do you mean they have had it lately, or that it is a disease that has appeared there at one time, and then died out again?—Yes.

5939. You

5939. You do not mean that it has been existing in Holland within the last five or six years?—It has made its appearance, during various periods, for centuries.

5940. Chairman.] You do not mean continuously in Holland?—No, from time to time; every two, or three, or four years.

5941. We have been considering in this Committee whether it would be advisable to have a distinct foreign cattle market for the future. What is your opinion upon that?—I think, myself, that it would be beneficial to the country.

5942. As regard the trade; do you think the foreign trade would suffer?—Not at all.

5943. Can you give your grounds for that opinion?—Because the number of beasts and sheep in this country is certainly decreasing every year; I mean English beasts and sheep.

5944. Have you any data for that assertion?—It is my opinion that it is decreasing. I believe we have got some four or five million less sheep in the country than we had in the country 20 years ago.

5945. In what part of the country?—I take the whole country.

5946. I should like to know on what you found your opinion?—Principally on this fact, that prior to the passing of the present tariff, London was wholly supplied from our home countries, from Ireland and Scotland. We had not the aid of a single foreign bullock or foreign sheep. If the price of beef got up to 4*s.* 4*d.* a stone, it was considered very high, and if you got it to 4*s.* 6*d.* everybody was in a state of alarm. Then when the mutton in the wool got to 5*s.* a stone, people were greatly alarmed at that.

5947. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Have you ever taken into consideration the number of beasts that are killed in London in each week now, in comparison to what were killed in those days?—Yes; the number has increased very much, of course.

5948. Chairman.] The population has increased, and is it not the case that the consumption of meat has also increased very much. Do not the lower classes of the population eat more meat than they used to?—Yes, perhaps at the particular period I am alluding to, a labouring man would not have more than two joints of meat in the week, now he has three or four.

5949. Do not all classes of society eat more meat than they used to do?—I do not know; I dare say the upper classes were always able to get it.

5950. But is it not the case that more meat is consumed in gentlemen's families now than there used to be per head?—I dare say there is.

5951. Mr. Edward Egerton.] When you talk of the number of beasts being less, do you not think that upon every farm in England where 100 sheep used to be kept during the last century, 500 or 600 or 700 sheep are kept now?—It depends upon circumstances.

5952. Do you not know that it is the case, in consequence of improvements which have been going on in the drainage?—It would require great alteration in the system of tillage.

5953. Chairman.] Has there not been a great alteration in the system of tillage?—Possibly there has been; but if you take the lease of a farm, you are bound by certain covenants in it.

5954. Do you know, that with the present system of tillage in all parts of the country, a greater head of stock is kept on every farm than used to be kept 50 or 60 years ago?—It may be so.

5955. You have no statistics upon which to proceed?—None were published until recently.

5956. You go upon the number of foreign animals, cattle, and sheep which now come into London, and which we formerly did without?—Yes. Then you must look at the price. The price is now between 30 and 40 per cent. higher than it was 30 years ago.

5957. If you put alongside those facts, the fact that the population has increased, and that persons now eat more meat than was eaten in the last generation, that would then correct your view, would it not?—Perhaps it would in a great measure do so.

5958. Supposing that there was a foreign cattle market established at the river side for London, as has been proposed, do you think the buyers would come down there to purchase?—Yes, those who could get rid of the foreign meat easily.

5959. Do you think it would be convenient for the buyers?—The present system is certainly more convenient.

5960. To have them all in one market?—Yes.

5961. That convenience is bought at the risk of introducing disease from abroad?—Yes. Years ago they brought a great number of half-fed foreign bullocks and half-fed foreign sheep, and they were taken to Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambridge and Essex; more than two-thirds of them died of disease; hence, in my opinion, the rinderpest was thus communicated to our own stock.

5962. Do many store animals come into the London market?—No, it is not a market for store beasts.

5963. There is nothing to prevent their coming in, although practically they do not?—The store beasts seldom come lower than Barnet fair, where they are disposed of.

5964. Do any store sheep come in?—Perhaps two-thirds of them are fat; they are purchased again for grazing.

5965. Do you know to what part of the country the store sheep go?—Generally into Norfolk, Suffolk, Lincolnshire, and Leicestershire.

5966. Mr. Dent.] Do not the milch cows for the supply of the dairies come into the London market?—Yes, but it is a very small supply after all; it is only about 100 or 120 a week; that is the largest number I ever recollect.

5967. The dairies are principally supplied by the dealers going to the local fairs?—Yes.

5968. Do a great many cows come for the London dairies?—There were, a few years ago, a great number.

5969. Are they not sold generally in the Islington market?—Yes, certainly.

5970. Mr. Edward Egerton.] How were the prices of beasts to-day in the market?—About the same as on Monday. It is a firm market; that is the consequence of a short supply to Newgate Market, and the consequence of a strong rise in price there.

5971. Chairman.] Have you been in Newgate Market this morning?—Yes.

5972. And in Leadenhall Market?—Yes.

5973. Was there much meat in those markets this morning that had come up from the country?—A very small quantity.

Mr. R. Herbert.

14 June 1866.

5974. Is that on account of the weather?—On account of the weather.

5975. For how many days has there been a cessation of sending much meat from the country?—Since Monday last.

5976. We had some very hot weather just before that?—Yes.

5977. The weather being cooler now, do you think there will be a greater supply next Monday?—The price of 5*s.* per 8 lbs. for dead carcases will bring up a supply if the weather be sufficiently cool.

5978. Are you able to tell us whether much meat is supplied now from the country?—The fact is the people in the country are very cautious in hot weather. When the weather is hot very few people, unless living close to London, will be disposed to slaughter for the London market.

5979. Of that which is sent very little comes bad?—Very little comes bad, but they are obliged to sell it immediately.

5980. Mr. Dent.] You have paid a great deal of attention for some years to the supply of meat for the London market?—Yes.

5981. And formed your opinion from statistics you have obtained?—Yes.

5982. You think there is serious danger of there being very small supplies of English stock for the London market?—Yes.

5983. The quantity that is sent half fat in the autumn to the markets, and the cattle plague together, will have the effect of causing a prospective diminution?—Yes, and keeping up the prices.

5984. Unless we have a considerable increased importation of foreign cattle, the prices are likely to be seriously higher?—I think if you were to double the importation of foreign cattle, the prices would be very firm still, unless the foreign cattle should come in a very much improved condition.

5985. You say there is an improvement in some classes of foreign stock; is that general?—Yes. The merino sheep, for instance, which come from Hamburgh, would not weigh more than 3½ stone, and now some of them weigh eight stone.

5986. Some very good foreign sheep come into the London market?—Yes, I have seen Dutch sheep with good fleeces sold for 65*s.* a head.

5987. Are the foreign sheep sought by the west-end butchers?—Many of them of that weight and kept, but then they are cross-breed sheep with our Downs.

5988. The importation of fat cattle from France is quite a new thing?—Yes, but the prices in France are nearly as high as they are in this country now.

5989. Are the French that are brought here of the pure breed, or crosses with short horns?—Of the pure breed; they are nearly seven years old, after four years working at the plough.

5990. Is it not the fact that recently we have not had so many worked oxen coming into the market, but that there have been more steers?—Do you mean foreign or English?

5991. I am speaking of foreign cattle. We have not many worked oxen in the north of England?—No, but we have in the south.

5992. Mr. Edward Egerton.] In Sussex?—Yes.

5993. And Kent?—Yes.

5994. Mr. Dent.] With reference to foreign beasts, are there not many more steers coming here in proportion than worked oxen?—I think the aged bullocks are in greater numbers than formerly. They are very stately looking beasts, and consequently fetch a long price if they are good and well fed.

5995. Mr. Edward Egerton.] They always fatten much better after work?—If they come here in poor condition they are unfit for sale.

5996. They are not, just as a man would be who had been working at the plough for some years?—Yes; but the meat is generally very tough.

5997. Chairman.] Not so juicy?—No, the sinews are all stretched. You see, the beast has to perform a labour for which it was never fitted; it has to perform horse labour.

5998. That is the view we take in England; but they do not take that view in other countries?—They do not cook the food abroad as we cook it here. You were talking in reference to the establishment of a market, which would of course comprise an abattoir for the slaughter of these foreign animals. It has been thought in this country that the greater portion of the meat consumed in Paris is slaughtered outside the barriers. I have some statistics from Paris, and they embrace the whole of the year 1864; I think they are rather interesting at this time. In 1864, according to the official returns, the meat slaughtered in the abattoirs, taking oxen, cows, calves, sheep, and goats, amounted to 96,213,497 kilogrammes; that is equal to about 96,000 tons English weight; that was slaughtered at the abattoirs of Paris within the barriers. Then, "meat offal," as it is called here, of pigs, 10,000,000 kilogrammes (that is, 10,000 tons). Then, "brought from the country," 17,268,014 kilogrammes; that is, 17,000 tons as against 96,000 slaughtered in the barriers. So you see that Paris is principally supplied from within; the cattle are brought in, in a live state, and they are slaughtered. In addition to that, there were 7,000,000 kilogrammes of pigs, boars, sucking pigs, and so forth, brought from the country.

5999. Where are the dead-meat markets in Paris?—I cannot tell you exactly where they are; I have been in Paris, but never had the curiosity to go and look at them.

6000. Do you think there would be any inconvenience in having slaughter-houses attached to the Islington market of sufficient size for a radius of three miles round it?—There are slaughter-houses already there.

6001. They are not sufficient, I think; there are but two private slaughter-houses in the City?—They have hitherto slaughtered all the animals which have been offered to them. They have not slaughtered more than 120 or 130 a week in the slaughter-houses in the cattle market itself.

6002. Do you know what the consumption of the metropolis is, and how many animals are slaughtered in a week?—It is impossible to tell.

6003. Do you think it would be an inconvenience to the trade if they were required to slaughter all their animals at the Islington market?—There would be very great inconvenience.

6003*. Mr. Dent.] Do you think there might be public registered slaughter-houses in different districts of London without inconvenience?—That would get rid of the present inferior system, certainly.

6004. If the butchers had to slaughter at public public slaughter-houses, they would lose a certain amount of fat, and other parts of the animal, by reason of their having no one to look after it, I suppose?—No doubt they would.

6005. Do you think that a system of suitable supervision might be devised, that would prevent that?—Such a thing is possible; that is all I can say.

6006. On the other hand, a Leeds butcher told us the other day they do not find that the case with regard to the registered slaughter-houses in Leeds?—But the slaughter-houses of Leeds would be only on a very moderate scale as compared with those of London.

6007. But if you had district slaughter-houses, you might have them for a population not much larger than there is at Leeds?—Yes, in various parts of the town.

6008. Chairman.] Have you any more statistical information which you propose to give us?—I was merely going to say that the charge for slaughtering bullocks at the cattle market is 4 s.; for sheep and pigs 1 s., and for calves 2 s. 6 d. per head.

6009. Mr. Holland.] Have you mentioned what the points of inconvenience, with regard to public slaughter-houses, are?—I believe that the inconvenience will be very great, because if a butcher now buys a whole bullock, he can have it taken home to his own slaughter-house, and can kill that bullock whenever he pleases, his own men can do it; but if it is compulsory that his bullock should be slaughtered in the abattoir, he must send a cart, or perhaps two or three carts to take away the carcase; hence there would be an additional expense, and very likely he may fancy from the appearance of the bullock, there is 10 or 12 or 15 stone of fat in it, but his account may only show eight or nine stone of fat. The difficulty in removing meat about is very great. Now you can send a bullock all the way from Aberdeen to Leadenhall by railway for 1 l.; you can send from places south of Aberdeen a truck which will carry five, six, or seven bullocks for 9 l. Then dead meat from Aberdeen to London is 3 s. a cwt., and the commission on sales at London 1 d. in every 8 lbs. Then in sending dead meat, you run the risk of its spoiling, and we all know that country killed meat sells for 2 d. a stone less in London than meat killed in London of the same description.

6010. Chairman.] We have been told by butchers that the meat which the retail butchers like best is the meat that comes from the country?—If you were to place a sirloin of beef from a Scot killed in London by the side of a sirloin killed in the country, beef of the same quality, you would soon see which the buyer would prefer.

6011. We have had evidence from butchers that their customers prefer the Scotch beef to any other. I do not say compared to the live Scotch killed in London, but merely compared with the other meat?—That is the point.

6012. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Do you happen to know how the quotations of the prices of meat are regulated in Paris?—I do not.

6013. Mr. Leader.] A good deal of foreign cattle are landed at Harwich?—Yes.

6014. You would have a market, then, conveniently placed for the railway, as well as for the boats, I suppose?—Yes; you see the actual outlay to the grazier on the selling of stock is very small; what I should call commission on charges.

6015. Mr. Edward Egerton.] You mean selling the live animal?—I mean on the animal sold alive in London. The market charge for the bullocks is 3½ d. per head.

6016. For coming into the market?—Yes; that is what is called a toll. Then for driving from the railway into the market, the drovers charge us 6 d. per head, and from the waterside 6 d. That is for the foreign and Scotch cattle; the sheep pay 2 d. per head. Then the salesman's commission is 3 s. upon the bullock, so that the charge against the grazier is in reality about 4 s. 6 d.

6017. Chairman.] Do you remember the discussion that took place in the House of Commons when the importation of foreign cattle was first regulated by Act of Parliament?—Yes.

6018. The importation of foreign cattle was not called for by any demand for meat?—Neither from demand for meat nor from any want of supply, because we had then prices from 30 to 40 per cent. less than they are now.

6019. Still I suppose if we had not a foreign supply now meat would be very much higher in price?—Meat would be unobtainable by the lower classes.

6020. Although it was not at that time?—Yes.

Captain William O'Brien, called in; and Examined.

6021. Chairman.] You are the General Manager of the North Eastern Railway Company?—Yes.

6022. We understand that there is great difficulty in getting meat conveyed from Hull to the towns of the West Riding within any reasonable time; are there no special meat trains, or quick trains, by which the meat can be sent?—I am not aware that there is any difficulty in getting meat sent in reasonable time from Hull to any of those places.

6023. What is the distance from Hull to Leeds?—Fifty-one miles.

6024. Are there any trains by which meat can be forwarded at night, so as to be at Leeds early in the morning?—Yes; a train leaves Hull at half-past 12 in the day, arriving at Leeds at four in the afternoon. Another leaves at a quarter past nine in the evening, arriving at Leeds at a quarter to one in the morning. Another leaves Hull at two in the morning, arriving at Leeds at half-past five in the morning.

6025. Have you any special vans for the conveyance of meat?—No, we send it in trucks.

6026. As a matter of fact, does much meat go in that way?—Not a great deal; in fact, the dead-meat trade from Hull to Leeds is only beginning.

6027. Is the railway company anxious to give every facility for the traffic?—Of course we are quite ready to facilitate every traffic out of which we can make money.

6028. Do you favour the live-cattle traffic, or the dead-meat traffic, in the interest of your line?—It is perfectly indifferent to us which it is.

 6029. Can

Capt. W. O'Brien.
14 June 1866.

6029. Can you tell us by what train the dead meat, which goes from Hull to Leeds, is generally sent?—I could not say; we have no particular train set apart for it; but I know anybody may use any of those trains as he pleases.

6030. It is a matter of three hours, is it not?—Say three hours and a half from station to station. There is additional time occupied in getting the meat from the slaughter-houses to the market, of course.

6031. Do you know where animals are slaughtered in Hull?—There is a place not very far from the quay. There are several places used.

6032. How far is it from the trains to the principal place where they are slaughtered?—It may be half a mile.

6033. Is it your opinion that meat could be sent during this weather from Hull to Leeds without being spoilt?—There can be no doubt about it, seeing that meat is sent from Aberdeen to London and not spoilt.

6035. We will take, for instance, Bradford. What would be the time the trains would take going from Hull, which is in direct communication with Bradford?—Our railway stops short at Normanton. It would then be on another railway.

6036. Do the trains run through?—The waggons run through, but Bradford is only 13 miles beyond Leeds at the furthest, and therefore there is no difficulty.

6037. Would there be any detention of the meat trucks at Normanton?—There would be a detention, because the trains conveying the meat are mixed, and there are other trucks conveying goods of all kinds, and to a great variety of places, and therefore at Normanton or Leeds the trains must be stopped, and the waggons shunted to go to the different places, and therefore detention will occur.

6038. Could no arrangements be made so as to avoid that detention?—I think not, unless (which is out of the question) the meat trade assumed such magnitude that there would be sufficient trade, say from Hull to Bradford, to warrant running a train of meat waggons the whole of the way, without other waggons.

6039. But the trade is not likely to assume that importance?—It is impossible. We call a special train, a train say of 20 waggons; that would carry 50 tons of meat, and that, running every day in the year, would be 15,000 tons to one town. It is quite out of the question to suppose that that would be the case.

6041. Chairman.] What do you say with regard to Wakefield?—Wakefield is only four miles beyond Normanton, and the same thing will apply as to Leeds.

6042. What time will one of these night trains take in going from Hull to Bradford, including the detention?—It depends, of course, upon circumstances, but if I allowed two hours more than to Leeds, it would bring it to five hours and a half.

6043. Mr. Dent.] It would not be certain that your train would catch the train at Normanton for Bradford, Huddersfield, and Halifax?—That is quite certain. That is to say, that the meat train from Hull to Bradford would be treated like the Continental imported goods train from Hull to Bradford.

6044. Chairman.] Is it your opinion that all the meat which would be wanted from Hull would travel by the trains which now run to each of those towns, and the meat not be spoiled?—Certainly; beyond all doubt.

6045. You think there is no occasion, even in summer, that the cattle should be taken alive to Leeds, Wakefield, and Bradford Markets?—I think not.

6046. Lord Naas.] Suppose a beast is killed at Hull at 6 o'clock in the morning, and is fit for transmission by the railway at 8 o'clock in the evening, how soon do you think that meat could be in a butcher's shop, at Leeds, ready for the retail trade?—By the time the retail shop would be open in the morning.

6047. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Do you deliver the goods as soon as they arrive by the night trains?—Yes. It would be treated exactly like a bale of merchandize. Our system for the merchandize trade is to have a train leaving any particular town as late as possible in the evening and that train has the whole night to run to wherever it is going to; the goods are delivered the first thing in the morning, so that all those towns would be included in the same rule, and the delivery made early in the morning.

6048. Have you had any complaints from different consignees of meat, as to the badness of the meat, when it arrived?—No; I have had none.

6049. The company have had none?—I mean to say the company have had none. I do not know of any. We have had disputes with the senders about various things.

6050. But not as to the condition of the meat after it arrived?—No; I do not remember any. There have been complaints of its arriving too late for market at certain times.

6051. The reason of the very high charge for dead meat is in consequence of the number of claims the company have had to sustain?—It is only one of the reasons, but, perhaps, in comparing the charges the Committee will bear in mind that with reference to the live meat it is put into the train without labour, and the other has to be carted at both ends. Of course that is a very material thing.

Capt. W. O'Brien.

14 June 1866.

6052. Mr. Dent.] You collect the dead meat at Hull and deliver it at Leeds, and other towns?—Yes.

6053. What is your charge per bullock?—We charge the live beasts at so much per truck.

6054. What do you charge for trucks of beasts to Leeds?—We charge for a middle-sized truck containing seven beasts, 1*l.* 9*s.*

6055. What do you charge, per cwt., for dead meat?—Taking it per ton, we charge 18*s.* 4*d.*, including collection and delivery; and deducting the cost of collection and delivery, the charge for dead meat would yield us about 3*s.* 4*d.* per truck more than the charge for live cattle; and against that increase we have to set all the risks and difficulties.

6056. Have you any fish traffic between Hull and Leeds?—Yes.

6057. How do you carry on the fish traffic; it is attached to the passenger traffic, I presume?—We do so occasionally.

6058. I know it is done from Scarborough to London; you attach the fish trucks to the passenger trains, and come all the way to London with them?—For this reason; the trains run from Scarborough up to York, where they catch the Great Northern trains, and that traffic is so slight that we only run one train a day. The Hull trade inland is so very large that we have plenty of trains in the course of the day to carry it.

6059. Your fish traffic from Hull to Leeds would be done by goods trains, and not by passenger trains?—Yes; we should not use passenger trains unless there was anything special.

6060. Then why should you not do the same, if necessary, with perishable goods like meat?—We should, but that we do not like sending anything we can help by passenger train. In cases of emergency we do send it, but if it were done where not absolutely necessary we should have to turn our passenger trains into goods trains.

6061. We had a witness here who said the deficiency had been supplied by dead carcases from Hull during the good weather, but when the weather became warm there was not a single carcase last week in the market; do you know whether that is correct?—I have no knowledge as to the supply of meat in the market.

6062. Chairman.] Have you any knowledge whether you have conveyed any meat by your line?—I have no knowledge as to any particular week. If the Committee should wish to know, I should be happy to get the information for them.

6063. Mr. Edward Egerton] Could you give any return of the quantity of meat sent since the prohibition against carrying live animals?—Perhaps the Committee will confine it to a certain date.

6064. Chairman.] Can you give it us for the last four weeks?—Yes, certainly.

6065. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Would that be a difficult return to get at?—No.

6066. Then, give us the return for the last five weeks of dead meat from Hull to Leeds, ending last Saturday?—Yes, I will send down for it at once.

6067. Mr. Dent.] Will you also let us know whether there has been any dead meat taken to Bradford or any other part of the West Riding?—Yes.

6068. Chairman.] You collect for Hull, and for all the other towns?—Yes.

6069. You would be able to tell from your books?—We should have to search through a mountain of consignments to pick out a consignment of a little dead meat; if the Committee could confine it to one or two places, I should be glad.

6070. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Would you object to making a return of any complaints you have had?—I should not object; but we have many complaints which get settled, and many which do not get settled, that I should hardly know which to pick out. I know there was some general complaint made before the Committee by some person. We are in litigation with him.

6071. We ask really for information, because people have come here and said there were great difficulties in the way of supplying dead meat, and we want to see whether that is so?—Yes.

6072. Chairman.] Does the meat come over fresh from Rotterdam to Hull?—I do not know.

6073. It is sheep principally, is it not?—Both sheep and cattle. It is a passage of about 24 hours.

6074. There was a large live cattle traffic between Hull and Leeds and the West Riding before the restriction, was there not?—It was not a very large one; there was a fair supply.

6075. Mr. Holland.] I dare say you can tell us whether you have any experience in watering and feeding cattle while they are in transit?—We find chiefly at Hull that the importers object to our giving cattle water. There is no great opportunity of feeding on the road, of course.

6076. You have no experience of feeding animals on the transit?—No, they are not fed on the transit, as far as I know.

Mr. Thomas Betts, called in; and Examined.

Mr. T. Betts.

6077. Chairman.] You are a Butcher, at Maidstone?—Yes.

6078. We understood that the butchers of Kent wished to give information to the Committee; and we requested them therefore to send two names to represent their interest. What points do you wish to give evidence upon?—First I beg to state that our supplies in Kent are totally exhausted.

6079. How have you usually been supplied?—During the many years that I have been in business I have been in the habit of coming to the great Metropolitan Cattle Market; say for eight months out of 12.

6080. You depended on the Metropolitan Cattle Market?—Yes; and since we have been prohibited from getting cattle down the line we have depended on our own county. At this time the supply of the county of Kent is totally exhausted; we have nothing but a little mutton and a little beef.

6081. Do you have dead meat down now?—We have had, but the weather will not permit of that at this time.

Mr. T. Betts.

14 June 1866.

6082. Where have you got it from?—From Newgate Market.

6083. Do you have any foreign supply?—I do not; mine is a private trade, what you might call a family trade; and I, of course, buy the very best I can get, Scotch beasts and Norfolk beasts; it depends on the season of the year.

6084. Has the price of meat risen very much lately?—It has been very dear for a long time.

6085. What are the prices of meat now?—As regards the present moment, I do not know that there is any really quotable prices, because there are no beasts sold in country markets in Kent.

6086. You say there is no price; do you not sell any beef now?—Of course we have a little, but we are just on the brink of being exhausted.

6087. You supply a good many families; have you refused any family during the last week a single joint of meat?—Not one. I have a little on hand.

6088. You have not yet refused?—No, and I hope not to do so.

6089. Have you refused a customer mutton?—No; we have got plenty.

6090. You charge them for the meat you supply them with?—Yes, and no more.

6091. What are the prices now at Maidstone; what are you selling at?—Our very best joints are 10*d.*

6092. I do not want to know the secrets of the trade, but simply to know at what prices you are selling?—The very best joints of beef, 10*d.*

6093. What do you charge for mutton?—The very best joints of mutton, legs and loins, 10*d.*

6094. And the inferior joints?—Say from 6*d.* up to 10*d.* The breasts do not make more than 6*d.*, and the legs 10*d.*

6095. How long have you been selling at these prices?—A considerable time.

6096. Six weeks?—More than that.

6097. Thirteen weeks?—Perhaps for a twelvemonth.

6098. You have not raised your prices to your customers for a twelvemonth?—There has been a little fluctuation. I am not prepared with any particulars respecting that. If we buy it extremely dear, we are obliged to sell accordingly.

6099. You say for about a twelvemonth your prices have not varied?—There has been little variation.

6100. Do not you find when there is a great difficulty in the supply that there is a rise in the price?—Of course, if we cannot get it we cannot sell it.

6101. If your supplies are exhausted, how is it you are able to supply your customers on the same terms as before?—At present we have been supplying them with beasts purchased in the county; but now the county of Kent is very nearly or quite exhausted in the way of fat stock.

6102. Do you not find, if the meat is on the point of being exhausted, the price rises; do not you always anticipate exhaustion by your prices?—We have been living in hopes of having the line opened.

6104. You think you will be able to go on for a week more, and then you will not know where to go?—Yes.

6105. Have not the owners of cattle in Kent found that out, and raised their prices?—They have indeed, I can assure you.

6106. Do you pay one-fourth more than you did three months ago?—I should think, upon an average, the meat is 8*d.* per stone dearer, that is 1*d.* per pound, on the average.

6107. Notwithstanding that you have treated your customers so well, you have not raised their prices?—We do the best we can for them, I assure you; that, I believe, is our character.

6108. I have no doubt you conduct your trade in a very respectable manner, but I want to know this: if the supply of Kent is now so nearly exhausted that it will only last a week longer, how is it that it has not told more upon the prices?—I cannot tell. I assure you that what I tell you is correct; the beef is 1*d.* per pound dearer than it was some months back.

6109. You are still purchasing of farmers and graziers in the country?—We have been allowed to get what we could; we have not been allowed to go to the cattle market, and we have been allowed to go to farmhouses and buy what we could find.

6110. You have bought dearer in consequence?—Of course we have.

6111. You do not know where to go to get a beast; is that so?—I do not know what have been already purchased for the last fortnight or three weeks.

6112. Mr. Edward Egerton.] The people have lost their cattle much quicker this year than they ever did before?—I think the cattle in Kent have held out much better than I expected; and you must recollect that Kent is not a grazing county.

6113. Have you not had the disease very bad in Kent?—No; it was very trifling down about Dover, I think.

6114. Chairman.] How does the railway run in Kent?—There is the South Eastern and the North Kent Railway; and the Paddock Wood branch.

6115. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Do you ever attend Tunbridge market?—Yes.

6116. That has been well supplied all this year?—We have not had a cattle market for the last six months, only a market for sheep; neither at Tunbridge, nor at Ashford, nor at Maidstone. There has not been a cattle market open for a long time.

6117. Chairman.] Have you ever thought of employing an agent to buy in other counties for you?—I think not; that would not answer at all.

6118. You have never thought of doing it?—No.

6119. Supposing there was not another animal to be got in Kent, do you think you might turn your attention to that mode of proceding?—I should turn my attention to shutting up my shop; that is what I should turn my attention to, and very quickly too. No, no, that would not suit; not at my time of life, at all events.

6120. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Could you not get dead meat at the metropolitan market?—The dead meat is at the present moment in this condition: you may come to Newgate Market and buy any amount of meat, and after it has been sent to Maidstone, and shifted from one train to another, it would be only fit to be thrown away, fit for nothing else. I have seen meat recently brought into Maidstone that has really been fit for nothing; it has been quite a sacrifice. It perhaps has come a long distance to London, and then has been taken down to the Bricklayers' Arms station, and sent to Maidstone to hang up in a shop, and perhaps been a day or two before the customers might want it; it has got into a most frightful state; it would be much more fit to be hung up on a tree to feed the dogs upon.

6121. Mr. Carnegie.] But could you not buy live animals in the metropolitan market, slaughter them in London, and take the carcases to Maidstone?— The last cattle that I bought at the metropolitan market, I sent to the Bricklayers' Arms station, and they stated they would be sent on as before; instead of that, they had to be sent back to the metropolitan market and slaughtered, and sent to Newgate and sold; and the 12 beasts lost me 36 l.

6122. Could you not buy live cattle in the metropolitan market, slaughter them in London, and send the carcases to Maidstone; answer the question?—It could be done if the weather was fit for it; it could not be done now.

6123. Chairman.] How long does it take going from London to Maidstone by railway?—About five or six hours by goods trains, and by passenger trains two hours.

6124. Are there any night trains?—There is one which arrives at Maidstone at eight in the morning.

6125. Is that early enough for your customers?—No.

6126. What is the earliest time at which you receive a visit from a customer in the morning?—We are obliged to have a supply, and like to have a supply over night; we like to have our shop furnished.

6127. What is the earliest time at which you receive a visit from a customer in the morning?—We have customers coming in as early as our shop is open, but they would be of a very minor character.

6128. At what hour do you open your shop?—At half-past six.

6129. Do you sell much before eight o'clock?—We sell all we can.

6131. What is to prevent your making arrangements for slaughtering animals in London, and getting them down by the night goods trains to Maidstone?—I do not believe any man would do it, I assure you; I do not believe anybody would purchase cattle, and have them slaughtered in London, and then convey them home.

6132. Is it not possible to arrange with some man, who has a slaughter-house in the neighbourhood of the Bricklayers' Arms station, to slaughter cattle for you, and send them down to the Maidstone station?—We should get robbed of half the offal, and very likely of half of the fat.

6133. What is there to prevent your buying the dead cattle now of a man in London, and having it conveyed to Maidstone?—It would be unfit for human food by the time it got to Maidstone.

6134. You were alluding to the meat that is sent up from the country to London, and then sent down to Maidstone; but what is there to prevent your buying the sides of a beast killed by a butcher in London, and sent down by the night train to Maidstone?—We could not be subject to such impositions; we do not believe any man in our trade could exist under them.

6135 Where would be the imposition; if you bought the sides of a beast, you could weigh it, and sell it again at so much per pound?—A man should be able to go into the public market and buy an article fairly.

6136. You mean it would be an alteration of the system of the trade?—A great alteration.

6137. And that you would not like?—No.

6138. It would be possible to do it?—I do not think I could possibly reconcile myself to it; I do not think I could.

6139. Mr. Carnegie.] You would soon shut up your shop?—Yes, I would as soon as possible; in spite of everything. I would sooner be conveyed to the union workhouse than have to do it.

6141. Chairman.] You have not been much affected with cattle plague in Kent?—Oh dear, no, we have known nothing of it. I have not felt the slightest alarm. I have a butcher's shop and a little farm. I have cattle on my farm, and I have not felt the slightest timid or nervous about it, I assure you. All I can say is, we are placed in very great difficulties at present; very great indeed.

6142. Mr. Edward Egerton.] What is your remedy for this?—To allow the butchers in Kent to buy their meat wherever they can, whether it is in the great metropolitan cattle market or elsewhere, and have it conveyed home and slaughtered by themselves.

6143. Chairman.] You wish the butchers of Kent to have that advantage, and not the butchers of other counties?—I am only representing Kent; I think every county ought to represent itself.

6144. You know the reason for these restrictions?—Of course I do.

6145. Have you not discovered that those retrictions have tended to get rid of the cattle plague in a great measure?—I think I can enlighten you on that subject a little, as regards Kent, which I told you before is not a grazing district. I should think Kent, according to the size of it, is dependent more on the supply of this great cattle market than any other county in the kingdom, and we have less cattle plague. If that is worth anything to you, I can assure you it is a fact. We have had hundreds of beasts go out of this cattle market to Ashford, to Tunbridge, to

14 June 1866.

Maidstone, to Rochester, to Canterbury, and to all the local markets throughout the county; it has been wholly supplied with cattle from the cattle market; and I should say there has been no county in Great Britain that has been less afflicted with cattle plague than the county of Kent.

6146. Mr. Edward Egerton.] They have had the cattle plague in Sussex?—To a very trifling extent.

6147. Some 1,200 beasts died there; those are the figures?—I believe it has been to a very trifling extent.

6148. Probably you are aware that the whole of those 1,200 beasts died in consequence of four calves which were bought in the metropolitan market?—I believe those suckling calves have done more mischief than anything else, and they were taken from the sheds of the London cow-keepers.

Mr. GEORGE WAKEFIELD, called in; and Examined.

Mr. G. Wakefield.

6149. Chairman.] ARE you a Butcher from Canterbury?—From Maidstone; from the same town as the last witness.

6150. Do you agree in what has been stated by the last witness?—Yes; mine is the same grievance precisely as his. I am perhaps rather worse situated than Mr. Betts.

6151. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Why?—I have a contract business and a carcase business as well.

6152. With whom have you contracts?—I have several contracts in the town of Maidstone.

6153. Chairman.] Contracts with public establishments?—Yes.

6154. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Do you supply the jail?—Yes; the jail, the asylum, and the troops.

6155. Chairman.] How do you get your supply now?—Principally from Newgate Market.

6156. Has any of the meat which you have supplied been rejected by the Commissary?—No; we have not had the weather very bad until quite lately.

6157. When was your last delivery of meat?—This morning.

6158. Was that meat purchased in Newgate Market?—No, it was meat I bought at home alive principally.

6159. Have you delivered any by virtue of your contract which you have obtained from Newgate Market during the last few days?—I have.

6160. When?—I delivered some portion this morning, and some home killed meat.

6161. For the troops?—For the troops.

6162. Have you had complaints?—Yes, I have had continued complaints.

6163. From the Commissary?—From the officials at the depôt.

6164. What has been the nature of these complaints?—They have not liked the appearance of the meat at all, it has been in such a bad state.

6165. Have they complained that it was bad when it was eaten?—No, they have not complained of its being bad when eaten.

6166. Is it not the case that meat, if it travels about, gets a shabby appearance on the surface?—Yes, very.

6167. And that it is none the worse eating?—I do not know that it is.

6168. Have you had any complaints that the meat has eaten badly?—I have had some few complaints.

6169. Who from?—From the establishments which I supply.

6170. What complaints have you had from the troops?—I have had complaints from the captains, that the men had found fault with the meat.

6171. At the table?—Yes.

6172. On what ground; what have they said was the matter with the meat?—They have said it was not fresh; and there have been various complaints for a long time, since I have had meat from here.

6173. During the last week have they made complaints?—Yes; I have had complaints lately.

6174. What was your reply?—That I did not know in what other manner to supply them; that I was compelled to get it from here, as my supply was exhausted from home.

6175. Have you had any official complaint?—No, not any from the Commissariat.

6176. Mr. Carnegie.] Were those complaints made at the time of the inspection of the meat in the morning, or at the time of the officers going down to dinner?—At both times.

6177. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Was any of the meat rejected?—No. I must say they have been as lenient as possible with the contractors. They have known the position the contractors have been in. I had meat from Newgate Market last week.

6178. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] What is your contract price?—The present contract price is 6½ d. per pound.

6179. For the jail or for the troops?—For the troops.

6180. What has been the price for the jail?—Seven pence per pound, without bone.

6181. Mr. Carnegie.] Have you ever tried buying live cattle in London, and having them slaughtered, and the carcases sent to you, at Maidstone?—I bought some last week, for the first time.

6182. Where were they slaughtered?—They were slaughtered at the cattle market.

6183. And the carcases sent to Maidstone?—Yes.

6184. In what condition did they arrive there?—In very bad condition. I had several quarters green when I cut them up the next morning.

6185. To what do you attribute that?—To the constant moving of them; the repetition of the movement.

6186. Were they well dressed?—Yes, very well dressed.

6187. Were they allowed to get cold?—Yes; they were killed the night before, and loaded the next morning.

6188. In what way did you pack them?—In a van, and they came by road the whole way, that they should not be more often moved than could be avoided.

6189. You did not send them by rail?—No; I have only sent two lots of meat by rail.

6190. Have you ever seen the way in which the meat comes up from Scotland?—Yes, often.

6191. You

Mr. G. Wakefield.

14 June 1866.

6191. You are aware that it comes by rail?—I am.

6192. Did you not think packing yours in the same way as that would be best?—No; I think why the Scotch meat comes in best condition is, it is not killed off the drift.

6193. What is the meaning of the expression "off the drift"?—It means after it has been driven a long distance; meat bought at Islington on Monday would be killed the same day perhaps, and then it might have travelled a long distance in the morning, or on the day previously.

6194. Chairman.] Have you a butchers' association in Kent?—I think not; I do not know of one.

6195. Have you seen butchers from any other towns in Kent on this subject?—Yes; I have met many of them.

6196. But I mean had you seen any of them on this subject before you came here to give evidence?—No.

6197. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Are the cattle that are fed in the marshes entirely exhausted?—I think so; I do not know where to find more. I have seven or eight beasts at home alive, and I do not know where to buy any more when they are gone.

6198. Do you usually get a great number of animals from the marshes?—No; what beasts we do get are stall-fed beasts in our own districts.

6199. You get mutton from the marshes?—Yes, we get mutton from the Romney Marshes.

Mr. THOMAS BETTS again called: and further Examined.

Mr. T. Betts.

6200. Chairman.] YOU say there are very few beasts in Kent?—Very few indeed.

6201. And that that is the usual thing?—Yes; it is not a grazing district.

6202. Do you know how Kent stands in that respect with regard to other counties in England?—I cannot say I do. What grazing there is in Kent is grazing for sheep; we have no beasts, or scarcely any. Here and there we have a few milch cows. What beasts we have in the winter months are principally fed by the hop-growing farmers, for the purpose of getting the manure; they come in about Michaelmas time, and they go out about this time.

6203. Lord Naas.] Where do you buy your meat in summer time?—We come to the metropolitan market. I have been in business for 36 years; I have never known any other market.

6204. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Is not the Weald of Kent a grazing country?—Oh dear, no; they could not live there; the land is poor in the Weald of Kent.

6205. Chairman.] Should you say Kent is worse off for beasts than all the other counties of England?—I should think it is the very worst of all counties.

6206. We have had a return presented to us of the number of cattle, distinguishing cows and other cattle, in the different counties of England, up to the 5th of March last; perhaps you would be surprised to learn that there are 17 counties in England that have less foreign beasts, of two years of age and above, than Kent has?—I should be very much surprised to hear it.

6207. Bedford has about half of what Kent has; Berks, less than half; Bucks, a fourth less; Cambridge, rather more than half; Hertford has about one-third, or not more than one-third; Huntingdon, not more than one-third; Oxford, two-thirds; Rutland (being a very small county), has one-third less than Kent; Surrey (extra-metropolitan), about one-third of Kent; Westmoreland, rather more than half; Wilts, about two-thirds; Worcester, about three-fourths; does that surprise you?—It does very much.

6208. Now I find the number of cattle in Kent (extra the metropolitan district), on the 5th of March, of two years of age, excluding milch cows, was 16,708; and there were 17 counties at that time that had fewer cattle within them than Kent?—Is it not possible that those counties you are speaking of are counties that have been suffering by this cattle plague, and burying their cattle by thousands.

6209. Some have and some have not; then, on the other hand, would it not be fair to take the population of Kent into consideration?—I should think Kent is more thickly populated than any other county.

6210. The population of Kent is half a million, in round numbers; it is nearly the same as Cheshire, and about the same as Gloucestershire; are you aware that in Kent, besides the metropolitan part of Kent, there are 18,000 odd milch cows?—I was not aware. Of course, in these thickly populated towns there are a great many cows kept for milk purposes, and I am not prepared to say anything about them.

6211. What would you say with regard to sheep; is Kent well off for sheep?—Yes; it is better off than any other county, I should say, because we have the Romney Marsh to go to.

6212. It stands third, as to its number of sheep, of the counties of England?—I quite agree with that.

6213. Then, if you are badly off for beef, you are very well off for mutton?—Yes. I hope you gentlemen will do the best you can for us, and will give us relief as soon as you can.

Mr. JAMES HUTCHESON, called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. Hutcheson.

6214. Mr. Carnegie.] YOU come from Inverury?—Yes.

6215. How many miles north of Aberdeen is Inverury?—Sixteen miles.

6216. You are a butcher?—Yes.

6217. Are you a farmer also?—No; I am a butcher. I do business entirely with London; I have had no retail business for the last seven years; it has been London business entirely.

6218. Do you take grass parks or turnips, or do you buy entirely?—I buy entirely; I buy and kill, and send to London.

6219. I suppose you buy from all round Aberdeenshire and Banffshire?—Yes.

6220. Do you go to Morayshire at all?—No, I do

Mr. J. Hutcheson.

14 June 1866.

I do not go to Morayshire; I buy principally in Aberdeenshire.

6221. Do you slaughter in Inverury?—I slaughter in Inverury.

6222. The trains with your meat go straight through to London without change of carriage?—Yes.

6223. How long does it take for the dead meat to go from Inverury to London?—The time that it should be, if the train arrangements were properly kept, is 38 hours. It is 36 hours to Aberdeen. There is one dead-meat train, the Aberdeen express goods train, which leaves Aberdeen at 11 5 a.m.; another train, bringing the north of Scotland meat, leaves Aberdeen at 12.45, and catches the first express train at Perth. That is the second train which takes meat off the railway with which I am connected.

6224. Do you send at all times of the year?—At all times of the year; but I find for four months of the year it is at a considerable risk.

6225. Still you send at all times of the year?—At all times; but when the weather is extremely warm we are obliged, in safety to ourselves, to guard against it. The weather is cool to-day, and if we had a few bullocks we might go and kill them; then perhaps the weather may change immediately, and be warm by the time it arrives here. We find the meat is oftener spoiled when the weather is excessively hot in London, than it is when it is excessively hot in Scotland.

6226. Has there ever been a week in which you have stopped sending meat altogether?—Well, scarcely so; but then I have seen a week or two weeks when, if you could get here safe, you would make a fine market; but very often it happens you may lose some of it.

6227. Have you suffered much loss by the meat spoiling?—Yes, a good deal.

6228. Have you suffered much by the unpunctuality of the railway?—Yes, a good deal.

6229. Have you in such cases succeeded in getting compensation?—Very seldom. Sometimes we have got it, but not very often. As a general rule, and I have been in the trade for the last 16 years, in the winter, when the weather is wet, and damp, and windy, the dead-meat trains are heavy. It is a season of the year in which our principal bullocks are fat in Scotland. The dead-meat trains are heavy, the rails are wet, and in that way we are often two or three hours behind our time.

6230. But in such weather the meat keeps sufficiently well?—It does keep; but in damp weather, when it is slaughtered in Scotland, and comes to London, it would not come to London in such a good condition if it were damp weather all along. If it arrived here at the proper hour of delivery, it might be in fair order, but not if it was detained.

6231. I suppose you send it all in sides?—We send it all in sides.

6232. And packed in cloths?—Yes.

6233. What do you do with the offal?—We send it generally to Dundee and Aberdeen; I contract in Aberdeen with parties to consume my offal at so much the beast for the 12 months; that is the small offal, heads, livers, hearts, and tongues.

6234. What do you do with the tripes?—We generally feed our pigs with that; it is not so much eaten in Scotland as in England.

6235. What do you do with the blood?—We do not care for that either.

6236. Do you waste the blood, or keep it for manure?—We waste it.

6238. Mr. Carnegie.] Have you thought of making arrangements for public slaughter-houses at Inverury?—It has been often thought about.

6239. Do you think your trade look with favour on the idea of public slaughter-houses?—There is no question about it. The town of Inverury is a Royal burgh, and there is everything to favour trade. There were 355 beasts killed there a few years ago, and during the last year from the 31st March 1865 to the 31st March 1866, we killed 4,065.

6240. In this town of 3,000 inhabitants?—Yes.

6241. I suppose that, independently of the hot weather, you have more cattle fit for killing in the winter and spring months, than you have in the summer months?—Most decidedly.

6242. Aberdeenshire is more of a winter feeding district than a summer feeding district?—Much more so; we have not the cattle in summer.

6243. The grass there is light?—It is light.

6244. I suppose the cattle you are killing now, have been principally fed upon turnips, and just finished off upon grass?—Yes; but then this is a year not like many other years. We have been extremely short of keep this winter; the winter keep of turnips was shorter than usual, and then some of the stock that ought to have been kept for grazing was obliged to be killed, because they could not be kept on until the grass came to maturity.

6245. You send no live cattle to London?—I have sent live cattle, but both myself and the butchers in the trade at Inverury, send extremely few now; we may have sent a few bullocks in summer alive for safety, to get them slaughtered in Newgate Market, when we thought the weather too risky to send them dead, and the bullocks were rather heavy.

6246. Do you work the telegraph at all?—We do.

6247. Do your agents send to you to say, send us so many beasts, or do you take the chance yourself?—What the salesman does is this: if there is a rise in value, a rise of perhaps 4*d.* or 6*d.* a stone, they would telegraph at once to give us the advantage, so that we might get up the meat as soon as possible. Then if the weather got soft and warm, they would telegraph at once to us, at their expense, not to send it, but on the other hand, if we want information ourselves, we telegraph ourselves, and pay for it.

6248. How long does it take to send a telegraphic message from the salesman at Newgate Market to Inverury?—I can scarcely explain that. There is a break at Aberdeen in the Great Great North Railway; we are differently situated at Inverury with regard to telegraphs than they are at Aberdeen. It is a single line, and they have got the wires on the Great North of Scotland line to work their own traffic. They do not hold themselves responsible to forward it to us if they have occasion to use it on their own line. I have known a telegraphic message delayed for two or three hours, but not generally. It could be sent there and back in three hours, I think. I could send a message, and get the answer back in three hours. I think it might be done sooner; but still that is about a fair average time.

6249. Do you consign to the same salesman or to a different salesman?—I generally do my business with one, but it is not the general way.

6250. The general custom of the trade in the North of Scotland is to employ more than one salesman?—Yes; some men, killing very largely, will divide their meat in one morning amongst six salesmen.

6251. Mr. Dent.] How many beasts would he send among these six salesmen, do you suppose?—Allowing him to kill eight beasts, he would perhaps give some of them a side a piece.

6252. Mr. Holland.] You have animals coming in to you at times?—Yes.

5253. And from all distances?—From all distances.

6254. Have you any rule, if you have a telegraph and an order for any animals, with regard to slaughtering them at a certain period after they come upon your premises, after travelling?—We have no definite rule. Before this cattle plague commenced in the country we had local markets about four days a week or sometimes five, and sometimes nearly every day. They went away in the morning by the trains leaving Inverury at eight o'clock; the Great North Railway gives us a special train up to the market, and takes up the trucks and the carriages, and returns special from the markets with the cattle and passengers, and probably arrives at Inverury about four o'clock. If the weather is fine the cattle would be all slaughtered that night, and sent off for London the next morning.

6255. Lord Naas.] How long does a carcase hang, after it is killed, before you put it in the train?—If the weather is fit for it, we should be killing at four in the afternoon, and get away at seven o'clock a.m.

6256. About 14 hours?—Yes, but it is better to hang 24 hours.

6257. Mr. Carnegie.] You very often, from press of business, are not able to give it so long as that?—No.

6258. Mr. Dent.] The farmers do not send you their beasts to kill; you buy them?—We buy them.

6259. Lord Naas.] At the fairs, or at the farmers' houses?—They were almost all bought at the markets until last year.

6260. But now you are obliged to go to the farmhouses?—Yes.

6261. Mr. Carnegie.] I suppose, even before the time of the cattle plague, it was a common thing for a farmer to send for you to come and look at a lot of beast on his farm, and say, "I will not risk the markets, for fear of pleuro-pneumonia?—Yes, that was very common; but then I considered, as a general rule, it was not giving us justice, and it was not doing justice to the farmers, letting us be without markets.

6262. Mr. Dent.] Do you not like buying at home, as a rule?—No; I prefer to fight the battle in the open market.

6263. Chairman.] Are the farmers tougher customers to deal with than those in the open market?—The greater number are not good judges; they think their cattle are heavier than what they are; they think the cattle are worth more than they really are.

6264. Mr. Carnegie.] An Aberdeenshire man is rather a stiff hand at making a bargain?—Yes; but the markets make them quick.

6265. Chairman.] Do they ever go to see their beasts killed?—Yes, they do go sometimes.

6266. To see them cut up?—Yes.

6267. Mr. Carnegie.] It is not customary in Aberdeenshire to buy by weight?—It is not customary, but it is done. More of it has been done in Aberdeenshire this year than any former year.

6268. The farmers sell by dead weight?—Yes.

6270. Mr. Dent.] You send the whole of the beasts to London; you do not pick out the best parts to send to London?—No; I send the whole. Sometimes it happens to be damp weather, and the market is bad here. The curers in Aberdeen buy the fore-quarters; we could send a number of fore-quarters to Hoggarth's, at so much per cwt., and then we feel the benefit of sending the hind-quarters to London; but as a general rule we do not send it to Aberdeen.

6271. Lord Naas.] You send some live beasts to London occasionally?—Yes, I have sent some, but not many, some time back.

6272. Do you find it more profitable to kill at home?—We realise better market value by sending them dead. We get the weight of a bullock, and we get the market value. Sending them alive, if you get a good customer, and a good price, it is all right.

6273 Chairman.] You know best what you are killing?—Yes; we can weigh it before sending to market.

6274. Lord Naas.] Used you to send more live beasts to London when you first began business, than you do now?—I did.

6275. Can you give the Committee any idea of what the difference of the average profit of the live beasts as against the dead beasts is?—No; I do not think it is possible.

6276. But still you believe the dead-meat trade is far more profitable to the north country butcher than the live-meat trade to the north country trader?—Yes, it is. In one sense the profit is more steady; perhaps during three or four months of one season of the year the party sending the live cattle will realise more value than we do; and in the public markets they would would be inclined to buy them a little dearer per cwt., that is to say, the neat beasts. But then at another time again they lose a lot of money, in order to compete with us. It has been found, for a number of years, that the best judges in Scotland have not pursued the trade with the live cattle; they are fewer in number.

Mr. J. Hutcheson.

6277. Taking one period of the year with another, the risk and uncertainty of sending the live cattle is greater than it is with regard to the dead?—Yes, keeping away the warm weather.

6279. Mr. Carnegie.] Is there any dead meat trade north of Inverury?—Yes.

6280. Do the Elgin people send dead meat?—Yes; Elgin, Huntley, and a number of towns.

6281. Chairman.] To London?—Yes.

6282. Mr. Holland.] They have done so for years?—Yes; the railway is brought up to their doors. They are not doing such a large trade at Inverury as at Aberdeen, but they are travelling in their wake.

6283. Mr. Carnegie.] Do they send any from as far north as Inverness?—Yes.

6284. You know of your own knowledge that it goes as far north as Elgin?—I am quite sensible of that.

6285. Mr. Holland.] Did these men take the supply of the live-meat markets previously to the appearance of the rinderpest?—Yes; the fact of the matter is this: butchers generally do not now do so much in the live trade. It is generally farmers, and people of that sort, who work the live-meat market, and not the real butcher. Some of them do so, but not generally.

6286. Lord Naas.] Do the farmers themselves kill the beasts in your neighbourhood?—They have done a little this year under the impression that we were taking advantage of them, and that they would kill on trial, in order to see whether we were honourable or not.

6287. Do you think that a farmer who brings his beast to a man to slaughter in the north of Scotland will get more for his beast than a farmer who sends the same beast up to London on his own account. Do you think the farmers find it more profitable to sell their beasts to you for the purpose of being slaughtered and sent to London, than to send their beasts to London on their own account?—There is no question at all that the farmers find it better to sell to us.

6289. The effect of it is that so far as the farmers are concerned, it makes the price better?—Yes.

6290. He can be more sure of a certain price?—Yes; they realise the full value for their cattle, taking all in all, in Aberdeenshire.

6291. I suppose another advantage the farmer has is, that he will sell his beasts in small numbers, as they are fit, to you, instead of sending them in a lot?—Yes, he will.

6292. Whereas if he is obliged to send them to London, he is obliged to send them in a truck-load?—Yes.

Mr. Joseph Butler, called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. Butler.

6293. Chairman.] Where do you reside?—At Aberdeen.

6294. What is the nature of your business?—I am in the dead-beef trade.

6295. Do you purchase live animals on your own account, and slaughter them?—Yes.

6296. Do you consign them to Newgate Market?—Yes.

6297. How long have you been in that business?—For 35 years. During the six months previous to the rinderpest, I bought 1,322 cattle, beginning on the 1st of December 1864, and ending on the 31st of May 1865.

6298. Since the rinderpest has been introduced into this country, has your trade increased or decreased?—It has decreased.

6299. How is that to be accounted for?—The farmer is always sending out, and never getting a beast in to supply the place of those that are gone out.

6300. They have been afraid to purchase?—They could not get them in; they were prohibited.

6301. Mr. Carnegie.] A good deal of cattle are imported into Aberdeen from the south to feed, are there not, during the time that there is no disease?—Yes, they come from the Falkirk markets.

6302. Chairman.] Is Aberdeenshire more a feeding than a breeding district?—Both; but inclined to fattening.

6303. What is the breed of animals that you generally kill to send to London?—The first cross between the short-horn and the home cow.

6304. Do you still continue to send during this weather?—Every day during the year. We never stop.

6305. What is your experience as to meat travelling to London in the hottest weather that we have in this country?—There is sometimes a little risk of a loss.

6306. Do you depend upon the consignee to let let you know whether the meat has arrived badly or not?—Yes; we must leave it to him.

6307. Supposing you hear from him that so much of the meat is bad, you take his word for it?—Yes.

6308. Have you had any complaints lately of the meat being bad?—No, not yet.

6309. Up to this point it has travelled in good condition?—Yes.

6310. Last year had you much meat spoilt?—Yes, just about the middle of May last year.

6311. We had some very hot weather then?—Yes, it was a very sudden change, and the winter-fed cattle would not stand the warm weather. We had a great quantity of fat stock last year.

6312. Had you much loss then?—Yes, of course.

6313. Can you give us the proportions of loss you had upon one consignment?—I lost in one day 60 l. 3 s. 5 d.

6314. Mr. Dent.] That is in money; can you give us any idea of what weight of meat it was?—There was 973 stone, which would be about 3 ton 9 cwt. 2 qrs.

6315. Chairman.] They were all spoilt?—Yes.

6316. Did you get anything for it?—Yes; it was sold at 3 s., 3 s. 6 d., 3 s. 4 d., 2 s. 8 d., and 2 s. 6 d.

6317. Mr. Carnegie.] That was the whole consignment for that day?—For that day alone.

6318. Was none of the meat that was sent that day good, or had you some good?—It was detained by some break down on the railway, I believe.

6319. Chairman.] Did you make any demand upon the railway company?—Yes, but they would pay nothing.

6320. Did you go to your lawyer about it?—Yes, but I did not make anything of it.

6321. Is it a very uncommon occurrence for you to lose so much?—It occurs frequently through the year; some three or four times.

6322. But still it is not such as to make you give up your business?—No, I would not do that.

6323. It is a pretty good trade, notwithstanding that?—Some people have been fortunate in it.

6324. When any of your meat gets bad on its passage by rail, do you have advice by telegram to that effect?—No, I never mind the telegrams. About 10 or 12 years ago I had a telegram from four different salesmen in one day, one Monday forenoon, to kill and send as much meat as ever I could. In 24 hours I had another telegram from each of them to send none. I never take any notice of them.

6325. You send up according to your own judgment?—Yes.

6326. Mr. Dent.] Is your supply much the same every day?—Yes, daily.

6327. Mr. Carnegie.] You send more in winter than in summer?—Of course.

6328. You have more cattle to send in winter?—Yes.

6329. Lord Naas.] Have you sent any during the last few days of the hot weather?—I sent some on Monday. This account refers to my traffic in dead beef from 1st December 1864, to 31st May 1865. This is the account of them (handing in a Paper): December, 50 tons; January, 50 tons; February, 51 tons; March, 62 tons; April, 48 tons; May, 54 tons.

6330. Is that this year?—No, it is 1864 and 1865, before the rinderpest.

6331. Chairman.] You have not got the account for this year?—No.

6332. Do you send a much shorter supply in June and July?—We cannot get them then; they are turned off to the grass.

6333. Mr. Dent.] When does your grass-fed supply begin in Aberdeenshire?—There is very little grass-fed; but sometimes, perhaps, about the middle of September. We kill a little off in August, but not much.

6334. Do you buy it all yourself off the farms, or do the farmers send it to you to be slaughtered on their own account?—I buy all.

6335. Mr. Carnegie.] Do you farm at all; do you grow turnips?—No, I have not done so for six or eight years.

6336. Mr. Dent.] Do you find any difficulty in the disposal of the offal?—None.

6337. Chairman.] How is it disposed of?—It is disposed of in Aberdeen.

6338. By the word "offal," do you mean the coarser parts of the meat?—The hides, feet, tongues, and tails; that is what we consider offal.

6339. Mr. Carnegie.] What do you do with the tripe. Do you dispose of that in Aberdeen?—Yes, the provision curers make up the tripe and send it abroad.

6340. They buy the tripe from you?—Yes.

6341. Lord Naas.] Do you know where it goes to?—To India, I believe.

6342. Mr. Carnegie.] A witness from Inverary just now stated they wasted a deal of it?—I dare say they do.

6343. Mr. Holland.] Have you more than one slaughter-house?—Yes, I have two.

6344. Mr. Carnegie.] Are those two your own, or are they in the market?—They are not mine; they are in the market, and belong to the Corporation.

6345. Lord Naas.] Do you rent them from the market trustees?—Yes.

6346. Mr. Dent.] Do you send up the fore-quarters as well as the hind-quarters to London?—No, I do not; I supply John Moore & Sons, the provision merchants, and they generally have 80 or 90 tons of fore-quarters in six months.

6347. You seldom send fore-quarters, do you?—I do when his price will admit of my cutting them for him. He sometimes fluctuates a good deal in his prices.

6348. Was there any of this dead-meat trade to London before the railways were established?—Yes, long before the railways.

6349. Mr. Carnegie.] You sent by steamers?—Yes.

6350. Do you send by steamers now?—Yes.

6351. Mr. Dent.] Dead meat in winter?—Yes; we send mostly all the days of the year by the steamers also.

6353. Mr. Dent.] There is a special dead-meat train from Aberdeen which brings nothing else?—I do not know.

6354. What time of the day does the meat leave leave Aberdeen?—At five minutes past 11 in the forenoon.

Mr. J. Butler.

14 June 1866.

6355. I suppose all those beasts are killed the day before?—Generally.

6356. Is the meat packed in cloths or baskets?—In cloths.

6357. Have they any special carriages on the line for the conveyance of the meat?—No, they are just common trucks covered with tarpaulin.

6358. Lord Naas.] Do the steamers carry cheaper than the rail?—Yes, 1 l. a ton cheaper.

6359. Is the steamer which comes in 36 hours a new boat which has been lately put on?—Yes, she came upon the passage, I think, about the beginning of December.

6360. She is put on to run in opposition to the railway, I suppose?—No, the Company required a new steamer, and they had her to work their general trade.

6361. Is there any dead-meat trade to the manufacturing districts of England, that is to say, to Yorkshire and Lancashire?—There has been, this season, on account of the stoppage of the live cattle, but never before.

6362. Mr. Carnegie.] Have you sent any meat to Glasgow within the last fortnight?—I have sent nothing; I never send any but to London.

6363. Mr. Holland.] Is the meat packed in the same way on board the steamers as it is by rail?—The same way.

6364. In cloths?—Yes.

6365. Mr. Carnegie.] There is no import of foreign cattle to Aberdeen, is there?—None. I was asking the local authorities (there are some up here at present) whether they would have the foreign cattle, and they said they would not. I was thinking of going across and sending some, but they would not have them.

6366. Mr. Dent.] You were thinking of going to buy them to kill?—Yes.

6367. Do you think you could get them good enough for the London market?—Yes.

6368. Where could you get them?—Very likely in Denmark or Sweden.

6369. Have you been in the habit of buying any foreign cattle?—I have bought them in London, and taken them down to Aberdeen.

6370. Mr. Carnegie.] To feed?—Partly to feed and partly to kill.

6371. Mr. Dent.] Not to send them back again to London?—No; I mean at the time of the Crimean war, for the provision merchants.

6372. Mr. Carnegie.] There is a very large provision trade in Aberdeen, is there not?—Yes.

6373. Lord Naas.] That is for the preserved meats as well as for the salt meats?—They do not salt it; it is preserved.

6374. Do not they preserve any meat, except beef?—It is all fresh meat and vegetables.

6375. Do they preserve mutton?—Yes.

6376. Pork?—No, no pork; beef, mutton, and veal.

6377. Do you know the price of offal in London as compared with the price of offal in Aberdeen?—Yes.

6378. How does it sell now; does it sell at as high a price in Aberdeen as it does in London?—Yes; I have had many a bullock killed in London.

6379. Have you been able to get as much for the offal in London, or less?—About the same; some of it fetches more in price, and some less; and it comes to about a balance, about the same money.

6380. There is no rise in the price of offal by selling it in London?—No.

6381. In Aberdeen there is no large manufacturing population to consume the offal; it is not consumed fresh, I suppose?—Yes, all fresh.

6382. But by what class of people?—By the general labouring classes of people; they consume the head and the heart; the feet goes to the provision merchants.

6383. Mr. Holland.] And the tripes?—The tripes generally go to the provision dealers.

6384. Lord Naas.] Do they consume the beef livers?—Yes; the fisher people buy a little of it for bait to catch the fish, but most of them are consumed by the labouring class.

6385. And actually eaten in the neighbourhood?—Yes.

6386. What is the retail price per lb. of the liver?—Twopence.

6387. And the heart?—They generally sell them whole; but when they are cut down they sell them from 2 d. to 5 d. per lb., according to the demand.

6388. How are the heads sold?—They are sold in halves, or in wholes.

6389. For immediate consumption?—Yes.

6390. Are they consumed fresh?—Some people buy a few, and cut off the fleshy parts, and salt them.

6391. Are the skins manufactured in Aberdeen by the tanners?—No; but we have two markets, and the tanners come from a distance and buy them. We have no tanners in Aberdeen just now.

6392. They all go away green?—Yes.

6393. Mr. Carnegie.] Where do they go to principally?—I have heard them speaking of Galashiels and different places through Scotland. Some, I believe, come to London.

6394. Lord Naas.] What is done with the blood?—It is sold for manure.

6395. Is it sold for any manufacture?—Some few years ago a man in Glasgow bought the blood, and gave so much per gallon for it, but he dropped it.

6396. I suppose the blood of each beast does not come to much?—It is of no value at all.

6397. Chairman.] Do not they make blood manure in your part of the world?—No.

6398. Mr. Carnegie.] The manure and the refuse goes altogether from the shambles, does it not?—Yes, the blood and the refuse, and so forth.

6399. Lord Naas.] It is sold at so much a load for manure?—Yes.

Mr. JOSEPH NELSON, called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. Nelson.

6400. Chairman.] YOU are a Surveyor, are you not?—Yes, I am a Land Surveyor.

6401. Have you been employed by some gentlemen who are desirous of establishing a company to carry out a market for foreign cattle?—Yes. I may mention that last year I was concerned in promoting the construction of a landing stage at Gravesend, and also in the extension of the North Eastern Railway down to the Isle of Grain; and I had to inquire very much upon the subject of the foreign-cattle trade, and the fish trade, and so on. By that means I became conversant versant with the whole of the foreign cattle trade.

6402. Have you concerned yourself in endeavouring to maintain what would be a suitable landing place for cattle, with a quarantine ground attached?—I have.

6403. Have you turned your chief attention to the Port of London?—I have.

6404. What have you been endeavouring to find?—I have examined the Thames, on both sides of it, all the way down as far as the mouth of the Medway; and by far the most eligible site we have been able to discover is that of the Isle of Grain.

6405. What have been the requisites you have desired to find?—In the first place, a good landing place, free from the navigation of the River Thames. Last year a landing stage was proposed to be erected at Gravesend. That was objected to by the Thames Conservancy; and they threw the Bill out in the House of Lords. They said it interfered with the navigation of the river where it was very much crowded. However, a Bill was passed for the erection of a landing stage, down at the Isle of Grain, in the Medway, where it was free from any objection of that kind. The Isle of Grain possesses an excellent place for landing cattle; it is very fertile; it comprises about 3,000 acres; the middle part of the island is of good elevation; there is a gravelly soil, with good water. The low land is excellent grazing land, in summer. (The Witness described the situation of the island to the Committee, on the map.)

6406. Mr. Carnegie.] What railway communication is there?—There is the North Eastern Extension Railway, and that Railway, I believe, will be completed this year. Arrangements are being made with the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway, and the South Eastern Railway, as joint proprietors of the line.

6407. Lord Naas.] How far is the Isle of Grain from London?—It is near Sheerness, 37 miles from London.

6408. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Does that belong to the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company, or do the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company find the money for the completion of it?—No; the South Eastern Company; it is in direct communication with the South Eastern. There is an arrangement almost complete by which the South Eastern guarantee a certain rental for this line, and that will be worked by the South Eastern.

6409. It will be opened as soon as the station is finished, I believe. The line is finished, is it not?—The line is not quite finished yet.

6410. You propose that the foreign cattle market shall be there?—Yes. Why we consider it so eligible is, that the isolation is perfect, and therefore it will be an excellent place for the quarantine of live stock.

6411. Lord Naas.] What port will you have there?—It is proposed to erect a landing stage here (pointing on the map). An Act of Parliament was passed last year for the erection of a landing stage on the Medway.

6412. Chairman.] Has it not the disadvantage of being at the wrong side of the river for the metropolitan market; namely, on the south side of the river?—It is on the south side of the river, but the railways on the south side of the river have much better terminal accommodations in London than the railways on the north side. This line of railway runs almost in a straight line here (pointing on the map); it runs to London Bridge and Cannon-street, in connection with the London, Chatham, and Dover. The junction is formed by a line being constructed from Greenwich. Then you get to Ludgate-hill, you go to Charing-cross, and you go to Victoria station, and the connection will be complete.

Mr. J. Nelson.

6413. In order to get to the Islington market, where would you cross the river; would you propose, if you had this landing place at the Isle of Grain, that the fat animals should be slaughtered there, and sent dead to London?—Of course we propose that, if Parliament should determine to adopt such regulations.

6414. What has been your view in looking out for a site?—The view was, looking out for an eligible site for slaughtering cattle, if necessary, but more especially for quarantining lean stock. We feel certain that lean stock imported from abroad will never obtain admission into the metropolitan market: that there must be two markets, one for the sale of foreign lean stock and the other for the sale of home lean stock.

6415. Lord Naas.] How will you get a beast from the Isle of Grain to the Islington market?—That we should not do.

6416. Chairman.] Supposing animals were saughtered at the Isle of Grain and had to go to Smithfield or Newgate Market, how would the dead meat get there?—You would go as direct as possible by going by railway, either to Cannon-street, or as I say in this way (pointing on the map) forming a connection with a line which is not marked here, of the London, Chatham and Dover Railway, which forms a connection with the South Eastern Railway, near Lewisham. They will go direct from the Isle of Grain into the dead-meat market at London.

6417. Have you examined any other sites down the river?—Yes, I have examined all those sites.

6418. Was your attention called to the debate on the Cattle Plague Bill in the House of Commons?—Yes.

6419. Have you looked at a site, which I then brought before the House, at Plaistow Marshes?—Yes.

6421. Did you examine this site at Plaistow Marsh?—I did not examine it particularly.

6422. With regard to the Isle of Dogs, did you consider the propriety of establishing such a place in the Isle of Dogs?—No, I consider the Isle of Dogs too far up the river; and another consideration, I must tell you, is this, we considered that this, although some distance down the river, had direct communication with the railway. This was only an hour and a quarter's distance from the best station in London, and by landing cattle at the Isle of Grain, instead of taking them up to this part of the river, where the detention is very much greater than it is out here, we considered it would be an advantage to land them at the nearest and most eligible landing place, and we considered it would be something like six or seven hours' sail in the sea voyage, and that part of the sea voyage which I say is most deteriorating to cattle.

Mr. J. Nelson.

6423. You think the river voyage is more deteriorating than the sea voyage?—Yes; that I have discussed with all the captains of the steamers, and they say the ventilation at sea is sometimes a little too much, but the moment they get into the river then the cattle begin to suffer; that the cattle have suffered more especially off Blackwall whilst waiting for unloading; they have suffered more during the few hours of the day than during the whole of the voyage. I saw a number of owners of land here, and one gentleman said, "I will place 100 acres of land at your disposal for the purpose of carrying out the new quarantine arrangements for lean stock, or to erect the abattoirs for slaughtering cattle, or whatever you determine upon." The South Eastern Company have, of course, a manifest interest in supporting such a thing as that, and they state that they would be happy to render their assistance in carring out such an arrangement, if Parliament should determine upon it.

6424. There is a company formed for establishing such a place at Thames Haven?—I have heard so.

6425. Have you considered whether that would be a good site?—The railway communication with the great mass of London is much better on this side of the river than on that (pointing on the map).

6426. Have you looked at the Thames Haven site?—Yes; I know Thames Haven well.

6427. There is direct communication with it, is there not?—Yes, but its connection with London is not so good as on the south side.

6428. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Does it not run into the Metropolitan Market direct?—Yes. In selecting this site, we went on the assumption that lean cattle would not be sent to the Metropolitan Market.

6429. Mr. Dent.] Lean cattle would not want to go into the market at London at all?—No.

6430. Therefore what you want is, a depôt from which your fat cattle could get into the Metropolitan Market?—Having read the Report of the Cattle Plague Commissioners, we went upon the assumption that fat cattle would be slaughtered at the port.

6431. How would the meat get into the dead-meat market better by coming up on that side of the river than on this?—At present, they get to the Cannon-street station, which is the best station in London at the present time for Leadenhall and Newgate Markets.

6432. But those markets are to be done away with, and there is to be a deadmeat market in Smithfield?—By the time the new market is established, the London, Chatham, and Dover, over this line will have immediate access to the dead-meat markets.

6433. There is another line, from the Thames Tunnel, which runs into Smithfield Market? —I do not know what the connection is here, but I assume the southern lines would have a connection with the Metropolitan Cattle Market by that line which has utilised the Thames Tunnel.

6434. That runs to Finsbury, I think?—Yes, but there is a line crossing from the south, which goes by way of Thames Tunnel, and forms a connection with the North London Railway.

6435. Where do you think the lean cattle that come into quarantine are all to go to?—The great portion of these would go to the London dairies.

6436. For milch cows?—Yes.

6437. That is not a very large trade?—I should think it is the bulk of the lean cattle trade.

6438. Chairman.] Have you anything further to add?—I do not know that I have anything further to add; I wrote to Lord Granville, pointing this out; and I saw Colonel Harness, and the said Government had considered the question of the Isle of Grain, and that the only objection they saw to it, was its distance from London.

Monday, 18*th June* 1866.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Mr. Carnegie.	Lord Naas.
Viscount Cranborne.	Mr. Norwood.
Mr. Dent.	Sir M. W. Ridley.
Mr. Edward Egerton.	Mr. Banks Stanhope.
Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.	Mr. Alderman Salomons.

MR. HUNT IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. THOMAS RUDKIN, called in; and Examined.

Mr. T. Rudkin. 18 June 1866.

6439. Chairman.] YOU are Chairman of the Markets Committee of the City of London?—I am.

6440. Will you tell the Committee how that committee is appointed?—It is elected from the Court of Common Council; one member from each ward, and each side of a ward, of the City.

6441. The Markets Committee elect their chairman?—They do.

6442. How long have you been on the Markets Committee?—Eight years.

6443. How long have you been chairman?—I have been chairman now for some six months; I was chairman before, four years ago.

6444. Will you tell us what the duties of your committee are?—We take the entire control and management of the various markets of the Corporation: Newgate Market, Leadenhall Market, Farringdon Market, Billingsgate Market, and Copenhagen Cattle Market, at Islington.

6445. Are you concerned in making bye-laws for the regulation of the markets?—The bye-laws are framed by the committee, submitted to the Court of Common Council, and ultimately placed before the Home Secretary, who gives his sanction before they become law.

6446. Your duties consist of considering what bye-laws should be made, and framing them?—Yes; and also the general detail and management of the markets within the bye-laws.

6447. Do you give your personal attention to see that the bye-laws are complied with?—I do, myself; but it is not the custom for the chairman or members of the Corporation personally to attend to that; it is invariably left to the officers, which I consider to be a very objectionable course.

6448. How frequently do you attend the markets for that purpose?—I attend the Copenhagen Cattle Market every week.

6449. Once a week?—Yes, once a week, and other markets occasionally.

6450. Do you attend the Monday or Thursday market?—Never at any fixed time.

6451. You attend the dead-meat markets occasionally?—I attend the dead-meat market occasionally. I may say I reside in one of the dead-meat markets, Newgate Market, and therefore I am on the spot.

6452. You have some statistics to produce to the Committee?—I have. If you will allow me I will explain them; they are in reference to the number of animals in the market in 1865 and 1866.

6453. Be good enough to give them as you have them there?—I have taken the returns showing the number of animals in the market for eight weeks, commencing on the 16th April and ending on the 10th June 1866, and the corresponding weeks in 1865. I thought it would be desirable that the Committee should have these returns, because since the last Order in Council, admitting animals coming from the country by railway, we have been practically in the same condition as we were in the year 1865.

6454. Have you found them come in in great numbers?—Very nearly; the returns will show you that.

6455. Mr. Dent.] The slaughtering within the metropolitan districts has been stopped?—Not to any large extent. In 1865 the number of cattle during the eight weeks was 45,258. In 1866, 36,072. The number of sheep in the year 1865 was 261,665. I have also a return showing the number of animals in the lairs during those periods in 1866 and in 1865. The returns were handed in. (Vide Appendix.)

6456. Those are the lairs attached to the market?—Those are the lairs attached to the market; under the Act of Parliament.

6457. A great many animals go to lairs outside the market?—Since the last Order in Council, not so many have gone as before. The fact is, the effect of the last order has been especially to send most of the foreign animals to the Copenhagen Cattle Market.

6458. The radius within which they could get them was restricted?—Yes. I may say, that that Order in Council was brought about mainly through the suggestion of the Corporation, that it was a very objectionable course that animals coming from abroad should be permitted to go into lairs in different parts of the town, so that by such means the inspectors and police have no control over them.

6460. Are they principally foreign cattle that have been in the lairs?—We have had a vast number of foreign cattle; but the English cattle also also come, and we have had a great many Irish cattle.

18 June 1866.

6461. In those returns you have given us their is no distinction shown?—There is no distinction shown at all.

6462. Chairman.] Have you any other statistics with regard to the Islington Market?—As to the price of cattle; what is callled the return price, or list price.

6463. What do you mean by "return price"?—The clerk of the markets makes a return to the newspapers.

6464. At Islington?—Yes. When I was here the other day, I thought the Committee might probably want some information on that subject.

6465. We are very anxious to have information on that point?—I thought that would be so, and I am prepared to give you it.

6466. You have no returns for those weeks during which the Act of Parliament was in force, prohibiting the amount of cattle by railway?—I have not; but I can produce it for you.

6467. We should be glad if you would be kind enough to procure it for us. The Act of Parliament came into force on the 20th of February, and the prohibition was continued by Order in Council until the 16th April. If we could get the number during those weeks of last year, we should see what effect that restriction had upon the market?—Yes.

6468. Will you give us the prices of which you have the return?—I have taken these return prices for the corresponding weeks, similar to those returns I have handed in.

6469. Can you give us the prices in the same way for the other weeks?—Yes, and the corresponding prices for the year previously. I find that in the year 1865 the average price of cattle at the market ranged from 3 s. 4 d. to 5 s. per stone, sinking the offal. The offal, of course, belongs to the purchaser.

6470. Mr. Edward Egerton.] From what date is that?—From the 17th of April to the 10th of June 1865 inclusive. The price of mutton during that period ranged from 3 s. 10 d. to 6 s., veal from 3 s. 8 d. to 5 s. 3 d., pork from 3 s. to 4 s. 8 d., lambs 6 s. 1 d. to 8 s. In the corresponding periods in 1866, beef 3 s. 6 d. to 5 s. 2¼ d., an increase of about a farthing per pound; mutton 3 s. to 6 s., veal 5 s. to 6 s. 3 d. You see there is a vast increase in the price of veal during that period. Pork 3 s. to 4 s. 10 d., lambs 6 s. to 8 s. These are the returns taken officially from the books at Copenhagen Cattle Market, and signed by the clerk of the market.

6471. Mr. Dent.] How does he get those prices?—Those prices are obtained by the clerk going to various salesmen in the market, and asking their opinion as to the prices. Of course he does not take the particular statement of one individual; but obtains the best information he can by passing from one to the other, and shifting about from week to week to obtain that information. (The Returns were handed in.—Vide Appendix.)

6472. Chairman.] He gets from the salesmen the prices at which the cattle are sold?—Yes.

6473. How does he form his judgment as to what the dead-meat price is?—That is about the price they are sold at. The salesmen state to him that, to the best of their judgment, that is about the price per stone they have sold the animal at.

6474. I understand the salesman estimates the weight of the animal, and gives him the prices?—Yes.

6475. He depends on the judgment of the salesman?—Yes, clearly so.

6478. You think it is a better way of getting it, to take the judgment of the salesman as to the prices of the lots which he sells?—Mr. Baldry, the clerk of the market, informed me on Saturday, that he did at times ask the opinion of buyers and of butchers, and he used the best information he could get to make a fair return. He knows the importance of it, and has been told by the Committee the importance of making a return that will bear investigation.

6479. Are the salesmen obliged to make a return to the clerk of the market?—No.

6480. It is entirely voluntary?—Entirely voluntary.

6481. Is it within the official duties of Mr. Baldry to state those prices?—It is not within the official duties of Mr. Baldry to do that.

6482. It has been stated by some of the witnesses here, that the salesmen have an interest in keeping the prices down?—I can easily understand that; I think they have.

6483. You think they have an interest. Do you think, as a fact, that operates to keep the quotations down?—I have no doubt it might to a certain extent; I think possibly it does.

6484. It has been suggested to us, that if there was a committee of salesmen and butchers to give the prices jointly, that would correct it. Do you think that would improve the state of things?—I think it would be a very desirable thing.

6485. Do you see your way to such an arrangement?—There can be no objection to it at all. There must be some stringent rule laid down as to the mode in which the decision is to be come to. You must make it so stringent, that it should go according to the opinion of the majority of the persons who are appointed, and that their decision should be final, or they would never come to any decision at all.

6486. I suppose your markets committee could lay down such a rule?—I think we could, but I think it would not be desirable for us to do so.

6487. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Do you think people at this time of day would submit to that, and that the markets committee, or any other committee would be able to fix prices for them?—I do not understand that that is the question that is put.

6488. It comes to the same thing. How could you make a person buying a bullock tell us the price of it. If I were a salesman, how could you compel me to return to you what I bought a bullock for, or sold a bullock at?—I have long since been of opinion that the returns of prices for the dead-meat market were very fallacious as we have seen them in the paper from time to time.

6489. Chairman.] We are told that presses wrongly in two ways; first of all, the butchers say that their customers are constantly complaining of the prices they charge, because they see the prices quoted lower in the paper. You think there is something in that, do you?—I think that is because the public at large do not understand the mode in which the trade is carried on. A person going to Newgate Market and buying a carcase of beef, had to buy all the inferior portions of the animal with it; he buys the entire carcase. The fact is, that for the last six months the prime parts of the beef have been fetching a very enormous price above the wholesale in Newgate Market; and, in fact, I may illustrate that statement by stating that, to my own knowledge, this morning one salesmen informed me that out of some 50 or 60 carcases of beasts he had sold this morning, selling the whole of the hind quarters, he had sold none at a less price than 6*s.* 8*d.* per stone, and that is 10*d.* per pound for the hind quarters. Of course we know that at the west end of the town that class of the community residing there will insist on having prime joints. The rinderpest caused an immense number of inferior animals to be sent into the market, and those cut down the price of the inferior quality of meat. Therefore, the clods and stickings, and shins, and thin flanks, and thick flanks of the best animals were reduced in price to a considerable extent, because they had to buy the carcase at an enhanced price when they wanted to supply the best customers with the prime joints.

6490. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] What is the wide difference between healthy animals which would command the best trade, and those inferior animals that would go to the inferior trade?—There is this difference, that the one animal, in all probability, has not been half fed, and may have had some sickness.

6491. I mean, what is the difference in price?—The difference in price ranges from 3*s.* to 5*s.* 2*d.*, as the list I have handed in to-day shows.

6492. And the dead animals?—From 3*s.* 4*d.* to 6*s.* 8*d.*, or from 3*s.* 4*d.* to 6*s.*

6493. Double?—Yes.

6494. Do you mean to say that one animal, a healthy animal, may be worth 5*d.*, and another worth 10*d.* a pound?—Yes, clearly so; the whole carcase, and each animal perfectly healthy.

6495. Chairman.] When we see these quotations in the papers, independent of the difference between what the butcher charges a retail customer, and the prices quoted in the papers, the butcher gets in the offal, does he not?—If he buys the animal alive; but I am now speaking of the price at the dead-meat market.

6496. Mr. Norwood.] Do not the salesmen issue prices current of their own, market advices to their customers?—They do; but they are very fallacious.

6497. Do not these large salesmen issue a printed circular after every market, informing their customers in the country their range of prices in the day?—Do you refer to the dead-meat salesmen, or the cattle salesmen?

6498. To both?—I do not think either of them do; I think the business of the Copenhagen Fields Market is conducted on a different principle to the business of Newgate Market.

6499. Chairman.] The cattle salesmen only send a sold note to their customers?—They send a sold note, and also put the name of the person to whom they have sold the animal upon that note. The meat salesman does not; he returns what price he thinks fit.

6500. With regard to the cattle salesman, he does not accompany the sold note with any list of the prices in the market?—No, certainly not.

6501. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Then you would say, there is at least a uniform variation every market day for dead meat, according to the quality of it, of 2*d.* or 3*d.* a pound?—Clearly so; more than that.

6503. If they take the trouble, they can ascertain whether the salesman returns the real prices?—Clearly so.

6504. Of course, there may be collusion between the buyer and the salesman?—There may be.

6505. Do you think there is, as a rule?—I am afraid in all these businesses there is something of the sort going on; I have no knowledge, but I have a very strong opinion there is.

6506. I suppose, if the cattle are killed in the country, and sent up in the shape of sides, the man can tell exactly what his beast weighs, and has more opportunity of ascertaining and getting the correct price?—He has no opportunity of knowing what the price is, none whatever.

6507. He has an opportunity of knowing what the weight is?—Yes, he has an opportunity of knowing the weight, but no opportunity whatever of knowing the price; he is entirely at the mercy of the salesmen.

Mr. T. Rudkin.

18 June 1866.

6508. In Newgate Market?—Yes; I think that is a very objectionable course, and that some steps should be taken to remedy it.

6509. Now, you say it is a very objectionable state of things; will you suggest a remedy for it?—I think that the same custom that obtains in the Copenhagen Fields Cattle Market should also exist in the dead-meat market at Newgate, that the salesman should be compelled to name the person to whom he sells the animal, or the carcase, in his sold note.

6510. Is that part of your regulations?—We have no power of laying down such a rule.

6511. Why do they do it in one case, and not in the other?—It is a system that has been in existence, I believe, since the memory of man; they have always done so.

6512. It is the custom of the trade, in fact?—It is the custom of the trade.

6513. And it is not the custom in the dead-meat market?—It is not.

6514. How would you enforce such a practice in the dead-meat market?—By Act of Parliament.

6515. Is it not in the power of the consignors to require it?—It is, if they think fit.

6516. Every consignor might say, "I will not consign to you, unless you send me the name of the purchaser"?—He might do so.

6517. Why is it not done?—I suppose he feels satisfied with the return of the price that he gets.

6518. You think if he knew the facts, that he would not be satisfied?—In some instances I think not.

6519. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Is it not competent for the City to make their own regulations?—We have no means of making bye-laws. At the present moment, our market is in rather a curious position; we have a chartered market, and there are also houses in the immediate vicinity over which we have no control, which have been permitted, from time to time, in consequence of the growth of the market, to exist as salesmen's shops; we have no control whatever over them.

6520. Surely the City might be allowed, by Act of Parliament or prescription, to levy a certain toll?—We were allowed to do so; but those tolls are in abeyance.

6521. Are no tolls paid in your market?—There are no tolls directly paid.

6522. Is there any payment at all?—Yes, but it is in substitution of the ordinary tolls that were levied under the charter.

6523. Chairman.] Are you speaking of the market at Copenhagen Fields?—No, I am speaking of Newgate and Leadenhall Markets.

6524. What tolls are paid now in Newgate Market and Leadenhall Market?—In Newgate Market, I think, about 30*s.* per week; and in Leadenhall, from 12*s.* to 15*s.* I may say this: originally, the charter gave us the power to levy a toll; so much toll "per pad," or "pack," and so much per hamper of meat which was sent to the market.

6525. Mr. Edward Egerton.] You say you have the power; how have you the power?—By the charter.

6526. Was that charter ever confirmed by Act of Parliament?—I am not aware.

6527. Surely you know the regulations of your own City?—Not sufficiently to answer that question.

6528. You have never had those tolls disputed, I suppose?—Not in my time.

6529. Have they been disputed at any time?—I believe they have been.

6530. Do you know what remedy was taken by the City?—I believe the remedy was this, that they were commuted. Instead of levying the tolls persons were obliged to pay a certain stated sum per week.

6531. Chairman.] Was that for stallage?—That was in lieu of tolls.

6532. How do you take it; from every person who occupies a certain stall in the market?—We let the stalls in Newgate Market at per week, to certain individuals. They pay a stallage or rent for their stall, and in addition to that some of them pay; not all, there are a few who pay, but the majority do not; and I believe, that in point of fact, if the Corporation were to insist upon it they would find they could not levy it; it is a nominal amount paid by old tenants, and having paid it for some time they still continue to pay it.

6533. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] What is the nature of the regulations allowed in the new market?—Under the Metropolitan Meat and Poultry Acts we are allowed to levy ¼*d.* for every 21 lbs. of meat that is taken into the market.

6534. Chairman.] Is that the Act under which Smithfield Market will be held?—That is so.

6535. When you get to the new market you will be able under the Act of Parliament to charge all these dues?—Yes.

6536. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Is the due you have mentioned the only due, or is there a stallage besides that?—Yes, there is a rent of 1*d.* per foot per week.

6537. Chairman.] Under what authority do you levy these substituted dues?—Under charter. I believe actions were brought by the Corporation of London to enforce those tolls, but they were opposed, and the result was that a compromise was come to, whereupon these individuals agreed to pay a certain sum per week in lieu of tolls.

6538. Do you know the date of this charter?—I do not.

6539. You do not know whether it has been confirmed by a recent Act of Parliament?—It has not been confirmed by a recent Act of Parliament.

6540. Do you consider that under the old charter the Corporation are in a position to enforce these rates?—I do not. I think they are in abeyance in consequence of desuetude.

6541. I understand you to say that in addition to the sales within the precincts of the market, there are salesmen outside over whom you have no control or any pretence of control?—Yes, that is so, precisely.

6542. This unsatisfactory state of things will be entirely remedied when you get your new Smithfield Market, by having the provisions of an Act of Parliament saying what you can do and what you cannot?—Yes.

6543. What prospect is there of this new market being established?—The ground is now being excavated for the railway station to be completed under the market. As soon as that is done the Corporation of London will be in a position and perfectly ready to commence the construction of the market. I may say that at the last meeting of the Market Improvement Committee the desirability sirability of sending to some 20 or 25 contractors to send in tenders for the purpose of erecting the market was under consideration.

6544. In what space of time do you think it possible the market will be opened?—I think this midsummer two years.

6545. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Have you any idea of the rent which the Corporation of London get out of those tolls in the markets that at present exist?—I think it is about 30*s.* per week in Newgate Market, and from 12*s.* to 15*s.* per week in Leadenhall.

6546. We want you to furnish us with the total of that?—I will do so.

6547. It is a very material point that the consumers should know exactly what the price of their meat in the market is. Have you, from your experience, the power of suggesting any means by which accurate information on that subject could be published?—I think the best means would be for the Corporation to be empowered to cause an exact return to be made and published in the newspapers.

6548. Do you apprehend there could be any objection made on the part of the salesmen to furnishing such information?—I do not. Even supposing there should be an objection raised on their part, there would be no difficulty in obtaining the information independently of them.

6549. There should be some person whose duty it is to furnish it?—I think the clerk and collector of the market should be the person to make the return, subject, of course, to the control of the Corporation.

6550. Do you know the system that is adopted in other public markets throughout England, which are held either under charter, or by Act of Parliament?—I do not.

6551. Would you be able to supply us with the exact amount for the last two or three years of what the City of London received in the shape of tolls either for stallages or anything that comes into the market?—I should be able to do so.

6552. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] I do not know whether we have clearly got from you what would be the new rates in the market?—The rent will be 1*d.* per foot superficial, and the toll will be ¼*d.* for every 21 lbs. of meat or provisions taken into the market.

6553. Are the regulations, with regard to the new market, very much like the regulations in the old, that they will be limited to wholesale dealers?—That is not decided. It is a moot question whether there shall be a retail market in the after-part of the day, as well as a wholesale market in the morning.

6554. In the earlier part of the day it is to be entirely a wholesale market?—I think it would be so, but that is only my own opinion. It is not decided at present.

6555. I was contradicted by one of the witnesses, some time ago, as to my impression about the live market. Is not the best standard market early in the morning before 10 o'clock; that is to say, for the live market in Copenhagen Fields?—Do you mean for purchasing, or for sale?

6556. I mean altogether. Is it not the object of the Corporation that that market should be as early as possible?—I may say that that suits itself entirely to the views of the salesmen. They sometimes sell their things early in the morning, and sometimes late in the day, in accordance with the advice they get as to the price they ought to obtain.

6557. I thought there was some desire on the part of the Markets Committee that the markets should be held very early in the morning, so that the cattle should be got away as early as possible?—As far as I understand the views of the Corporation, we have had no desire for anything of the kind. The only view we have had is, that the market is to open for sales at four o'clock on the Monday morning, and remains open until two o'clock on the Monday afternoon.

6558. There are no regulations with regard to sale?—No, it is perfectly competent for them to sell animals at any time during those hours.

6559. Practically, when do the heaviest sales take place?—I should say from 8 to 10 in the morning. I may say that the market is very much later than it was some 10 or 15 years back, when it was held in Smithfield. In Smithfield it was a common custom to see everything sold by torchlight; now the custom is to see the market at its density at 9 or 10 in the morning.

6560. Mr. Dent.] With respect to the returns in prices, both of live and dead meat, I take it there is a considerable competition amongst the salesmen in business?—There is.

6561. If consignors of either live cattle or carcases are dissatisfied with the prices, they would easily change from one to the other?—Yes; it would be simply out of the frying-pan into the fire.

6562. You have no decrease of consignment of dead meat, or of the consignment of live stock?—We have no decrease in consignment of dead meat, but we have a slight falling off in the consignment of live stock.

6563. That does not seem as if there was much dissatisfaction on the part of the Commissioners, with the prices they have made?—My view of the case is this: that the consignors of meat are entirely at the mercy of the salesmen.

6564. The Aberdeen and north countrymen are not usually considered blind to their own interests?—No; I believe they are alive to it now, and are taking steps to remedy the evil which they have admitted to exist for some time; in fact, always.

6565. Do you think it would be really possible to make it compulsory on salesmen to return the prices obtained?—Not necessarily: but I think it might be compulsory to make them return the names of the persons to whom they have sold the carcases.

6566. You say the custom is to do that in one branch of the trade and not in the other?—Yes.

6567. Do not you think the custom of the trade is much more likely to regulate it than legislative enactment?—Possibly so. I am opposed to legislative enactment to enforce any regulations in a trade, if possible.

6568. You would not recommend interference between buyer and seller by law in any way?—No, possibly not; it ought to regulate itself.

6569. There would be more chance of doing so in the new market than in the old market?—Yes; circumstances will be altered when we get to the new market.

6570. There will be a greater opening to the trade?—Yes. I think it will be much better for the person who consigns the meat.

6571. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Is there not this difference between the Newgate Market and the Metropolitan Market, that the salesman in the Metropolitan Market is an agent between buyer and seller, and that in the dead-meat market he is only doing his own business, or very frequently?—

Mr. T. Rudkin.

18 June 1866.

frequently?—Yes; and so do the salesmen in the Copenhagen Market.

6572. Mr. Norwood.] The Honourable Member for Scarborough has brought before your mind several questions which I intended to put to you. You do not seriously imagine that you could compel dealers in any produce, whether cattle or anything else, to declare their prices by Act of Parliament, or by the regulation of a Corporation?—I have never made such a proposition.

6573. I thought there was a suggestion of the kind; that you would compel them, as far as the Corporation was concerned, to disclose their prices?—Not to disclose their prices; but to return the name of the purchaser.

6575. Do you know of any trade of any kind that exists in England, where there are anything like compulsory arrangements for the declaration of prices. Do you know of any place where that exists, except upon the Stock Exchange?—I have no knowledge with reference to that.

6576. Do you know of any trade carried on in England, except the Stock Exchange, where there is anything like compulsory arrangement as to declaration of prices?—I do not.

6577. Sir M. W. Ridley.] As to prices, have you ever compared the prices given by some of the London papers, such as the "Times," and others, with the prices given by what may be called the mere agricultural papers, such as the "Mark-lane Express," and so forth. Have you seen any greater justice or greater truth in any one return given in any one paper than in the other.

6578. Are you yourself aware of what the system of giving in the prices in the larger country markets, such as Wakefield, Newcastle-on-Tyne, and so forth?—I have no knowledge on the subject.

6579. What do you think in your opinion is the earliest hour at which a fair statement of prices could be given in the markets?—Do you refer to the dead-meat market, or the live-meat market?

6580. The dead-meat market?—I should say nine o'clock in the morning.

6581. That is not too early?—It is not too early.

6582. And as regards the live-meat market?—I should say 12 o'clock.

6583. Twelve is the earliest hour in the one case, and nine in the other?—Yes; because, of course, the market may drag, and if it drags, that drag would tell.

6584. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Would prices be of any use whatever, unless you put the quality at the same time?—The prices are returned for the various qualities, and they range from 3*s.* up to 6*s.*

6585. From 3*s.* up to 6*s.* is a pretty wide range. Would it be of any use to a man to know that the prices ranged from 3*s.* to 6*s.*?—I do not think it is a guide to the consumer. I think it is a guide to a man who sends his meat to London. He knows the quality of the meat he has sent to London, and therefore is the best judge of the price he is likely to get for it.

6586. Chairman.] You are acquainted with the slaughter-house system in the City, are you not?—I am.

6587. You are acquainted with most of the private slaughter-houses in the City?—Yes; and I may say I am tolerably well acquainted with the slaughter-houses throughout the metropolis generally.

6588. What is your opinion as to the desirability of doing away with all private slaughter-houses within the city, or at all events within a certain radius of the dead-meat market?—I say at once, it will be a very desirable thing.

6589. What are your grounds for that opinion?—On the score of public health, and the great desire there is now to put a stop to the driving of cattle through the streets of London.

6590. Do you think that the present slaughter-houses are prejudicial to the health of the inhabitants?—I only speak of course, and form my opinion, from the opinions of medical professors, who have expressed their opinions on those subjects. I am not so strongly opposed to living near a slaughter-house myself as some people may be; I do not see the objection to it, which possibly the general public may have.

6591. Do you think that the nuisance of animals being driven through the streets of London is very great?—I think that is the strong objection.

6592. Supposing that all these private slaughter-houses were done away with, where would you have the public slaughter-houses?—I do not think it is desirable to do away with private slaughter-houses. I may say that I am taking the view that it is necessary to feed the people of the metropolis as well as to protect their health, and to regulate the traffic of the streets.

6594. Then, what would you propose?—I would propose that every retail butcher should be permitted to have a slaughter-house attached to his premises, and that he should have that slaughter-house licensed to slaughter as many animals as he would be likely to consume in his own business. It should be licensed, say, to slaughter 10 head of cattle in a week, and 40 sheep, or anything that he might be likely to sell in his shop in which it was situated.

6595. Why would you regulate him as to the numbers you would allow him to slaughter?—Because I do not think there is any necessity for private slaughter-houses to be in existence in London, simply for the purpose of carcase butchers. I think carcase butchers are altogether in a different category to those who are simply retail butchers.

6596. I understand you think that carcase butchers ought to be made to slaughter at public slaughter-houses?—I am of opinion that carcase butchers ought to be compelled to slaughter at public slaughter-houses.

6597. But that retail butchers should be allowed to slaughter at their own slaughter-houses?—I think it is absolutely necessary, under existing circumstances. I know that in Paris slaughter-ter-houses do not exist privately, but everything is carried out at public places.

6598. Are you well acquainted with Paris abattoirs?—I know something of them.

6599. Are you able to tell us whether great inconvenience arises to the trade or the inhabitants of Paris by reason of that law?—I believe not.

6600. Then why do you think that could not be done in London if it is able to be done in Paris?—On account of English custom. An Englishman likes to carry on his business as he has been in the habit of carrying it on hitherto. Englishmen do not like breaking through old rules and prejudices.

6601. We quite understand that it would be against the wishes of the trade; but would there be any practical difficulty in it?—I think there would be in the summer time. Londoners eat much more meat than Parisians; and I think the supply of meat to the metropolis is of a vast deal more importance than the supply of meat to Paris.

6602. Supposing you allowed these private slaughter-houses, you would then not get rid of the nuisance of the animals being driven through the streets of London, so far as the retail business is concerned?—Not so far as that is concerned, but it would mitigate the evil to an enormous extent.

6603. Can you give us an idea of the number of animals that are slaughtered by retail butchers and carcase butchers?—I cannot give you any data, but I can give you an opinion. My opinion is, that about half the number of animals that are slaughtered in London, are slaughtered by carcase butchers.

6604. Do you mean in the metropolis, or the City?—In the metropolis.

6605. Is the greater part of the meat of the animals killed by the carcase butchers exposed in Newgate Market and Leadenhall Market?—It is; of course some of it is sold at the different slaughter-houses where it is slaughtered. They get customers from the country to go to the slaughter-houses and purchase them.

6606. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Are there any carcase butchers in London, properly so called. When I say London, I exclude Deptford and Greenwich?—Yes, an immense number of carcase butchers.

6607. Chairman.] Supposing you required all the carcase butchers to slaughter at public slaughter-houses, where would you place those slaughter-houses?—At the Copenhagen Cattle Market.

6608. You think that would be enough for the whole of the metropolis?—I do.

6609. You think there would be no occasion to have any on the other side of the river?—I think there would be no occasion to have any on the other side of the river.

6610. Nor out in the suburbs?—Certainly not; I go upon this principle. I think an animal, when it is slaughtered, may be just as easily carted from the Copenhagen Cattle Market to any other part of London, as from any other part of London to the district it is required to be sent.

6611. You contemplate railway communication between Copenhagen Fields and Smithfield Market?—Yes; and that would communicate with every other district of London.

6612. Would there be a provision for a siding to go into the slaughter-houses in Copenhagen Fields?—Yes.

6613. So that there would be less shifting and handling of the meat?—A great deal less than there is at the present time.

6614. Mr. Carnegie.] The suggestion that there should be one public slaughter-house at the Copenhagen Cattle Market is founded upon the supposition that the retail butchers would still have their private slaughter-houses?—Yes, it is on that supposition.

6615. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] What do you call a carcase butcher?—A person who buys an animal, either in the country or at the Copenhagen Cattle Market, and slaughters it for the purpose of sending it to the public market to be sold wholesale. He does not slaughter it for the purpose of selling it to the consumer direct.

6616. Chairman.] Do the carcase butchers ever cut up their sides into joints?—Not into joints, only into quarters; and that is simply for the convenience of transit.

6617. Nothing less than quarters?—No.

6618. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Tell us whether there are any carcase butchers except those at Aldgate and Whitechapel?—Yes.

6619. Where?—There are carcase butchers at the Copenhagen Cattle Market now; there are also carcase butchers at Newgate Market. There is a slaughter-house at Rose-street, Newgate Market, now, where they slaughter from 12 to 20 beasts during three days of the week.

6620. Are there any cattle slaughtered in Newgate Market; anything larger than calves?—Yes.

6621. There are no carcase butchers, except at Newgate Market and Whitechapel?—Yes, there are slaughter-houses at other parts of the City, and in other parts of London as well.

6622. Where?—In Maiden-lane there are slaughter-houses.

6623. Are these slaughter-houses belonging to carcase butchers?—Yes.

6624. Who sell the animals wholesale?—Yes.

6625. Maiden-lane is Newgate Market, is it not?—No; Maiden-lane runs from the King's Cross Railway Station up to the Copenhagen Cattle Market.

6626. It is still close by, is it not?—No.

6627. At all events, it is London?—It is in the vicinity.

6628. Chairman.] Is it your opinion that it is desirable to have one central dead-meat market for the metropolis?—Yes, I think so; in fact, any attempt to divide the markets would fail; any division of markets always does.

6629. That is as regards the dead-meat markets; are you of the same opinion with regard to the live cattle market?—I am.

6630. You would object to having a division between the foreign cattle and English cattle in the market?—I think so.

6631. We have been told by most witnesses who have been examined, that a different class of customers purchase the foreign cattle; is that your opinion?—No; I think the best butchers in London now purchase foreign cattle; of course they also purchase English.

6632. The West-end butchers whom we have had here have denied that they purchase foreign cattle; you think they do?—A great many of the French cattle that come now are very prime, and they are purchased, as I know, by West-end butchers.

6633. Supposing that there was an enactment that foreign cattle should be slaughtered down by the river side, do you think the foreign trade would suffer?—I do. I may say in reference to the foreign animals coming to London, I think that unless foreign animals are permitted to come much in the same manner as they do now, it would be practically impossible to feed the metropolis.

6634. Supposing that all the foreign cattle were slaughtered at the port of London, and that there was railway communication direct from the place at which they were slaughtered to Smithfield, do you think there would be any difficulty then in feeding the metropolis?—I do.

6635. Why could you not then have the same supply of meat as you have under present circumstances?—Because the retail butchers would be not able to purchase the animals alive and slaughter them on their own premises; and at this time of the year that is absolutely necessary.

6636. The retail butchers buy most of these foreign cattle?—The retail butchers do buy foreign cattle.

6637. Can you tell us whether the carcase butchers or the retail butchers buy most?—I should think it is very equally divided. The contractors, as a rule, buy foreign animals.

6638. With regard to the interest of the contractors, is there any objection to their being slaughtered at the port of landing?—I think it would be much better for the contractor to be enabled to purchase his animals in a market where there is free and open competition. He purchases them much better than he would do if he were simply to go down to the water side, where there are no English animals in competition with the foreign.

6639. Do you think the foreign animals ought to be allowed to come freely into the metropolitan market?—I do. I think the metropolitan market should be what it represents itself to be, namely, a market for the supply of animals for food; for the supply of animals for slaughter, not for store animals at all.

6640. Would you have all the animals that come into the metropolitan market marked for slaughter?—I should. I believe, looking over the matter as to the mode of marking animals which should be permitted to pass into the country, if bought by butchers or contractors, I should suggest they should be marked with a tar or pitch brand, with the date at which they pass away from the market, and that they should not be permitted to live more than seven days.

6641. Should they be marked under the superintendence of the market authorities?—Yes.

6642. You would allow no store animals to come into the London market?—I would not; it would be a very objectionable thing altogether.

6643. Not even sheep?—Not even sheep; no store things of any description.

6644. You would confine the metropolitan market to the fat stock market?—Clearly so.

6645. You propose that all animals should be branded, and that the animals that passed into the country should all be killed within a week?—Yes; as to all animals for consumption in the metropolitan district, there would be no necessity for branding them.

6646. Would you allow the cattle so branded in the metropolitan market to be exposed for sale in country markets?—Certainly not.

6647. You would only allow them to be sold to go to the slaughter-houses, either in the metropolis or in the country?—Yes.

6649. Have you considered what would be the best site for such a thing?—I have not, indeed; the nearest port, I should imagine; the port most convenient for landing.

6650. You would have the same rule at all ports?—I think so.

6651. Would you limit the number of ports to those ports at which foreign animals could be landed?—I think it would be better to limit them, and district the seaports out, so as to permit animals coming from abroad to be landed at that port where the quarantine was established.

6652. What regulations would you make with regard to fat animals about to be landed at ports other than London?—I think the same plan would work well. There is a market at almost every place where there is a landing; I would allow them to go into that market to be sold, and, if permitted, to pass out of the town or place at which they were landed; they should then be branded similar to those which left the Metropolitan Cattle Market.

6653. You said you should like to see the metropolitan market confined to the sale of fat stock; but that would not be possible at all these ports of landing throughout the kingdom, would it?—I think for that purpose it could not; but then I look upon the Copenhagen Cattle Market as very much larger in extent, and more liable to spread disease than any other smaller market.

6654. But the same reason that would require store animals to be kept out of the London market would also require some regulations to be made requiring fat animals from abroad to be prevented from meeting store animals from the country in that particular market?—I apprehend it would.

6655. What would be your proposal with regard to that?—I have not thought of that branch of the subject; I have confined my thoughts on that subject to what would be desirable in the metropolis.

6656. Do you know anything about the supply of milch cows for London?—The supply of milch cows, as I understand now, is this, they come to London from all parts of the country.

6657. There are a great number of milch cows come from abroad?—Yes.

6658. You would require all these animals to be quarantined?—Certainly; I think the system under which the cows are purchased to restock the cowsheds is very objectionable.

not; they pass from the wharves to the cowsheds, and if they have the germs of the disease in them they spread the disease; whereas if they come from the Metropolitan Cattle Market there are no means of their doing so, because they are slaughtered, under the recent Order in Council, within four days.

6660. Mr. Banks Stanhope.] I think you said that animals for slaughter might be sent from the metropolitan market to country butchers?—Yes.

6661. If they were to go by rail, how would you prevent infection remaining in the trade?—I would not permit any truck to be used for any other purpose except for the conveyance of cattle from the market to the butcher, and the railway companies would be quite ready to fall into that view if a slightly increased price was paid them.

6662. You say trucks should never be used for any other purpose?—They should never be used for any other purpose; they should be kept entirely for the purpose of conveying fat animals from the market to the butchers, and the same trucks should not be used for any other animals. It is the same thing that exists now under a recent Order in Council. Trucks are compelled to be kept distinct for bringing animals from the water side up to Copenhagen Cattle Market.

6663. Supposing one of these trucks to be full of animals fit for slaughter which might have the germs of infection in them, and it was to run into a station and remain standing by the side of trucks with store animals in them, what would happen then?—In all probability it would give them the disease.

6664. You cannot see any way of preventing the disease but the plan you suggest?—I do not think it is possible to lay down any system absolutely to prevent it if you permit animals to move at all.

6665. Is there any way in which country butchers could supply themselves without buying in the metropolitan markets at all?—Not with foreign animals.

6666. But with any animals?—Yes, with English animals.

6667. If there was a foreign market held at the water side, could they not kill them there, and have them sent down 20 or 30 miles by rail?—It might be done by the establishment of slaughter-houses at the water side.

6668. I think you recommended that carcase butchers should kill in the metropolitan markets?—Yes, in the Metropolitan Cattle Market.

6669. And that retail butchers should kill at home?—Yes.

6670. Might not the same arrangement be entered into with regard to a separate foreign market?—As far as regards the carcase butchers it might.

6671. Could not this be done: a foreign market being at the water side, could not carcase butchers have their own slaughter-house, and kill there?—Yes.

6672. Could not also some system be organised by which the retail butchers might be allowed to take the cattle from the foreign market straight to their shops?—Yes.

6673. Would not that diminish the risk of infection?—I do not think so. I do not think the disease is more prevalent among foreign animals than among English. I think it is altogether a mistake to imagine it. Our experience at the Copenhagen Cattle Market shows us it is not so.

6674. Are you aware that nearly the whole of England were poisoned by the Metropolitan Cattle Market?—I am.

6675. Are you aware that the whole of England have great objections to being poisoned again?—I do not think it arose from the foreign animals.

6676. Can you enter into the feeling of the whole of England, that having once been poisoned by the meat from the metropolitan market they object to be poisoned again?—Quite so. I have as great a desire to put a stop to it as any man can have.

6677. Do you think your method would be effectual, namely, allowing animals to be sent to butchers in the country from the Metropolitan Cattle Market?—I think it would be the most effectual system, taking into consideration the absolute necessity there is of feeding the people of England.

6678. I thought you said you confined yourself to feeding the people of London?—Well, feeding the people of London, if you will have it that way.

6679. Keeping it to that, what do you say then?—I may say this, if you will permit me for one moment: London now, as far as the supply of meat is concerned, comprises a radius of 100 miles round it, and it has been so for many years.

6680. You are anxious to include 100 miles round London under the term "London," are you?—Yes, so far as the supply of meat is concerned.

6681. Am I to understand that people within 100 miles cannot supply themselves unless they buy in the metropolitan market?—I do not say that, but they do supply themselves from that source now.

6682. Do you think it of vital importance to the feeding of the people 100 miles round London, that they should purchase in the metropolitan market?—No, I simply adopt the system that already exists. You may establish another market elsewhere.

6683. Would it not be perfectly possible to feed all the people 100 miles around London, without their coming into the metropolitan market at all?—Clearly so.

6684. I presume a considerable portion of the meat that comes into the metropolitan market comes from 100 miles round London?—Vastly more than 100 miles round London. Very little I should say comes from within 100 miles.

6685. There is a certain quantity?—A very small proportion, I should say.

6686. Are there no sheep?—There are sheep, but a very small number.

6687. You mentioned the quarantining of these Dutch cows. You said you would advise that they should be quarantined. Can you suggest where that should be made?—I should say at the port of landing.

6688. Do you mean at the wharves?—There is no necessity for landing them at the wharves at which they are now landed, at all.

6689. You think there might be some fresh places?—Yes, I think Thames Haven or Harwich; at Thames Haven especially there is plenty of room for the purpose of erecting any quarantine, and for the purpose of having a market for these store cattle.

 6690. Supposing

Mr. T. Rudkin.

18 June 1866.

6690. Supposing the same vehicle carried a lot of fat stock and a lot of cows, would you suggest that they should first land their cows at Thames Haven and take their fat stock on?—I should suggest they should all be landed there, the fat stock brought up to Copenhagen Fields by railway, and special trucks provided for that purpose.

6691. You would suggest a new landing place?—It is not a new landing-place, that is the one that is now in existence. I would do away with the landing-place at Blackwall and City wharf.

6692. You do not approve of Brown's Wharf?—I do not think there is any necessity for it at all. It is needlessly crowding the streets for no purpose.

6693. They might be landed lower down?—Yes, and brought up by railway; that is the system that is being worked to a considerable extent.

6694. Would it not simplify everything if, having such a place for landing as Thames Haven, you had a foreign cattle market?—That would simplify the matter, so far as the foreign animals are concerned, but I think the difficulty would be this. You have to consider the fact that butchers have to go to the markets to buy the things. The retail butcher first of all has to come to Newgate Market to buy his meat; he then has to go to the Copenhagen Fields Cattle Market, and to drive something like three and a half miles or four miles to buy his live stock; if he also has to go down to Thames Haven the same morning, or any other morning in a week, for the purchase of foreign animals, you would occupy the time of the man to such an extent that he would not be able to carry on his business at home, but he would have to employ an agent for the purpose of buying his live animals.

6695. There would be a railway from the new Smithfield Market up to Copenhagen Fields?—Yes.

6696. There naturally would be a railway from Copenhagen Market down to Thames Haven?—There is now.

6697. How long would it take to go from one place to another by rail; 10 minutes?—Much more than 10 minutes. You could not get from Copenhagen Fields to Thames Haven under an hour or an hour and a half.

6698. Is there no place short of Thames Haven where you could have a cattle market near London?—Yes; I have no doubt there are plenty of places within an easy distance of London.

6699. Mr. Norwood.] North Woolwich?—Yes, North Woolwich would do; there is no doubt of that at all.

6700. Mr. Banks Stanhope.] Would there be any difficulty in getting by rail in a quarter of an hour from Newgate Market to the nearest point where you might have a live meat market? Certainly not a quarter of an hour.

6701. In 20 minutes?—Certainly not. It would take you a quarter of an hour to get to the railway station now, considering the crowded state of the streets.

6702. When you are on the railway, I mean?—Probably it would.

6703. Then you would naturally get by rail all the way from this foreign market straight up to Copenhagen Fields, and that would not take you long?—Yes. Suppose the case of a man who goes to the Copenhagen Market. He finds that the English market is so dear he cannot buy anything; he must run down and buy some foreign things. He runs there, and he finds them rather dearer than they were at the other place, and he has to go back again. If you have them all on the same spot there would be no practical difficulty.

6704. I suppose there is a danger of infection arising from the foreign animals?—I think the danger arises more from English than foreign.

6705. You think it was started in England and communicated itself to the Continent?—I do not know how it came to England, but I believe the first animal we had in the Copenhagen Market with the disease was an English one.

6706. Were they not Dutch cows?—No, not the first.

6707. Have you not heard there was a doubt about their coming from Revel?—I have heard that, but never had any faith in it, I have seen it contradicted officially.

6708. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Do you see any objection to our keeping the foreign market, and the English market, distinct?—I can see no objection to it. I only say they ought to be in close contiguity, there should not be a distance of miles, or even of hundreds of yards between them. They should be close together.

6709. Do you think the foreign market is likely to increase in consequence of the supply to the English market decreasing?—I have no doubt during the next three or four years London will be practically supplied with foreign cattle. It is increasing every day, and the English is falling off.

6710. Has that been found before this year?—That has been found before this year. The general bearing of the case has been that we have had a vast increase of foreign animals, and falling off of English animals.

6711. Do not you know, as a fact, that a great deal of ground has been laid down in grass which was not in tillage before in England?—I do not know it, as a fact.

6712. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Up to the present time you say the foreign trade is on the increase?—It is.

6713. If you had a market for the foreign animals, distinct from the English market, what effect would that have on the prices?—It would materially increase the price.

6714. Why so?—Because you would increase the difficulty and expense of the butcher in obtaining the animals he wanted to slaughter, and any increase of cost in obtaining that kind of meat before it goes to the consumer, must, of necessity, be charged on the consumer.

6715. What regulates the prices, does the foreign market regulate the price of the English market, or does the number of the English beasts regulate the prices of foreign stock?—I do not think either governs the case; I think the price is governed by the supply coming from both districts. I do not think the price of either the foreign or the English governs the case; I think that the supply is governed by both, and that the price is regulated by supply and demand.

6716. Do you think, in fact, the butcher will go to that market which will give him the best advantage, either as regards quality or price?—I do.

6717. And therefore the foreign markets may become become the governing market in that case?—I think it would have a different effect to that which is imagined by the advocates of that view. I think that instead of being beneficial to the English purchaser, it would militate very much against him.

6718. You said just now something about the Metropolitan Cattle Market being entirely limited to fat cattle; why should that be so?—I do not think there is any necessity, and I see many points which show that it is very undesirable, that lean stock should mix with fat cattle.

6721. You think that the restrictions which are now in force ought to be made permanent?—I think they should be made permanent, with this exception, that those cattle passing away from the Copenhagen Cattle Market to the country should be branded with a pitch brand, on a prominent portion of the hide, with the date on which the animal passed out of the market; and that it should not be permitted to remain alive more than seven days after it has passed out of the market.

6722. I think I have heard you say positively that that animal should not be exposed for sale in any other market?—Yes; it should only be for slaughter.

6723. Your markets are on Monday?—Yes.

6724. Supposing there is a market within a reasonable distance on the Wednesday, and the markets are dull in London on the Monday, do you not think it is very hard on the sender if the animals should not be allowed to be exposed for sale again in some other market held within the seven days?—I think not; I think the supply would regulate itself.

6725. Why not; you must give your reasons?—It is hard upon the producer, the person who breeds the stock, to place any restrictions on the sale of the animal; but the question is how to place restrictions on the trade in animals, with a view of putting a stop to the spread of the disease.

6726. We have had a witness here who stated a fact, which I know perfectly well, that Tonbridge and Maidstone are supplied very often from London?—Yes.

6727. Do you not think it would be a very hard case in the summer season, to a grazier sending his stock from Lincolnshire, or any other part north of London, if he could not be able to sell them to a jobber, and to expose them in another market (if he did not sell them in the first market) within seven days?—The system of jobbers in the Copenhagen Market is a very objectionable one, and so is the system of jobbers in every market. It is objectionable on the part of the person who consigns the animal, it is objectionable to the consumer; in point of fact, they are men who should not exist, in my mind; I do not like them at all.

6728. That is a very hard measure with regard to trade, to say that no man should buy anything that is cheap, and hold it over for a better market; would not that be a great disadvantage to the trade?—I think it is a curse to the community to have persons who buy a large quantity of anything, and hold it over, with a view to prices going up.

6729. I was brought up in a school where it was believed that a speculative man, in all markets, was a convenience to those who wanted a proper price; you say that the man who has got the animal to sell must sell, whether the market be good or bad?—I say that it does not benefit the person who sends his animal to the market, because he has sold it to the jobber. It does not benefit the consumer, because the jobber holds the animal until a better market, and sells it at a better price.

6730. I suppose if the jobber did not buy them he would sell them to another person as cheap or cheaper?—Probably at about the same price.

6731. Let me ask you another question, not as a matter of speculation, but as a matter of fact; you spoke of the cattle landed at Thames Haven; do you know anything about the trade at Thames Haven?—I know no more than the fact that a landing-place is in existence, and that animals do come that way.

6732. You do not know anything about the number?—No.

6733. All you know about Thames Haven is what you have learnt in the same way as any other man, from quotations in the newspapers?—Quite so. I may say I am on friendly terms, and continually in communication, with persons who are shareholders in the Thames Haven undertaking, and also with the salesmen, who bring their things that way.

6734. You are not aware of the number that come there?—I am not.

6735. Would you be surprised to learn that very few animals are landed there?—I should not be surprised to learn it; in fact, I believe at present very few cattle come. I may say that the Order in Council permitting them to come has only been passed about a month; it did not exist before.

6736. Is it only a recent trade, then?—It is only a recent trade. I may say that the Order in Council was brought about, to a certain extent, by a resolution passed by the Corporation of London in the Market Committee; and we had an interview with Colonel Harness on the subject, recommending that course.

6737. Do you not think that a very hard case on the steamboat owners, who have got wharves up the river, that they should be compelled, without any remuneration, to go and land at Thames Haven, for the benefit of those shareholders?—I should think it would be very much better for the steamboat companies, if they could get rid of their cargoes 30 miles further down the river; they would certainly save fuel.

Mr. T. Rudkin.

6738. Supposing Brown's Wharf belonged to them?—I know that animals landed at Thames Haven would be at the cattle market two hours earlier than they would if they came to Brown's Wharf, and in much better condition.

6739. Does the Corporation of London ever give up anything they can help without compensation?—I believe they do not; and I think they are very much to blame, for I think that there are many things they hold at the present time which it would be much better for them to give up.

6740. I wish you could persuade the Common Council of that fact?—I wish I could; I would try.

6741. Mr. Carnegie.] With regard to the pitch brand which you have spoken of, would there be any means of effacing it?—None, except clipping the hair off; and even then there would be some traces of it left.

6742. You are satisfied it would be impossible to efface it?—It would be practically impossible.

6743. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] With regard to the traffic of cattle in the streets, do you think it desirable that should be limited in London?—I think it is very desirable, if possible, to put a stop to it altogether.

6744. You say private slaughter-houses should not be abolished?—I think not.

6745. That would necessitate the following out of the cattle trade in the streets?—It would; and I think it is necessary for the supply of food to the metropolis at present.

6746. Should you suggest any regulations with regard to limiting it to a particular time of the day?—There is a regulation now in existence; animals are not allowed to be driven through the streets of London between the hours of 12 and 7 in the day.

6747. Do you think you should limit that time to 9 or 10?—I do not; I think especially at this time of the year, and with regard to butchers in London buying an animal at the Copenhagen Cattle Market, it would be absolutely necessary for them to get that animal home at once, say before 12 in the morning, if they could, to be slaughtered that afternoon, cooled, and consumed the next day; whereas if you were not to permit them to bring them home after 10 o'clock in the morning, purchasing them at 10 o'clock in the morning, they would not be able to get them away till after 7, and then probably not be able to slaughter them that night. This matter was considered, I may say, some four or five years ago: Sir Richard Mayne and the Corporation considered the question of driving the cattle through the streets; there was a deputation of the trade waited on Sir Richard Mayne, and he at first suggested issuing an order, and did issue an order, making it between 10 and 7; but in consequence of representations from the trade and Corporation, it was altered until 12.

6748. Mr. Edward Egerton.] The order is not very rigidly enforced, is it?—I do not think it is; it rests entirely with the police to enforce it.

6749. Sir Matthew Ridley.] You spoke about the quarantining of store cattle; have you considered at all, whether the system of quarantining store cattle would raise or lower the price of such stock to the buyer; would it have any effect in that way, as far as your experience goes; would they give more for them, as being safer, after having been quarantined?—I should think so; I should think they would be worth more, after passing through quarantine, than they were before.

6750. You said a good deal about Thames Haven; I presume Thames Haven is so situated as that foreign cattle imported there could be landed at any hour; I mean that the vessel would not have to wait to discharge her cargo?—I believe it is so. My particular view with reference to Thames Haven is this; that it has direct communication with the Copenhagen Cattle Market.

6751. And vessels could discharge their cargoes readily at all hours?—I think so.

6752. Chairman.] From your previous answer, you seem to be of opinion that cattle take a good deal of harm on their river voyage?—I am.

6753. They have much less ventilation?—Yes.

6754. And if they were discharged at a lower point down the river, they would arrive in better condition?—Yes; I may mention a circumstance that occurred to myself, about three weeks back, on a Thursday. I was coming from Copenhagen Cattle Market, and met a drove of foreign cattle. Between the entrance to the Copenhagen Cattle Market, Caledonian-road, and the Agricultural Hall, a distance of about a mile, I saw six of those animals down in the road, from being over-driven. They had been brought up in a hurry to Blackwall, and from Blackwall they had been hurried to such an extent to save the market (it was about half-past one in the afternoon, and they had to be in the market before two) as to injure them beyond all measure. I saw six of them down in the road, simply within the distance of a mile; their tongues were hanging out, and they were in a very bad state indeed. If they had come viâ Thames Haven, and been landed at Thames Haven two hours sooner, they would have been in the cattle market that morning by 11 o'clock.

6755. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] If they had come by railway, in fact?—If they had come to Thames Haven, or any other place, or supposing they had been landed at Harwich.

6756. Has your attention been called to the condition of cattle that have been landed at Harwich, and come up by the rail?—Yes; they are very much better than those that have been landed at London.

6757. First of all, a great many hours on board ship are saved, and they are also saved being driven a distance of three or six miles?—Yes; again they get food and water at Harwich, and on board the ship they get nothing.

6758. Mr. Edward Egerton.] In some vessels?—Mostly.

6759. Chairman.] Has your attention been called to the way in which cattle are treated on board the ships?—Not sufficiently to speak on the subject.

6760. Mr. Dent.] Have you actual returns of the quantity of dead meat that comes into the dead-meat market?—We have no means of ascertaining that.

6761. Could you not give us the return per month, say from the year 1865?—I cannot at present. We are not able at present to levy a permanent toll, but when we get to the new meat market, we shall be in a position to give you the exact return. I cannot tell you at all, except from observation, and I should say that the supply has not very materially increased; about in the same same proportion as the falling-off in the supply in live cattle.

6762. Alderman Salomons.] The tolls of the new market are required to pay the bonds for the money you have raised, therefore there would be no return?—I think so.

6763. Mr. Banks Stanhope.] Have you turned your attention to store stock from different countries abroad?—No; I have no knowledge on the subject. I may say I have another return here with reference to the number of animals that have been seized since the 18th November 1865, in consequence of the rinderpest, in the cattle market. I find that from the 18th November up to the 22nd February (since which I have not had a single case of any description) there were 37 seized. (The Return was handed in, and is as follows:)

"Metropolitan Cattle Market,
"Sir, Islington, 16 July 1866.

"In compliance with your request, I have the honour to report that the following seizures have been made in the market since the 16th November 1865, viz:

1865:		1865:
November 18	1	December 26	3
„ 19	10	1866:
„ 26	2	January 1	1
„ 27	2	„ 30	1
„ 28	2	February 21	8
December 3	1	„ 22	1
„ 11	1
„ 14	1

"There has been a marked improvement in the health of animals brought into the market since this latter date (February 22).

"I have, &c.
"George Tegg, Inspector."

6764. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Is 37 the total number of cattle that have been seized?—Yes. Since the 27th February we have not had a single case of rinderpest; the inspector also states that the market is now peculiarly free from any description of disease.

6765. Chairman.] It is singular that the 22nd February is very near the time when the Act of Parliament stopped the cattle coming over by rail?—I think the 22nd February is the time when they were permitted to come again.

6766. No; the Act of Parliament prohibiting their travelling by rail received the Royal assent on the 20th February, and from the 22nd February to the present time you have had no case of rinderpest?—That is so, no doubt, but since then we have had an Order in Council altering that, and permitting cattle to come by railway. Since that time we have had none.

6767. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Were the 37 animals you speak of that were seized English or foreign animals?—Three-fourths of them were English animals.

6768. Mr. Banks Stanhope.] I think you said your opinion clearly was, that animals branded in London, and sent into the country, ought not to be shown again in the market?—I do.

6769. Is that from danger of infection?—Yes.

6770. If there is danger of infection in the market, would there not be danger of infection if these cattle were to meet cattle on their way from the station to butchers' shops?—Yes.

6771. You think there would be danger of infection in permitting branded stock to be sent from the metropolitan market?—Yes. I think there is also danger of infection by permitting butchers to come to Copenhagen Fields and then go back to the country. I think they might carry it in their clothes.

Mr. T. Rudkin.
18 June 1866.

6772. Could the districts round London be practically supplied if there were other markets put outside for the supply of meat?—Of course it could be, but I think it would very much enhance the price of meat in the country.

6773. In the country?—In the country. I think if you had one, two, three, or four markets, in lieu of the one great central one, you would thereby very much increase the price of meat to the consumer.

6774. What would be the effect upon the producer?—I think it would militate against him also.

6775. He would get a less price?—I think he would 6776. May I ask how you account for the fact that the consumer pays more, and the producer gets less?—It is very simple. It all comes within this rule; there are certain charges and expenses in getting the cattle from the market to the butcher's shop; you increase the price to the consumer.

6777. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] I do not see how that proposition is established, in consequence of your having four markets instead of one?—It is just possible a butcher may go to one market and not find what he wants; he would then have to go to a second, or possibly to a third.

6778. Chairman.] He has to add the cost of his own time to the price he gives, and that increases the price to the consumer?—Clearly.

6779. Mr. Banks Stanhope.] Supposing a butcher at Maidstone wished to purchase, would it not be equally easy for him to have a large market on the south side of London, for supplying the whole of the south suburban country, instead of going to the Metropolitan Cattle Market?—Yes; but there would not be a competition such as there is where you get a large number of animals together, and a large number of salesmen and buyers. Freedom of competition is very desirable under any circumstances.

6781. Supposing it was found that the infected animals were continually spreading disease in a country, and it was necessary to prevent it, in what way could the country districts best be supplied, assuming there was a regulation that no animals should be allowed to go out of London alive?—Then it might be done by slaughtering the animals at the port of landing and sending them away, but I think that would be a very unjust course.

Mr. T. Rudkin.

18 June 1866.

6782. Is there no way of having other markets outside London, say at the south of London, to supply Kent and Sussex and other counties?—Such a thing might be done, but I think it would not work properly. I think it would ultimately merge into one market again.

6783. Do you think if London was to increase to double its present size it would always be content with one market?—I do.

Mr. Thomas Lovell called in; and Examined.

Mr. T. Lovell.

6784. Chairman.] You are a Farmer and Grazier living at Winwyck Warren in Northamptonshire?—Yes.

6785. How long have you been engaged in that business?—All my life.

6786. What is the extent of your holding?—560 acres.

6787. How far are you from Northampton?—13 miles.

6788. How many cattle on an average do you feed in the course of the year?—On an average from 190 to 200.

6789. Mr. Dent.] On 500 acres?—Yes. I have some ploughed land. I feed from 190 to 200. Sometimes we have as many as 250 on the farm. I have not so many now in consequence of this disease. I think for the last 20 years I have fed 192 a year on an average.

6790. Chairman.] Do you send your cattle to Copenhagen Fields?—Yes.

6791. Do you consign to salesmen to sell on your account?—Yes, I do.

6792. Do you sell any at home?—Very few.

6793. You have heard the evidence of the last witness with regard to the quotations of prices?—Yes.

6795. Have you ever killed in the country and sent the carcases to London?—Never.

6796. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Do the salesmen never take the money in the London market?—Not that I know of.

6797. Chairman.] You used to sell cattle yourself at one time?—Yes.

6798. For your own people?—Yes, for my own family and friends; perhaps 30 or 40 beasts a week.

6799. Do you agree with the last witness that the quotation of prices is kept down in the interest of the salesmen?—I do not.

6800. You think the quotation of prices is fair?—Generally, I do. At the time I sold in the market, I have seen clerks from newspaper offices ask both salesmen and butchers their opinion of the trade, and I have always thought the prices of the day are obtained in that way.

6801. What is your opinion as to the desirability of separating the foreign and English cattle markets?—I should like to see the English cattle on one side of the market and the foreign on the other.

6802. You would like to see a division in the Copenhagen Fields Market?—Yes, I can see no objection to it.

6803. You do not wish to see a wholly separate market for foreign cattle?—No, nor do I think the graziers do.

6804. Supposing that they were merely separated in the market, I suppose they would meet on the roads, and tread the same ground in coming in and going out?—Of course they would.

6805. You would not avoid infection in that way?—Not in the slightest degree.

6806. What is your opinion as to the desirability of their undergoing quarantine, when they come from abroad?—I think it would be quite right they should undergo quarantine unless they are killed at the ports.

6807. The proposal has been to kill the fat animals at the port, and to put the store animals under quarantine. Would you approve of putting store animals under quarantine?—I certainly should, if they are allowed to be landed at all.

6808. Would you, as a practical man, be inclined to give a higher price for an animal which has undergone quarantine, than for one that has not?—Yes, I think it would be safer.

6809. It has been stated to us that the expense of quarantine is so great that it would prevent animals being imported; but supposing you give a higher price for the animal which had undergone quarantine, would not that answer the purpose of the foreign sender?—It might; I cannot say. The animals sink a good deal in quarantine. I think it would prevent their sending them.

6810. Do you ever buy foreign animals to graze?—Never; I should be very sorry.

6811. What is your opinion as to animals that have been in Smithfield Market; ought they to be allowed to go down in the country and stand in country markets?—I do not think so.

6812. Do you agree with the last witness about that?—Entirely.

6813. Would you allow them to go out of the market and go into the country at all?—By no means.

6814. You would not let them go to the butchers?—I would not let them go to the butchers in the country.

6815. What do you think should be done; do you think they ought to be slaughtered in London?—Yes.

6816. And that if the supply is wanted in the country, they should come down in the shape of dead meat?—Yes; but there would not be so many sent here; the country butchers would buy them at home.

6817. You think if they could not come out of London again the home-fed beasts would not go to London at all?—Not so many. More of them would be sold at home.

6818. Is it the case, that since we have had the cattle plague, your own profession generally have considered the metropolitan market has been the great focus of infection?—We think so.

6819. And

6819. And therefore you are afraid of animals coming out of that market and going into the country again?—Yes, we know it came from London into Northamptonshire.

6820. Mr. Norwood.] By foreign cattle?—Yes.

6821. Is there much dead meat sent from Northamptonshire to London?—I think not.

6822. Where is it sent from principally?—There is a good deal from Scotland; but I know very little of the dead meat trade.

6823. Have you known any of your neighbours kill on their farms when this prohibition as to moving by railway was in force?—None.

6824. They sent to the local butchers?—Yes, but the prohibition was not in force until after Christmas, when very few fat cattle are left in the midland counties.

6825. Mr. Banks-Stanhope.] Was not the metropolitan market blamed for disease in the neighbouring counties, as well as in Northamptonshire, last autumn?—I really do not know; I did not hear of it.

6826. Mr. Edward Egerton.] We have been told that English-bred cattle are decreasing in many parts of England; is that the case in Northampton?—I think it is; you see but very little stock on many farms.

6827. Was that the case before this year?—I do not know.

6828. Until this year there was a great increase in the amount of cattle bred on the farms in Northampton?—I cannot say; it is not much of a breeding county. I buy all that I graze.

6829. Where do you get your supply generally?—Some from Wales, some from Scotland, some from Herefordshire, some from Devonshire; from all parts.

6830. Mr. Dent.] Is it summer grazing?—Yes; we keep twice the quantity in summer to what we do in winter.

6831. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Do you tie them up?—We tie very few of them up.

6832. Mr. Alderman Salomons.] Why would you quarantine foreign cattle?—On account of the disease. We imagine it would spread the disease if there was no quarantine existing.

6833. They have imported foreign cattle for a great many years without quarantine; do you mean to say you would only quarantine them at the present time, or make it a permanent thing that there should be quarantine?—I should only wish it now while there is disease. If there is no disease abroad, I should not wish for quarantine.

6834. You only think the quarantine should exist now while there is disease?—I think that would be quite sufficient.

6835. The quarantine of animals generally is something analogous to the old idea of Frenchmen and Englishmen not coming together, because the Frenchmen were too dirty; all you mean is, that while the disease is on the Continent, you wish quarantine should be established; you do not mean that you want quarantine as a general measure?—I do not see why it should be permanent.

6836. Mr. Dent.] What is the proportion of arable to grass land?—I have from 50 to 60 acres of corn land.

6837. When do you buy your stock generally; in the spring?—Yes; we generally buy half in the spring, and the other half at the close of the year.

6838. When do they go off from Northamptonshire to the London markets?—I think principally from July to Christmas.

6839. Do you graze much Irish stock?—None; but a good many are grazed in the county.

6840. Mr. Carnegie.] Where do you buy your stock generally?—I have had more than 100 beast sent to me lately by license from Devonshire and Wales.

6841. Where do you buy them generally?—At Northampton, Leicester, Daventry, and other places.

6842. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Do you send your stock to the Manchester market, or to the Leeds market?—Never.

6843. The price is never higher than in London?—I believe it was higher for a few weeks in Manchester.

6844. Why did you send them there?—I thought the price would not continue higher in Manchester than London.

6845. Is yours an infected district still?—Not my district. There are places in the country which were infected, but not in my district at all.

6846. Mr. Norwood.] In your opinion, are graziers who send live cattle to the market for sale universally cheated by their factors?—I think not.

6847. You think they return the price they get?—I think so.

6848. Is that the case also in the dead-meat market?—I do not know anything of the dead-meat market.

6849. You do not agree with the former witness?—I do not. I think, as a rule, the salesmen are very fair.

6850. I presume agriculturists, like any other traders, understand their business remarkably well, and if you send your cattle up and find your returns are not what you consider fair and reasonable returns, you would make inquiry and employ another factor?—Of course.

6851. You would remedy the evil by your own act and deed?—Yes.

6852. Sir Matthew Ridley.] Can you tell the Committee what is the advance in price upon store stock which you have bought this spring?—I should think from 1 l. to 30 s. in 20 l. I think a 20 l.-bullock would be worth 1 l. or 30 s. more than it was last year.

6853. What do you say as to sheep?—Seven or eight shillings per head dearer than they were last year.

6854. Chairman.] Do you think graziers have been enabled to supply themselves pretty well with stock, or have they had any difficulty?—We have not had any difficulty in getting the stock, but the prices have been higher.

6855. You think you have been able to get stock?—Yes; perhaps we have not been able to get it quite so well, because we have not had the opportunity of buying at fairs and markets ourselves.

6856. Have you anything further to suggest?—No; only that I hope it is not contemplated to make us kill fat cattle; in the country, it would be ruinous to kill on our own farms, we should have no means of disposing of the offal.

Mr. JAMES CURRIE, called in; and Examined

Mr. J. Currie. 18 June 1866.

6857. Chairman.] WHAT are you?—A Steamship Owner at Leith.

6858. I believe there is some little conflict of interest between the port of Granton and the port of Leith?—They are two distinct ports, and there certainly is a competition for business.

6859. It was proposed the other day that certain cattle should be landed at Granton and certain cattle at Leith; have you heard of that evidence?—I have been told of it since I came up.

6860. What have you to say upon that point?—I have been carrying cattle both into Leith and Granton for some time, and in some respects, I think, it would not work advantageously if it were made an imperative rule for one sort of cattle to go into one port and another sort of cattle to go into another port.

6861. You think they ought to go into either port, according to the wishes of the senders?—I think so.

6862. Is it the case that there is no risk of infection between these two ports and the city of Edinburgh?—At neither; you can take cattle into both ports, and take them into the adjoining country without going into Edinburgh.

6863. That is not the point I am upon; can you not take them to the slaughter-house at Edinburgh from the ports, without risk to the animals grazing by the road-side?—I think you can without any risk. There is the same risk in going through a street in London.

6864. As to Leith, are there not quays and wharves all the way along?—All the way along.

6865. There is no grazing ground; there are no places where cattle are kept grazing from Leith to Edinburgh?—I think not.

6866. How is it with regard to Granton?—Granton is more in the country, but there are more farms in the immediate neighbourhood of Granton than Leith.

6867. So that in going from Granton to Edinburgh, animals would pass by cattle grazing on the road; would they?—It goes through a more open country, but I do not think it is used fo cattle grazing.

6868. Mr. Carnegie.] It is principally used for market gardens and nursery gardens?—Yes, chiefly; most of the ground between Granton and Edinburgh is nursery ground.

6869. Chairman.] So that, practically, there would be very little fear in allowing animals to go to Edinburgh from these points?—In going over these places, I do not know that I have ever seen cattle grazing; they are not numerous.

6870. Mr. Carnegie.] What accommodation have you now at Leith for foreign cattle; what is your practice at present?—At present they are put into covered pens or sheds, and kept there for the time prescribed by law, unless they are sold previously.

6871. Are they slaughtered at Leith?—They are slaughtered at Leith; at least there are slaughter-houses there. I do not know that they are slaughtered at Leith, but they can be.

6872. Can you have good accommodation for slaughtering at Leith?—Yes, I believe very good; I have never seen the slaughter-houses at Leith.

6873. Mr. Banks-Stanhope.] Do you import foreign cows?—We have bought foreign cows, but not very many.

6874. Mr. Dent.] Where do you bring the foreign cattle from?—From Hamburg, Copenhagen, and from Jutland. We have brought a pretty considerable number, and I think we have brought all from those places during the last year. There has been no cattle coming from any other port. There used to be a few come from Holland, but that has been discontinued some time.

6875. Mr. Banks-Stanhope.] Tell me what objection would there be to Granton being a port of landing for cattle of one country and Leith being a port of landing for cattle of another country?—The objection would be mainly this: that these cattle are coming forward in small numbers, they are not coming forward in large numbers, such as you have in the port of London; and the vessels in which they come are principally laden with cargo which is destined for Leith; if you compel those vessels to go into Granton you certainly increase the cost, because you compel the vessels to go into two ports.

6877. Mr. Banks-Stanhope.] If there was any danger of disease in Germany, and of disease in Denmark, would it not simplify the trade to have healthy animals sent to one port and the more suspicious ones to the others?—No doubt it would.

6878. Would it not make it easier for people to buy cattle from a healthy country?—Yes, no doubt it would. My objection to it is, that you increase the cost.

6879. Would it not increase the importation from the healthy country not having the same restrictions upon those particular cattle as upon the cattle from a suspicious country?—No doubt; the fewer restrictions you put upon it the more you will stimulate the trade.

6880. Would not that countervail the increased cost?—That I cannot say.

6881. Would it not be a sufficient boon to make it worth while to pay a little more?—It is a balance of evils. I know the immediate effect would be to increase the cost.

6882. Would they not send over cattle from Denmark in the vessels the same as from elsewhere?—The numbers coming hitherto have not been sufficient for that. Last year there were some from that port in Jutland. This year there has not been as yet, but perhaps the season is not far enough advanced to compare it with last year.

6883. Are there no regular cattle vessels coming to Leith or to Granton?—Not from the Continent, except the one I spoke of from Aarhuus. There are vessels coming to Granton from the north Scotch ports, Aberdeen for instance. From Aarhuus last year there were very nearly 4,000 cattle came to Granton.

6884. Is there not a complaint that the Danish cattle cattle are subjected to the same restrictions as the German cattle?—There is a feeling that it is an unfair thing that a country which is neither infected nor suspected to have disease should be subjected to the same treatment as a country in which there is a possibility of infection.

6885. Would it not be a wise thing to send the safe cattle to some place where they could be admitted without risk of loss?—I think it would be advisable to admit those from a place free from infection upon more easy terms than the other. I see no more reason why they should be prevented from coming, than that there should be free circulation in any county where there is an absence of disease.

6886. You do not consider they could be safely admitted if they mixed with the German beasts at the port of landing?—Not if they mixed with them; but they could easily be admitted at the same port without mixing. The numbers coming in at a time are not large. They come in, for instance, from Hamburg on an average of not more than 13 or 20 head of cattle in one steamer, perhaps 27. From Copenhagen there is an average of 40 or 50 cattle in one steamer.

Mr. J. Currie. 18 June 1866.

6887. Would not those steamers which come in at the same time with other cattle, mix them together?—You do not require to mix them, if you have them put in separate docks.

6888. But I mean on their way to Edinburgh market?—They would be mixed certainly, then.

6889. Supposing there were no store stock among them?—Then in that case I think they ought to be trucked at once; they ought to be put into the trucks at the docks. The trucks run them alongside the steamers, and you can put them on at once. You do not require to mix them.

6890. But supposing these trucks had carried German cattle before?—That is a risk that you must run in all cases, and to meet that risk, as I understand, it has been made obligatory to disinfect the trucks. I do not believe that, in practice, railway companies will be found to allot certain trucks for specific purposes.

Professor Thomas Strangeways, called in; and Examined.

6891. Chairman.] Do you reside in Edinburgh?—I do.

6892. Do you hold any public appointment there?—I am Government Inspector for the port of Granton, and was formerly assistant inspector for the ports of Leith and Granton.

6893. Are you acquainted with the slaughter-house system in Edinburgh?—I am.

6894. How long has that been established?—I can scarcely tell you. It has been established ever since I have known Edinburgh, that is, since the year 1849.

6895. Is it the law in Edinburgh that no animal can be slaughtered except at the public slaughter-houses?—Yes, neither in Edinburgh nor in Leith. There are public slaughter-houses in both places.

6896. Mr. Dent.] What is the population?—About 170,000.

6897. Chairman.] Is that regulation under the Edinburgh Slaughter-House Act?—I could not speak to that. I should imagine it is under the Edinburgh Police Act.

6898. There are two Acts; the Edinburgh Police Act, 1848, and the Edinburgh Slaughter-House Act of 1850?—Probably; I can scarcely speak to the fact under which Act the slaughter-houses were established.

6899. What is the division of the trade in Edinburgh. Is the trade divided into carcase butchers, and retail butchers?—It is. There are few carcase butchers, or what are called wholesale butchers, men who supply smaller butchers with carcases, either of beef or mutton.

6900. Do the retail butchers kill much at the public slaughter-houses?—They do. They kill all at the public slaughter-houses.

6901. Have the retail butchers given up slaughtering in consequence of this Slaughter House Act?—No; they still continue to kill there and cart them from thence to their own place.

6902. You call butchers "fleshers" in Edinburgh, do you not?—Yes.

6903. Has the fleshers' trade suffered in consequence of the establishment of this public slaughter-house system?—I should think not at all.

6904. Do you hear any complaints amongst the fleshers in consequence of it?—I have never heard a single complaint; and I should think during the prevalence of the cattle plague last summer I visited the slaughter-houses twice and sometimes three times a day.

Professor T. Strangeways.

6905. We have had it stated in this room by several witnesses that the butchers would not have the same control over their profession if there were public slaughter-houses; that they might have the fat purloined, and so on?—I have never heard the slightest complaint in Edinburgh. It does get stolen, I dare say, but it would be stolen even in the private slaughter-houses occasionally.

6906. What sort of supervision is there over the carcases and offal there; I do not mean for the purpose of inspection, but for the purpose of taking care of the property?—Every butcher or flesher has his own booth, and he has the key of his booth; on going out at the gate he leaves the key with the gatekeeper.

6907. Is the booth the place where the animals are slaughtered?—The places where the animals are slaughtered are called booths, and behind those booths are places for putting the animals before they are slaughtered; starving, or hunger places.

6908. Do they call them "lairs"?—I do not know exactly what they call them there, but they are lairs.

6909. They shut them up there to fast them?—Yes.

6910. Each man has his own place?—Each man has his own place and his own key.

6911. And each man has his own slaughtering booth?—Yes, each butcher has his own slaughtering booth. There are three or four common booths where small butchers kill occasionally

6912. Is it the practice there for the butcher's man to kill his master's beef, or do the butchers employ slaughtermen who slaughter for anybody?—Some of them employ slaughtermen and some of them keep their own men.

6913. Which is the more common practice?—I should think to employ slaughtermen, they charge so much a piece for killing a beast, and so much per score for killing sheep.

Professor T. Strange-ways.

18 June 1866.

6914. They go to the different booths and slaughter?—Yes.

6915. Is the owner of the beasts generally there to see it done, or are his men there?—Generally there is somebody there belonging to the owner of the stock, but some of these slaughtermen slaughter regularly for masters. Butchers killing sheep for the London market employ stated men regularly, and these men kill at so much per score.

6916. Do you find in hot weather the town gets well supplied?—I never saw any difference either in hot or cold weather.

6917. Do you know what they charge for slaughtering?—I could not speak to that. I have heard it often enough, but I should not like positively to say.

6918. Is it the case that that system enables the inspection of meat to be carried on much more advantageously?—Yes.

6919. You have it all in one place, everything under the inspector's eye?—Yes.

6920. What is done with the offal at the slaughter-houses?—The tripe is boiled on the premises by people who are employed for that purpose.

6921. What is done as to the gut twisting?—The gut is sold to a manufacturer in Edinburgh who carts it away.

6922. What becomes of the blood?—Some of the blood is carted away for manure, some of it is sold. I believe there is an annual sale of the blood.

6923. What becomes of the hides?—There is a hide market.

6924. How far is the hide market from the slaughter-house?—It is in the slaughter-house yard. It is within the same walls.

6925. Is there any tallow melting?—No.

6926. What becomes of the fat?—I suppose the fat is sold to tallow-chandlers and others.

6927. There is nothing done with it on the spot?—I do not think so.

6928. Is there any bone boiling or anything of that sort?—No, nothing of the sort. There are no bones to boil, because the carcases are all taken away entire.

6929. There is no trade of that sort in the immediate neighbourhood of the slaughter-house?—Not that I know of. There is a place in the slaughter-house for boiling down diseased carcases, but it is simply for diseased carcases.

6930. What is the situation of this slaughter-house?—It is situated close to the city.

6931. Is it in the outskirts?—It is situated in the south-west of the city, at the south-west corner. If you know the city I can tell you exactly: when you are at the extreme west of Princes-street you turn down to the left, and it is about half-a-mile down the Lothian-road, just beyond the Caledonian Railway Station.

6932. You think that the system answers well, both as regards the trade, and as regards the public?—I should think it answers well for all parties.

6933. Mr. Dent.] Do you say each butcher has a separate booth?—Each butcher who has any business of any consequence has a separate booth.

6934. How many butchers are there in Edinburgh?—I could scarcely tell you.

6935. How many booths are there in the slaughter-houses?—There are four rows of them.

6936. How many of them are there in a row?—Perhaps about 90 altogether; I can scarcely tell you, but I should think there would be about 90.

6937. You say you are the inspector of the port of Granton?—Yes.

6938. The principal cattle that are imported there are Danish, are they not?—We have had only one cargo of cattle since I was appointed inspector.

6939. How long have you been inspector?—Since Professor Dick's death in April.

6940. You have had only one cargo since then at Granton?—Yes, under my own charge; but I have assisted Professor Dick as inspector for the last three or four years both at Granton and Leith.

6941. Have you had any diseased cattle coming from Denmark to Granton at all?—I never saw a diseased animal come from Denmark of any sort.

6942. Have you had any diseased cattle coming from Hamburg and Germany?—A great many diseased animals from Hamburgh.

6943. With rinderpest?—No; I never saw a case of rinderpest, nor a case of pleuro-pneumonia; only foot and mouth disease, that is, eczema.

6944. You said the Danish cattle have not foot and mouth disease very often?—I have never known one.

6945. And you have seen a good many?—Yes.

6946. You do not think there will be any danger from allowing those Danish cattle to be taken to the places of consumption at Glasgow, Coatledge, and that district?—I do not think there would be any danger at all.

6947. They are principally cattle for the butcher, I suppose?—The last cargo that came over from Aarhuus, and the only cargo that came, in fact, from there since my appointment, included a number of milch cows.

6948. A good many sheep come over, do they not?—I will tell you exactly the number that came over in that cargo. There were 112 cattle, 70 sheep, and five calves.

6949. There have been a good many sheep?—Yes.

6950. At present the trade in sheep is very much checked, is it not?—Yes.

6951. Have you found (putting aside the Dutch cattle which are not now allowed to be imported) that there has been a considerable check, from the restrictions to the foreign trade; do you know at all, from your own experience, whether there is a diminution of the foreign trade?—I think there is a diminution at the port of Leith in the number of foreign cattle. There are not so many this year as there have been in previous years.

6952. Do you think that arises from the restriction of the compulsory slaughter at the port?—I think it does.

6953. Have you any reason, from your own experience, to believe that if they were to be taken to Glasgow and the consuming districts, a larger supply might be brought from Denmark and other places abroad?—I think there is every probability of more stock being imported if they are allowed to take them to the place of slaughter, instead of slaughtering them all at the port of debarkation.

6954. If we are told that foreign cattle are not brought in because there is a scarcity abroad, you would be inclined to think they are not brought brought in on account of the impediments placed in their way?—Precisely so. They bring no store stock at all. A great number of store stock used to come from abroad. They must now be killed, however lean they are; and, as to some of them, it is disgraceful that they should be killed while they are so thin; in fact, I believe some that were killed sold for 4*s.* 6*d.* a stone of 14lbs.

6955. At the ports of Leith and Granton you have had no case of rinderpest?—Never.

6956. And from Denmark you have never had any disease of any kind?—I never saw any diseased animal from Aarhuus or Jutland. The rinderpest was decidedly brought into our district from the Metropolitan Cattle Market.

6957. Sir Matthew Ridley.] By calves, was it not?—No; by 18 milch cows.

6958. Chairman.] Do you have many milch cows down from London?—Not now, I think.

6959. Used you to?—Yes, a good number.

6960. Where do they go to principally?—They principally go to the dairymen in the city, or in the immediate neighbourhood.

6961. To supply the cowkeepers of Edinburgh and Glasgow and towns near?—Yes. These 18 all went to buyers in Edinburgh.

6962. Viscount Cranborne.] What is the largest number of animals you inspect in one day at the port of which you are inspector?—I should say the largest quantity I have inspected was about 400, or nearly 400.

6963. Never more than that in one day?—Never more.

6964. Have you any assistance?—There are two of us conjointly, who are inspectors.

6965. Both acting at the same place?—Yes.

6966. Do you examine each animal individually?—I do when I inspect them. I examine all animals individually.

6967. You are more careful, I suppose, when you know they come from an infected district?—Whether or not, I always make a point of examining the mouth of every animal I inspect, in order to see whether there is not murrain, which, I think, is one of the worst diseases that has come into this country from abroad. That is eczema, or foot and mouth disease. It has a great many names.

6968. Mr. Dent.] It is called the murrain in Scotland?—Yes.

6970. Are there any places in the immediate neighbourhood of Leith and Granton that would be suitable for quarantine grounds?—In Granton they have plenty of room. In Leith I do not know where there would be room, but in Granton there is room to put up any amount of stock.

6971. You are of opinion that from any country where it is supposed that any disease, foot and mouth disease, pleuro-pneumonia, or rinderpest, exists, it would be advisable to quarantine all store stock?—All store stock, or to prevent the importation of store stock from those countries during the prevalency of disease in those countries, which would amount to the same thing.

6972. Are you aware that there was a considerable traffic in cattle from the Austrian dominions to Hamburgh and Bremen, and those ports?—Yes.

6973. So that I suppose if there was disease in the Austrian dominions, you would consider it necessary to quarantine all animals coming from those ports?—From Hamburgh or Rotterdam, or any of those ports. The only ports from which we get them into Leith are Aarhuus, Copenhagen, Rotterdam, and Hamburgh. I think those are the only four ports from which we get them into Leith or Granton.

6974. Would you consider it at all advisable to make any regulation with respect to the importation of foreign sheep?—What sort of regulation do you mean.

6975. Of quarantining, or a more rigid inspection than there is now?—We seldom get any store sheep from abroad; they are fat sheep that come into Leith from abroad, as a rule; and they ought either to be killed at the port of importation, or taken directly to the place of slaughter.

6976. You have not had any foreign store sheep landed at Leith or Granton?—I have not had anything to do with any foreign store sheep, although I believe several cargoes have been imported.

6977. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Do you think that the cattle which go out of the markets should be branded, if they are not slaughtered in Edinburgh market?—The cattle should be branded at the port of debarcation, I think.

6978. If they are not slaughtered there?—If they are not slaughtered there, and if found within a certain time after the date of the brand, to be seized, and the party liable to imprisonment or fine.

6979. Sir Matthew Ridley.] Are these slaughter-houses of which you have spoken, under inspection?—Yes.

6980. Are they well cleansed?—They are; I was going to say almost as clean as this room, they are as clean as it is possible to make places; they are washed out three or four times a day.

6981. Are they disinfected?—They are washed out, and disinfected with quicklime.

6982. Do you know what price is paid for them by the year?—No; I was simply there on duty, examining to see that there is no diseased or rinderpest animals passed off to the public as food.

6983. I think you informed the Committee that you have not heard complaints of parties losing the offal?—I never heard any complaints; I have mixed a good deal with the butchers, but I have never heard any.

6984. The regulations are liked, rather than otherwise?—So far as I know.

6985. Chairman.] Do the slaughter-houses of Edinburgh supply any district round Edinburgh?—Not that I am aware of.

6986. Do you know whether meat goes away by rail from them?—A great deal comes to London from them, more particularly mutton; a great number of carcases of sheep leave the Edinburgh slaughter-houses every week for London.

6987. Do any go to Glasgow?—Not that I am aware; I know they do go to London, because I have seen 100 hanging up together. I have asked

Professor T. Strangeways.

18 June 1866.

"where are those sheep for," and they have said "for the London market, for Newgate."

6988. Where is the Edinburgh cattle market; is it anywhere near the slaughter-houses?—It is a little to the south of the castle, on an elevated place, about half a mile from the slaughter-houses.

6989. Do you propose that the foreign animals which are branded, should go to the cattle-market or go to the slaughter-houses?—I would not allow any foreign cattle to go into a market among home-grown stock. I would have separate markets for foreign stock and home stock.

6990. Where would the purchasers have an opportunity of seeing the animals?—If imported into Granton they would have an opportunity of seeing them at Granton; or if at Leith, they would have an opportunity of seeing them there.

6991. Are they all imported at Leith by one company?—The boats belong to two separate companies, and the importers or the agents to whom they are imported are at different towns.

6992. Messrs. Swan are, perhaps, the largest importers?—I do not know exactly.

6993. You would have a cattle market at the port, would you?—I would have a cattle market at the port.

6994. You would have them branded, and go to the slaughter-houses?—Yes.

6995. Would you allow them to go to slaughter-houses in other towns?—Yes.

6996. By rail?—By rail.

6997. But not to mix with any home-fed animals in the markets?—Not to mix with any home-fed animals in the markets. In fact, I would have separate markets for store stock and fat stock; I would not allow store stock to go into a fat stock market.

6998. Mr. Dent.] Would you let foreign stock and English fat stock go into the same market?—If it is for immediate slaughter, I can see no objection to it.

6999. Chairman.] Have you given attention to the way in which animals are treated on board ship?—I have.

7000. Do you think any improvement can be made in that?—I think all vessels ought to be registered.

7001. Registered to carry a certain number of stock?—Yes, and no more.

7002. How would you deal with the case of the larger and smaller breeds of cattle. We are told that, on the average, animals of some countries are very much larger indeed than the average animals of another country?—They are.

7003. How would you deal with that state of things?—You might register them to carry a certain number of a certain breed, and a certain number of another breed; for instance, we have from Hamburgh and from Rotterdam very large animals, which have been worked, perhaps, four or five years; they are of an immense size; and then we have little Dutch beasts coming in the same ship. As a rule, the animals which come from Denmark are small.

7004. The Spanish animals, as a rule, are large?—We have never had any Spanish animals into Leith or Granton.

7005. You think there might be that distinction made between them?—There might be some distinction.

7006. As regards the ventilation, do you think there ought to be Government regulations about that?—There ought to be some Government regulation.

7007. You think there ought to be a Government inspector of ships for the conveyance of stock?—I think there ought.

7008. And that they ought only to be registered for conveyance in case they complied with the conditions laid down?—Yes; and there ought to be some regulation as regards watering the stock on board ship; I have seen sometimes, when I have been out in the Roads, animals with their tongues against the cool iron sides of the vessel.

7009. Trying to cool their tongues?—Trying to cool their tongues against the iron. As long as the vessel is sailing there is plenty of ventilation, but as soon as it lies at anchor all ventilation ceases down between decks. When sailing they have windsails, and those windsails are generally turned to the windward, and the wind goes down the sails and spreads about below. As soon as the vessel comes to anchor there is no air at all, and the animals become excessively fatigued for want of it.

7010. You think the animals ought to be fed and watered on board?—The animals ought to be watered on board, if there is not a possibility of getting them ashore at once. In Granton I see an advantage over Leith, inasmuch as at Granton vessels can get in at any time; at Leith they can only get in two hours before, or two hours after, high water, so that the ship may have to lie-to seven or eight hours off the port of Leith before they can get in.

7011. In that case they ought to be watered on board?—They ought to be watered on board.

7012. But supposing they are landed directly on their arrival, is there any occasion for that?—I see no occasion for watering them on board when they are in the port, if they are watered on the passage; but if you come to have a cargo of cattle, from 36 to 48 hours, from port to port, the poor animals should have some water in the interim.

7014. Sir Matthew Ridley.] Have you had an opportunity of judging of that in other ports, where you have seen stock landed from ships?—It is alike at all; that is, if the animals are between decks; if they are on deck, it does not matter so much. All the cattle that come from Rotterdam by one boat come on deck; she is a small boat, and she brings all her cattle cargo on deck.

7016. Have you known cases of accident from fractured limbs, and so forth?—That is a very common thing. Supposing there is a gale of wind, they get down, and as the sailors call it, get "spaldered." The hind legs stretch themselves out, and they are unable to move; we then have them killed on board, and the carcases inspected afterwards.

7017. Are these boats that you have seen arranged, as regards pens and standage, in the best way?—There are no pens, generally speaking; there are simply timber rails, to which the beasts are tied.

7018. Chairman.]

7018. Chairman.] Is there nothing to divide one from the other, or the one half dozen from the next half dozen?—There is nothing to divide them but these rails; some will be in the lower hold, and some between decks.

7019. Sir Matthew Ridley.] Do they clean these vessels after each voyage?—They are cleaned out thoroughly after each voyage; washed, and disinfected.

7020. Mr. Carnegie.] Have you ever thought on the subject of the transit of cattle by railway, and feeding and watering them; have you had your attention directed to that?—I have; and I think that cattle coming from Aberdeen for other places to London, must either have those watering troughs of Mr. Reid's, of Granton, in the trucks, or have places where they could stop and water on the passage from one town to another.

7021. Do you think it would be possible to water them from Mr. Reid's troughs?—I think it would be quite possible to water them from Mr. Reid's troughs. I do not see why they should not be.

Professor T. Strange-ways. 18 June 1866.

7022. What is the principle of that trough?—It is a trough outside which doubles up; and all they have to do is, to take them to a place where the engine takes in water, and let the water run along, and the cattle will drink. I do not think so much about food as I do about water; an animal can do without food for hours, but I do not think it should be allowed to do without water.

7023. Do you think disease is produced by their being so long without water?—I think so; febrile diseases particularly.

Mr. James Higgins, called in; and Examined.

7024. Chairman.] Are you Inspector of Meat and Slaughter-houses for the Borough of Leeds?—I am.

7025. You are also cattle plague inspector?—I am.

7026. Were you brought up to the butchering trade?—Yes.

7027. How long have you held the appointment of inspector of meat and slaughter-houses?—For eight years last February.

7028. Do you inspect the live cattle in the markets?—Yes.

7029. Do you examine all the carcases slaughtered in the slaughter-houses?—I do.

7030. Are they public or private slaughter-houses in Leeds?—They are private slaughter-houses. We have about 130 private slaughter-houses, but in the very centre of the town we have six large slaughter-houses; four of which are capable of slaughtering about 100 head of cattle, besides small things.

7031. Do you mean 100 each or 100 between the four?—One hundred each.

7032. Are the private slaughter-houses licensed?—They are registered slaughter-houses.

7033. Under the Act?—Yes.

7034. Is there a temporary dead-meat market in Leeds?—We had one during the stoppage of the supply of fat cattle.

7035. Where was that?—In the live cattle market. The Corporation had built a large building; a very suitable building; but it was not intended for that purpose: it was built with a view of making accommodation for the Christmas fat show, and it happened to be just finished in the spring of this year.

7036. Chairman.] When the Act of Parliament was passed, prohibiting the movement of cattle by rail, it was turned into a dead-meat market, was it?—Yes.

7037. At that time did you get a plentiful supply of meat?—We got a very good supply of meat.

7038. Where did it principally come from?—It came principally from the farmers in the neighbourhood.

7039. Did it come in the shape of dead meat from the farmers?—All dead meat.

7040. Did they kill it on their own farms?—Yes. Irish beasts have been slaughtered at Liverpool, and bought by our carcase butchers, and the carcases of foreign beasts slaughtered at Hull.

Mr. J. Higgins.

7041. The town was very well supplied?—The town was very well supplied during that time.

7042. What do you say about the prices?—I may say that our butchers were under the impression that we should be very much put about for our supplies of stock; and the carcase butchers, in making provisions, rather overdid the thing; they brought too plentiful a supply, and positively the prices were lower for a few weeks, until they rectified themselves.

7043. Then the carcase butchers turned their attention to getting supplies from other places?—They did.

7044. And they rather overdid it?—Yes, for a few weeks.

7045. Since that prohibition has been taken off, has there been a good supply of meat for Leeds?—No, we have not had a good supply of meat lately.

7046. To what do you attribute that?—We attribute it to our carcase butchers not being able to get their supplies of foreign stock; that is, the carcases.

7047. Why could they not get the same supply as they did, when that prohibition was in force. You say that they got rather an over supply when they could not get meat sent by railway. Why have they not been able to supply town lately when the supply has been assured, in the same way as they did when the prohibition was in force?—Because the owners of foreign stock, instead of sending their cattle alive to Hull for the purpose of being slaughtered there, preferred a live market, and sent them away to London.

7048. You do not understand my question. You say that when the Act of Parliament came into force, prohibiting stock being moved by rail, the carcase butchers went to the ports and other places, and supplied themselves with meat?—They did.

7049. I want to know why they cannot do that now?—They can do that now, provided they can get a supply.

7050. Why cannot they get a supply now, if they could do it a few weeks ago?—They cannot get the same supply as at Hull.

7051. You mean that cattle are not imported into Hull?—Certainly not.

7052. Mr. Dent.] The home cattle supply around around Leeds is quite exhausted now, is it not?—Nearly so.

18 June 1866.

7053. And at the time of which you have been talking there was a great number of beasts round Leeds slaughtered and sent into Leeds, and into the North Riding?—A great deal.

7054. Chairman.] Why do they not go on importing?—Because if an importer bring his cattle into Hull, they are compelled to slaughter them there. He can take his cattle alive to London, and if he brings them up to London, he has the advantage of a live market, and he always prefers a live-meat market to a dead-meat market.

7055. They cannot bring them alive into the London market from Hull?—No, but from foreign ports.

7056. You mean to say, that in preference to going to Hull they come to the port of London?—Yes. I was not surprised to hear a gentleman state they had a very good supply. There is no wonder. He said they could supply a hundred miles round.

7057. In fact, what used to go to Hull comes to London?—Certainly.

7058. By reason of the London market having the advantage?—Yes.

7059. Mr. Dent.] Do you know that practically the importation into Hull has decreased?—I am told it has not.

7060. Have you any figures for that statement?—I have no means of ascertaining the number; I may say that last week there was a very fair supply in Hull, but I believe that was occasioned by the very extraordinary prices that were paid for carcases the week previous.

7061. Chairman.] Is meat at a very high price in Leeds at the present time?—Very high indeed.

7062. What is the beef now?—The best beef and mutton sold at 11 d. per lb. retail price. The best butchers are charging their customers round, that price for family joints. Even the poorer and inferior joints are sold at 9 d. per lb.

7063. Do you know what number of beasts are required for the consumption of Leeds?—We require from five to six hundred weekly for the borough of Leeds.

7064. Is the Leeds market open now?—It is open now.

7065. What is the average number of cattle that come into the Leeds market?—We have had seven markets since the restriction was taken off. The average number for the five markets in May was 1,263 head, that is about 250 a week. The market following that was 186; last Wednesday we had 188. Our average supply ought to be from 500 to 600 per week.

7066. Chairman.] You say you want five or six hundred, and you do not get above 200 and odd in the markets. Where do your butchers get the rest of their supply now?—Some of our carcase butchers have had to come to London and buy carcases here. Some have gone to Liverpool, and others go to Hull. Some of them have sent their partners over to Hamburg for the purpose of buying beasts, and have chartered vessels for the purpose of supplying their customers in Leeds.

7067. Sending over dead meat from that port?—No; sending over live cattle to be slaughtered in Hull. I may say, that more than half the carcases of foreign beasts that have been slaughtered last month have been those that have been purchased by our own butchers in Hamburg.

7068. Mr. Dent.] Brought over and slaughtered in Hull?—Yes.

7069. Is there not a trade just sprung up in carcases, from Rotterdam to Hull; is not that just beginning?—I think they are permitted from Rotterdam. I have heard of it, but it would be too risky, I think, for much trade.

7070. Chairman.] You say the price of mutton is very high, but there are no restrictions on the movement of sheep?—No; mutton is generally ruled by the price of beef. Mutton and beef of the best quality generally go together, and sheep are very dear at the present time all over the country.

7071. You have formed some opinion as to the desirability of having public slaughter-houses in all large towns, have you not?—Yes; I have opinions of my own on that subject.

7072. What is your opinion?—I may say I have held these opinions long since; I held them many years ago. I think private slaughter-houses, especially in large towns like Leeds, and in towns larger than Leeds, are not conducive to the health of the inhabitants; and I do not think the trade would suffer anything, not in the least, in my opinion.

7073. We have been told by butchers in London that they could not look after their property so well in the public slaughter-houses?—I think that is all nonsense.

7074. They think they would lose some of the inside fat, and so on. Do you think that would be the case, that they would be robbed of the fat?—If they employed dishonest servants they would rob them in their own private slaughter-houses. I cannot understand how they would be robbed of the fat in a public slaughter-house.

7076. So that each butcher can have his own private slaughter-house?—Yes, either for 200 bullocks or for 20 or 30.

7077. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Do you think any distinction should be drawn between the carcase butcher and the retail butcher, with regard to slaughtering in public slaughter-houses?—If I drew any distinction at all, it would be in favour of the retail butcher.

7078. You mean to say he might be entitled to slaughter in his private slaughter-house, and not the carcase butcher; do you mean to say that you would allow the retail butcher to slaughter in his private slaughter-house, but not the carcase butcher?—If I conceded the point of private slaughter-houses it would be to the retail butcher, not to the carcase butcher.

7079. Mr. Dent.] You would want to slaughter at the outside, perhaps, 500 beasts a-week?—Yes.

7080. You know, in London, they want to slaughter 4,000?—Of course, it is a different thing in London; I am aware of that.

7081. You

7081. You cannot compare London with Leeds or any of those towns. Although it might be perfectly possible for Leeds, Birmingham, and Liverpool, it would be a different thing in London?—Yes, certainly.

7082. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] What would be the distance of your butchers from their slaughter-houses in Leeds. You have slaughter-houses in Leeds now, I suppose, in a tolerably central place. What is the distance from that to any of the butchers' private houses?—It is the outside butchers who have private slaughter-houses mostly.

7083. But from the central slaughter-houses round the town of Leeds, what would be the distance?—About three miles; three miles is about the furthest.

7084. Chairman.] Is dead meat still coming from Hull?—Yes.

7085. And practically Leeds has been supplied?—We had a large supply came last week; that supply was prejudicial to our butchers.

7086. Mr. Dent.] Did that lower the price of meat much?—It lowered the price of meat; it came in on the Saturday.

7087. Chairman.] How did it come in?—It came in in carcases, on the Saturday.

7088. Who was it consigned to?—To one or two of our carcase butchers; and coming in on the Saturday it had to be sold. It came in up to Saturday evening, at seven o'clock. It completely lowered the price of meat. I should say that would make such a difference to those butchers who had made their previous purchases in the live market, that it would take away their week's profit; I have no doubt about it.

7089. That has occurred since those gentlemen from Leeds gave evidence here?—It has.

7090. Sir Matthew Ridley.] Whence did it come?—It came from Hull.

7091. Mr. Dent.] Because, on the Wednesday previous, they had been buying first-class bullocks at high prices?—They had been buying them as high as 9 d. and 9¼ d. per pound.

7092. You have had lately a large number of north of England bullocks for the live market?—We have.

7093. At this time of the year the best supply is from the Northumberland bullocks?—Yes; they are considered the best beasts in England.

7094. That large supply of beasts coming in interferes with the sale?—I saw a lot of beasts sold the very Saturday following at 6½ d. and 6¾ d., which, had they been at Leeds on the Wednesday in the week before, would have made 8 d. a pound in the carcase.

7095. Chairman.] What caused this supply of meat to come last Monday, do you know?—I cannot understand, unless they are making such a noise about it that they thought they would be able to get a very good market.

7096. Was it not because people learnt in this room that there was a great supply wanted in Leeds?—Some one on the other side must have got to know about it, and intended to make it a profitable speculation.

7097. Probably some one connected with the foreign trade in this room heard what the price of meat was at Leeds?—It might be so.

7098. And as soon as the want was known there was the supply?—More than a supply.

7099. Mr. Dent.] Probably he made a bad speculation, in consequence of which you will not get another cargo?—I am afraid not; I am afraid the prices will not enable them to send any more.

7100. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] We are told the market was held on Wednesday, but the principal purchase of meat was on Saturday, and between Wednesday and Saturday the meat got bad; is that the case, that the only market for meat is Wednesday?—That is the live market; but the butchers can keep their cattle.

7101. We have been told that the beasts were sold at Hull on Monday, and came into Leeds on Tuesday for the Wednesday market; we were told it would not keep well till the Saturday, which is the day when most of the poorer classes purchase their meat; is that the usual state of things?—No; they send them over quite fresh from Hull; they have sent them every day, quite fresh killed beasts, beasts that have been killed only the day before. The carcases that came in last week, I should say, had not been killed 12 hours; they were quite fresh; they were scarcely set, in fact; I have no doubt they had been killed that morning or during the Friday evening.

7102. Mr. Carnegie.] They were in a good state?—They were in a first-rate state; quite fresh. I have no doubt that that cargo had arrived in Hull on the Friday, and they had started killing them on Friday night and Saturday morning; and that was the way we got them. They came quite fresh, and were good in quality, and came in good condition.

7103. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Then the poorer classes at Leeds last Saturday had nothing to complain of?—No, they certainly had not at that time.

Thursday, 21st June 1866.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Mr. Carnegie.	Mr. Graham.
Mr. Dent.	Lord Naas.
Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.	Sir Matthew Ridley.

MR. HUNT, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. WILLIAM TORR, called in; and Examined.

Mr. W. Torr.

21 June 1866.

7104. Mr. Dent.] YOU are a large tenant farmer in Lincolnshire?—Yes.

7105. Tell us what you occupy there?—Rather over 2,000 acres; I think it is 2,200.

7106. Of course you keep a large flock of sheep, and a considerable amount of cattle?—Yes.

7107. You are not very much in the habit of buying cattle to graze; yours is more of a breeding place?—I have both; I buy largely young breeding stock, and the best short horns.

7108. Where do you generally buy your grazing stock?—Generally from the breeders themselves.

7109. You do not go to fairs?—Not much.

7110. From what part of England do you generally buy?—In my own county; I buy my young steers when they are for sale.

7111. You graze them during the summer and winter, and then sell them fat in the autumn to the butchers?—Yes; generally.

7112. Where is your principal market for sale of stock?—As to the bulk of our fat stock in my neighbourhood, the cattle go to the markets of Leeds and Wakefield principally, and some to Manchester.

7113. Do you ever send to the Metropolitan Market?—In the spring of the year we send a good few sheep.

7114. And you send a good many carcases, do you not?—A great many.

7115. Do you slaughter them yourself;—Yes; close to my own farm.

7116. You do not sell them to a butcher who slaughters them for you?—No; we sell them generally at home. We know the markets, and if we can get as much for them, we generally sell them at home.

7117. You do not take the risk of the consignments to London?—I do not.

7118. Have you found loss arise from making consignments to London as compared with selling alive?—Occasionally, not much.

7119. I think I remember your telling me once last winter there was a difference of something like 10 s. a head between carcases sent to London and live sheep sent to Leeds?—Yes; that happened to meet a Saturday's market in London, when it was over-glutted, which it is occasionally.

7120. Have you at all considered the question of the trade in stock since we have had the rinderpest in the country?—Yes, I have; the home trade.

7121. I presume you would not be prepared to put any restrictions on the home trade in cattle, provided the stock in the country were healthy and had no disease?—I think there is much more danger in our small markets in the country, where they are under no surveillance whatever, than there would be even in well-regulated larger markets.

7123. Some veterinary surgeon's inspection?—Yes; that is in large markets. We have a great objection to the small markets in small towns; they tend in no way to advance us as farmers; they are chiefly got up by small innkeepers and by little country jobbers who have no character to lose, and there has been more infection from them during the last six months than from the large markets.

7124. How would the buyers in the small country towns be supplied if you do away with the markets in those towns?—Are you speaking of dead meat or live stock?

7125. Take such a place as Brigg; if there were a market in Brigg how would the buyers and the villages round be supplied?—They are not supplied to any extent from it; they are more jobbing markets.

7126. With respect to the foreign trade, have you formed any idea as to the restrictions to be placed on the foreign trade?—Only since the rinderpest has been in the country; the general feeling is, that there should be large slaughter-houses in all import towns.

7127. And that the foreign cattle should only be conveyed in a dead state from the port of landing?—Yes, unless there was quarantine and separate store markets.

7128. We will first take the question of foreign cattle intended for slaughter; what do you say as to that?—I think they should all be slaughtered when they come on land.

7129. You think it would be possible to supply Leeds and Manchester and other large towns throughout the summer with meat slaughtered at Hull and Liverpool?—Quite so; Hull has a very large import; that would only be upon an excess over the ordinary supply of home stock; foreign stock is chiefly used as an overplus over and above the home supply.

7130. You

7130. You do not think it would be safe, in ordinary times, to take foreign cattle, say from Hull to Leeds, there to be exhibited in the market, and to be slaughtered at Leeds?—I think it would be very unsafe.

7131. You, yourself, have never been in the habit of buying any foreign stock to graze?—None.

7132. Are there any bought in the part of the country where you reside?—Not many; in the north of England, generally speaking, there are large breeders, and if any man cannot feed his own he has a neighbour, very likely, who is more a feeder than a breeder; in that manner they change hands, the stock generally working from the north to the south; we have had supplies of stock from the north which passes us and goes still further south.

7133. Still there are a certain number of supply store stock, and especially of milch cows, imported from abroad to this country; do you think those should be subjected to quarantine?—Yes; I think that would be a great safeguard.

7134. I think, generally, your view with respect to the home trade is, that you would not put a restriction on that unless it were possible to stop the small markets?—I think that the more the supplying markets are concentrated into larger markets, the better it will be for all parties, the better for the seller, the better for the buyer, and the better for the jobber.

7135. With regard to foreign stock, you would slaughter fat beasts, or beasts that were to be slaughtered in the port; and, as to store stock, you would subject them to quarantine?—I would.

7137. It might be ordered by the retail butcher?—Yes; the butcher would send an order down, perhaps, for 20 head of cattle to anyone 150 miles from him. There is no reason I should not send in to a butcher in London 20 sheep in a day if he wanted them, and they would be slaughtered within a very few hours of the time they would be in London. The great advantage of that would be that a very large portion of the offal would be left in the country, which offal bears a very large proportion to the beast itself. It is not wanted in London, and it would be left where it is wanted. The meat would come as well killed, and much better, by that plan, even in hot weather.

7138. By the word "offal" you are speaking of blood, hide, heads, and horns, not meaning tongues?—Hides, livers, lights, and heads.

7139. There would not be sufficient consumption for the whole of that offal in the country, would there?—There would very nearly, in small market towns and villages.

7140. Take your own case; supposing you slaughtered 20 sheep, how would you dispose of the heads and horns?—I should dispose of them all most readily at about 1*s.* or 1*s.* 2*d.* each; there are plenty of country people to take hundreds more of them than they can get, and they would not bear transit to London at that rate; our rate of wages is now 15 s. per week.

7141. Do you think it would not be a great deprivation to the working classes in large towns if they could not get them?—I am only saying, if those cattle that are slaughtered in the country; if the large towns afforded 10 per cent. more for them, they would find their way there as well as any other perishable article.

7142. I imagine you are always supposing there are to be still live-stock markets?—Yes.

7143. One to supplement the other?—Yes; I am wishing to show that there is much less difficulty in dead meat, or carcase meat, getting to market than has generally been supposed. The difficulty, as I said, is, that the system at present is, to send them at the vendor's own risk, and, consequently, a great risk; I say that risk can be most materially and almost effectually done away with by the cattle being slaughtered in the country to order; that is as far as that goes.

7145. You have not sent any beef in that way, have you?—No; but I have sent a good deal of mutton. I sent a good deal of mutton last winter; so many a week were ordered; they went to Hull, not to London; I supplied a butcher in Hull with 30 a week.

7146. You have no experience in consigning carcases of beef to London?—No.

7148. Where did he have to deliver it?—I think he had to deliver it for shipment for the regiments in the Crimea. I am pretty certain it was at Southampton. He bought it at Aberdeen, and it was killed in Aberdeen. He knew what he wanted before he bought the carcases, and I think they all came from Aberdeen. Mr. Donald has had the Crystal Palace contract, and perhaps knows as much about the sort of thing as any man in England.

7149. Chairman.] You say you would like the store animals to be quarantined at the port of landing?—I think so.

7150. We have been told by the foreign trade that there would be a depreciation of the value of foreign animals if that was insisted upon?—I think that would soon arrange itself as to the foreign trade. A good deal of the foreign cattle is bought of the Jews, who are collectors, and chiefly by English agents.

21 June 1866.

7151. Do you think graziers would give more for store cattle that had been subject to quarantine?—There is not the slightest doubt of it.

7152. It would be like buying a horse with a warranty?—Certainly, for some time; what you lost on one hand you would gain on the other.

7153. You think the expense of keeping the beasts in quarantine would be amply repaid by the enhanced price?—It would be more than repaid, decidedly.

7154. Do many store animals come to your part of the country?—From Hamburgh and Rotterdam.

7155. Store animals; beasts and sheep?—Yes.

7156. And cows?—And cows. There have not lately been so many store cattle, because there has not been market for them, and no one would buy them. We have some German sheep.

7157. With regard to fat beasts, do you think there would be any difficulty in supplying the large towns of the West Riding with animals killed at the ports?—I think, as far as the foreign cattle goes, there would be no difficulty at all.

7158. Take it thus: supposing that depended mostly upon the foreign cattle, would there be a difficulty?—I think not; it would soon right itself.

7160. There is also this economy, is there not, that where you carry live animals to be killed a great deal of the offal has to come back again?—It goes into the worst market, instead of the best.

7161. So that when you send dead meat, you send the whole of it which is available for consumption?—Yes; and only that. The best fellmongering yards are in the country. The skins are not wanted in the towns generally.

7162. Supposing you kill beasts, to send to London dead, should you get them killed on your own farm, or get them driven to a slaughter-house?—I should kill them in districts, as I have mentioned, and that would soon become a sort of trade. Some farmers, who have advantages for that kind of thing, would kill their own animals, and we should soon get into it. It would not be necessary for every farmer to have his own butcher's shop, but it would with me.

7163. You think there would be a slaughter-house provided in most parishes?—I do.

7164. Did you approve of that provision, in my Cattle Plague Bill, requiring that there should be a slaughter-house provided?—I did. I mentioned this in evidence so far back as 1847, when I was examined here several times upon our railways.

7165. Do you think it would be the case that slaughter-houses would be erected near to the principal stations?—I do; they are now.

7166. Can you mention cases where there are such?—We had evidence here in one of the committees as to the large supply of lambs from Southampton; the slaughter-houses, as I understand, are close to the railway stations, to which the lambs are brought down, and there they remain, until an order comes down from some one who wants lambs; then they are slaughtered and sent, hung in trucks by their legs, and come to London, cooling as they come along.

7167. Does the meat set very well as it travels?—The meat has generally been sent in a wrong form; I think the railway truck wants to be a slaughter-house of itself, and that the meat should not be put in packing bags.

7168. I suppose you mean a "larder," rather than a slaughter-house?—That is the first slaughter-house; sheep could be carried in that manner to an immense distance; they would each hang by themselves, and the current of air would be much better than they get by the present system. The rule of the present system is, that they are put into bags, and piled one above another to a great height, and if they are not perfectly cold and set before they are so packed, they receive injury on the journey.

7169. If they were all hung and slung free in the meat vans, you think they would set perfectly well, and arrive in good condition?—As good as anything need be if properly done.

7170. What do you say about the railway dust?—That must be taken care of.

7171. How would you take care as to that?—You might have an awning round, and then have plenty of air.

7172. Do you mean that each carcase should have canvas round it?—Oh, dear no; that is not necessary; if your truck was perfectly well-ventilated, as to the dust, you might have some sort of very thin awning to prevent its getting inside the truck.

7173. Curtains inside the truck?—Yes, anything of that sort could soon be found out; I would venture the assertion that sheep might, in Mr. Dent's own county, the Yorkshire wolds, be killed there, and sent to London, after they had been perfectly set, and if sheep should be sent alive at the same time, and afterwards slaughtered in London, you would be able to tell the difference of the mutton in the eating.

7174. Do you mean to say that the advantage would be on the side of the country-killed sheep?—There is not the slightest doubt about that.

7175. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] It would set during the journey?—That would assist in setting it.

7176. You would have the 12 hours' setting first of all, before you put it into the truck?—Yes, I should, if I were not in a great hurry.

7177. In hot weather?—In hot weather; I maintain it will go better in that way, than when the sheep are crammed into trucks and get themselves heated, and immediately on landing in London are slaughtered when there is no time to keep and cool them.

7178. Chairman.] The railway journey hustling them out, and driving them through the streets, heats the blood of the animals and they do not kill so well?—No; because you have no means of getting the blood cool again.

7179. Does it come to the difference between the hunted hare and the shot hare?—It is exactly exactly the same thing. If the animal dies cool with its blood in it, it is very good mutton; take the case of a sheep which has been drowned in cold water, that mutton is as good as any mutton need be, although it is not very nice to look at, it is good and wholesome.

7180. It has been suggested to us, that all animals coming from foreign parts should be branded on coming into the Port of London in the Metropolitan Market, and before they are allowed to go to butchers in the country?—I have not that great knowledge of the town market which would enable me to give a direct answer to that question, but common sense says, it would be one of our great sources of infection; and it has been so.

7181. You mean that experience says it?—Yes.

7182. And you would say that common sense shows we ought not to continue it?—Yes.

7183. Should you object to fat animals that have once been in the London market coming out again?—Indeed I should; I would not buy them at any price, to mix with stores.

7184. Should you object to their coming down by train to slaughter-houses in large towns?—I should, if they came near me.

7185. Where would you think the risk would lie?—The risk is in bringing those animals principally to stations to which we have to take our own cattle; there is the same pen, there are the same footmarks, and there are the same trucks.

7186. They are treading the same ground?—They are treading the same ground, and they travel in the same trucks, and we could get no safety, even if we asked for clean trucks.

7187. They might be shunted inside with other animals?—That is the great risk. I have seen the abattoirs in Paris; I think the whole of the town of Paris is supplied by five abattoirs, and they seem to have no difficulty in any shape or way. They are managed entirely by government, a duty is paid for them, and they are under military discipline.

7188. Should you wish to prevent store animals going to the Metropolitan Market?—They have no business there.

7190. Supposing all animals that went to Copenhagen-fields were branded, to show that they had been there, that would prevent that taking place?—It might prevent it; but there are so many shifty ways, that I do not know that it would. I think if there could be an arrangement for quarantine, within a convenient distance from London, and a store market adjacent or convenient to it, it would be a very great improvement.

7191. Mr. Dent.] You do not want stores for London, but only milch cows?—I think it would be an improvement, both to the vendor and to the purchaser, inasmuch as if I wanted to buy a lot of cattle for grazing, I could go there.

7192. Chairman.] As matter of practice, do people go to the Metropolitan Market to buy store cattle?—I do not know that, but I know that stores come down to the country, both sheep and cattle, that have failed to be sold in the market as fat stock.

7193. If the fat stock market is low, they are sent down to the provincial markets, to be sold for feeding again?—They are fed on a little more. Lately we have had store stock at a higher proportion in value, the whole of the spring, than fat stock, yet a deal of the stock have been sold for fat instead of stores.

7194 Mr. Dent.] Are store cattle proportionately much dearer this spring than they were last spring?—Yes. If you go down to one-and-a-half-year old and two-years' old.

7195. Will you tell us how much dearer they are, on an average, taking two-year olds, such as you would generally buy?—Taking a yearling steer (I am now speaking of good ones), that I should have bought in 1865 for 12 l. or 14 l. it will now cost me 14 l. or 15 l.

7196. Does this apply to Irish cattle during this spring, do you think?—The Irish cattle have not been allowed to be imported; they have been higher, but not in the same proportion. The grass land in Ireland, I must tell you, is going down a good deal in rent this year.

7197. Mr. Graham.] Your impression is that the whole of the foreign store cattle should be quarantined?—It is.

7198. Would not that be a deterring consideration with the foreign shippers; if their cattle were to be quarantined, would it not prevent their sending cattle altogether, or to a large extent?—I think not, inasmuch as they are generally bought by Englishmen going over for them. The bulk of the foreign cattle are bought by men going over, and making their purchases, and bringing them back. There is not much consignment.

7199. The reason for quarantining them is that there is danger of their infecting other cattle, if they get mixed with them?—So frequently has rinderpest been in most countries of Europe—in fact, extending over so much of it—that I think greater care should be taken as to having the quarantine.

7200. Then the man who goes abroad, and brings back with him a quantity of stock cattle, would be obliged to quarantine them; would there not be an extra risk, in consequence of that, of getting them diseased during the quarantine?—The usual practice is this: if a man goes over to Frankfort, or any town abroad, he finds the cattle are generally collected for him, principally by the Jews. He then makes a bargain for 100 or 150, at so much a-head. He then takes charge of them, and brings them down to a shipping port, say Rotterdam or Hamburg. He then makes his arrangements with a Hull steamer, to bring over whatever he has got. Those come to the port, and they have been collected abroad from all countries, although he buys them from one. There is the great risk of rinderpest. He brings them into England, and he would make a still greater profit of them, if he could put them in quarantine, and give them a warranty.

7201. Supposing him to have taken care to select sound animals, I ask you whether he would not

21 June 1866.

not be exposed to an extra risk by being forced to quarantine them in the quarantine ground?—Of course he would, or else the quarantine would be of no use, and he would consider that in making his bargain abroad, whether he would run the risk or not if he bought it with a risk, he would buy it for less money than if he bought them in a tolerably healthy district.

7202. It is not the risk abroad I am speaking about, but as to the risk he would incur in putting the cattle, which I presume to be sound, into a quarantine ground where there might be diseased cattle?—Do you mean his fresh cargo?

7203. Yes; would not that be a risk?—To a certain extent; but we have not arrived yet at such immense quantities from the various places, and I suppose the quarantine ground would not be all in one situation; there would be separate yards; the very yard the cattle are going into might, as you say, be infected, but there disinfectants must be used, and it would be a great deal safer that they should be kept there than to let them go into the country and thereby spread the disease.

7204. It would be safer to the country, no doubt, but I am speaking of his interest in his own cattle?—The fellows that go over are very shrewd men; they are, no doubt, the shrewdest men I have ever met with in my life; they would have to take more care on the other side.

7205. I am not quite sure whether you understand my question yet; I am presuming that the man has got a lot of perfectly sound cattle, and that he brings them down to the port, and the law which you propose says he must put them into a general quarantine ground, is his risk not greatly enhanced by that?—I should say it might be so, if rinderpest was abroad.

7206. And the cost raised by the increased risk?—It would be if there were any cases broke out, no doubt, in the quarantine.

7207. But whether that was so or not, there would be an increased risk?—Yes; but if he could give a warranty it would be worth a deal more money to him.

7208. It would raise the price of foreign cattle?—Yes, by the warranty.

7209. And, of course, would be a great advantage to the English breeder of cattle?—The grazier would never think of 1*l.* a head more, or even more than that if he could be satisfied that they were quite healthy.

7210. Anything which tends to raise the general price of cattle would be of advantage to the English breeder?—They do not come exactly in juxtaposition there, or not so much so. The English breeder is very generally a grazier as well as a breeder; you cannot separate the two distinctly, and what is gained on the one hand is lost on the other.

7211. The English breeder and grazier would give a higher price for the article, and, therefore, the foreign stock would be enhanced in value?—Not a very great deal; it would, to some extent, if healthy.

7212. Mr. Dent.] If the grazier gives so much less for the fat stock it must be so?—It cuts both ways; it would be so, to a certain extent.

7213. Mr. Carnegie.] Do I understand you think the principal advantage the English grazier would get would be more in security from disease than an increased price?—It would, to begin with, no doubt.

7214. Mr. Graham.] You spoke of dealers going over to the Continent to buy. Do you mean that with reference to store cattle or to fat cattle?—Both.

7215. Is it not the case that foreign cattle from Holland are imported into Hull from different ports there on foreign account?—No, it is not so, generally.

7216. You spoke of the fat cattle being slaughtered at the ports of import. Of course, a butcher has now the advantage of cattle imported to a number of different ports, and brought altogether; how could a butcher superintend his business at four or five different ports of import at one and the same time without great additional inconvenience and expense; take the case of a London butcher, for instance?—A large supply and demand regulates itself. A London butcher would be chiefly supplied from the Thames; he would not have to come to the Humber for his beast; but the Manchester man and the Leeds man would.

7217. Then the Manchester man's choice of markets would be limited; he could not be in two or three markets at once?—Taking the case of the Manchester market, and the Leeds and Wakefield markets, which are the large Midland markets, and chiefly supplied from Hull, if there is more demand, there would be still more steamers put on.

7219. Then he would only have the choice of Hull; he could not get to any other place?—Most butchers have foremen, and some have men that are better qualified than themselves. The butcher would have his foreman at Hull, the same as he has at any other market. On Wednesday we have the Wakefield market; and very likely there is a market on Wednesday at some of the other towns as well.

7220. Does not a butcher deal more advantageously by having his supplies brought, and all concentrated at one market from these different sources, than if he had to send out agents to those different sources?—He gets a very great advantage by being able to go to two or three markets in the week.

7221. How so?—If, for instance, Leeds be full, his man would buy more at Manchester; and if Manchester be over stocked, he buys at Wakefield. These markets are regulated with the greatest nicety, like corn markets. It is better for him to have the opportunity of two or three markets.

7222. And that he should be compelled to do so?—His own wants would compel him to do so; he would not rely on one market. Many of these butchers at Wakefield, or other towns, have men who buy for them on commission in the country; that is already, as I consider, a step in the right direction.

7223. You propose that the butcher should send his orders to the country, and have the cattle killed there. Can a butcher do as well if he has to positively order a certain quantity to be killed at a distance from where he is as if he had himself gone to the market and purchased in competition with various dealers?—I think he would; I think the trade would create that tendency; there are some very great advantages in it.

7224. You think a butcher would not make a better bargain for his beast, being a healthy beast, if he were in the market than he would if he sent an order by telegram to you on your farm?—What I think is, that the man who sells should know the value. If the market is against him one week, it would be for him the next; it depends a great deal on the markets. If Leeds wants 700 bullocks, and there are only 400 in the market, then it is the grazier's turn; and if it wants 400, and there are 700 in the market, then it is the butcher's turn. I think generally the farmers gain as much by going to market, if there is a competition of buyers, as the buyer does if there is a competition of sellers. We as farmers rather like large fairs, where we get a competition of buyers. We think, generally speaking, we get paid by going to a fair or market, and get more than we do by selling at home.

7225. I gather from your answer, that the tendency of this measure would be to do away with the competition of buyer and seller in the markets?—The same would take place in the country where they were brought for sale. If I got a profit this week on buying on commission, I should lose, perhaps, next week. The competition would be more in the country where it is now less, and less in the towns where it is now more. I think that meets the case. The competition would be sent into the districts.

7226. I think you said, that at present, the cattle are sent at the sender's risk?—Yes; to the dead meat market.

7227. And that this would throw the risk of sending the cattle on the buyer?—Yes, but a small one.

7228. You yourself are a vendor?—Yes. I am speaking now of the dead carcases. I am a vendor of dead meat; as to live stock, I am a buyer and a vendor.

7229. Can you suggest any other great article of consumption that is dealt with in that way, simply by order, from hand to mouth?—I know that poultry and fish are very much ordered in the country. We have a large trade from Grimsby, about five miles from me. You have fish here in plenty by four o'clock in the morning, alive, that was at Grimsby at nine o'clock the night previous.

7230. The fish is not sent until it is ordered?—I understand a great deal of that fish trade is carried on in this way: the fish is fetched from the railway station in waggons, with a pair of horses, and taken to the party who has contracted for it, or bought it in Grimsby; but it is carried further now; it is brought from Norway and sent up alive; it is brought up alive to Billingsgate.

7231. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Do you mean by being brought up alive, that it is kept in ice?—No; in water-tight waggons; and there is a pair of horses meets the train at King's Cross every morning. I have seen this.

7232. Does salmon come up in that way?—Salmon and other fish. In the season a great deal of cod comes. As to the fish market, as far as the live fish is concerned, if I understand it rightly (I may be misinformed), these waggons are sent for by the party whose fish is in them in the morning. They provide a pair of horses and fetch it into their own shops.

7233. Mr. Graham.] That is a different thing from sending an order to buy fish for their daily wants?—Yes; it is, perhaps, different, not much so.

7235. Mr. Dent.] All you propose is this: that this dead meat trade should be supplementary to the live markets?—To a live market in the country.

7236. For English stock?—Yes. I should like a live market in London too.

7237. Mr. Graham.] But only for English stock, not for foreign?—Only for English stock; not for foreign. I think it should be kept separate to itself.

7238. Mr. Dent.] You do not propose that the foreign stock coming into the Port of London should not go into the Metropolitan market?—I am not sufficiently a judge of that. I think the great thing is to keep the markets separately, and not to allow the stock to go into the country until it has been subjected to quarantine. I think that is the safest course for the purchaser and consumer, and everyone; it is the common safety I look at.

7239. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Have you had the disease in your district?—Yes; we have in Lincolnshire.

7240. And are fully alive to the necessity of taking all precautions as to the prevention of the introduction of the disease?—Yes; if Mr. Hunt's Bill had passed we should not have had so much loss, there is no doubt about that.

7241. Mr. Dent.] You have been fortunate enough to escape the rinderpest?—We have been fortunate enough to escape it, and therefore I have been satisfied; I know I ran great risk.

7242. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Is the traffic of cattle out of Lincolnshire stopped now, or is it treated as an infected district still?—No, only as far as particular villages go; we have some villages under petty sessional regulations, which are written off, and from which cattle cannot come out.

7243. Were there great complaints when the traffic in cattle was stopped altogether?—During the winter months I do not think there were any of consequence.

7244. The markets could be supplied with dead meat equally well?—Quite as well.

7245. Did the producer gain by that; did the farmer get as good a price for his meat, as he would otherwise have done?—I think I may put it in this manner. During the winter months up till lately, the price of mutton and meat was not enhanced to any serious extent, but now we want the land stocking, and there is an increased demand for store stock, and thus both beef and mutton are enhanced.

7246. Do you think that the price of meat will rise?—I think the price of beef will not rise so much as has generally been anticipated.

7247. It will be kept down by importation of foreign stock?—By the foreign meat coming in in a half cured or cured state. There is a drawback now as to the sheep, the wool is of course materially affected; it is a great deal lower.

7248. Sir Matthew Ridley.] Have you bought foreign stock from Hull lately?—Never; I never should do it.

Mr. W. Torr.

21 June 1866.

7249. Have you had an opportunity of seeing the condition in which animals are disembarked on importation into Hull?—Yes; I have seen a great deal of it.

7250. What is your opinion of the system by which they are landed on board those boats?—I am not sufficiently acquainted with that; I know that lately they have imported them in good condition. They are not brought so ragged as they were some years ago; I think they pay the collectors better, and they bring them in a better state than they used to, especially sheep.

7251. Do you think, as a practical man, as I know you to be, that it could be arranged that cattle could be watered on their railway journey in the trucks?—That has been attempted, and it could be done at certain particular stations. I do not know why it should not; I believe that there is a very great difficulty in getting them to drink in the trucks themselves.

7252. You think they could not be watered within the trucks?—I think it would be very difficult to do so, very.

7253. That is a point upon which the Committee want practical information?—The difficulty of it is, that when these jobbers take the trucks they pay for the trucks, at so much per head, and consequently it is their interest to cram as many in as they can. They put in 18 beasts where there should be 14, and 14 where there should be 10.

7254. In what way is it that these small markets to which you allude appear to you to be prejudicial, rather than otherwise, to the interests both of the public and the grazier?—First of all, if I am to take the grazier, he goes to one of these markets where there is only very inferior stock in the hands of little jobbers, and he cannot get hold of any good beasts, generally speaking. Then again, the respectable jobbers, who are men of capital and really respectable, do not go to these small fairs, because there is no scope for them, and the farmers do not go where the chief jobbers do not go. These small fairs are carried on by small jobbers, pig jobbers, and so on, and these little men go and buy a cow, and are not particular whether she has rinderpest or anything else, so that they can make 5 s. out of her. A respectable jobber does not do that. It may be that this little jobber gets this cow sold to another jobber, and so the cow may go to half a dozen of these small fairs. As to these men (I do not want to say more of them than they deserve) they generally have no character to lose, and they care for nothing.

7255. Would you propose that the holdings of these markets should be prohibited, except in towns of a certain population or size?—Entirely; I think they are the worst things for everything; I am not speaking interestedly; I would allow a pig market, but I would not have a pig market turned into a small cattle market. Some of these things have proved to be most dangerous.

7256. Have not these cattle markets been created in consequence of the requirements in the part of the country in which they have existed?—I do not think so; no district in England has suffered more than your own districts in the north, by having so many of the fortnightly markets.

7257. What places in the north of England do you mean?—Take any of your best towns, take Northallerton or Darlington. They are better where they have fewer markets in the year than they are when they have fortnightly markets; on principle. On principle, the frequency of the markets do no good, and occasion great risk.

7258. Surely you would not class Darlington among those towns?—No, indeed, I do not; I think that is one of the very best and largest; I was only giving you an example; I know that the farmers in the north of England think that the frequency of the markets do no good; we know that the Scotchmen have a great objection to them. There they have large trysts, and the great fairs of Scotland are much better attended, and there is much greater competition in every shape and way than in the small markets of little country towns.

7259. Can you tell the Committee of the advance of price within this last month on beef and mutton in your district of England?—Mutton has got up to about 9 d. I made 9 d. last week, and I made 9 d. before the fleece was on, and four months ago that would be equal to 1½ d. a pound difference. We are selling them now without the wool, and before we were selling them with the wool. I think if I were to say 1 d. a pound difference, it would not be far out.

7260. Is the quantity of fat stock in your district at the present time very much lower than usual?—Yes, and of course dearer.

7261. So it is equally in the north of Yorkshire, with which you are well acquainted?—Yes; that has arisen from the large quantity of cattle that have been slaughtered not in a fat state. I generally have about this time 120 grazing steers, and I have now only 84; I have sold a good many at about 28 l. each, that I should have made 40 l. of next October.

7262. What is the largest market town near Grimsby?—Grimsby is not a large town of itself; it is a large importing town. Lincoln is our best town; but it is more a market for providing other counties. We have no consuming town in the county; more stock goes out of the county of Lincoln, over and above our own consumption, than any county in England.

7263. Have you seen the last prices quoted for beef in the Newcastle market?—I heard there was a rise in beef.

7264. I have a quotation this morning that the best beef and the best steers are 11 s. per stone of 14 pounds?—Very likely; I was going to say perhaps 10 d.; I have seen some sold at 10 s. Our graziers will not sell, because the country is, so to speak, denuded. I made 45 l. of my last year's beasts; I have none this year.

7265. Chairman.] That was the case all over the country; people were in such a panic about the rinderpest, they sent off beasts half fatted to the market?—Yes, every one did almost.

7266. Some of them were only what you would call an ordinary year's lean?—In some parts of Lincoln they make the steers half fat before turning them out. They have a large allowance of oil cake in the fold yard.

7267. Have you had any difficulty in stocking your land this spring?—I have not sold largely this spring, or I should have had.

7268. Have any of your neighbours?—Many of my neighbours have gone largely into sheep, and of course the pastures are much larger than they would have been in an ordinary year.

7269. Where do you supply yourselves with steers from principally?—I supply myself generally from my own neighbourhood. Very large droves come down from the north of England in March and April, from the large fairs in the north north—from Darlington, and as far north as Scotland.

7270. Have these droves come down this year, —No.

7271. I suppose the restrictions prevented it? —The restrictions prevented it, and they would be wanted more at home; they were considered risky, and not looked after.

7272. In answer to the Honourable Member for Glasgow, you stated you thought it would be an improvement that orders should come down to the butchers and graziers to sell so many cattle, and that that would be an improvement of the system of sending them to the market?—Yes.

7273. Do you think it will be the case, that agents will spring up, who will go round to the farmers and cattle owners, and have a general knowledge of what stock there is?—That would be the very best occupation that could be offered to any one now.

7274. You think that will be the course of trade for the future?—Yes, certainly. Some encouragement should be given to it. It would be a very fine opening.

7275. In that way you think farmers would get as good prices on their own farms for animals as they do now by sending them to market?—I think they would. A good deal of that is done at present; but it is not done in right manner.

7276. It is the case now, that many butchers contract with the farmers to take so many head of stock per week and per month?—There is a good deal of that done; I do it myself.

7277. A great deal of fat stock is killed without ever going to the fat stock market; is it not?—Yes, an immense proportion, and it is growing and increasing every year. In fact, a very large proportion is now, particularly, in spring-fed sheep, which is a great illustration of that. As to spring-fed sheep—"hoggets," one-year old sheep, that have not been clipped—the trade is now entirely carried on by butchers buying them and making a sale of the fleece, and sending them to market without the fleece, instead of sending the sheep with its wool on. The price of wool is better at home. If the sheep is clipped at home, it is then called good wool, and there has been a great profit upon it. Going to market rather detracts from it. In fact, it has got quite a trade. The bulk of our hoggets go in that manner.

7278. The Honourable Member for Glasgow asked you if there was any general article of consumption treated in the way in which it is proposed to deal with the meat. Is it not the case, that there is no article of consumption that stands upon the same footing as meat?—I think there are many other articles equally as perishable, if you mean that.

Mr. W. Torr.

21 June 1866.

7279. I mean to say there is no other article of consumption which is in the same condition as sheep and beasts, which you cannot keep in large towns?—No, there is not. Neither alive nor dead. Alive, it is worse than dead; and if you have to turn them out generally, it is worse than anything.

7280. The only thing you can compare it to, is to poultry and fish?—Yes.

7281. You think that people ought to wait for orders from London before they send them up? —And as to lambs from the south, and fish; that is quite practicable.

7282. Supposing you send up a lot of beasts to the London market, and it is a bad market, you would suffer a great loss?—Yes, but it must be a very bad market if they are not sold. Store animals very seldom get to London.

7283. Is it not the case that sometimes you have a lot of beasts, and you send some out of the lot to one market and some out of the lot to another market, and that sometimes the best animals do not fetch the best prices?—It is not generally the case.

7284. But it does happen so sometimes?—Yes, it does. We know very well what suits the different markets. For instance, I should not send my largest sheep to London; I should send my largest sheep to Manchester and Wakefield, because they like the large sheep there, much better than the Londoners do.

7285. You have different breeds of sheep, have you not?—You see in breeding different kinds of sheep, they form themselves into size. I have 3,000 sheep; my small sheep I bring to London. I have some pure Leicesters, and some cross between Lincolns and Leicesters. My small sheep make me a penny a pound more than my larger ones.

7286. You have no black face?—No.

7287. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Do your large graziers during the winter months have sales by auction, which the butchers attend?—That is not much practised in our county; very little. We have some, but it is generally done by gentlemen; we generally send ours away, as they get ready. Supposing you have got 10 beasts ready, you would send those 10 beasts this month and send another 10 next month. I send all my sheep off in that manner. Upon an average, I send sheep 30 weeks out of the 52.

7288. To retail customers?—Yes, some of them are. I have very good grazing land, and very good breeding land, and I feed all I breed.

Mr. Thomas Hudson, called in; and Examined.

7289. Chairman.] Are you a Farmer and Grazier?—Yes.

7290. Where do you reside?—At Castleacre, in Norfolk.

7291. Are you in partnership with your father?—I am not in partnership, but we are farming in the same parish.

7292. What number of acres do you and your father occupy altogether?—Rather over 2,000.

7293. Is yours a sheep farm?—It is principally arable, but we graze bullocks and sheep in the winter months, with the turnips.

Mr. T. Hudson.

7294. Have you a large flock of sheep?—Not a very large breeding flock.

7295. You buy in, do you?—We buy in, as lambs, at this period of the year.

7296. Where do you buy principally?—Principally of the large flock masters in the county. Some come from the West of England, and some from Hampshire.

7297. Where do you buy your beasts?—Generally it has been at Norwich or Peterborough, at the large fairs. We have but a small quantity of grazing land, and we keep scarcely scarcely any beasts during the summer months; they are nearly all bought in the autumn of the year.

Mr. T. Hudson.

21 June 1866.

7298. Mr. Carnegie.] You do not breed?—Not at all. Large droves of beasts were brought, previously to the restrictions, from Scotland, Devonshire, and the north of England. A great quantity were brought from Ireland to Norwich Hill.

7299. Chairman.] You buy of any breed that will answer your purpose?—Of any breed, I think I may say, excepting foreign stock. We do not buy foreign stock.

7300. Have you suffered much from cattle plague in that part?—A great deal. We have not ourselves suffered much. My father has a small grazing farm of about 200 acres, near Lynn, where he had a slight outbreak of the disease. Further than that we have had nothing. It has been in our immediate locality, and some of our neighbours have suffered great loss by it.

7301. You heard the examination of the last witness?—I did.

7302. Do you agree with him in the matter?—I do not.

7303. What are the points on which you differ from him?—For my own part I prefer the competition of the London Market, I must say.

7304. You like sending up live animals?—I do; In fact I can prove that it is a dead loss to us to send the slaughtered stock up to London.

7305. In what way do you lose if you do that?—We have no market for the offal of the beast, and there is another thing; the railway company charges us nearly double freight upon a dead bullock, and the commission charged by the salesman in Newgate Market is higher.

7306. With regard to their being one market for the offal, is yours a thinly populated neighbourhood?—Very.

7307. Mr. Dent.] What are the labourers' wages?—The standard is about 11 s. now, but at this period the men principally are upon piece work, and earn from 15 s. to 18 s.

7308. Chairman.] Does the labouring population consume much meat?—Not a great deal.

7309. You think you would have great difficulty in disposing of the offal?—I am sure we should very great; I can instance it; We have killed several sheep this winter, and the offal has been obliged to come to London or at least a portion of the offal. Certain portions would not pay the carriage to get them to London, whereas if they were sent up alive the London butchers would have the opportunity of making something considerable of that offal; I allude to the tripe and the blood.

7310. Have you ever sent sides of beef up to London?—Yes; but not as a matter of trade. It has occurred thus: perhaps a beast has not been apparently doing quite well, and it has been killed and sent to London.

7311. During the stoppage of the railway movement of cattle, did you then kill and send to London?—We killed a few.

7312. You did not find it answer?—I found a dead loss of from 5 l. to 10 l. an animal; some of the beasts that were sent up in March really made nothing at all; and I can instance that on this small farm of my father's, where this outbreak of cattle plague took place, 23 of the animals, out of the 24, were killed; one animal was condemned by the inspector, and he advised my father to kill the rest of them, and 23 were killed and sent to London. Certainly, they were not fat beasts, but beasts kept in a store state that would be put on this grass land in May; they did not make above 2½ d. a lb. in the early part of March.

7313. But that was a forced sale?—Yes.

7314. When many people were doing the same thing?—Yes; there was a glut in the market at the time.

7315. What happened upon that particular occasion, would not be a rule as to what you would expect?—No; had those animals been kept, perhaps, six weeks longer, or had the outbreak occurred six weeks later, in all probability the animals would have made double what they did.

7316. The probability is, that there was a glut in Newgate-market at that time in consequence of other people sending up from fear of the cattle plague?—It is so; but then I allude to the other one losing from 5 l. to 10 l. I killed five beasts myself, and there was a great loss upon them; beasts which would have made 28 l. each, did not bring me home more than 21 l.

7317. When was that?—I think that was about the latter part of February.

7318. That was after the prohibition came into force?—It was; either the latter part of February, or the commencement of March.

7319. The prohibition as to moving cattle came into force on the 20th February and continued till the 16th April?—I know it was very soon after the prohibition.

7320. It was during that period?—It was during that period; and I am sure I can hardly say how we could manage with the killing of the sheep during the spring months. We send 300 or 400 sheep a week to London, I should think our returns have been about 7,000 sheep this spring; and it would have been an utter impossibility to have killed all those sheep.

7321. You could not have killed them on your own farm?—We could have killed them, but there would have been such a loss, we could not have got rid of the offals.

7322. What station do you send them from?—On the Great Eastern Railway from Swaffham station.

7323. Is there any demand for offal?—None.

7324. It is a small town?—Yes; of between 2,000 and 3,000 inhabitants.

7325. Did you hear Mr. Torr's evidence respecting the quarantining of foreign animals?—I agree with him there entirely that they should be quarantined.

7326. Do you agree with him that graziers would give a higher price for animals that had undergone quarantine?—Yes; I think they would; because they would not have the risk which they otherwise would have.

7327. What have you to say to this, that there would be a risk of animals catching disease under quarantine?—I should think they would be liable to it if a lot of diseased animals went into the quarantine ground.

7328. Would not the effect of quarantine be to make people very careful of what they sent over?—It would.

7329. They would not be likely to send a suspicious beast?—They would not; it would be a hard matter. As Mr. Torr says, these animals are collected by dealers abroad, and sold by dealers in large lots.

7330. They would take more care of them on the

the other side of the water?—I should hope they would.

7331. Is it not the case that in these ports, where the suspicion is great, they keep the animals on the other side of the water more; have you any experience of that?—Not for the last few years. Beasts used to be imported at Lowestoft, but we do not get them there now so much; they go to Harwich.

7332. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Would not the fat animals with foot and mouth disease taint the quarantine ground?—I think no more than the steamboat itself would be tainted.

7333. Chairman.] There is always a risk of their catching diseases on board the boats in which they come across?—Always.

7334. And at the landing-place; in fact wherever they come?—Yes.

7335. Have you much foot and mouth disease in Norfolk?—At the present time we are freer from it than we have been for years.

7336. To what should you attribute that?—I can hardly say; perhaps the prohibition of fairs may have a little to do with it. I know that at Norwich Hill, which is a very large fair, every week the ground was completely tainted with the disease.

7337. Nothing could go into the market without getting it?—Scarcely anything could.

7338. Do you think foot and mouth disease is such a disease that animals having it ought to be stopped at the port of landing?—No, I think not; they would have to remain too long.

7339. Do you think that they ought to allow animals with foot and mouth disease to pass the inspection?—I hardly know how I can answer the question. Sometimes this disease will only affect three beasts in a lot, and then the other ones might, perhaps, keep falling down with it for six weeks or two months.

7340. There is a difference in practice to what there used to be at the ports; formerly they used to stop the whole cargo, and now they only stop the animals which actually have got it; which do you think is the right course to adopt?—It would lead to serious inconvenience, and serious loss to the importer were they all to be stopped.

7341. You think the present course is a right one, to stop those which have actually got it, and let the others pass?—I think so; I do not see what else they could do.

7342. Supposing that you have a quarantine for foreign animals, would you let the animals pass out of quarantine until they were cured of the foot and mouth complaint?—I think the quarantine is more especially for the stoppage of the rinderpest than the foot and mouth disease.

7343. Do you think anything of it with regard to pleuro-pneumonia?—No; I think not.

7344. You wish to have a quarantine simply as a safeguard against a re-introduction from abroad of the rinderpest in case we should get rid of it here?—Yes.

7345. Would you confine the quarantine to animals coming from countries where they have the rinderpest, or would you apply it to all animals coming from all foreign countries?—I think, strictly to all.

7346. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Are you aware there are some countries where there has been no rinderpest, such as Sweeden, Denmark, and Spain?—Yes; I am perfectly well aware of it.

7347. Chairman.] You would like to see all foreign animals subjected to quarantine?—Yes, and the fat cattle slaughtered at the outport; I should say that only a certain number of ports ought to be allowed; I should limit the number of ports; I know that small cargoes are sent into small ports; for instance, into Yarmouth in our own county; where there are no means of supervision at all; the beasts are landed and driven through the country, spreading the disease in all quarters.

7348. You think, supposing you limited the import to certain ports you would have a more rigorous inspection?—I think so.

7349. You would limit it to those ports where they could have proper quarantine grounds?—Yes.

7350. With regard to the fat stock, you would wish to see all those slaughtered at the ports?—I should, decidedly.

7351. Would you not allow fat stock to me up to the London market?—I think not, for this reason, that the trucks, directly the beasts are unloaded at Tottenham or in Copenhagen Fields, are immediately sent down again, and the probabilities are, would be used for store cattle.

7352. Of what port are you now speaking?—Harwich.

7354. It has been proposed that they should be branded in such a way as would be unmistakeable, and should be allowed to go to Copenhagen Fields, but not allowed go out of the market again, except to the slaughter-house?—I think that has been very little safeguard during the last few months, because I know there have been beasts surreptitiously smuggled away from the Copenhagen market.

7355. Have they been taken to farms, or have they been taken to slaughter-houses?—They have been taken to slaughter-houses.

7356. In the country?—In the country.

7357. Do you mean that they have been driven or taken by rail?—Taken by rail.

7358. And you think that whatever regulation you had, it would be evaded?—I think it would; I think that the other would be the safer way; then they could not get away from the authorities.

7359. Do you know much of the Copenhagen Fields market; do you ever attend it?—Yes.

7360. Frequently?—Three or four times in the course of the year, when our animals are up in London.

7361. Do you think it would be a disadvantage to the trade that there should be a separation of the foreign and English cattle market?—No, I think not, and for this reason; the foreign stock, generally speaking, go to a different class of butchers to the English stock.

7362. You think that practically, there is very little competition between the two in the market?—I think there is not; I think a great many of the west-end butchers prefer killing the home-fed beasts.

7363. Does not the presence of a number of foreign animals in the market help to keep down the price of the English animals?—Of course it it has an influence, but Blackwall and Copenhagen-fields are so close, that there would not be that difference that there would be if the London butchers had to go to Hull, to Harwich, or Liverpool, or wherever the beasts might be landed.

Mr. T. Hudson. 21 June 1866.

7364. You think the presence of foreign animals at some port down the river in the neighbourhood of Blackwall or Woolwich would have the same effect on the price of the English market as if they were in the market itself?—I think it would, the same as Newgate and Leadenhall have on the live markets. If Newgate and Leadenhall are filled, the live markets are lowered in proportion.

7365. Mr. Graham.] I think your objections to bringing animals up from Harwich or similar stations is that the trucks would be infected?—Yes.

7366. And spread the disease to other animals?—Yes.

7367. Could not that be obviated by appropriating trucks solely to that purpose, and employing them in running between the market and the port, and doing nothing else?—It might, of course.

7368. If that were so, there would be no objection to bringing up live stock from Harwich and other places in trucks appropriated to the special trade?—The great Eastern has two lines of railway, one to Harwich, and the other the Cambridge line, as it is called. I do not think they would be very particular which way they sent their trucks.

7369. Supposing you had trucks painted in a particular way, and intended solely for that trade. Supposing the disinfection is not sufficient, would it not be possible to appropriate trucks to a trade of this sort?—It might be if the railway company would do it.

7370. They have trucks which they use for salt, and for nothing else, in the districts of Cheshire?—Yes; but many of those trucks belong to private individuals; I do not think they are company's trucks.

7371. Still that would obviate the objection to it?—That would obviate the objection, no doubt. Of course, a cargo of animals, if they have undergone inspection, would be allowed to pass out; and whether a train of animals, going through a large grazing district would communicate the disease, during the transit, to other animals in that district, I am not able to say.

7372. You mentioned, with reference to foot and mouth disease, that Norwich-hill had become so thoroughly impregnated with it as to affect the animals going into the market?—Yes.

7373. Was it not possible to disinfect the soil of that place?—I think not. It was not alone Norwich-hill, but the lairs in which the animals rested before they were taken into the market.

7374. It was not possible to disinfect that so as to prevent it?—I think not.

7375. Would it be possible to disinfect the quarantine ground in which you propose to store the foreign animals, or would they be liable to catch the foot and mouth disease?—They would not be so extensive as the lairs that are used in different places. One dealer has one lair, and another another, at different places, and these animals are all concentrated in one spot for sale.

7376. Do you think it would be the fact, that the quarantine ground could be so thoroughly disinfected as to obviate risk to the stock cattle that are shut up in them?—I should think not, with the foot and mouth disease. What it might be as to the rinderpest, I do not know.

7377. Your impression is, that we ought to quarantine animals, even coming from a country where no disease has prevailed?—My only desire in that respect would be to act in such a manner as that we might be safe. It is so difficult to determine where the disease does exist, or does not exist.

7379. As far as I know, there has been no disease in Portugal. I have never heard of rinderpest prevailing in Portugal. Do you think that animals coming from Portugal, where there is no suspicion of disease, should be quarantined?—That is very difficult to determine; but in my opinion, all foreign store stock should be quarantined. Until lately we knew of no disease in Ireland.

7380. But at the same time you would allow traffic in English stock, from counties which are not proclaimed as diseased?—Yes.

7381. Mr. Dent.] Yours is entirely winter feeding?—Yes.

7382. Both sheep and cattle?—Yes.

7383. I recollect you stated to me upon one occasion, that they all came up to London from Christmas to May?—Yes.

7384. And I think that is pretty much the same with the sheep?—It is so.

7385. Therefore your Norfolk supplies generally are very heavy at that particular time of the year, and not spread through the year generally?—Not in the west of Norfolk; in the east of Norfolk it is different.

7386. I mean, taking your own district?—That is so.

7387. With respect to the disposal of offal, I think you told us your labourers wages were 11 s. a week?—Yes.

7388. You would not be surprised to hear that in Lincolnshire the wages are about 15 s. per week?—No. I say that is the standard wage.

7389. The standard wage for an ordinary good labourer now, in Lincolnshire, is about 15 s.; I suppose you think they can afford to eat a little more meat than yours?—Perhaps so.

7390. Are many foreign cattle brought into Norfolk for feeding?—Yes, several.

7391. Those are cattle which are imported from Harwich generally, are they not?—Generally from Harwich.

7392. And generally sold at Norwich-hill?—Some at Norwich-hill and Fakenham, others at Dereham.

7393. Are there many Irish beasts brought into Norfolk for feeding?—Yes, a great many in the autumn.

7394. Do you not find, generally speaking, the Irish beasts are more or less affected with foot and mouth disease?—We used to consider them more affected with the lung disease than with foot and mouth disease.

7395. You do not think much of the foot and mouth disease, do you?—We do not.

7396. You scarcely ever buy a lot of animals which have been to fairs, but out of it some of them fall down with the foot and mouth disease?—Very frequently. The beasts bought at Peterborough, in the autumn or October, are almost sure to be so.

7397. Although it throws them back for a week or a fortnight, as a rule they come round?—They do if they all fall down at once, but if it keeps lingering on for five or six weeks it is tedious work.

7398. You would not like to see any restrictions whatever put upon the home trade?—Not any.

7399. You do not believe in the possibility of supplying the large towns satisfactorily, either to the farmers or graziers, with dead meat?—I must say, taking our own county as an instance, we could not do it; it would be a dead loss to ourselves.

7400. Chairman.] You could not do it without loss?—No.

7401. You do not mean that you could not supply them?—I do not say that it could not be done, but it could not be done without loss.

7402. Mr. Dent.] No trade can be satisfactorily carried on which is a losing one?—Certainly not.

7403. Therefore, if it was a loss to you to supply them, you would probably give up the supply of meat and turn your attention to something else?—Certainly.

7404. If it is a losing concern for the person who supplies the meat; it is not very likely that the supply will continue to the consumer?—I can assure you, the charges upon our live animals are 19 s., including the sale and the market expenses in Copenhagen-fields, and on animals of the same weight, dead, it costs from 35 s. to 38 s.

7405. Putting aside the mere railroad charges, as I understand you, there would be a loss of 5 l. or 6 l. on your fat beasts?—We have no competition in the sale of our skins. They make a great deal more money, in London, of the fat and other things.

7406. You believe that there would not only be the difficulty in the supply of meat to the consumers, in the large towns, but that there would be a great loss to the grazier if there were restrictions put upon the trade of animals fed in England?—I do.

7407. Do not you think that if there were these restrictions put upon the trade in foreign cattle, there would be a great check to the importation of foreign stock?—To diseased animals I believe there would.

7408. Do you not think there would be a check generally. There must always be a risk of disease in the removing of cattle. Do you not think there would be a check in this way?—I think not. If they find that England is their best market, it does not matter what restrictions are put upon them; they will send them to England.

7409. As I understand you, if there were restrictions put upon your own stock, you consider it would eventuate in a very great difference of price?—Yes.

7410. If these restrictions were also to be put on foreign stock, would it not make such a difference in price as to considerably deter an importer from sending foreign stock?—It might in the first instance.

7411. You think they can produce their stock so much cheaper than we can in England?—I do. It only shows that the store cattle of about the same weight as our own will b stout 3 l. to 4 l. less per head, as to the foreig[n] ock, than the English store stock are.

7412. When they come to England?—When they come to England.

7413. As a rule, the consumer does not find it an advantage to buy those, as against the English stock?—Some farmers do. Some farmers say they prefer them. I know some men who graze a great many of them. Take the instance of the person who imported the rinderpest first into Norfolk, Mr. Stephen Leeds, of Whitwell. He bought them in London, at the Copenhagen market, and took them down into the country.

7414. Were they for winter feeding, or for grazing?—For winter feeding.

7416. I understand you that lean foreign cattle, of equal size and weight, could be bought at 2 l. or 3 l. per head cheaper than English store beasts of the same size?—Yes.

7417. As a rule, the English farmers do not buy them?—No, they do not. Our own county is an exception. There are a great quantity of farmers in the county of Norfolk who, previously to the outbreak of the rinderpest, bought foreign cattle. I do not like them myself.

7418. Mr. Graham.] In answer to a question of the Honourable Chairman, I think you said the effect of the quarantine regulations, would be to make people very careful when they send; in other words, they would send fewer, and some that they send now, they would not send?—I think that would be so; there would not be that risk of sending the diseased animals.

7419. That would limit the quantity?—I do not think it would limit the quantity of sound animals at all.

7420. But it would limit the total quantity sent; if they were more careful what they sent, they would send fewer?—Perhaps they would, if the animals were in a diseased state, but if the animals were perfectly sound it would not limit it at all.

7421. Would they not be deterred from sending animals they were quite sure about, but which otherwise would have come?—Yes, I think it might influence them in that way.

7422. You said the experiment of dealing with dead meat in the London market was such as to deter their recommending that system; as the growers of meat, if I may use that expression?—Yes.

7423. The foreign importer who sends his meat to the London market from Harwich and Hull, would be subject to the same expenses as you are?—But I hardly think so, for I think the large large carcass butchers would know exactly when a cargo of beasts arrived, and they would go down, and purchase the beasts at the landing stage, and have them killed there themselves.

Mr. T. Hudson.
21 June 1866.

7424. The butcher would make arrangements to relieve the foreign importer from these extra expenses?—I think a great quantity of these carcass butchers would go down to Harwich instead of going to Copenhagen-fields, they would go to Harwich or Hull, and buy their 30, 40, or 50 head of cattle, and have them killed there at once.

7425. Chairman.] They probably would employ an agent to make purchases for them?—Probably they would.

7426. Mr. Graham.] That would not relieve you from sending this dead meat, and having these expenses; it would only be the foreigner who would escape that?—Yes.

7427. I do not see why the traffic in your dead meat should entail expenses on you which a traffic in dead meat should not entail on the foreign importer?—I can only say the charges are about double.

7428. They are about double to you that they would be to the other men?—It is just this, that the meat is killed and must go, and the railway company charge just as much as they like.

7429. Would they not charge the foreign importers from Hull or Harwich just as much as they would charge you?—No; I think probably they would be able to get a special rate.

7430. The importer of foreign meat at Hull or Harwich would be subject to those expenses that you complain of, as preventing you from submitting to a system of that kind, unless some special arrangements are made which do not now exist?—I think it would become such a matter of trade that as I said before they would give a special rate, probably for the carriage of those animals.

7431. At present the loss by sending a dead animal from your county to London is 2 l. or 3 l., and I suppose the same loss by sending a dead animal from Hull to London?—I should say so; I can only speak for my own district.

7432. Your impression is, that the disease is owing to the importation of the foreign cattle?—I have every reason to believe so.

7433. Do you attribute the disease in Ireland to the importation of foreign cattle there?—No, I think there are various ways in which it might have been communicated as well as by foreign cattle.

7434. And yet you would not stop the traffic in English cattle, which may be supposed to have communicated the disease to Ireland, although you would stop the traffic in foreign cattle?—I do not think it would be communicated by animals there; I think it would be more probably communicated by drovers or some one of that description. I think it would be more likely to be conveyed to Ireland in that way.

7435. Then you would allow English cattle to be imported into Ireland still?—Yes, I think so; I think there are very few——

7436. You would not allow the foreign cattle to go into Ireland, although you have no reason to suppose that the disease was taken there by foreign cattle?—Pardon me; I think there are other means of communicating the disease.

7437. It has got there without foreign cattle, and yet you would propose that foreign cattle should be prohibited from going into Ireland, although you would allow the English cattle to do so?—I do not think they would require the foreign cattle there.

7438. Suppose a man wanted them for his farm there?—Then let them perform the quarantine in Ireland, the same as they have in England.

7439. Mr. Dent.] You would not advocate the exportation of English cattle to Ireland, while the disease is existing in England?—I think not.

7440. Chairman.] As a matter of fact, there is no exportation from England to Ireland, except it may be in the case of a bull of valuable breed?—No, I think not.

7441. Mr. Dent.] Since the disease broke out in England, there has not been a beast exported from England to Ireland, either a bull or anything else?—I think not.

7442. Mr. Graham.] Then if the disease exists in Ireland, it exists there without any importation either of foreign or English cattle?—I cannot speak exactly as to that; I think it was communicated by contact with people who had taken it there in their clothes.

7443. Mr. Carnegie.] Is the prejudice against grazing foreign cattle at all attributable to the idea that they fat slower than English cattle?—In a measure perhaps, and also that they are more subject to disease. I have known whole yards that have been taken off by pleuro pneumonia, and every bullock has died; in all probability, that has been communicated by their being put down the hold of the vessel and packed in for several hours; then put on a railway and whisked through the cold air, and taken a violent cold, which terminated in lung disease.

7444. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Did you ever hear that the foreign animals, after their arrival in England, take some time to recover from the effects of the change of the climate and diet, and, therefore, as the Honourable Member just stated, do not fat so quickly?—I have not noticed that fact, but I have seen animals that have been recently imported, apparently doing well where the animals have been healthy; they have done as well as other store animals.

7445. Mr. Carnegie.] Are you aware of the fact, that a large extent of dead meat trade is from the north of Scotland?—Yes; perfectly.

7446. Do you not think it would be quite as easy for railway companies to make arrangements for the transit of dead meat from Hull and Harwich to London, as it is from Aberdeen?—From Hull, perhaps, they might, where there would be a market for the offal; but if you take our quarter of the kingdom, being almost isolated from the large towns, we have no means of getting rid of it.

7447. At Harwich, would there be no means of getting rid of the offal?—At Harwich, there might be, perhaps. It could be taken to London, or some portion of it. There is some portion which the butcher makes a considerable profit on in London, which would not bear the carriage.

7448. Sir Matthew Ridley.] Have you found that the price of store stock has been higher in your county this spring?—We have had very little trade in store stock this spring; in fact, none at all. Our markets have been nearly closed.

7449. Have you (to use rather a common expression) expression) gone in more upon sheep?—Yes; entirely, I may say.

7450. Have you any of those small markets in your neighbourhood that were alluded to by Mr. Torr?—Yes; we have.

7451. Do you agree with him in thinking them objectionable?—Quite the contrary.

7452. You think them of advantage to local graziers?—I do, decidedly.

7453. And that they meet a fair market, and make, as a rule, good prices where there is an opening, both for the vendor and the buyer?—I can only instance the small town of Dereham, in our county, which is in the centre of a considerable winter grazing district. I know the butchers and dealers from Manchester and Yorkshire come down there weekly to purchase the fat cattle from that market.

7454. What is the number of head of beasts that may be seen in Dereham Market in any one week; 500 head?—No; I should say from 150 to 300.

7455. I am alluding to the fat cattle at this moment; are there 200 head?—Perhaps 200 on the average.

7456. Are the prices there as good as they would be at Norwich Market?—They are not sent in in very large quantities in that district; a small farmer may send in five animals there and find a market for them, which market is close by his home, without entailing expenses.

7457. You think, in point of fact, if these small local markets were stopped it would be disadvantageous; that they are an advantage to the districts in which they are situated, and likewise to the jobbers and buyers in distant towns such as Manchester?—I do; at any rate they come to these markets.

7458. You do send yourself to Dereham Market?—No, not much; mine principally go to London; in fact, almost everything both of my father's and my own go to London, except that during this year we have sent some to Retford. Mr. T. Hudson. 21 June 1866.

7459. Do you agree with Mr. Torr, that trade would spring up in the country, and, generally, through the country, if these cattle markets were dropped and superseded by means of agents going through the country and buying on the farm, and of the farmers themselves, by which an extensive business might be done; do you think that that would spring up?—It is done so in a great measure in our own county, at the present time, by dealers.

7460. Do you think that the abolition of these markets would tend to create that sort of business and give it a stimulus and establish it as a matter of fact?—The only thing, I think, is, that it produces a competition which, I think, is required in business, whereas a man previously would have been solely dependent upon the dealing man in his own neighbourhood; by taking them to the market, he gets the advantage of acting with the distant buyer instead of acting with the man I have mentioned, who, up to this time, has stepped in as a middle man.

7461. I am aware you frequently consign animals to the West-end butchers; do you still consign them alive?—No; ours are all consigned to salesmen in Copenhagen-fields.

7462. It is not your habit to consign the dead meat carcasses to butchers?—No; if it is done it is done to a salesman in Newgate Market, and not to a butcher.

Mr. Joseph Druce, called in: and Examined.

7463. Chairman.] You are a large occupier of land at Eyrsham, in Oxfordshire?—Yes, about 800 acres. Mr. J. Druce.

7464. Do you breed or graze?—I breed and graze also.

7465. Do you work oxen on your farm?—I do not now.

7466. You used to do so?—Yes, before steam cultivation came in.

7467. You breed the cross between the Downs and Cotswolds?—Yes, they are now called the "Oxford Downs."

7468. You consider that you have established that breed?—Yes, my father started it about 30 years ago.

7469. You have heard the evidence of the last two witnesses?—Yes.

7470. Perhaps you will tell us the points upon which you agree, and the points on which you differ, with those gentlemen. With regard to the quarantining of foreign animals, do you agree with them that all foreign animals should be subjected to quarantine or killed at the port?—I think so; the whole of them.

7471. Do you think that fat animals imported from abroad should be allowed to go into the Metropolitan Market?—Yes; I should allow them to go into the Metropolitan Market.

7472. You would allow the fat animals landed at the port of London to go there?—Yes.

7473. Would you allow those which were landed at other ports, say Harwich for instance, to go into the London market?—I should have given localities for them to land; stated ports.

7474. As to those that were landed at other ports than London, would you allow them to go by rail to the Metropolitan Market?—No; only those that come to the port of London.

7475. With regard to the home-fed animals in the London market, would you allow them to leave the London market and to go into the provincial markets?—I do not see any objection to it.

7476. Do you agree with the last witness that you would not stop animals that come in the same vessel with some that had foot and mouth disease?—I should only stop those that showed signs of the disease.

7477. With regard to the dead meat supply to London and other great towns, do you think it would be advantageous to the feeders of cattle or otherwise to send up dead meat, instead of live animals, to London?—It would not be at all advantageous to send it up dead.

7478. Upon what ground do you say that?—We should not make so much of our produce.

7479. That depends very much upon the locality in which the animals are fed, does it not?—To some extent it does.

7480. Supposing you were in a neighbourhood where you could get a ready sale for all parts of the offal, I suppose then it might be worth your while to send the carcases and sides of a beast to London?—Yes.

Mr. J. Druce.

21 June 1866.

7481. But in the neighbourhood where there is no sale for offal, you would lose?—Exactly so.

7482. You have not sufficient population in your immediate neighbourhood to find a sale for any quantity of offal?—No; but lately we have had a local demand in Oxfordshire. It has increased very much; 30 years ago we started a market once a month, and now it is once a fortnight.

7483. That is a market for live stock?—Yes.

7484. Do you think it would be worth your while to kill at Oxford, or to sell to other persons to kill at Oxford for the purpose of the carcases being sent to London?—I think not; I do not think there is a sufficient demand for the offal to make the best of it.

7485. Do you agree with Mr. Torr, that you could sell as advantageously to agents as you could by sending into the market?—Not quite, I think.

7486. You want the competition of the buyers?—I think so; I prefer the competition.

7487. Are you acquainted with any of the ports where the vessels land?—I am not.

7488. Have you any suggestions to make as to the treatment of animals in railway trucks?—No. I have none; it is so difficult. They crowd them so thickly in the trucks that it is very difficult to give them water, or else it would be very desirable to let them have water in their transit.

7489. Do you think they could be watered without untrucking them?—I think not.

7490. Suppose a pail could be lowered into the truck, would they drink out of it?—I do not think they would.

7491. Mr. Carnegie.] Have you seen any of these trucks with folding troughs, a plan which has been suggested for giving water to the cattle?—I have not.

7492. Are you constantly sending animals up?—Not very often to London; we have a local trade.

7493. You think that the animals would not drink in the trucks?—I believe that they would not.

7494. You think they would hustle one another to get at the water, so that no animal would be able to get his head down to the trough?—Just so; I should think it would be difficult.

7495. You have not considered any special arrangement for giving them water?—I have not.

7496. You think it would be a bad thing for the animals to be packed 30 or 40 hours in a truck without being watered?—Yes.

7497. The meat of the animals which have undergone such treatment as that, would not be so good?—Exactly, they would be very much damaged by it.

7498. Mr. Graham.] You expressed your disapproval of allowing any other port except London to supply the London market with live cattle, what is the objection—what is the objection to bring live cattle from Harwich to London for instance?—Perhaps you would import the cattle disease.

7499. In what way?—By the cattle themselves.

7500. How would the disease be communicated, by the trucks, or by the air, or what manner?—By the trucks.

7501. Supposing a service of trucks be appropriated solely to the purpose of the traffic; what objection would there then be to the importation of live cattle from Harwich to London?—If you could depend upon it there would be no objection.

7502. Do you feel a very decided disadvantage in sending dead meat to London, as compared with live meat?—Yes.

7503. Is that in connection with the loss of the offal, or in connection with the enhanced expenses in London?—It is in connection with the expenses, as well as the offal; it is the transit altogether.

7504. So if you obliged the foreigner to kill his meat and send it dead to London, while you are allowed to send yours alive to London, you give the English importer into London an advantage over the foreigner, to that extent?—To that extent you do.

7505. You disapprove of selling without the competition of a public market; it answers your purpose best to have the competition of a public market?—I approve of the competition of a public market.

7506. Of course the wider the supply to the market, the larger the competition will be; the greater number of buyers the more would be the competition?—Yes.

7508. It would answer his purpose better if it was sent to the market on the same terms as you would send it?—Yes.

7509. Mr. Dent.] Do you get any foreign cattle at all in Oxfordshire?—No.

7510. You would not like any restriction to be placed on the home trade, supposing the county to be free from disease?—I do not see any object in it.

7511. Sir Matthew Ridley.] What is the rate of wages in your part of the country?—From 11 s. to 15 s. per week.

7512. Are many men at piece-work?—Yes.

7513. Is there a general consumption of animal food, or to some extent?—Yes; I think the men live much better than they did. There is more animal food consumed than there used to be.

7514. Has there been an advance in the rate of agricultural wages in your district within the last 12 months or two years?—A slight advance I should say.

7515. Do you ever consign dead meat to London?—I have done so in the spring.

7516. What do you think of that mode of conducting business?—I have a great objection to it.

7517. What is your objection?—We never realise so much as if we were selling at home, and selling alive.

7518. Do you mean that the railway charges, or the salesman's commission, diminish the profits?—The salesman's commission and the railway charges together do so.

7519. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Do you sell by auction?—I do not, but there are a few farmers who do sell by auction.

7520. Sir Matthew Ridley.] Do you agree with Mr. Torr, that meat home-killed and stiffened at your place, will keep longer than the sheep taken to London in a truck, and then taken from the truck to the butchers to be killed?—I should think it would.

7521. At any season of the year?—No; perhaps more in the winter than in the summer.

7522. Chairman.] You know that they find it answer to send meat from Aberdeen to London, I suppose?—Yes; and that they have special trains for the purpose, at night, and special rates.

7523. Is it not the case that where the trade is sufficiently extensive to insure getting special rates there, it answers?—Yes, and I believe the railway companies find it to their advantage to put on special trains. For instance, in bringing milk up to London on the Great Western from our place, they have special trains for the purpose.

7524. It depends on the amount of traffic?—Exactly.

7525. If you were able to supply one carcase butcher in London yourself, and to get special rates, it might be worth their while to do so?—Yes.

7526. But it would not be worth while to do so unless you can supply a certain quantity of beasts, and can secure an advantage from the railway company in the way of special rates?—Exactly so.

7527. Mr. Carnegie.] I want to refer for a moment to a question that was put to you by the honourable Member for Glasgow with regard to the service of special trucks. Do you not think that even, although there were special trucks for foreign cattle, there would still be some risk, owing to the stoppage at the different stations?—I think so.

7528. But the result would not be entirely obviated by having the service of special trucks?—No; hardly, I should think.

7529. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Do you think that fairs and markets tend to spread the disease, if there is any, in the country?—Yes, we have had experience of that in Oxfordshire. They brought some foreign cattle down, and the disease spread into the whole of the neighbourhood. We have not got rid of it yet.

Mr. J. Druce.
21 June 1866.

7530. Do you think that wherever there is disease in the country it is desirable, in order to prevent the spreading of the minor diseases, such as foot-and-mouth and pleuro-pneumonia, that there should be no more fairs and markets?—Not at all.

7531. Would it not be desirable to limit their number, do you think?—I think not.

7532. Chairman.] Is it the case with you, as in Norfolk, that there is less foot-and-mouth disease now than there is usually in the country?—Yes, much less.

7533. Do you attribute that to the stoppage of fairs and markets and the restrictions upon traffic?—No, I should think not. I think the cattle are more healthy; people are more particular to keep them well, and guard them against any disorders.

7534. I suppose there has been less movement of cattle than usual?—Yes.

7535. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Do you think that while the rinderpest exists no other disease takes a prominent form?—With us in Oxfordshire it is the case.

7536. You think the rinderpest monopolises all other diseases?—Yes, I think so.

Mr. William Fair, called in; and Examined.

7537. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] You are a dealer in cattle and a grazier also?—Yes.

7538. Do you deal principally in fat or store cattle?—In store animals.

7539. Mr. Dent.] From what part do you come?—From Cheshire; near Manchester.

7540. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Where do you get your store animals?—I have been in the habit for many years of buying my store beasts in Scotland.

7541. Do you supply the dairy districts of Cheshire with animals?—I did 12 months ago supply them with a great number of cattle.

7542. You have heard the previous witnesses?—Yes.

7543. Do you agree with Mr. Torr, that the fat cattle should be slaughtered at the ports?—I do not; certainly not; I think it is utterly impracticable; I think they should not be slaughtered at the ports.

7545. Supposing they came to the Manchester market, would you allow them to be branded there, and sent into the surrounding districts, and slaughtered within a certain number of days?—Yes; I would.

Mr. W. Fair.

7546. Is the Manchester market a fat-stock market?—There were two markets. The store market does not now exist, but there was a store market and a fat market.

7547. Together?—No.

7548. In what district?—One was in Salford, and the other in Manchester.

7549. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] I am now speaking of the fat-stock market. You think that the surrounding districts would be supplied in this way?—The surrounding towns could be supplied in that way, but I think the surrounding towns in the neighbourhood of Manchester ought to have the privilege of taking the cattle home.

7550. In the same way as Stockport, Bolton, or Macclesfield would have the same privilege?—Yes; Northwich or Warrington, within a limited distance. Within my own immediate neighbourhood the butchers, and I may say the poor people, suffer a great deal from it for this reason.

7551. From the present state of the trade?—From the present state of the trade. The butcher goes on Tuesday to the Manchester market to buy his beef and mutton; he is bound to carry it home there. He comes home again, and sends his man the next day to kill it, and the following day he has to send his cart over for it. Take Knutsford, for instance. Knutsford is 17 miles from Manchester by rail; go which way you will it is 17 miles, and Northwich is a little further. The butcher has 34 miles to go to buy the beef and mutton, the next day he sends his man 34 miles to kill it, and the next day he sends his cart 34 miles to cart it home.

Mr. W. Fair.

7553. You would want the poor people in the several manufacturing towns about Manchester to have the same privilege?—Yes, I only take Knutsford as an instance.

7554. Mr. Dent.] I suppose in these small towns they have no live market?—No.

7555. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Are you in favour of quarantining the foreign store animals?—I do not see the advantage of quarantining foreign animals coming from a country where there is no disease existing. Certainly, as to quarantining where they come from an infected district, I should do so; but from such places as Spain and Portugal, where no disease exists, I do not see the advantages to be derived from quarantining those cattle at all.

7557. Chairman.] I suppose that was under the temporary regulations, which temporary regulations created a disturbance in the trade?—There was too much of the meat come to be sold.

7558. But I ask you whether that was not the cause of it?—It was.

7559. They were new and temporary regulations, and they greatly disturbed the trade?—Certainly; they were new regulations. More beasts come to the market than could be sold.

7560. Exactly so; that is to say, people did not know what the demand would be, and they rather overdid it?—They knew what the market demand was. They sent too much of it, and when the beasts were killed the meat was obliged to be sold at a great reduction, but if the beasts had gone alive they might have kept them, and killed them as they wanted them, within four or five days.

7561. But supposing this had been a regular thing, and the senders knew exactly what the demand would have been, you would have had an over supply?—It existed during the whole of the time during the stoppage of the trade.

7562. Till when?—Till the market was open again.

7563. From the 20th February to the 16th April?—I have not the date of it, but I know it existed till the markets were opened; there was a great quantity of beef. I heard a salesman one day, in Manchester, say, he sold some bodies of beef at 7 d. a pound, some part at 3¾ d. a pound, all part of the same beast which had been perhaps lying about the slaughter-house for four or five days.

7564. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Has not the average price of meat in Manchester been just the same?—To the consumer it has; but it was bought a great deal cheaper; by the butcher, during the time of the dead-meat market.

7565. Then the dead-meat market was an advantage?—It was to the butcher, but it was a very great disadvantage to the farmer. I have no hesitation in saying that some of the big beasts, which were worth from 28 l. to 30 l. a piece, would lose 10 l. each.

7566. Mr. Dent.] Was not great slaughtering going on on account of the cattle plague, and from fear of it?—The greatest slaughter was from fear of what the cattle plague would be in October and November.

7567. Chairman.] If you say the butcher got an advantage by the dead-meat market and the farmers did not, how do you account for all the butchers coming here and complaining of this state of things?—I suppose there have been several deputations here from Manchester. The butchers could not get the meat to send it in a fat state to the customer.

7568. You say the butchers bought cheap, that they did not lower the price to the customers, and that the farmers lost?—Yes. Even as to the beasts they bought themselves, before they had it in their own shops 12, 14, or 15 hours, it became not fit to serve out to their customers in consequence of being shaken so. I know several instances of that, both in beef and mutton.

7569. You mean that they bought cheap, and the meat was spoilt?—Yes, and they had a greater risk, and the consumer got no benefit by it, and the expenses were trebled.

7570. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.] Has the western market been well supplied lately. We have heard that Leeds has been very badly supplied, indeed, during the last few months?—The Manchester Market has been very much better supplied since the cattle trade opened again.

7571. Has that been from the Irish beasts coming in principally, or from what part?—There are a great number of beasts come out of the north of England, from Scotland, from Fifeshire and other counties, and another large proportion come out of Shropshire and Herefordshire; there have been some few beasts out of the south, the principal supply has been from Shropshire; Herefordshire, and from the north of Aberdeenshire, Fifeshire, and so on.

7572. Do you think the rinderpest has been propagated at all by the cattle travelling by rail through Cheshire?—I do not.

7573. What is the price of young stock now; is it very high in Cheshire?—Of course the price is nominal, we have no price in Cheshire.

7574. Nobody is buying any young stock?—No; I think we can buy a great deal cheaper in Wales. I have a firm in Wales, and we can buy our beasts cheaper in Wales now than we could last year; the consequence is that people buy in fear in Cheshire, and there has not been the trade trade for them in the south of England that there was in former years.

7575. Have you bought any of the young stock out of Ireland?—I have not.

7576. You do not know whether many have been sent into Cheshire?—No. I hear that Ireland is very full of beasts, and that beasts have been bought cheap there. I know from a friend of mine who very often goes there that the country is very full of beasts.

7578. Sir Matthew Ridley.] They are not buying store stock in Cheshire now?—They are not; our county is declared an infected district, as you are aware, and we dare not go to the market.

7579. Mr. Graham.] There was a great disturbance of the trade in meat in Manchester during the period of which you speak?—There was; there was an influx of it, in fact.

7580. And the losses that you spoke of arose from a good deal of the meat being spoilt?—It was not exactly spoilt, but it was obliged to be sold at a reduced price, or it might have spoilt.

7581. You say that the butchers lost by it?—I mean to contend that the consumer did not reap any benefit, and that the farmers were a great deal worse off. There was so much of the meat spoilt that the butcher bought it so much the cheaper, having so much more risk in his meat spoiling.

7582. You think it was a waste of meat?—Yes.

7583. Is it your experience that that would be the general effect of consigning it to the dead-meat market?—I feel confident it would in the summer months. The meat markets would answer very well in the winter months. Take the case of a butcher going to market to buy lambs in the hot months of July and August; they have enough to do to keep it sweet when they kill it every day, and can scarcely then do so.

7584. You think it would be a decidedly bad economy in meat?—I contend it would be impracticable altogether; and I think it has been so viewed by the trade in general round Manchester, which is, of course, a great consuming district.

7585. You do not believe that the rinderpest was propagated by beasts travelling by rail in your district?—Not through Cheshire.

7586. So that you see no danger in transporting beasts from such ports as Harwich to be killed in the London market?—Not a bit of it; the nearest place to me where the rinderpest first broke out in Cheshire was five or six miles away, and the nearest place to which we could trace the disease at the time was very nearly 20 miles.

7587. Are you acquainted with the foreign trade?—Not particularly acquainted; I know a little of the foreign trade, being intimately acquainted with the Manchester market; we have a great quantity both of sheep and cattle coming from Hull to Manchester.

7588. Do you deal in foreign beasts?—No, I do not.

7589. But you know something of them?—Yes; I am a good deal connected with them.

7590. Is it your opinion that the establishment of a quarantine for all foreign cattle would check the foreign trade to any extent?—It would certainly check the foreign trade very much indeed.

7591. Would the regulation of obliging the foreign trade to kill at the ports of import have any tendency to limit the foreign trade; would it be an advantage to the foreigner to kill them at the port?—I think they would reap the same advantage as we should in our own country, a decided loss.

7592. The tendency of that would be to raise the price to the consumer?—No doubt of it; the risk and expense is so much more.

7593. Anything that raises the price of foreign meat to the consumer is an advantage to the producer of meat; it raises the value of his produce?—I do not think it does; there are two classes of meat; our best beef which goes to the best butchers at home, and the other beef that goes to the lower class, the mill workers and so on, and which sold at a much less price in the first place; when it is bought at market it is bought at 1*d.* per pound less.

7594. But if this supply of foreign meat is restricted, would not that enhance the price of home meat, and give the cattle producer a higher price for his produce?—Certainly it would; but I do not see the advantage that would arise from stopping the foreigner having his beast examined at the Port of London, and sent by rail to Manchester with the slaughter mark.

7595. Mr. Dent.] You would not propose to leave the foreign trade entirely open without any restrictions?—I would submit to an inspection.

7596. And when submitted to an inspection, you would not allow those beasts to be taken from the market and sent to the country?—No; they must be branded with a slaughter mark.

7597. And should be branded within a certain time of their exhibition in the market?—Within 38 hours, or two days.

7598. That you would not apply so stringently to Spain and Portugal, where there is no disease?—No. There must be a line drawn there; that is what I say; allow those countries to come.

7599. You would apply it to Germany, where the disease is known to exist?—Yes.

7600. How would you treat store cattle coming from Germany and from Holland; milk cows, for instance?—I should certainly subject them to a very close inspection; and if there was any disease existing, I would not allow them to be removed.

7601. But supposing them to come and pass an inspection at the port, would you allow them to go from that port without any quarantine?—Where the disease exists, I would not allow any cattle to leave the place after an inspection in the foreign ports where the disease is; I would not allow any cattle to leave the place where they were landed, unless they went under inspection, and were pronounced clear of cattle plague, and then only subject to their being branded with the slaughter mark.

7601* Then you would stop the importation of foreign store cattle altogether?—Where the disease exists.

Mr. W. Fair.

21 June 1866.

7603. You would be inclined to keep them in quarantine for six weeks?—Yes; and if they left at all, they should be branded with the slaughter mark.

7604. Being branded with a slaughter mark, you would allow them to go to Leeds, Manchester, and Bradford?—Oh yes.

7605. But not to go to those markets where they would be exhibited?—Wherever they are exhibited at a market, let them be exhibited only once, and then slaughtered within so many days.

7606. Have you ever turned your attention to separating the fat market from the store market, both as to English and foreign cattle?—That is a good deal done now already in our country. Take Manchester and Liverpool; it is separated there. Take Shrewsbury; it is separated there.

7607. In the Shrewsbury market, are the fat cattle brought in on one day, and the store cattle on another?—The store cattle market begins about four o'clock in the morning; then it is all over, and the fat cattle come in and are sold by auction about 11 or 12.

7608. In that part there are auction sales of fat cattle?—They are pretty nearly all sold by auction.

7609. You think it would be almost impossible to supply the manufacturing districts with foreign cattle slaughtered at the port of landing?—I do think it would be impossible.

Mr. William Lindsey, called in; and Examined.

Mr. W. Lindsey.

7610. Lord Naas.] I believe you are Provost of Leith?—I am.

7611. How long have you been provost of Leith?—This is the sixth year.

7612. I suppose, from your official position, you are very well acquainted with the regulations affecting the importation of foreign cattle to the port of Leith?—I think I am.

7614. Will you state where the first inspection is conducted by the first officer?—The first officer goes on board the ship, and makes his inspection. Then, if he passes the cattle, the cattle are landed, and after they are fairly out of the Government inspector's hands, it is the duty of the town inspector to take charge of them. As showing their respective duties, I may state that a lot of sheep arrived on board one of the ships at Leith, and they were passed by the Government inspector; the town inspector found fault, and said that although they had no contagious disease, yet they were so emaciated that he could not allow them to go into the market or to go out of his sight, and he asked the people in charge where they were to take them; the people declined to answer, and he said, "Then I will not allow them to go out of my sight, and I will get a policeman to watch." The men were obliged to take the sheep to the public slaughterhouse, and when they were taken there they were killed and the carcases condemned. The town inspector then said, "If you are not satisfied with this condemnation, we are quite willing to have a formal inspection brought to bear upon them;" but the parties accepted the condemnation, and they were destroyed and prevented from going into the market for consumption.

7615. When did that happen?—Very recently; not above a month ago.

7617. When you speak of the importers, do you speak of the persons who consign the cattle from foreign ports?—I mean the persons on this side who receive the cattle. I think the best of them require to be looked after—the very best. They may have an interest, either for the parties on this side or for the parties abroad, to make good sales and to turn the cattle, in whatever state they are, into money.

7618. Are there great numbers of foreign cattle imported in Leith?—Large numbers.

7619. Is it an increasing trade?—A rapidly increasing trade.

7620. Where do they generally come from?——From Hamburgh, Rotterdam, and Copenhagen; from ports of the Continent generally. I think it is very desirable that some better arrangement should be made for the reception of the cattle when they do arrive at the port.

7621. Would you propose that, after the inspection has been carried on on board, something in the shape of a quarantine should be established, where these animals could be kept for a limited time after being landed?—If you are to have any regulation for fear of the cattle plague, I think the existing system is the best that can be devised. They arrive, and they must be cleared cleared out of the spot within a limited time. I think it is very desirable, when cattle come from sea, that they should be well treated; they should be watered, and allowed to rest; but if there is any dread of spreading the cattle disease, the safest thing for the public is to slaughter them on the spot.

7622. Can any animal be transmitted into the interior now from Leith under the existing regulations?—They cannot.

7623. They must be all slaughtered?—Yes, within a given time.

7624. Under the Orders in Council?—Yes.

7625. Do you think it is desirable to make that a permanent arrangement?—So long as there is any fear of spreading the cattle disease, I think it is necessary to keep that a permanent regulation. I do not think that any precaution you can take in sending the cattle from the port of disembarkation will be attended to. You might nominate and appoint drovers and licensed men, who will take care that the orders are attended to; but it does not answer to have a divided responsibility. If there is any fear of spreading the cattle plague at all, it is better to have them under one authority, and see the cattle destroyed.

7626. You think that, even if these cattle were branded at Leith, and marked for immediate slaughter at Glasgow and other places, you could hardly depend upon the slaughtering order being carried out at the place of arrival?—I have the greatest fears in that respect; the people to whom you intrust these cattle you really cannot depend upon; as to the very best of the importers, you see what they do for the sake of money.

7627. Is there a large trade from Leith to the interior in dead meat?—Yes, there is; a very large one at Leith.

7628. I mean in dead meat?—In carcases, there is a great trade carried on at the slaughter-houses.

7629. Where does this meat generally go to?—I am not able to speak to that, but a considerable portion of it goes to Edinburgh.

7631. Where are the animals sold now?—They are first sold privately at the port.

7633. Are they subject to those general market regulations which I suppose exist in the town of Leith?—There is no market regulation; there is no market there; but the local authorities feel that this a comparatively new trade, and if they were to be assured there was to be a permanent trade, they would more readily make arrangements and accommodation for its being carried on.

7634. There is nothing in the existing state of the law which would offer any impediment to the local authorities or private parties, as to establishing a market at Leith, if they liked?—I do not think we are at liberty to establish a market at Leith.

7635. Is there no local Act?—Yes; we have powers to establish markets generally under the local Act; I do not know that we could open a market at Leith under the present regulations of the Board of Trade.

7636. I suppose there would be no difficulty in obtaining a private Act of Parliament for the purpose, if necessary?—No; but that is expensive; we have power given now to establish markets for general purposes, and I daresay we could establish a market if the Orders in Council did not prevent us.

7637. There is no recommendation that you wish to offer to the Committee on that point?—I think it would be as well to authorise markets, and give the power to the local authorities to establish markets in the way I have stated.

7639. Is there a large cattle market at Edinburgh?—Very large; it is a very old-established market for the cattle trade.

7640. Under the existing regulations, therefore, cattle which stand in the Edinburgh market cannot be transmitted alive from Edinburgh?—No.

7642. Still it would hardly be possible to obtain compulsory powers for such a purpose, without applying to Parliament for a local Act?—No; unless Parliament gives powers to the Privy Council, or in some other way. I think they had authorised ground to be taken by way of agreement, when the cattle plague was at its height, for slaughtering the cattle. I think Mr. Hunt's Bill proposed that. We know if we want ground for any public purpose a very exacting price is asked. I think a fair price should be given, but still nothing more than a jury would give under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act.

Mr. W. Lindsey.

21 June 1866.

7643. In the event of a public market being established for foreign cattle, care would be taken, I suppose, to establish slaughter-houses close by, in a convenient place?—Yes; the market would require to be some little distance, perhaps, in open ground.

7644. Do you see the cattle landed when they arrive?—I have seen them, but I have not inspected them.

7645. Do they arrive, generally, in good condition?—As far as I can judge, they do not; they arrive like a person who has been subject to sea sickness, or a person travelling overnight.

7646. Have you heard many complaints of the state in which they arrive from butchers and other people?—I have heard that the closest inspection is necessary to prevent animals coming in in an emaciated state.

7647. Have you heard of any cattle being stopped in the same way in which these sheep were?—I have not.

7648. You have heard no instances of cattle being stopped by the inspectors?—No; I cannot, at this moment, give you the instances.

7650. It arises from the fear which the farmers entertain, that the manure will bring them the cattle plague?—Yes; I think it is an element in dealing with the matter, and I think it right that that should be stated to the Committee.

7651. Have you any other remarks to make?—No; I do not think I have anything more. Of course we should be very ready, in the case of a permanent trade being established, to erect sheds; we have erected cattle sheds just now and fitted them up with troughs for the water, and we should be quite ready to do anything of that sort if the trade is to be made permanent.

7652. Lord Naas.] Was there any slaughtering trade of this kind before the cattle plague broke out?—We have always had slaughter-houses at Leith.

7653. But before the cattle plague broke out, were the foreign cattle generally sent away from Leith alive, or were the greater proportion of them slaughtered at Leith?—They were sent away alive.

7654. Then this practice of slaughtering all of them at Leith has arisen entirely since the existence of the cattle plague in the country?—Quite.

7655. Mr. Graham.] Are you referring principally to store cattle or fat cattle that come into Leith generally?—Cattle for the market; the fat cattle. There are some cattle and milch cows come, and there was a difficulty with regard to them.

7656. Then, I may take it, your remarks apply generally to fat cattle?—Yes.

7657. Your impression is that the fat cattle trade ought to be entirely carried on by killing at Leith itself?—So long as there is any fear of spreading the disease, I think that is the only effectual way of keeping the disease down.

7658. Is it a desirable thing in Leith that the trade in dead meat should be established there, or would it be a nuisance to the people?—I think it could be accommodated quite well.

7659. Would it be a thing of importance to the prosperity of Leith that a trade of that sort should grow up there?—It would not be against the trade of the port.

7660. It is not a thing of great interest?—It is not of great moment that it should grow up there; the public interest, of course, should be looked at more than the interest of any particular place.

7661. You spoke of a lot of beasts that had been killed after being condemned in the market; were those beasts diseased or emaciated, and suffering from the voyage?—They were emaciated; they were unfit for human food.

7662. But they had not rinderpest?—They had not rinderpest; I do not know whether they had the foot-rot, which is not a contagious disease.

7663. These animals, if they could have been moved on to fresh pastures, would probably have been saved and become good food?—I do not think they would have been saved; I do not think they would have lived, from what I have heard of the case, they were so bad.

7664. Sir Matthew Ridley.] You were talking of acquiring land for the purpose of a slaughter-house near Leith; may I ask what is the price you have been asked for land by the square yard or by the acre?—We paid for the ground on which the present slaughter-houses are erected 550 l., for about a quarter of an acre. They are asking quite a fancy price for a small bit that we want to add to that piece of ground to extend the slaughter-houses.

7665. Is there not a good deal of dead meat forwarded now from Leith to Glasgow by train?—I believe there is.

7666. Lord Naas.] Most of it goes to Edinburgh?—Just so; I know that the slaughter-houses are kept very busy.

Mr. William James Bonser, called in; and Examined.

Mr. W. J. Bonser.

7667. Lord Naas.] You are a Salesmaster in Newgate Market?—Yes.

7668. Are there any general observations you wish to offer to this Committee, with regard to the trade in dead meat as it at present exists in the City of London?—I am not prepared with any particular suggestions; but I am prepared to answer any questions that may be addressed to me by the Committee.

7669. I believe the trade is principally from Scotland,

Scotland, is it not?—Not in our market; it has been from all parts of England, and a good deal from abroad of late years.

7670. What is the proportion of dead meat that comes into Newgate Market from abroad as compared with the home supply?—I could not give you that; but there are statistics of supply at the Custom House.

7671. Has the trade been a very increasing trade of late?—Very much so.

7672. Has the increase been as much in foreign meat as it has been in home-killed meat?—Very much more so within the last few years.

7673. Since the outbreak of the cattle plague has there been, do you think, a sensible increase in the dead-meat market?—Yes, especially from Holland, since they are now prohibited from sending it alive.

7674. Where is the Holland meat killed?—It is killed in Holland, and sent from there dead.

7675. Does it arrive in pretty good order?—It arrives in pretty good order in cold weather, but in warm weather sometimes it comes in very bad condition.

7676. Has the trade been very limited since the hot weather set in?—The trade has not decreased much, because we have not yet had any very hot weather; it has rather been increasing up to the present time.

7677. There has been no substantial decrease in the importation of dead meat from Holland up to this moment?—Not any; rather an increase.

7678. Do you know how long after the beast has been killed in Holland, the carcase makes its appearance in Newgate Market?—It would depend on the part of Holland from which it came. The passage from Rotterdam takes about 18 hours.

7679. And what from the other ports?—From Harlingen it is rather more; I cannot tell you the exact time, but something like 24 hours.

7680. Then those beasts have probably been killed 12 hours at least before they are put on board?—It must be killed the same length of time before sending it from there, as it would from any part of England.

7682. Has there been much loss upon dead meat imported in this way this year?—Not at present.

7683. There has been no loss?—Very trifling. There has been a loss, from a worse market, in consequence of hot weather; there has been that to-day, but I think very little meat has been positively spoiled.

7684. Do you think it would be possible, from your knowledge of the trade, to supply the dead-meat market from cattle slaughtered when they arrive here; that is to say, if there was a regulation in force that all cattle should be slaughtered, as near as possible at the port of debarkation, do you think that would interfere much with the trade?—I think that would probably depend upon what was meant by the word "port." There has been some discussion on that point, with reference to the port of London.

7686. Live cattle, I believe, go to Islington to be sold; they go from the steamer at the place of landing to Islington?—Yes.

7687. Do you think it would be a great advantage if the cattle could be killed near the place of debarkation, and sent on to the dead-meat market?—I think it would be a great inconvenience to the trade and a general loss, without any advantage whatever.

7689. Where are the beasts generally killed that are exposed for sale in Newgate Market; I am speaking now as to the beasts killed in the metropolitan district, and then sent to Newgate Market for sale?—Very many at public slaughter-houses near the Metropolitan Market, and others at slaughter-houses in various parts of London. We have one at Whitechapel, which is very convenient for beasts landed from different steam-boats.

7690. Does not this happen, that beasts are driven from the river to Islington, and then driven back again to Whitechapel to be slaughtered?—It might be so. When we have any beasts at Islington, such as we had from Sweden last week, we have them slaughtered at Islington to avoid driving them back again.

7691. Does it not then happen that what I have stated takes place?—It may be so; but I do not think anyone would unnecessarily drive them backwards and forwards.

7692. Mr. Dent.] With your slaughter-house at Whitechapel, does it not very often happen that you bring them from the steamers to Islington, and then have to take them back again to Whitechapel to slaughter?—Ours is entirely a commission business; but if we bought at Islington we should have them slaughtered there to prevent them being brought to Whitechapel; none of ours go into the public market, at least not after they are in our hands; ours is entirely a dead-meat commission business.

7693. Lord Naas. In fact, you never see the beasts alive at all?—Yes, we do in many cases. We had a consignment from Sweden last week; they were landed at Thames Haven, taken to Maiden-lane, and slaughtered there, close by the Metropolitan Market; that is, within a few yards.

7694. If those beasts were consigned to you direct from Sweden, what was the object of sending them to the Metropolitan Market at all?—Because they were landed at Thames Haven, and they were taken by the train direct to the Metropolitan Market; there was no way of getting them to Whitechapel, except driving them a long distance.

Mr. W. J. Bonser.

21 June 1866.

7695. It is not a common course in your business to have live cattle consigned to you?—It is not the larger part of it, but it is a matter of almost every-day occurrence.

7696. Mr. Dent.] Will you explain that, if you please; they are consigned to you to slaughter?—To slaughter, and sell on commission in the dead-meat market. That is principally done in the hot weather, when they are afraid of sending dead meat long distances.

7697. Lord Naas.] Do you kill them as they are wanted, in that case, or do you kill them immediately?—If they are detained at the wharf by the inspector, on account of being diseased or damaged, they are slaughtered immediately; otherwise we keep them one or two days, if we think the trade will be favourable.

7698. There are no live cattle consigned to you from parts of Great Britain, are there?—Yes; from Scotland, frequently.

7699. Live cattle?—Yes, frequently in the hot weather.

7700. What is done with them; do you keep them and kill them just as you want them?—If we think we can make a better price of them for the consignor, we keep them a few days.

7701. Where do you get them?—Either at Whitechapel, or any place that is convenient according to circumstances.

7702. Do they go to the Metropolitan Market?—No, never.

7703. They come straight from the railway to your place?—They come straight from the railway to our place.

7704. Mr. Dent.] Are there any beasts sent to London in this way, that are never sent to the Metropolitan Market?—Yes, a considerable number during the hot weather; beasts, sheep, and pigs.

7705. They take the place of meat that would be consigned dead in cold weather, I suppose?—Precisely so.

7706. Lord Naas.] Do you think it would interfere very much with the trade if public slaughter-houses were established in different parts of the town, in sufficient numbers to supply the wants of the public?—Do you mean in substitution of the private slaughter-houses?

7707. In substitution for the private slaughter-houses?—It would cause a considerable loss to the persons who were compelled to use them. That is so well known to be the case, that our consignors from the country objected to sending cattle to us in the way I have described, until we had a private slaughter-house, because they would not expose themselves to the peculations of the men employed in these public places.

7707*. Supposing slaughter-houses were established of this kind, they would be in compartments apportioned out and let to different persons, who would find it for their convenience to take them; and do you not think that in that manner those objections would be got rid of?—Do you mean outside London?

7710. That slaughter-house is, to a certain extent, a public slaughter-house?—That is what we call a public slaughter-house, in distinction to private slaughter-houses, of which we have the key, and employ our own men to do the work.

7711. Mr. Graham.] You say, that as to the dead meat you receive from Holland, there is a waste of it from its arriving, in a bad condition, occasionally in hot weather?—With any meat it would be so, in hot weather, coming from a considerable distance.

7712. Supposing it were necessary to kill all the cattle at the ports of landing, would not there be a loss in sending it to market dead, instead of sending it up alive?—There must be much less danger, in sending from Harwich instead of Holland, on account of the distance. There is another great difficulty, and that is the delay on account of the Custom House. The meat coming from Scotland can be landed at any time of the day or night, but from abroad they will only allow it to be landed at certain hours.

7714. Then the foreigner would get a less price for his meat?—He would lose that difference.

7715. What would be the effect of the difference if it extended over the whole foreign trade; would it be to increase or limit the foreign trade?—It must be to limit it; and at present they complain that our prices will scarcely allow them to send; in fact, the importation of pigs has almost entirely ceased, on account of the higher prices abroad.

7716. I think you said there was no corresponding advantage gained by killing them at the port of discharge rather than sending them in?—I think not in the least.

7717. Mr. Dent.] You are alluding, of course, to the present system at the wharves and the ports of of discharge; you are alluding to things as they are?—In reference to the inconvenience and loss, although they might be modified, they would still exist to a certain extent.

7718. If it became the custom, there would, no doubt, be slaughter-houses erected, and the consequence would be that they would be slaughtered as economically there as at the slaughter-house at Copenhagen-fields?—But there would be the expense of carting the carcases to London.

7719. On the other hand, there would be the diminution of carting away the offal, and doing away with the expense of dragging them through the streets of London?—Practically, that would be nothing. London is the market for the fat beasts; they are worth more in London than anywhere else.

7720. Have you many private slaughter-houses now about Newgate Market?—A few in the market.

7721. I think the noble Lord in the Chair alluded to dividing the slaughter-houses, and having what are called "booths," in Scotland. It is not found that in Edinburgh or Leeds, where these slaughter-houses exist, there is any peculation or robbery?—I cannot speak as to that.

7722. We have had evidence from those parts saying there was none; in those cases there would be, as usual, supervision exercised, as in the private slaughter-houses?—Perhaps so.

7723. I think you have had your attention called to dividing the trade, and making the carcase butcher slaughter in the public slaughter-house, and making the private butcher have a registered slaughter-house?—No, I have not said that; I merely mentioned it as it occurred to me.

7724. I think it was suggested by Mr. Rudkin?—I was not aware that the point had been mentioned before.

7725. It was mentioned by Mr. Rudkin that the carcase butcher might slaughter in the public slaughter-house, but that the private retail butcher should be allowed to have a private slaughter-house for the convenience of his customers: do you think that would be feasible in London?—I scarcely know how you draw the distinction between the private butcher and the carcase butcher.

7726. The one is the retail butcher who sells to the consumer, and the other, like yourself, sells to the butcher?—We have a customer who sends to us to sell certain portions of beef, and he sells certain beasts at the market and certain beasts at home; he would be both a carcase butcher and a retail butcher.

7727. Do you find the foreign meat trade in different hands to the English meat trade?—It very much depends on the class of meat and the state of our trade at the time. As to the inferior kinds of foreign meat, it is generally sold to butchers who carry on business in the poorer parts of London, or to contractors; but we have some consignments of foreign meat that are bought by the West-end butchers.

7728. The West-end butchers we have had here have told us they never think of buying foreign meat; do you agree with that?—In a general way that is true, no doubt; but we have recently had some consignments of meat from Holland as good as meat need be; I have had some of it sent home for myself, some parts of Dutch sheep and some veal, and it was exceedingly good.

7729. I suppose London is almost entirely supplied with foreign veal?—We have had a great deal of English veal; in fact there has not been much foreign veal the last few weeks.

7730. Is the trade in carcases a ready-money trade; if you have meat consigned to you, is it a ready-money trade?—We pay ready money for it, but we do not receive ready money.

7731. Is that the same with the meat killed in London?—For any consignments that we received this morning, we send a cheque off by this evening's post; some of our customers pay cash, and some take credit for a few weeks, more or less.

7733. Do you have large consignments from Aberdeen?—Yes.

7734. Do you find that those consignments fall off very considerably during the summer months?—Very much so.

7735. You could not maintain a permanent supply of dead meat throughout the year?—I think that, to a great extent, arises from the scarcity of meat there. Meat killed in Aberdeen by persons who are well accustomed to the trade, will come in better condition than meat killed much nearer London by persons who do not manage their business well.

7737. I wanted to know whether you found a considerable diminution of supply of dead meat to London in summer?—Yes, it arises from those two causes.

7738. Mr. Carnegie.] Have you ever known any time this year when a contractor could not obtain meat in Newgate Market?—I think not this year. The weather has been cold this season.

7740. Do you consider that arises from defective railway arrangements?—No, from the hot weather.

7741. What is there to prevent meat travelling by railway to Aldershot, if it can come from Aberdeen?—When meat is sent from Aberdeen it is meat that is well dressed, and it reaches us in very good condition; but after it is once exposed to the air it changes very rapidly, and if that meat has to be repacked and sent to the country again, it would probably be quite useless the next morning. Frequently our customers will ask us to send down a few lambs. We are always compelled to send town-killed meat, because meat that has once been packed and exposed to the air changes very rapidly.

Mr. W. J. Bonser.

21 June 1866.

7742. Lord Naas.] Is the packing of Scotch meat as good as it possibly can be?—It is the best we have at all.

7744. You think, on the whole, the packing of meat in cloths is the best way?—I think that is the way I should send meat to London.

7745. With reference to the foreign meat that comes in bad, is it packed in the same way in cloths, and laid in masses on the deck?—The meat that comes from Hamburgh comes in that way in cloths, and comes generally in fair condition. From other parts I have not so much experience, but they pack it more carelessly in proportion to the Scotch.

7746. There would be no such thing as hanging it up on board the vessels?—It could only be done to a small extent, when there was only a small quantity, and room to hang it under shelter.

7747. Is the meat generally packed in the hold or on the deck?—It generally lies on the deck, and is covered with tarpauling; then it is exposed to be washed by the sea, unless great care is exercised.

7748. At present there is great inconvenience in the Newgate Market, owing to the crowding and want of space?—There is great inconvenience from that; but my premises are outside the market, and I do not feel it so much as those inside perhaps.

7749. Still, larger markets would be a greater advantage to the public?—Unquestionably they would be.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Mr. Carnegie.
Mr. Edward Egerton.
Sir James Fergusson.
Mr. Graham.
Mr. Cogan.
Mr. Holland.
Lord Naas.
Mr. Norwood.
Sir Matthew Ridley.
Mr. Banks Stanhope.

MR. DENT, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. RICHARD WALSH, called in; and Examined.

Mr. R. Walsh. 25 June 1866.

7750. Chairman.] ARE you a partner with Mr. Aungier, who was summoned here?—Yes.

7751. What are you?—I am a cattle salesman and grazier, in Ireland.

7752. What part of Ireland?—In the County Dublin and in the County Meath.

7753. You are largely concerned in the exportation of cattle from Ireland to England?—I sell a great deal of cattle to go from Ireland to England. I sell to the dealers, but I am not personally concerned in the exportation.

7754. Do you sell fat or lean cattle?—All fat.

7755. You never sell store cattle?—No.

7756. Have you anything to say to the Committee on the manner in which the cattle are shipped at Dublin?—The only thing I would say is, perhaps it would be well if there was some inspection of the vessels, so that the vessels might not be overcrowded at certain seasons of the year.

7757. Inspection of the vessels?—Inspection of the vessels.

7758. Generally, are the animals brought down to the port of Dublin in good condition, do you consider?—In an admirable state. They get bought in the Dublin market; they are put there in lairs that night, and fed and watered, generally speaking.

7759. Do fat cattle come from all parts of Ireland to England for shipment?—Not all parts of Ireland, for all parts of Ireland do not feed cattle.

7760. Do they come from different directions?—They do.

7761. Are they brought down by railroad usually?—They are brought from the far parts of Ireland, not from the home counties. There are not many cattle brought from the counties of Dublin, Kildare, or Meath, by railway. We prefer walking them.

7762. Are most of the animals sold in the open market to dealers in England, or are they consigned to English salesmen?—They are consigned to the Dublin salesmen, and bought by dealers to go to England. Those which are consigned to the English salesmen do not stand in the Dublin market, but they go direct to Liverpool.

7763. Are there many consigned direct to English salesmen which do not stand in the Dublin market?—There are a great number.

7764. Is it your opinion that the steamers at certain times of the year are overcrowded?—Perhaps they are a little overcrowded, but not so very much.

7765. Not so much as to injure the health of the cattle?—I think not. I may say I inspected them on Friday last, and I thought their arrangements were very good.

7766. Those were the boats that run to Dublin and Liverpool?—To Holyhead and Liverpool. I saw some of the boats that had been used in going to London when the cattle were not allowed to go by rail. The boats were not near so good as the regular cattle boats; those were boats used to take cattle to London during the prohibition by railway.

7767. Are those boats kept entirely for fat animals, or are store animals also shipped in them?—They are used for both indiscriminately.

7768. Complaints have been made as to the state in which store animals arrive from Ireland; that they have been so crowded together that they are heated, and then landed carelessly, and have become liable to lung disease?—I think heretofore there has not been due attention paid to the way store cattle were dealt with in the ships. I think the store cattle are very badly treated on our Irish railways; they are too much crowded, and are also very badly treated in the loading; they get a great deal of abuse.

7769. We have had witnesses here who have stated that the cattle are naturally wild, and I suppose the drovers are wild also?—I think the railway servants are worse than the cattle drovers. I think the railway companies are very negligent in how they send them, and as to whether they keep them too long a time.

7770. We have a great number of cattle coming to Yorkshire; some of them are miserably lean, and very subject to disease, both foot and mouth complaint and lung complaint. The dealers, I think, attribute a good deal of that to the bad way in which they have been treated on board the steamers and on the railways; do you think there is any truth in that?—I think there is, as to the railways; I am not so much acquainted with the steam-packet companies, but I have heard the vessels have been crowded.

7771. Have you any suggestion to make with respect to the better regulations of the Irish railways or Irish steamers in the transit of cattle?—I think the steamers do not require so much, but I think the railways could be very much improved in their regulations as to cattle.

Mr. R. Walsh.

25 June 1866.

7772. Now what regulations would you suggest with respect to the railroads?—In the first place, I think the jobbers who buy cattle in the fairs ought not to be allowed to crowd any number they please into the trucks in order to save expense.

7773. You would suggest that they should pay so much per head, rather than so much per truck?—I should suggest they should pay so much per head; and I think, when the cattle are loaded, the railway companies should forward them forthwith. They sometimes keep them knocking about for hours.

7774. When they arrive at the port of embarcation are they, generally speaking, watered and put into lairs or fields before they are shipped?—The fat cattle are; the lean cattle are generally watered and fed before they are put on board. Sometimes they may arrive late, and be put on board the steamers forthwith, which I should say would be very injurious to them.

7775. How has the price of cattle in Ireland been affected during this spring by the restrictions which have existed upon the trade in animals?—Store cattle have sold wonderfully well; better than one could have thought, up to the time of the report as to the rinderpest breaking out in Ireland; then it affected it slightly.

7776. Do you think the price of store cattle has been as usual this spring?—They have not been quite so dear as they were last year. They were dearer last year than I ever remember them before.

7777. Have you found the price of fat cattle has risen much in consequence of the restrictions that have been placed on the trade in England?—I cannot attribute the rise so much to that; within the last fortnight we have had a serious rise; I think it is from the scarcity of fat cattle in England and Ireland.

7778. That serious rise has taken place during the last fortnight?—During the last fortnight or three weeks.

7779. Has it affected the retail trade as well as the graziers; I mean, have the butchers been charging higher prices for their meat?—The butchers were charging high prices all the spring. I do not think they have raised their prices much yet, but they will be obliged to do so.

7780. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Is it the case that, when they take the trucks, they are allowed to put any number of animals they please into the truck; is there no limit to it?—I think not.

7781. Do you think there is no supervision on the part of the railways?—Not for what they call "small" cattle. I believe they do limit the number of fat cattle.

7782. Do you know that as a fact yourself, or are you speaking from mere hearsay?—I know it as a fact.

7783. You do not think there is any supervision on the part of the railway authorities as to those cattle?—I think not; there may be some.

7784. I suppose they would be liable if any accident happened from their overcrowding?—I know on one occasion some cattle were killed, and they did not pay for them.

7785. Were any steps taken on the subject at law?—I cannot tell whether there was more than an application made.

7786. You say there has been a scarcity within the last fortnight; has that been in consequence of the grass being backward?—Yes, and also in consequence of the increased demand for England.

7787. What is the average price for beasts now?—I think fat cattle realised four guineas per cwt. last Thursday in Dublin. When I say that, I mean first-class animals, beef of first-class quality.

7788. Lord Naas.] Will you state to the Committee what has been the effect on the Irish trade of the restrictions which have been placed in England upon the transport of cattle in consequence of the rinderpest?—I think it has interfered with it very much indeed.

7789. State to the Committee how that has occurred?—They are not allowed to take the Irish cattle from Liverpool. If they stand in the Liverpool market they cannot bring them to any other market; they must be killed there, and I think about 1,000 or 800 beasts a-week supplies Liverpool. The usual number going to Liverpool is from 2,000 to 2,800.

7790. So that not more than one-half the weekly supply of Irish meat is consumed in Liverpool?—Not more than that is killed in Liverpool.

7791. Where does the rest go?—The rest is sent up to Birmingham and to the north of England, to Wolverhampton and Manchester.

7792. What has happened in respect of those animals since those restrictions have been laid on?—A great number of their best buyers, since the weather has got warm, have come to Dublin to buy the cattle, and take them direct to their places in England. When the weather was cool they did not mind so much buying the cattle in Liverpool.

7793. What effect, in your opinion, has that change in the course of the trade had upon the price?—I think it lessened the value of the cattle in Liverpool, and perhaps increased it in Dublin.

7794. The Irish producer did not lose by that practice?—If they continued sending their full number of cattle to Liverpool they did; some of them have, I have no doubt; Mr. Garnett will tell you that; he sends cattle to Liverpool, I do not.

7795. There has been no decrease in the price of cattle in Dublin in consequence of this partly new system being introduced of parties coming over to buy?—There was very little when the English cattle were more plentiful than they are now, and when they had more stall-fed cattle; then it had a serious effect on Dublin for three months, and reduced the price of cattle very much in March and April and the first week in May; since that they have been obliged to come to Ireland to buy all the cattle they can.

7797. Yes?—I think it would have rather an injurious effect.

7798. Do you think such a system of inspection would be necessary for fat cattle?—I do not; I am speaking as if we had no rinderpest in Ireland, which I believe we have not.

7799. Would it be in any way advantageous for for store cattle?—I think not, if we had no rinderpest in Ireland.

7800. I mean as a safeguard against foot and mouth disease, or against pleuro-pneumonia?—Pleuro-pneumonia is so much on the decrease, and we have had so much less of it this year, that it is out of the question; and the foot and mouth disease is such a trifling thing that I do not think it requires any interference.

7801. Foot and mouth disease and pleuro-pneumonia are the only diseases of much importance which affect cattle?—Quite so, except the murrain, which we always have to a slight extent.

7802. Upon what do you ground your opinion that pleuro-pneumonia has decreased very much in Ireland lately?—I have had very good opportunity of knowing it. I have been for a good many years connected with the sale of cattle in Ireland, and in the month of May it was always more prevalent in the grazing stock than any other time of the year. At this time, in May, we have not sold one quarter of the number of cattle we have sold in any year during the last 15 years affected with lung disease.

7803. Do you think that state of things applies to the country generally?—I do.

7804. How has it been as regards foot and mouth disease this year?—We have not had it at all this spring; we have not heard of a single case of it.

7805. Are you aware of the state in which the store cattle generally arrive at English ports from Ireland?—I do not know much of that, I know how they leave us. The store cattle come in a very heated and uncomfortable state to Dublin before they are shipped; in consequence of the time they are upon the railways I think.

7806. Are a great proportion of the store cattle that are exported to Dublin brought to Dublin by railway?—A great number of them are, a very great proportion of them are brought by railway.

7807. Do you think that greater care and greater quickness in transport would be a great advantage in respect of those cattle?—I think it would be a very great advantage.

7808. Do you know how long the cattle are generally kept on the railway?—I used to ride a great many more of my own cattle than I do now. I now prefer walking them even for 70 or 80 miles. I have put cattle in the trucks at Limerick at 12 or 1 o'clock on one day, and not got them at my place near Dublin till the next morning, from six to eight o'clock.

7809. Sir James Fergusson.] How many miles is that?—About 80 Irish miles.

7810. Supposing they are put on the train at two o'clock, at what time does that train start?—Not till four or five in the evening.

7811. Are those trains special trains?—Sometimes they are special trains, and sometimes they are the ordinary trains.

7812. Are you limited by the railway company as to the time at which you shall send your cattle to the train?—In order to box them they like to have them in good time.

7813. They insist on having them at about that time in the day?—They do or did. I gave up sending cattle by rail because they were very much abused, and I found the cattle went much better by walking.

7814. We have had it in evidence before this Committee, that the Irish drovers are much rougher in the handling of cattle than the drovers in England; have you had much experience upon that point?—I have not had much experience of the English drovers.

7815. Do you think the knocking about, of which you speak, is altogether attributable to the delay before starting the trains, so that the cattle bustle each other; or may it not be from the rough handling?—I think they get a great deal of abuse in loading from the railway servants, and also from the Irish drovers.

7816. In fact, that the persons concerned in loading cattle generally are unnecessarily rough in their handling of them?—I think they are.

7817. May not that be more the cause of their deterioration than the time they stand in the trucks?—No; I think the time they stand in the trucks is very detrimental to them.

7818. Do you think they arrive at the trucks in a healthy state?—I do, when they come from the farms and the fairs in good order.

7819. They are not fevered by hard driving?—No, very seldom indeed.

7820. Lord Naas.] I believe at most of the large fairs there is a railway station pretty near?—Yes, nearly all. Ballinasloe is the largest fair we have. There we have a station. The accomodation is not so good as it might be.

7821. Taking the case of cattle transported from a distant port of Ireland to an English port, are you of opinion that there is an enormous amount of unnecessary delay and also abuse, both on the railway and in the steamers?—Not so much in the steamers. The steamers advertise their time of sailing, and I think their accommodation is far superior to the railway.

7822. Is there not a variance in the kind of accommodation in the different steamers that leave the port of Dublin; are not some steamers better than others?—Some are better than others. I spent some two or three hours on Friday last in examining them. The boats coming to Holyhead are very superior; and the boats coming to Liverpool cannot be improved, I should think, with the exception of giving the cattle a little more room.

7823. The Holyhead boats are new boats?—Yes. The Holyhead boats and the Liverpool boats are very good. The boats which were used when the cattle were sent to London, during the time of the restrictions, were not so good.

7824. Do you think from your knowledge of travelling cattle, if cattle were travelled generally by railway, and loaded with care and punctuality and dispatch, they would travel as easily by railway as by steamer?—Not quite, I think. I think they are a little more abused in the railway. For instance, the stopping of the trains, and what they call shunting the trains, to allow other trains to pass, will affect them very much on their feet. They slip, and the feet are very liable to get loose between hair and hoof.

7825. There is a greater amount of risk?—I should say there was.

7826. Looking to they way in which animals of a valuable nature are transported by railway—valuable bulls and so on—there would be no difficulty in transporting them properly?—Those animals get so much room.

7827. Looking at that fact, they could be imported without risk?—Yes.

7828. Sir James Fergusson.] Would it be impracticable to place quantities of cattle either for store or slaughtering in horse boxes, like you do fine bulls?—If they got more room and put in open trucks they would answer, but I think they are not very well constructed for the transit of cattle.

Mr. R. Walsh.

25 June 1866.

7829. Unless the trucks are constructed with a separate partition for each animal, it is necessary to pack them close?—No, it is not. I very often send half a box of cattle, that is, five, and if they had a whole box to come in, they would come in a much superior condition than they would come in the ordinary way of loading.

7830. That would enable them to turn round?—It would, and it would be of great service if they had some stuff under their feet.

7831. Mr. Holland.] Is the railway fare paid at per head or per truck?—Per truck.

7832. If you pay per truck, you may pack them how you please?—Before last year you might put as many small cattle as you liked.

7833. Lord Naas.] Has there been any attempt to establish a dead meat trade between the Irish ports and England?—No; there is some dead meat sent at certain portions of the year to Glasgow from Dublin.

7834. What description of meat is that?—Very good. There is Mr. Tierman and a Mr. Geale in the trade, who has agents in Dublin, who buy the rumps, and those portions of the animals, and send them to Glasgow; those are from very superior beasts. There is not the consumption for all those parts of the good beasts they kill in Dublin.

7835. Is that a new trade?—No.

7836. It has been going on for some time?—It has; but it has not increased. I should say it has rather decreased than increased.

7837. There is nothing of the sort going on between Liverpool and Dublin and Bristol and Dublin?—I am not sure there is none going to Bristol; there is none going to Liverpool. One or two people may send small portions to Bristol.

7838. Are the fat cattle which are exported from Dublin principally grass-fed beasts?—For seven or eight months they are.

7839. For how many months in the year do you think the Irish trade consists almost entirely of grass-fed beef?—I think from the 10th June to about the 10th January entirely.

7840. About seven months?—Yes.

7841. Then for the remainder of the year?—They are stall-fed cattle.

7842. They are fed, I believe, principally on turnips?—On turnips a good deal, potatoes, linseed cake, and Indian corn; barley is much used in Ireland, and has been found to be very fine food.

7843. Do you think the practice of giving the beasts corn and oil cake in Ireland has increased very much of late years?—Very much; 10 years ago we knew nothing of it.

7844. Do you think the condition of the cattle sent away in the winter months has very much improved of late years?—I think the cattle feeding of Ireland altogether has very much improved.

7845. At a certain time of the year, is there not a good deal of what is called "grain-fed" beef sent away?—The dairymen's cows in April and May are fed in Dublin. In the interior of the country there are not so many as there were.

7846. The grain-fed beef consists principally of fat cows; cows that have been used for milk, and then afterwards fatted?—Yes; they are grazed outside Dublin in summer a good deal.

7847. Do you think the practice of selling at home by farmers in Ireland is increasing, particularly for fat cattle?—I think not.

7848. Is it not the practice generally for the farmer to send his fat beast to the neighbouring fair, or to consign it to a salesmaster in Dublin or Liverpool?—Generally speaking, it is consigned to a salesmaster either in Dublin or Liverpool.

7849. So that a great portion of the Irish fat cattle do not stand, as a rule, in the country fairs?—Certainly not.

7850. The country fairs are almost entirely occupied by store cattle?—Yes; and some small portion of fat cattle in the spring. In some of the fairs in Limerick there may be a good many fat beasts and cows; in Roscommon, in the month of October, for instance.

7851. Sir James Fergusson.] I should like to know whether the salesmen sell the cattle for themselves, or whether the owners advertise them?—Oh, dear no! there is no advertising at all. If you were a grazier you would consign your cattle to me; you would write to me to Dublin, or to any salesman, and we have a staff of men by which to send them to the market, and they are sold for you.

7852. Lord Naas.] It is entirely a ready-money trade?—Yes; entirely.

7853. Mr. Edward Egerton.] You paying all the expenses of transit?—We generally pay all expenses, and charge it to the owners.

7854. Lord Naas.] That system is adopted usually by the large farmers as well as by the small farmers?—Yes; by the graziers.

7855. By the stall feeder or by the grazier?—Yes.

7856. Have you any dealing yourself, as a salesmaster, in the sale of store cattle?—None.

7857. None whatever?—We may sell a few beasts, but I do not think they would amount to a score of beasts in a year. Some of our clients' friends who live in Dublin might send a few to us, and we sell them, more as a compliment than anything else.

7858. How is the great trade in store cattle conducted; principally by dealers?—No; the cattle owners send to the fairs, and sell to us and the large graziers.

7859. I mean the stock that is exported?—They are generally brought by dealers from Ireland to England.

7860. The dealers bring over their own cattle?—Generally speaking. Some of the Roscommon stock owners send store cattle to Glasgow.

7861. The general course of the export store trade is this, I believe: that the cattle are bought in the fairs by the dealers, and carried over by those dealers, or by their servants, and disposed of in different markets and fairs in England?—Yes.

7862. The salemaster's profession, as a profession, has little or nothing to do with that trade?—Nothing whatever.

7863. Sir Matthew Ridley.] Have you any knowledge of the trade in the north of Ireland, from Belfast, as to the sending over of store cattle to the west coast, to ports such as Morcambe Bay?—I have not.

7864. You have no knowledge of the condition in which animals are shipped from the port of Ireland to the Scotch coast?—I have not. We have have very little connection with the north of Ireland.

7865. Is the quantity of stock of various kinds in Ireland larger than usual at this moment?—I think it is.

7866. Have you known of losses occurring by accident to cattle consigned from Dublin?—Very seldom. I presume you mean fat cattle consigned to salesmen.

7867. Yes?—Very seldom, indeed.

7868. As a rule, in the shipment of these cattle, has more care been preserved than in the shipment of store cattle?—I think a great deal more care has been observed with fat cattle.

7869. You have spoken of the condition of these cattle on their arrival at Dublin. Has it appeared to you that they are shipped in that condition of health which is likely to predispose them to disease, on being further driven on landing in England?—Not as a general rule; but in some cases they are not brought as well as they might be to Dublin.

7871. Did you ever get any redress for that?—Yes, we got redress. Once, a lot of cattle belonging to two of our friends came in a very bad state to Dublin; they were loaded at Carrick-on-Shannon on a Tuesday morning, and something or other occurred to the train, and they were taken out again on Tuesday evening. The train could not come in; they were reloaded on Wednesday, and did not arrive in Dublin until Thursday morning, in a very bad state. For those two lots of cattle our friends were compensated, amply compensated.

Mr. R. Walsh.

25 June 1866.

7872. Have you ever turned your attention to the subject of their being watered on their journey in the trucks?—I do not see well how it could be done, because the unloading them and loading them again would do them more injury than the advantage to be derived from water.

7873. Does it appear to you they could be watered in the trucks?—I do not see how it could be done.

7874. Lord Naas.] The average distance that cattle are carried in Ireland is very short as compared to England?—From Mayo to Dublin is a distance of 150 miles.

7875. That is the furthest point, is it not?—No, they come from Cork to Dublin.

7876. Is not that about the same distance?—No, it is more; it is 180 miles.

7877. Sir James Fergusson.] Cattle need never be for 24 hours in the trucks in Ireland?—Not if they are properly managed.

7878. Chairman.] You very rarely import any foreign cattle into Ireland?—No; some Spanish cattle come there, and some few Dutch cattle have come there once or twice.

7879. Lord Naas.] There was a considerable importation of calves at one time?—The importation of calves from this city to Dublin was very great.

7880. Chairman.] Your wish would be to have as few restrictions as possible placed on the Irish trade with England; I mean legal restrictions?—Yes, that would be so; while our cattle are in a healthy state we do not require it.

7881. You would be against any system of veterinary inspection at the ports on arrival in England?—I do not think it necessary. Of course, I should have no great feeling one way or the other; our cattle go fat, and if there is a proper staff to have the thing properly done, I do not see why it should not be properly done.

7882. Lord Naas.] You are also very much opposed to anything like a system of veterinary inspection as regards fairs and markets in Ireland?—It would be a very difficult thing to get it properly done.

7883. Would it interfere much with the trade?—Yes; unless it was done by very superior people, and men of unquestionable character.

7884. You gave similar evidence to this before a former Committee, or your partner did?—My former partner did.

7885. Have you anything further to suggest?—No; I do not know of any other point.

7886. You do not think you could give the Committee any further opinion?—No; I should be happy to answer any other question to the best of my ability.

Mr. Samuel Garnett, called in; and Examined.

7887. Lord Naas.] You have been engaged for some years as a grazier in Ireland?—Yes, for many years; nearly 40.

7888. I believe you have been in the habit of buying your own cattle?—Yes; always.

7889. I believe you attend the fairs in different parts of Ireland?—I do; mostly in the west of Ireland. I like the stock there better than in the other parts.

7890. State to the Committee generally, how you conduct your business, and at what time of the year you buy your cattle?—We buy a little in September and October. In the spring of the year, we buy a good deal more in proportion; I feed about 800 head of cattle myself. In autumn, we generally buy about 150 or 200; the rest we lay in in spring, commencing in March, and ending about the middle of May.

Mr. S. Garnett.

Mr. S. Garnett.

25 June 1866.

7891. I believe your land is all fattening land of the first quality?—Yes.

7892. Chairman.] In what county?—County Meath.

7893. Mr. Edward Egerton.] As to those you buy in September, do you stall feed them in the country?—No, that is not my practice; I generally sell them in the following June.

7894. Do you generally keep them out all the winter?—Mostly. I have a little tillage; a very small proportion of tillage.

7895. Lord Naas.] The cattle that you buy in the autumn, you intend for early beef in summer?—Yes.

7896. Do you give them a little hay in winter?—I give them a little hay in the fields in winter; some of them are wintered in houses and yards, but not many on my place.

7897. Are the beasts you feed mostly heifers or bullocks?—I feed both; about 200 bullocks.

7898. As a rule, you never keep a beast more than a year?—Not generally; sometimes I get a good young beast to lie over longer.

7899. The general practice is to get rid of the stock you buy within the year?—Yes, that is the general practice.

7900. What age are the beasts you buy?—They are not younger than three or four or five years old. The cows I buy sometimes perhaps a little older.

7901. Where do you generally buy them?—Generally in West Meath, in Longford, in Roscommon, and in Galway. I buy in Mayo sometimes; sometimes in the county of Kildare and at Carlow, but not often. I am fonder of the cattle in the western country.

7902. Are those cattle generally bred in the western country?—Very often there is a trade in young calves and young stock to the graziers; they are brought by dealers to them in the western country; they grow them down there; they get their calves in Limerick and at Carlow, and Kildare, and Meath, and Longford, and from Fermanagh and the North, to Mayo and Sligo.

7903. The general course of the trade is, that the younger stock of calves and yearlings are bought by one class of graziers. They are kept for a year and a half, and then sold to persons in your condition, who hold very good land, and are so fattened up?—Yes, that is the general course of the trade.

7904. So that the heifer or the ox is generally about three and-a-half year's old before it comes to the butcher?—Three and-a-half years or four. We generally buy three and-a-half year old heifers in the fall of the year, and they are four when we sell them.

7905. Do you convey your store cattle much by railway?—I tried it for some time, but lately I have given it up altogether; I would rather walk them 70 or 80 miles than put them into trucks.

7906. Why do you object so much to the railway?—At the large fairs the cattle generally go down as they are bought; but at the railway they have to wait an immense time, and they put on a heavy train with one engine, and wait until they get it well filled, and when it starts, it is very often passed by the passenger trains, and has to lie by on the road going up. They are shunted so often backwards and forwards, that they come off their journey in a very bad state, and if there is any disease going about, they are sure to catch it. You might walk them 70 miles and they might never get such a thing.

7907. Your experience is, that the risk of infection is much greater in travelling by railway than walking?—That has been so hitherto. I have seen since I have come up to London, that all the trucks are whitewashed. Up to the present time, they have never disinfected them in that way in Ireland.

7908. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Are they not whitewashed now?—Not now.

7909. Lord Naas.] What is the expense of walking a beast from Roscommon fair?—The beast comes home cheaper by walking. They walk them probably not more than 12 or 14 miles a day. They come home cheaper and better with a careful driver.

7910. Have any representations been made to the railway companies, by graziers, as to the careless way in which they convey the cattle?—There may have been, but I have not really brought home anything by railway for a good while.

7911. You have seen no improvement?—I do not think there is any improvement. I have heard of a good many cattle being lost this spring; they have been killed by coming by railway.

7912. Do you think that good railway management would obviate a great number of these difficulties?—Perhaps it might; I do not know.

7913. How do you dispose of your fat cattle?—I ship them to Liverpool; the same salesmaster sells them for me at Dublin and Liverpool. Last year I sent a few to Glasgow, for the first time in my life.

7914. I suppose you never go yourself?—I never go with the cattle. I have great confidence in my salesmen; I have been dealing with them for many years, and they do it as well as I could do it myself.

7915. I believe it is a ready-money trade?—Yes.

7916. You receive your cheque by return of post?—Yes.

7917. In what state do your fat cattle arrive generally at the English ports?—Generally speaking, in very good condition. I try to avoid the day on which the great crowds go. For instance, in Dublin, a great many of the graziers send their cattle on the Wednesday before the Thursday's market, and they generally go safer than they would afterwards. The great dealers, who buy in Dublin, send down great crowds of cattle, particularly when the great flush comes on at the latter end of the year, September, October, and November, which are the heavy months. By shipping them on Wednesday they ship them at a lower rate.

7918. You generally send them the day before?—Yes; the dealers ship them on a Thursday, and sometimes on the Friday.

7919. Chairman.] Do you ship for a particular market in Liverpool?—Monday is the only market in Liverpool of any good.

7920. On the whole, you think your cattle arrive in the market at Liverpool in a good state?—I think they do, generally speaking. The salesmen have sometimes complained to me of the arrival of cattle; not of my cattle, but of other cattle from Drogheda, especially at the fall of the year, in places where there is a great quantity of store stock sold. They have not a sufficient quantity of vessels for the pressure of the time, and at other other times of the year they do not put them on because they have not got the pressure. I mean that at the large October and September fairs of Kells, Navan, and other places in this country, the press of cattle is so much greater than usual that for that particular time they have not boats enough.

7921. You ship entirely from Drogheda and Dublin?—Yes; from Drogheda I ship from the largest farm I have; and as to the other farms, I ship from Dublin.

7922. Do you walk all the cattle to port?—I do walk all the cattle to port; the farm is only 16 miles from the port of Drogheda, and I walk them there; my other farms are within eight miles of Dublin.

7923. You are at no great loss in the transmission of cattle from Ireland to England?—I have been sending cattle for 39 years, and all I ever lost was one lamb; I have been very lucky; I have never experienced any loss worth speaking about.

7924. Do you send many sheep?—Not to Liverpool, I sell my sheep in Dublin; I sell a good deal of cattle in Dublin.

7925. Do you consign them to the Dublin salesmaster in the same way?—The same salesmaster sells for me in both markets; I sometimes go to Dublin to see how the price goes, and what is going on.

7926. But not to interfere in the sale?—Not to interfere in the sale, simply to see how they sell.

7927. Has there been much alteration in the trade since the restrictions relative to rinderpest have been enforced in England?—I think the state of things in Liverpool market now is causing some salesmen to come over to Dublin to sell; the buyers are coming with them, and I am told more salesmen will come to Dublin to sell if these restrictions are continued in Liverpool.

7928. Will you state in a few words, what it is they complain of?—If the cattle are shown in the Liverpool market they must be killed in the town; they cannot sell more than a certain number for the purpose, and the consequence is, the salesmen are selling them at the ports where they land, and in the parks and in the yards in the town. When they make the sales there, the cattle are allowed to be carried away all over England; and if they are shown in the market they are not allowed to be taken away. I cannot see that they are a bit safer from rinderpest when sold in these places, than they would be if they were sold in the market. They leave Dublin under a bill of health; they are inspected and sent off; they are obliged to evade the order in that way.

7929. If a beast is not consigned to some person at a distance from Liverpool, and a salesman wishes to forward him on, he does not send him to the market, but disposes of him privately?—He disposes of him to the buyers who come up from Newcastle, Birmingham, Manchester, and other towns.

7930. Do you know whether that has affected the price at all?—I think it has affected the price in the Liverpool market.

7931. Do you think the producer would get a less price for his cattle now in consequence of that than otherwise?—I have not sent any cattle to Liverpool in consequence of it; I am selling them in Dublin; all I have sold this year I have sold in Dublin.

7932. You have heard of no complaints from the producer, of loss in price in consequence of their going to Liverpool?—Yes; I have heard of that.

7933. That practice has been in existence for some time?—Not very long; it has existed on account of the disease.

7934. It has, of course, only been felt hitherto by the producers of the corn-fed cattle; the grazier has not began to feel it yet?—Not quite yet. We have only had three markets where grass beef has had to be sold. The beasts are coming in very slowly this year; it is more backward than usual.

7935. Have you anything to complain of as an exporter, from the overcrowding of the steamers occasionally?—For myself I have not; I have been told by my salesmaster, Mr. Aungier, of Liverpool, that sometimes from the Drogheda station at the end of the season the cattle have been very much overcrowded, so much so that the salesmen prefer the cattle shipped at Dublin by 10*s.* a head.

7936. Do you think there should be some regulation, either by law or through the instrumentality of the Board of Trade, as regards carrying cattle by steamer?—I think it would be a very good plan to have all steamers licensed to carry a certain number under Government inspection.

7937. Would there not be a difficulty in licensing the steamers, on account of the difference of size in the animals; a vessel might carry double the number of yearlings to the cargo she might carry of fat beasts?—Yes.

7938. How would you arrange that?—I am not prepared to say how it should be managed. Of course they might carry a great many more smaller cattle.

7939. Do you think it would be sufficient that it should be left to an official at the port to say whether a steamer was overcrowded or not. Would there be any objection to that?—I do not know whether it could be managed that way, because the matter might be arranged between the official and the company.

7940. There would be great danger of that?—Yes. It is very hard to put these restrictions on. Certainly, they do overcrowd at times when the press comes on, and all dealers are anxious to get their beasts to a particular market, and they press the companies very hard to have them put on. When dealers purchase at a fair in that way, they like to be at as little expense as possible, and they hurry on.

7943. What is the general opinion of persons engaged in the trade with regard to anything like inspection or restriction of cattle exposed for sale in the market; is it favourable to it, or the contrary?

Mr. S. Garnett.

trary?—I do not know really how it could be well carried out; for when a lot of sheep go to the fair at Ballinasloe they might affect the whole fair, and the other people's cattle, before coming to the fair, might have been as clear from it as they possibly could be. Still, when they get in gaps and places that are infected, they will all get affected, and sheep suffer from it immensely. When they get it on their journey it knocks them up completely; if they get it at home quietly it does not tell so badly upon them; but if they are sold at a standard fair with it on them, and have to journey afterwards, they suffer immensely. I do not know how you could prevent it. Suppose Ballinasloe fair was coming on, and 40 or 50 graziers had their stock all healthy and well, you could not prevent them sending them to the fair, and the whole fair might be affected by one score of sheep.

7944. You think the inconveniences which would probably arise from that kind of thing would counterbalance the advantages?—It would probably be worse than it is now.

7945. The cure would be worse than the disease?—Yes.

7946. Do you think it would be a good thing if some more stringent penalties were laid upon persons who knowingly expose diseased cattle in the public markets?—I think that would be better. I think that people who knowingly sent diseased cattle to a public store market should be well punished.

7947. How would you prefer to punish them; would you punish them in a summary way?—I do not know about that; I leave that to Parliament; but I think it would be a very good thing to do. It is very cruel for anyone knowingly to send diseased cattle into a market.

7948. Have you known instances of legal proceedings in consequence of such a thing being done?—I threatened a gentleman with legal proceedings myself many years ago, and he paid me some money. It happened many years ago; about the pleura-pneumonia. There was another gentleman in the fair whose driver knew the driver of the cattle, and heard from him that the cattle were infected. I threatened him with an action, and he paid me money.

7949. Did you buy the cattle?—I did, and sold them again.

7950. Were they diseased?—They were; some of them died coming home. I sent them to Liverpool, and I lost 40*l.* by them.

7953. You think the knowledge that such a law was in existence might deter people from exposing the cattle?—I think it might.

7955. You think that the risk of taking pleura-pneumonia from cattle in a fair is not very great?—I think not.

7956. How is it with regard to foot and mouth disease?—I think it spreads like wildfire. It is the most contagious thing I ever knew.

7957. Do you think it is much propagated by fairs and markets?—I think it is, certainly. If there is any of it in the market, it is certain to be propagated. I think I saw it in the London market this morning among the foreign cattle; I am nearly sure I did.

7958. You would propose that the exposing of cattle in a fair that were evidently suffering from foot and mouth disease, should be punishable?—I would if it could be accomplished.

7959. Foot and mouth disease is not fatal?—No.

7960. But it occasions very great loss?—It occasions very great loss, and I have been under the impression that it probably laid the foundation of the other diseases coming after it.

7961. What other diseases?—Pleura-pneumonia affecting the animal's constitution.

7962. Sir James Fergusson.] And also predisposing to the cattle plague?—I do not know about that; I have had no experience of that yet, I am happy to say.

7963. Lord Naas.] Will you state to the Committee how a very serious loss may occur to a man from his half fat cattle taking foot and mouth disease?—They get shaken all over; it is a very feverish disease, and they get into a very feverish state. The best thing in the world you can do to them is to leave them quiet. Then they get sore between hair and hoof, and the hoof generally comes off. It affects them for more than six months very often; I had cattle affected last October, and they still feel it.

7964. Do they lose condition?—Very much at the time, but they pick up afterwards; if it comes upon cattle lying quietly on your land, it does not signify much, but if they are travelling with the disease, or suffer abuse of any kind, they suffer immensely, and sometimes die.

7965. Do you think that the foot and mouth disease breaking out amongst your cattle, would lose you on the average a couple of months' feed?—It will lose me on an average a month's feed.

7966. And that is a serious loss?—That is a serious loss. The first case I ever saw, was in the year 1841; it was on my own land, and I could not see that there was any infection whatever to bring it; it came somewhere from the atmosphere. It was an epidemic, or something of that sort; I had the cattle in the month of October, and it was in the month of March when I saw the first case.

7967. Have you suffered much from the pleura-pneumonia?

pneumonia?—Indeed I have, from time to time, a good deal.

7968. Is it on the decrease in Ireland?—Very much; it is not near so bad as it used to be; house-fed cattle are more subject to it; cattle that are wintered in the house are more subject to it than the outlying cattle, but that may be from the exposure; we have very cold winds in the months of March and April, and if we buy cattle that are house-fed, and turn them out, that produces it.

7969. You find the cattle that are turned out in the winter thrive better on the grass?—They are generally most healthy cattle.

7970. The business is conducted on a very large scale, is it not?—By a great many in our country.

7971. State to the Committee what number of cattle some of the large graziers buy, and feed off in a year?—Some feed 1,600; I have heard some feed 2,000.

7972. How many acres of ground must a man hold who feeds 1,600 head of cattle?—I have 1,100 acres, and I feed about 800 cattle. Other gentlemen I know feed double the number; I suppose they have double the quantity of land.

7973. The practical trade is generally carried on by men holding large tracts of land?—Yes; there are very large landholders in the west, who rear these cattle.

7974. Do you think the tendency is to carry it on on a larger scale from year to year?—It has a tendency to increase it. Those that are able to do so, and have had a good opportunity of taking land, have done so; but land has been rising in price, and that restricts it.

7975. I suppose the first outlay of capital is very considerable?—Yes.

7976. What do the store cattle generally stand you in on an average?—My store cattle are generally about 13 l. or 14 l. a-piece all round; that is the store price.

7977. So that the capital necessary for engaging in that business would be 11 l. an acre, I suppose?—It would be more; it would be 12 l. or 13 l. an acre, at the present prices.

7978. For stock alone?—For stock alone.

7979. Chairman.] Has not pleura-pneumonia been very fatal indeed in Ireland this spring in some cases?—I do not hear so much of it this spring as I have in other years.

7980. I thought I had read an account of it, that it had been particularly fatal, in consequence of the cold winds?—I do not think it has been in our country. Mr. S. Garnett. 25 June 1866.

7981. We imagine in Yorkshire, where we buy a great number of your cattle, that the Irish cattle are more subject to pleura-pneumonia than any cattle we get, and we attribute it to the exposure in the trains and in the steamboats, and because they are so badly treated; do you think that is likely to be the case?—That may be the cause of it. Wishing to avoid it, I do not put my cattle in trucks, I always travel them home from the different fairs.

7982. But the Irish dealers who bring them, bring them by railway?—They of course bring them all by truck in the railway.

7983. Our idea is, that they crowd them very unnecessarily and very injuriously on board the steamers?—I think they do, particularly after the large fairs. They are all trying to push on for the markets. I know they do crowd the packets, and they put as many of them into the trucks as the trucks will carry, undoubtedly.

7984. Lord Naas.] There is no such thing as a dead-meat trade from that country?—Not that I am aware of; I do not know that it would be well carried on, except, perhaps, in Dublin, and there they could not get rid of the offal well. Liverpool would, perhaps, be a better place in which to carry it on than Dublin. The shipping is so great, there would be an easy means of getting rid of the coarse class of cattle better.

7985. The establishment of the dead-meat trade would interfere with the old-established course of trade very much?—It would. I think it is a kind of thing which, if it pays, will be carried on, and if it does not pay it will not be carried on.

7986. It is just one of those things which will regulate itself?—Yes. I think it would be very hard to carry it on during the summer months anywhere. I am sure I do not know how they do it from Aberdeenshire; but, you may depend, if it pays in one place it will be done in another if it can be done. I think the less a trade of that sort is interfered with the better.

7987. Chairman.] Is there any other point you wish to suggest to the Committee?—No, nothing at all.

William Watson, Esq., called in; and Examined.

7988. Chairman.] You are Managing Director of the City of Dublin Steam Packet Company?—I am. W. Watson, Esq.

7989. I presume your experience of the shipping of cattle from Dublin is very considerable?—Generally, I have experience.

7990. Do you ship cattle from any other port than Dublin?—No.

7991. To what ports in England do you ship?—Only to Liverpool.

7992. Not to Holyhead?—No.

7994. How many vessels have you devoted to this cattle trade?—Generally 10.

7995. Do they carry any other freight beside cattle?—Yes; whatever cargo offers.

7996. Where do you carry the cattle, in the hold or on deck?—Both ways. Sometimes a vessel is loaded with nothing but cattle.

7997. Is there any distinction between the shipping of fat cattle and store cattle; will the same boats take both?—Yes; the only distinction is that of price. The store cattle are generally shipped at a lower freight.

7998. Is that because you can put more on board?—Yes; although some store cattle are as large as the fat cattle.

W. Watson, Esq.

25 June 1866.

7999. Do you charge by the head?—Yes, so much a head.

8000. What is the average passage from Dublin to Liverpool?—We consider a 10 hours' passage a very quick passage; in bad weather it is 14 hours. It extends from 10 to 14 hours, according to the weather.

8001. We have had witnesses here who have stated that the cattle are very badly treated in putting them on board the Dublin steamers; that they are knocked about very much?—Of course there is a degree of roughness to make them go down into the ship, but they are not slung now, we hear no complaints from the owners of the stock about it.

8002. Do you ever hear any complaints from the persons to whom they are consigned on the other side?—No, never.

8003. Do you find that the restrictions which have been lately imposed on the trade have caused much difficulty with regard to the cattle trade?—It is hard to say how much is owing to the restrictions, and how much to the course of trade. Of late the trade in lean stock has been nearly extinguished; but that is quite independent of restrictions.

8004. Why do you think the trade is extinguished; is it from fear of the English cattle?—There being market for them in England, was the reason.

8005. How have the restrictions on the English trade affected the fat cattle trade in Ireland, do you think?—The only restriction that I am aware of is, that they cannot leave the Liverpool market alive; they must be slaughtered immediately, and probably that restriction may diminish the numbers going over. Of course parties, you are aware, come from the interior to the Liverpool market to supply themselves; from London, Birmingham, and other large towns.

8006. At the present moment if they are consigned, and if they do not stand in the Liverpool market, they can be taken on?—So I understand.

8007. Has there been any decrease or increase during the present year in the shipment of fat cattle?—I think it has rather decreased.

8008. I suppose you have no statistics as to the quantity of fat cattle bought in Dublin and Liverpool?—No; I only got the notice to attend on Saturday last in Liverpool.

8009. What course do you pursue in respect to the cleansing of your vessel after you have brought a cargo over?—The vessels are cleaned out thoroughly after the cattle are debarked in Liverpool; sawdust is used, and they are made clean enough to take cargoes of fine goods to Dublin, which fine goods of course are expected to come without dirt about them.

8010. Have you ever made use of limewash or other disinfectants?—No; I think not.

8011. You never thought that necessary on account of the foot and mouth disease?—We have no diseased cattle from Ireland.

8012. You have cattle affected with the foot and mouth disease from Ireland?—I do not think it has been considered necessary on account of that.

8013. Lord Naas.] Are there any Board of Trade regulations or others which affect the cattle trade in any way?—None that I am aware of.

8014. It is completely a free trade?—Quite a free trade.

8015. What regulations do you yourselves make with regard to crowding?—We generally give instructions not to crowd them, so as to prevent those in the trade making any complaints.

8016. How does that work; do you often refuse to take cattle that are presented for exportation?—I am not prepared to answer that question; I suppose occasionally we may keep them over till the following day; but we have always professed to give any number of ships necessary to carry away the stock before Saturday night.

8017. Have you generally a spare ship which can be sent forward, if necessary?—We have at the end of the week.

8018. Is the supply of cattle regular?—No, it is rather irregular. It depends, of course, upon the prices at this side, and upon the number coming to Smithfield.

8019. What are the days of the week on which the greatest crowd takes place?—Friday, I think, is the principal shipping day; Friday and Saturday. There is not so much on Thursday, which is the market-day in Dublin.

8020. I suppose it is very difficult to tell, on Friday morning, how many cattle will do?—Quite uncertain. Sometimes the cattle that are expected do not come; it is very uncertain.

8021. Do you often send off more than two ships' load at a time?—Yes; frequently four or five in the busy season.

8022. When do those ships return?—They return the next day if they are wanted for cattle, and if not they wait until their regular turn, to load with cargo at Liverpool. The balance of the trade is always from Dublin; we have no live stock from England; in fact, the little we had we put a stop to.

8023. The back trade is generally very bad, with regard to any description of goods?—Yes; we require the extra number in Dublin for the cattle trade.

8024. Have you improved the accommodation in your ships lately?—We have added two new ships to our fleet of late.

8025. Are the new ships very superior ones to the old ones?—The St. Patrick is the last we put on; she is faster than the others, but as far as accommodation goes I do not think there is any advantage in her; probably she will cross the Channel in an hour's less time.

8026. Have you seen the vessels which bring the cattle from Aberdeen?—No, never. As I am in London I should like to take a look at them to see if we could get any hints from them.

8027. We have had it in evidence that they are very fine vessels?—I dare say.

8028. Do any other companies carry cattle from Dublin?—Yes, there are two other lines; there are the screw vessels, and a new line has been put in opposition; they also carry a good deal of cattle.

8029. Mr. Holland.] How are the cattle placed on board, are their heads tied?—Yes, they are always tied with a rope round their horns, and they are watched in the passage generally by the persons employed by the owners of the stock; Liverpool salesmasters employ their own bullockmen.

8030. Lord Naas.] The company employ no men to look after the cattle on the voyage?—No; but if any assistance is wanted, with regard to the cattle on board, they give it, but we do not consider we have charge of the cattle at sea.

8031. Mr.

8031. Mr. Holland.] You have no divisions between the lots?—No; we have for horses, but not for cattle.

8032. Mr. Graham.] Is there ever any insurance of these cattle?—I fancy not, the risk is considered so trifling. I was looking at the evidence of Mr. Kilby, before the Cattle Disease Committee, and he said that he brought a very large number of cattle over, and never lost but one; and Mr. Garnett has said here to-day, he has only lost one lamb in all his time. We have several times proposed a very small rate of insurance, but we could not get it accepted because the risk is considered so trivial.

8033. Lord Naas.] Have you had any claims for compensation for losses?—Very few.

8034. Have they been settled without resort to law?—We have never had a trial with but one exception, a few years since at the assizes at Naas. The commander of a vessel, in a very heavy gale of wind, thought it prudent to come back, and there was an action commenced against us for not going to sea; however, we got a verdict.

8035. I suppose that was a claim for loss of market?—Yes; but as for any claim for damage I do not recollect such a thing.

8036. Mr. Graham.] Of course your vessels are insured?—No, we run them at our own risk; we have too many to insure them; we think it is cheaper to run the risk than to pay the insurance.

8037. Sir M. W. Ridley.] How many vessels have you?—In this trade we have eight or ten; we have in other lines and in this line together, I think, about 20 ships.

8038. Mr. Graham.] Then, being your own insurers, it is your interest to see that the vessels are not overloaded?—It is our interest that they should be perfectly safe at sea. I recollect one instance we had, a loss which we did attribute to the improper loading, and it was considered necessary to throw the cattle overboard in consequence of it. We paid at once. That was about 12 years ago. Of course we considered ourselves responsible.

8039. You consider yourselves responsible when cattle are thrown overboard?—Undoubtedly; we accepted the responsibility at once and paid the claim.

8040. Lord Naas.] Have you ever been obliged to throw cattle overboard?—That has been the only case.

8041. Mr. Graham.] The loss would be taken on the general average generally, but you take it yourselves?—We do; we thought it not worth while dividing it among the rest of the cargo.

8042. Lord Naas.] Are the facilities for debarkation in Liverpool very good?—Yes; I do not see anything required there. We have inclined planes for the cattle to walk out of the holds. They walk on shore at once. They are landed in dock at the pier-head or the landing-stage, immediately on arrival.

8043. If it were possible to establish a market in Liverpool near to the point of debarkation, would it be an advantage?—I do not think it would, from my knowledge of the trade.

8044. The market is two or three miles from the port?—Yes, it is two or three miles. It would be an extra convenience, of course; but, generally speaking, I suppose the cattle go to parks, and are driven from the parks to the markets. In fact, it must always be so. The cattle we ship on Saturday arrive at Liverpool on the Sunday morning, and they are not in the market till the next day.

8046. Chairman.] Do you ever bring any dead meat?—No, we have never been asked to bring dead meat. Of course it is a subject we have often thought about, and we should be well disposed to co-operate in the matter, and to take the carcases over without being bruised.

8047. Sir M. W. Ridley.] What arrangements have you got with the London and North Western Railway for forwarding cattle?—We have through booking arrangements at Liverpool. Of course, any trade to Holyhead they take in their own vessels; we have also an arrangement with the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway.

8048. With any other companies?—We have nominally with other companies, but we do very little with them. We have arrangements with the Manchester and Sheffield, and with the Great Northern; in fact, I may say we have through booking arrangements with all the railway companies coming to Liverpool. We send a good many cattle up to London by these through routes to London and also to Manchester.

8049. There is no difficulty in sending a beast to any part of England?—No; we send store cattle to all parts of England at which there are markets for them when the trade is going on.

8050. I believe there is only one railway in England comes down to your quay in Dublin?—Yes; that is the Midland Great Western.

8051. The cattle that come from the other railways are driven across the town?—Yes.

8052. Would it not be a great convenience if all the railways went down to the shore?—I do not think it would be a great convenience; it would, of course, for lean stock, but as to fat cattle, I do not see what value there would be in having a railway down to the quay. There is no accommodation there in the way of grass for them. Of course they should go somewhere for grass after standing in the market.

8053. They would still have to remain, I suppose, for some time?—Yes, from Thursday to the shipping time; they would have to remain, perhaps, the following two nights; if it was any advantage, we would gladly have co-operated to bring the cattle market down to the port, but we thought it would be rather an injury to the trade than otherwise.

8054. They might have to be driven back again?—Yes, they would necessarily; first, they would have to come there, then they would have gone back, and lastly would come back again. We thought it would be better to let the market remain where it is, which is in an excellent position for it. The promoters got their Bill, but they did not make their market.

8055. Mr. Norwood.] With reference to a question put to you as to the conveyance of dead meat from Ireland in your steamers, you said you had had the matter under your consideration?—Yes.

8056. Did you come to any conclusion as to the mode in which the dead meat should be conveyed in the steamers?—Only in my own mind; I planned, in my own mind, that we should have shelves in the vessels so as to prevent any one carcase lying on the top of another.

8057. Shelves in the hold?—Yes, as they are

W. Watson, Esq.

25 June 1866.

fitted up already for carrying troops; in some of our vessels we have shelves or bed places for the troops; in some of our ships we can carry half a regiment in that way; and if we could carry the carcases separately from one another, so that they would be freed from any kind of bruising, I think that would answer. I believe, in the trucks they bring up from Scotland, they put one carcase upon another, and I understand the meat does not suffer; but of course the greatest difficulty in carrying on the dead-meat trade is during the hot weather.

8058. Of course, the heat of the hold would aggravate the thing?—Perhaps, for the time it would be in transit Several people interested in the cattle trade have spoken to me about it, and some were very urgent indeed as to the gain it would be to the producer to send it as dead meat to market instead of as live cattle. If it could be turned into a trade of that sort, it would get rid of one great risk of contagion, which is from the cattle drovers, who go in such numbers; that is a difficulty which we have never been able to meet, to prevent the contagion coming back with them.

8059. Could you carry as much dead meat as live cattle in your vessels?—I should think fully, because the weight of the offal would not be carried; I should think it would go fully as cheap, if not cheaper.

8060. Sir M. W. Ridley.] Could you not shelve it upon deck, and cover it, in order to protect it from the sun and wet?—That is not the risk, the risk is really the lapse of time in hot weather. I do not think that the plan of shelves on deck could be adopted; but, of course, below in the hold there is ample ventilation, as necessarily, when we carry live stock we must keep the hatchways open; it is in the holds we should have the shelves.

Mr. Joseph Hennessy, called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. Hennessy.

8061. Chairman.] You are an Importer of foreign cattle at Bristol?—I am a Salesman and importer of Irish cattle alone.

8062. You have nothing to do with the foreign cattle trade?—Nothing whatever.

8063. Do you import any foreign cattle into Bristol at all?—I have only had a few from Plymouth; not directly into Bristol.

8064. Are foreign cattle imported into Bristol to any extent?—None.

8065. From what Irish ports do you get an importation of Irish cattle?—From Cork, Waterford, Dublin, and Wexford.

8066. Are you principally concerned in the fat cattle trade, or the store cattle trade?—In both.

8067. Do the fat cattle come indiscriminately from all the ports you have mentioned or from other ports?—The majority of them come from Cork; a few only come from the other ports.

8068. Do you find those cattle generally arrive in a satisfactory condition?—We do.

8069. Do they arrive healthy?—Yes.

8071. Then they may be detained on board the steamer, in the river, for some time?—They are; but that could be avoided if the Dock Company would agree to what we have asked them to do many times, namely, forming stages by which stock could be landed immediately on the arrival of the steamers, before entering the basin, or floating harbour.

8072. Do you not think they are very crowded on board the steamers?—At times they are; the store cattle in the summer time, in many cases, have been overcrowded.

8073. Could you suggest any regulations to be enforced, either by the Board of Trade or by the Government, with respect to the shipment of cattle from Ireland?—Not unless an experienced man was appointed who would know from experience what a vessel would take, and the number to allow in that vessel and no more.

8074. Then you would have an inspector at the port of shipment, and leave it to his discretion as to the number?—Yes; a man that has had experience in the matter for years. Some vessels can take much more than others, though apparently they are not so large; perhaps they may be larger; but a man having experience in landing cattle and going with them would be the person to regulate it.

8075. If you left it to discretion in that way, would not a person be very liable to give way to the prejudices either of the owners of vessels or the owners of cattle?—I do not know; a disinterested man ought not to do so.

8076. Do you think that the store cattle are too much crowded together?—In ordinary cases, I do. There are none coming at the present time, but occasionally it is so. When there is a great demand for store cattle, and they are anxious to make a market, they may be overcrowded. Coming on a certain day in the week, the market day in Bristol being on Thursday, they all want to send the cattle at once.

8077. To what parts of England do the store cattle imported into Bristol generally come?—I may say every part of England, but principally into Kent. A great many of the Kentish men come down and take them to the different localities.

8078. These cattle in the port of Bristol, consigned by you to different salesmen, are bought by dealers who come over from Ireland?—The majority are consigned to salesmen, who sell them in the Bristol market.

8079. Are the fat cattle usually slaughtered at Bristol?—Under the present regulations.

8080. I am speaking of ordinary times?—In ordinary times they supply the different localities about Bristol, such as Bath and Frome.

8081. Those are sold in the Bristol market, to go to the smaller towns for consumption?—Exactly.

8082. What are the present regulations?—They are slaughtered within four days after having been in the market. Any fat cattle coming coming into Bristol must not be allowed in the market; they must be sent by an order from a magistrate to the place in the country, without being allowed in the market.

8083. Under the present regulations can a butcher at Bath, for instance, give you an order for cattle, and may these cattle go through your hands without going into the market at home, to Bath?—It is so at present.

8004. Is there a good deal of selling in yards and privately at Bristol at present?—The cattle have now fallen off from Ireland, it being between the two seasons; but in consequence of the restrictions put upon sheep and other things in that way, the sheep not being allowed to go into the market have to be sold about the streets in many cases.

8085. Did you find that the Irish graziers raised objections to the restrictions that were placed by the Government lately upon the trade?—They raised objections; inasmuch as having no competition they did not get as much of our cattle in the market from the different localities as they would otherwise.

8086. Was the price of fat cattle considerably lower?—Very much lower than was anticipated, and much lower than it would have been had we had competition from the different localities.

8087. Is the price of fat cattle at Bristol much lower than in other towns?—It is much lower than it is at Dublin.

8088. Is the price of meat to the consumer lower at Bristol than it is at Dublin?—I do not think it is.

8089. How do you account for the price being lower in Bristol than it is in Dublin at the present time?—I do not know whether the supply to Dublin is much shorter than usual.

8090. Has the supply to Bristol been much larger than usual?—No; not so large as usual; the demand has fallen off considerably.

8091. How do you suppose that the country buyers, who have usually been supplied from Bristol, have been supplied?—In consequence of the restrictions the farmers have held their own cattle, and had to kill them at their own houses, and buyers have gone out to those localities and bought their cattle until latterly, when they could get a magistrate's order to bring them into town.

8092. They have been able to bring their cattle now into market for a considerable period?—Not many weeks.

8093. Have the prices of fat stock in Bristol market been much lower since that restriction was removed?—The price is now advancing, but the quantity has fallen off from Ireland, it being now between the two seasons; that accounts for it.

8094. It generally is high just now all over England, on account of the lapse between the two seasons; did you, when the restriction of trade was going on, send much dead meat to London, and to the manufacturing districts?—No; the only meat going to London from Bristol has been principally prime meat to the London Market.

8095. There was prime meat sent to the London market?—Yes.

8096. Is there any meat sent from Bristol to Birmingham, or the manufacturing districts?—With one exception, I sent eight dead beasts on one occasion when I could not get a pass to send them alive; those are all that have been sent.

8097. Your trade is entirely that of a salesman of live cattle; you are not a butcher?—No.

8098. Mr. Banks Stanhope.] I wish to ask you a few questions with regard to the carriage of these cattle; are the Irish cattle carried on deck?—Some of them are; principally the store cattle when they do come.

8099. Are they all in one row, or are they outside in pens?—They are all in one row; the fat cattle tied, and the store cattle loose, they being small.

8100. Are there any below at the same time?—We have generally put the fat cattle below to keep them from the inclemency of the weather; to keep them comfortable.

8101. Is there any rule with regard to the number of fat cattle that are to be taken in a certain space below?—No; we never have too many fat cattle on board any of our vessels, because our market has not sufficient consumption for a very large quantity.

8102. In your opinion, would it be possible that all cattle vessels should be licensed to carry a certain quantity of stock, either store stock or fat stock, as the case might be?—There would be many difficulties in the way, in consequence of the size of the cattle principally.

8103. I presume fat cattle, to a certain degree, are more or less of one size?—Yes, they are generally of one size.

8104. There would be no difficulty in regulating that portion of it?—No.

8105. Store cattle are principally animals that are fed for one year?—They are principally yearlings and two-year old heifers that we get into Bristol in the shape of stores.

8106. Might it not be possible to specify the number of yearlings, or two-year olds, or three-year olds, and that the ships might be licensed to carry a certain number only in a given space?—I think not. According to the different holds of the vessels, so many yearlings could go into such a hold; that might be done, but our vessels bring in a general cargo. They have sheep and lambs, pigs, horses, fat cattle, lean cattle, and so on. There would be great difficulty in that matter.

8107. Can you make any suggestion to stop the inconvenience which often happens, as to the vessels being inconveniently overcrowded with store cattle?—Only that which I have named; a particular man having authority to see that the vessels were stowed properly, and not allowing them to be overcrowded.

8108. Is there any method of Government interference which you could recommend?—I think not. The overcrowding of cattle very seldom happens; I have seen it, but it very seldom happens.

8109. Are they at all fed on board?—With the fat cattle we always send hay, but the store cattle cannot be fed; they waste the hay under their feet.

8110. Do you give them any water?—Not on board. We may give the fat cattle water occasionally in fine weather.

8111. Have you ever heard that the Irish store cattle in England were more subject to the rinderpest than any others?—Never.

8112. Have you ever heard that they are very subject to pleura-pneumonia?—No.

8113. Do you think that the present system of carrying over store cattle is advisable?—Our vessels have been improving yearly since I have been in business. I do not think we could have a better system, if alterations were made, for free egress from the ship, so that directly the vessels come up the river to land; we have now to wait sometimes three or four hours.

Mr. J. Hennessy.

8114. Mr. Holland.] In the market at Bristol, before the restrictions, were all your fat cattle and store cattle mixed?—No. The market is divided into two sides, one for store cattle and the other for fat cattle.

8115. Are foreign cattle mixed with the store cattle at all?—We have no foreign cattle, with the exception of those that have been exposed some time ago in London, and brought down to Bristol to be sold.

8116. There is no foreign importation?—There is no foreign importation into Bristol.

8117. Where do you send these store heifers in particular?—We sell them to the different dealers from Kent and Sussex, and other places.

8118. For grazing?—For grazing.

8119. Sir Matthew Ridley.] Is there any inspection of cattle at Bristol?—At present there is. The inspector comes round the market also and inspects any Irish cattle that we send out of Bristol to Bath or Frome, or any other neighbourhood.

8120. How long has that regulation been in application?—Some two months, perhaps.

8121 Only since there was a rumour of the cattle disease being in Ireland?—No; prior to that.

8122. Had there been no system of inspection of Irish cattle previously to the occurrence of the cattle plague?—No; there was no disinfection. Parties travelling with cattle were obliged to disinfect themselves and change their clothes, and so forth; that was adopted on board the vessels.

8123. Are the vessels thoroughly cleansed on discharging?—On every voyage the holds are whitewashed, and disinfectants are used every time they come.

8124. The filth is taken out without delay?—The filth is taken out without delay at both ends, and the vessels disinfected and whitelimed each voyage.

8125. What is the length of the passage?—Twenty-four hours is the ordinary passage; some do it in 18 hours.

8127. You seem to fancy it could not be done by legislative means?—It is not insuperable, I think.

8129. And it would be desirable?—The only difficulty I see, is with reference to the different sizes of the cattle.

8130. The difficulty could be got over if there was a certain amount of cubic space allotted to each description of animal?—Yes; I think it is not insurmountable.

8131. Do you say that the store cattle are left to run about the decks unpenned?—Yes; they are small cattle.

8132. That is a serious matter in bad weather, is it not?—No; they form pens with shifting boards on deck.

8133. So that they are confined within certain limits?—They are confined within certain limits.

8134. Mr. Banks-Stanhope.] Are they fed at all at Bristol?—Yes. We have farms, and we turn them directly from the ship's side on to the grass. We have water-troughs all along the quay, put there by the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Society, for the benefit of the cattle when they come out of the vessel; they are put on the quay directly.

8135. And always fed?—The store cattle are sent to the grass directly they come out; the fat cattle are sent to the lairs, and the stores to the grass.

8137. But this regulation supposed him to be bound not to take above a certain quantity; your first suggestion was that the practical man should go upon his own judgment?—Yes; if he knows what his vessels will take properly he should not be bound to take more.

8138. The suggestion proceeds upon the idea of a certain space of cubic feet; a man arriving with a flock of sheep might find his flock of sheep cut off in the middle because of the space not being sufficient?—Yes; there would be that difficulty.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Mr. Carnegie.	Mr. Graves.
Mr. Dent.	Mr. Graham.
Mr. Willbraham Egerton.	Lord Naas.
Sir M. W. Ridley.	Mr. Norwood.

MR. HUNT IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. HENRY ETRIDGE WILKINSON, called in; and Examined.

Mr. H. E. Wilkinson. 2 July 1866.

8139. Sir M. W. Ridley.] YOU are the inspector of foreign cattle imported into Newcastle?—I am.

8140. How long have you acted in that capacity?—Since the month of February 1864.

8141. You are not the only inspector, I think. You have a colleague?—I am the only inspector for the Board of Customs.

8142. But you inspect equally for the corporation of Newcastle?—I inspect equally for the corporation of Newcastle.

8143. You inspect the cattle market?—I inspect the cattle market.

8145. Will you give me the gross number of cattle imported in the last two years, as you say the return is here?—I have the returns for the last two years separate and distinct.

8146. Will you give the return for 1864 and the return for 1865?—I have it in this way. I have it from the 30th June 1864 to the 30th June 1865; and from the 30th June 1865 to the 30th June 1866, taking a half year from each.

8147. Will you read the figures?—The total number imported in the year ending the 30th June 1865 was 3,625 cattle, 10,564 sheep, 1,847 pigs.

8148. Then the return for this year?—For the year ending the 30th June 1866, 7,019 cattle, 22,355 sheep, 484 pigs.

8151. Is that the only instance in which a foreign cargo has been seized for rinderpest?—No; there was a second on the 8th October. The "Lord Raglan" brought 34 cattle, one of which was affected with rinderpest, and was destroyed. The remaining 33 were slaughtered, and passed as food.

8152. Mr. Dent.] Was that a cargo from Rotterdam?—Yes.

8153. Sir M. W. Ridley.] Was it in the same vessel?—Yes.

8154. Will you put in those Returns?—I brought them for the purpose, if they are required. You will find the name of each vessel, the date, and a weekly reference calculated for each week up to our market day, which is on the Tuesday, so as to show the arrivals each week.

8155. Is there only one arrival in each week?—More. There are always two from Hamburg, and there were always two from Rotterdam. There is one a fortnight from Antwerp, one a fortnight from Dunkirk, one a fortnight from Denmark.—(The Returns were then handed in, for which Vide Appendix.)

8156. You have had constant opportunities of judging of the condition of the foreign cattle on their arrival?—Yes.

8157. What is your opinion as to the general condition in which they have arrived; I do not mean as regards fatness, but as regards health?—Very good. I have never, excepting in the instances mentioned, seen animals suffering from disease of any consequence, save and except the ordinary foot and mouth disease. I have stopped the import of those wherever I possibly could. I have always quarantined them, and we have been put to some expense about it. For some time we have not had any imported with that disease.

8158. I mean whether they have in point of condition suffered much from the passage?—No; they have been in perfect health, as far as that is concerned. Our boats are, with the one or two exceptions I have pointed out, not over-crowded; they are not entirely cattle boats, they are not over-crowded, and the men take great care of the cattle. The vessels are calculated, as a rule, to carry a much larger cargo of cattle than they do, and I am bound to say they arrive in very good condition.

8159. It does not appear to you that the ventilation is deficient?—The ventilation is not conducted in most of the vessels on any very sound or fixed principle; and when they have carried their full complement, I have occasionally complained of the vessel being over-heated. I have known instances where they have had to lie-to in a storm, or where they have persisted in going on where they ought to have lain-to, where the cattle have suffered a good deal.

8160. What vessels, beyond those of the General Steam Navigation Company, are there on that station?—There is a vessel belonging to Pile, Spence, and Co. of Hartlepool, called the "Fairy Queen," which runs to Aarhuus, in Denmark. She is fitted up almost as a cattle ship.

8161. Which cattle come to you in the best condition, with reference to the appearances they present after the voyage?—For the reasons I have stated, that they are so seldom over-crowded, I can make no distinction. They are in excellent health; I have no complaint to make in that respect.

8162. Are these vessels cleansed out as soon as ever they have discharged the cattle?—They are thoroughly cleansed out. The vessels of the General Steam Navigation Company adopt a very good plan of bringing their cattle standing on sand ballast of 18 to 20 inches thick, and they turn off that, as well as they could, from a well cleansed floor.

8163. Are they disinfected after the dirt is taken out?—They are thoroughly disinfected under the supervision of the Board of Customs, according to the orders; but previously to that time, they were always thoroughly sluiced out. I complained so much of the foot and mouth disease, and the owners said so much about it, that the ships always had to be cleaned out thoroughly.

8164. Is that filth thrown into the river?—It is taken away in the hoppers, and goes out to sea.

8165. When these cattle are landed they are now put, I believe, under some shedding?—There is a very nicely constructed place for that purpose.

8166. That was erected by the Corporation?—It was erected by the Corporation, and is capable of holding something like 300 cattle and 400 or 500 sheep, with ample divisions in case of two or three cargoes being landed at once.

8167. Is that immediately contiguous to the quay of landing?—It is immediately contiguous, as this plan will show (introducing a plan). After the cargo is taken out it is thoroughly sluiced out with water, and disinfectants are applied.

8168. Is that done under your inspection?—It is done under my inspection. There are also large slaughter-houses attached to it, where we can kill any amount of animals. We can kill a whole cargo, if necessary.

8169. A whole cargo might be destroyed in a day, if necessary?—They might, if necessary.

8170. Is there facility in that shedding to institute any system of quarantine as regards these animals?—I think there is a perfect facility. We had not the slightest accident from the other quarantine yard, and that was not near so good an arrangement. There was not the slightest case of rinderpest traced to those 125 animals, and we had them there for four days.

8171. What store cattle come in these vessels?—Very few. The principal store cattle came from Denmark until the last order was issued. We have had several importations of cows, which have replenished the cows lost in the town; some hundreds.

8172. Can you tell the Committee what number of cows have died in Newcastle since the outbreak of the rinderpest?—385 died, and 376 were slaughtered and passed as food.

8173. Were those principally the cows of the freemen that went upon the moor?—They were principally the cows belonging to the freemen and to the town.

8174. Had cows been imported from Holland into Newcastle between the time of last autumn and the period at which their introduction was forbidden by the Order of the Privy Council?—There were a few.

8175. Did any disease appear to be imported by them?—There was none. We could trace, step by step, every case we had in the town, and out into the district.

8176. I think this outbreak among the cows broke out in two different districts of the town at different periods; first in the western, and subsequently in the eastern district?—It never yet got into the eastern district; from what cause is almost difficult to determine; it never yet got there, except in two small instances, where a solitary cow was lost, and that was to be distinctly traced to carelessness on the part of the individual.

8177. What was the condition of the cow-houses at the time of the appearance of the rinderpest?—They were in a wretched state; a great proportion of the cows were on the moor.

8178. Are those cowhouses under inspection now?—They are.

8180. How long do the cattle that are placed in the sheds for inspection on landing remain in those sheds before they are removed to the cattle market?—Until I am thoroughly satisfied that they are right.

8181. What period of time would be sufficient to satisfy your mind as to the existence or non-existence of rinderpest in any cargo?—So far as rinderpest is concerned, I never have had any trouble trouble in examining them. I have generally been able to determine it on the first examination, and within four or five hours, if the animals were not in any distress from a severe passage.

8182. You could not detect it in the process of incubation, of course?—I do not profess to do that.

8183. And therefore a quarantine, to be effectual, could hardly be calculated at a period of less than 14 days?—It would scarcely be safe under 14 days.

8184. Should you be in favour of quarantining store cattle as a general principle?—I should, unless I was well satisfied that the district from which they came was perfectly free.

8185. Would you think it necessary to quarantine them now, if they came from a country in which rinderpest is not proclaimed to exist?—If I was satisfied that the arrangements there were good and sufficient, I should not quarantine them.

8186. Do you think that store cattle would be increased in value by being quarantined, and a certificate granted by an inspector, stating them to be in good health; would they be advanced in value to the purchaser?—I think they would; I do not think they would be bought as store cattle unless they came from a country where it was well understood they were free from disease.

8187. Is it your impression that buyers would give more for cattle certificated as having undergone quarantine, than they would for those as to which they had simply to take their chance?—I will give you one simple proof of it, as far as my own district is concerned: when a few Dutch cows come over, and a few German cows in milk, I have only to say to the cowkeepers, "Do not buy them;" and they will not; and every one has to be slaughtered. On the contrary, with regard to the Denmark cows, I recommend them to buy them, and they have purchased immense numbers of them.

8188. What is your opinion as to the policy of allowing the transit of foreign-imported stock by means of the rail, at this moment, to the large towns in the district of Newcastle, such as Sunderland, Morpeth, and Hartlepool?—I am in favour of it.

8189. You are not aware whether any decision has been come to by the Privy Council on the subject?—Not as to foreign cattle. I do not know what decision they have come to.

8190. Do you think that the present shedding, or site, into which the cattle are placed on being landed, is all sufficient for a quarantine depôt, without making any further preparation?—It would not answer for a large accumulation of stock; it answers our purposes very well as a quarantine so far, but not to accommodate a three weeks' supply.

8191. Are there slaughter-houses now provided by the Corporation contiguous to the cattle market?—There are.

8193. Do you think it possible to supply the district adjoining to Newcastle, under the present system, by dead meat alone?—It is perfectly impossible.

8194. Is that cattle market, which you are constantly in the habit of visiting, well cleansed, and the filth carried away?—They are well cleansed, and the filth is carried away.

8195. Where is that filth carried to?—I think I may say that the market is thoroughly disinfected every week; there is chloride of lime sprinkled over the whole of it; but I can show you a plan whereon the whole of the sewage is laid down.—(A Plan was produced and explained to the Committee.)

8196. Now, as to the slaughter-houses at the places where the cattle are landed, are they purified in the same way?—Thoroughly. Here are the three principal wharves on which the cattle are landed; and there is the short distance they have to walk to the receptacle for them, which is a large place into which they have to walk.—(The Witness explained the Plan to the Committee.)

8197. Chairman.] I see this is marked "slaughter-houses;" are those public slaughter-houses?—No. This is the corporation foreign cattle-yard.

8198. Do the slaughter-houses belong to the corporation?—The slaughter-houses belong to the corporation, and are only used to destroy diseased beasts.

8199. Sir M. W. Ridley.] The slaughter-houses near the cattle market are equally the property of the corporation, and are used by those who buy the beasts to kill them there, and then they take the carcases into the country?—They are situated close to the cattle market; within a very few yards of it.

8200. Have you been in the habit of slaughtering animals where you detect pleura-pneumonia?—I invariably have them slaughtered.

8201. If you detect it on their arrival, are those cattle condemned?—The whole of the cargo is condemned.

8202. Have those cargoes of cattle, when they are brought to the London Wharf, as it is called, to wait long before being inspected, in consequence of the tide being insufficient to bring them up?—No; they are invariably removed as soon as the vessel comes alongside. They never come up the river without having water enough. They have very powerful donkey-engines attached to the hold, and they can take them out in slings at the rate of a 100 an hour.

8203. Do you think a detention of that sort at the edge of a wharf would be as injurious to the cattle as the voyage itself?—If they stand any time it becomes very injurious. The ventilation is of a nature depending upon the motion of the vessel.

8204. As I understand, the inconvenience does not arise in the landing of cattle at Newcastle?—It does not.

8205. Have you had any opportunity of judging of the condition of the Irish cattle at the time of their landing, of their being delivered from the boats bringing them from Ireland?—I have. I have frequently come over from Ireland with them.

8206. What is their general treatment?—They are carried upon deck; they are huddled together; and if there is any storm at the time, they get a good deal knocked about; they slip and tumble about, and get a great deal more bruised than the foreign cattle do.

Mr. H. E. Wilkinson.

8207. Can you speak to the condition of the beasts that come over from Belfast, and the west coast, to Morecambe Bay?—I can speak to the condition of the cattle that come to Morecambe Bay from Belfast, and also to the condition of the cattle that come to Silloth. They have no foot-hold in those boats. They are merely on the slippery deck, and they tumble about a good deal.

8208. Chairman.] Are you acquainted with those ports?—I have been in the habit of going to and from Ireland, some years ago. I went over three times last year, and came back by the different routes.

8209. Lord Naas.] What routes did you come back by?—I came back to Morecambe with cattle.

8210. Sir M. W. Ridley.] Have you noticed those cattle suffer very much from exposure on deck to the sun in coming from Ireland?—I have not; I have generally had the misfortune to come over in stormy weather, and I have seen them suffer a good deal then.

8211. They are all on deck?—They are all on deck.

8212. Do you consider it is well that those animals should be brought without covering on deck in hot weather; is it not likely to create a predisposition to disease on their being driven up the country after being landed?—Yes; I should think it would.

8214. As to the conveyance of sheep; a great many sheep have been landed at Newcastle?—Yes.

8215. In what condition have they arrived? What has been the effect of the voyage upon them?—I seldom or ever have had cause to detain any of them. Occasionally, in very rough weather, they get a little salt water over them if they happen to be upon deck, and I always keep them until I see that they have recovered. It is a very rare circumstance.

8216. Do they seem to have suffered from too close confinement or close packing upon board those boats?—I never had any sheep destroyed from that cause.

8217. The prices have risen a good deal in the Newcastle Market?—They have.

8218. To what do you chiefly attribute that?—To the want of stock.

8219. A short supply?—Yes.

8220. They have risen very much?—They have risen very much, and our foreign imports are on the increase.

8221. Are the quoted prices at Newcastle Market struck by the clerk of the market?—No, they are published from the report of the inspector of meat, Mr. Sinton.

8222. He is not clerk of the market?—He is not.

8223. Do these prices appear to you, who have great experience and opportunities of judging of that market, and are constantly in it, to be accurately given?—I think they are fairly given.

8224. Are they given upon a comparison of notes between the butchers and salesmen, or is it a general calculation drawn by Mr. Sinton, from his own experience, and large practice and acquaintance with that market; are the prices a record of his own personal experience and individual opinion?—He makes it his business to go round the whole of the market, apparently, and to ascertain for himself the prices from listening to bargains going on. He was a butcher himself at one time, and has some idea of the quality of meat. He hears the prices, and therefore it is easier for him to make an estimate than many other men.

8225. Chairman.] Are the prices that are quoted the prices of live animals, or the prices per stone of dead meat?—He calculates the price per stone from the purchases that he sees made.

8226. He witnesses the purchase of live animals; he calculates what those live animals will weigh when dead, and draws his estimate accordingly?—Yes, a great many butchers in that district buy animals to weigh at so much per stone.

8227. Sir M. W. Ridley.] Does it appear to you that those prices are fairly given to the public under that estimate?—It appears to me that they are fairly given in our market.

8228. Is there anything you can suggest to the Committee which might be an improvement in the management of the import trade of stock into the country; do you consider it desirable that any Government regulation should be established, or any certificate given for the vessels which import them?—I do; I think that all vessels should be as liable to be inspected, and to be certified as being fit to carry cattle as to carry passengers.

8229. Do you think that the interests of those engaged in the trade would not be sufficient for their own security to employ only the better class of boats; do you think the trade would regulate itself without any Government interference or supervision?—With us the trade is very well conducted, as far as I am capable of judging. The vessels are powerful, good, fast sailers. The cattle seem to be invariably well attended to, and I have heard no complaints, but I have seen vessels arrive, thorough-going cattle ships, with the animals in a disgraceful state.

8230. Where was that?—In London.

8231. What vessels were they?—It was when I was here in August of last year. I saw four or five vessels land their cargoes in a disgraceful state.

8232. Was that at Blackwall?—At the Blackwall Pier.

8233. Do you recollect what vessels they were? No. One of them was not thoroughly adapted for cattle; that I do well remember. The other one I went on board of was one of the immense cattle boats; and after the cargo was taken out, I saw a lot of mutilated pigs lying about, looking in a very helpless condition.

8234. That you have not seen in the port of Tyne during your experience?—No, it occurs no oftener than I have stated here.

8235. Could you give us the last quoted price at Newcastle Market?—Ten shillings per stone of 14 lbs.

8236. Mr. Dent.] It is always a dear market, is it not?—I think it does command good prices. It is generally higher than the London market.

8237. Chairman.] I understand you to say you would like a system of Government regulations as regards the vessels in which cattle are imported?

imported?—My impression is, that the ventilation of cattle ships at the present time is conducted on no system at all.

8238. Do you think it desirable that all vessels should be registered and licensed?—Precisely. If they profess to carry so many cattle, I should allow them to carry no more than a certain number; and there should be provision also for regulating the watering of the cattle.

8239. In the vessels that come to Newcastle, is there any provision for watering cattle?—They have in each vessel large iron tanks, to hold a certain quantity of water; two large tanks, which hold 1,200 gallons each. In a storm it is almost impossible, in the way the animals are tied in our vessels, round at the sides, to get to their heads.

8240. The animals are tied round by the sides of the vessels, by their heads?—Always.

8241. Would it not be a better plan, if animals were tied with their heads towards the centre of the vessel?—Yes.

8242. With a space in front, so that a man could pass down between the heads of the animals, and water them?—Yes, that would be very desirable, so that a man could pass down between the heads, and water them with the hose.

8243. If that arrangement were made, ventilation could be more easily supplied; there could be ventilating shafts under the heads of the animals?—That could be done. I think they require a shaft to take the cold air down to the bottom of the hold, before it comes up. In one vessel, the "Fairy Queen," from Denmark, I got them to adopt that plan.

8244. I suppose you think it necessary that the holds should be properly penned off with partitions?—Yes; as we have them in the Tyne steamships, there are partitions put up between four and five.

8245. You think that should be regulated, according to Government regulation?—Yes.

8246. What space would you allot to each animal?—There is such an immense difference in their size, that I could scarcely tell you.

8247. You say they should be licensed to carry so many. How would you deal with the question of a large animal; the pen that would hold six small animals, would only be able to hold four large ones; how would you deal with that, with regard to licensing the vessels?—I should take the number of large or medium size animals, and arrive at it in that way.

8248. You would take an average?—Yes, take an average animal.

8249. Do you find it the case that animals from certain countries are, as a rule, larger than the animals from other countries?—There is no comparison; the animals we receive from Denmark, as compared with those large working bullocks from other places, are like Shetland ponies, compared with dray-horses.

8250. Would you say, for instance, that six Dutch cattle should represent four Spanish cattle, or anything of that sort?—Yes; that might be arranged, I think.

8251. With regard to sheep and beasts, would you allow so many sheep to represent a certain number of pigs?—That might be arranged as well.

8252. Have you considered that in detail at all?—Not thoroughly in detail.

8253. Do you think if you had time, you could put down on paper a scheme for it?—I think it might be done without much trouble. I have some idea of the amount of cubic feet of air required for animals under different circumstances, and the space in which they can conveniently live. I do not think there is much fear of the over-crowding if the ventilation is made efficient. That is the great point; the ventilation should be regulated either by a fan-blast, or any other approved method.

8255. Is the Newcastle Cattle Market a great market for the country all round about?—Yes.

8256. What other market is there anywhere near?—There is no other market anywhere near.

8257. What is the nearest cattle market to Newcastle?—The nearest cattle market of any consequence, and it is a very small market, is Carlisle. There are also Leeds and Darlington.

8258. What towns depend upon the Newcastle Market for their supply?—North and South Shields, and Sunderland; they are very large towns, each of them. Blythe, Morpeth, Consett, and Durham; that is within a radius of 12 or 14 miles. This morning I received a letter from some 20 or 30 butchers directing my attention to a few villages around them; and I just added up the population, which comes to something like 50,000. It is one continuous town.

8259. Sir M. W. Ridley.] Was it in the Cowpen and Blythe district?—Yes; they are most anxious to have something done for them; they are suffering very much. The united population of those places amounts to something very great.

8260. Chairman.] Is there more than one market-day in the week?—At present there are two a week; but the second market was made to meet the Order in Council, compelling foreign stock to be slaughtered in four days: it is of very little avail; they do not attend to it.

8261. Before that there was only one market-day?—Before that there was only one market-day, on the Tuesday.

8262. What was the ordinary supply of fat stock?—On the average, about 1,000.

8263. When the Order in Council forbade foreign cattle to be removed inland, that established a second market?—Yes; but it is not attended. The cattle salesmen prefer risking the order and keeping their cattle in the sheds.

8264. The foreign cattle go now into your cattle market?—They go into our cattle market; and they always have done so.

8265. By the Order in Council they must be killed within four days?—They must be killed within four days.

8266. They cannot pass inland at present?—They cannot.

2 July 1866.

8267. What is done at present with these cattle; what is the course of trade?—I believe the course of trade to be this, that the cattle come into the cattle salesman's shed, and the butchers buy them from the sheds and slaughter them in Newcastle.

8268. And convey them away in sides?—In sides. A great deal of irregular trade is carried on in that way. Our sheep market is in the same anomalous position. We have no show of sheep in our market in consequence, because when once they are branded they have to be destroyed.

8269. There is nothing to prevent sheep going by rail now?—No; but if once they are shown in our market, and the salesmen did not meet with a sale, they would still have to be slaughtered.

8270. And that prevents their coming into the market?—Yes.

8271. What is the present course of trade with regard to slaughtering these foreign beasts and conveying their carcases away. Do the buyers at the other towns buy the carcases of the Newcastle butchers who slaughter at Newcastle?—The butchers slaughter at Newcastle themselves, and cart them home.

8272. Suppose it was a permanent arrangement that all the foreign beasts imported should be slaughtered at Newcastle, do you not think that the course of trade would alter very much, and that the buyers would buy of the Newcastle butchers?—No, I do not think they would do it. The pitmen do not believe in the sight of dead meat. They like to have some proof of an animal's existence before they purchase. They will not have it at all. The principal portion of the foreign cattle goes down to Sunderland.

8273. This is still going on to a great extent?—It is.

8274. Have you heard great complaints that meat has been spoiled in the transit?—Yes, especially meat at this time of year, that has travelled by railway; and the cattle get heated and exhausted in the trucks, and have to be killed. The meat will not keep; it scarcely stiffens in the first instance.

8275. I am speaking of foreign animals imported in vessels, and slaughtered at Newcastle, and sent off as dead meat. Have you heard that that meat has been spoilt?—Yes, they complain, but not so much of them as they do of the others.

8276. Have you heard of cases of meat being spoilt?—Yes, I have. I have known it to be spoilt.

8277. How does it travel; is it packed, or does it go in trucks with a covering over it?—These country butchers in the large district I have just given you the details of, take them all in their own carts.

8278. But I am speaking of the supply to the large towns?—They pack them in sides, and send them by the road.

8279. Do they pack them in hampers?—No; they lay them in the pack, side by side.

8280. In the trucks?—No, they suspend them from the roof.

8281. In sides?—Yes.

8282. Have they what they call meat vans?—They have only the ordinary covered vans.

8283. And they suspend them inside those vans?—Yes.

8284. Do you hear any complaints of their getting dusty as they travel along?—The only complaint I have heard of was that they did not stiffen the second time, and they get putrid rapidly.

8285. Are they sent off before they are stiffened?—I expect they give them time to stiffen, and they think they take them away as stiff as the meat can possibly be; but the complaint is that as soon as they get them home they get flaccid; they never stiffen again, and the meat spoils.

8286. Do you apprehend that the carcases have ever been properly stiffened?—In the extremely hot weather which we have had during the last two or three weeks, it has been very difficult to get meat of that sort to stiffen.

8287. Is it within your knowledge that meat that is once stiffened will get flaccid again?—It will become flaccid again, and just in the same condition as the run hare; you may have the stiffening, and in the course of half-an-hour it will pass off again completely; so it is with the meat in this condition.

8288. What is your system of slaughter-houses at Newcastle; I am not now speaking of those belonging to the Corporation, but the butchers' slaughter-houses; are they licensed?—The principal slaughter-houses of the town are built by the corporation, and they are rented from the corporation. I am speaking under correction. I think the freemen or the different companies of the town built those large public slaughter-houses. At all events, they are large public slaughter-houses.

8289. They are public slaughter-houses, and the butchers rent them?—The butchers each rent their own.

8290. And they have as much control over their own part of the slaughter-houses as if it was upon their own premises?—They have, with this exception, that the whole are under inspection.

8291. Does that conduce very much to the facility of inspection?—Very much.

8292. Are there private slaughter-houses besides in the town?—There are.

8293. Are they licensed?—They are not licensed.

8294. Are they inspected?—There is a nuisance inspector, who has control over them.

8295. Do you find that the butchers prefer having their own slaughter-houses, or renting the public slaughter-houses?—The public slaughter-houses are every one let.

8296. They find it is more convenient for the trade?—They find it is very convenient for the trade. It keeps their workmen all about them, and they have the means of keeping the places thoroughly cleansed: they are well-built, well-flagged, and well-drained; and the corporation carts take the manure away, and all that sort of thing.

8297. Mr. Dent.] Did you ever hear last autumn of any diseased cattle being thrown overboard from foreign ports on the coast?—I read accounts of such. We searched the Manifests and we found it had not occurred to any boats that came to the Tyne.

8298. You do not conceive that there would be any danger in the removal of foreign cattle from Newcastle Market to the large consuming towns?—I should advocate it if they were situated on a line of railway, and to allow them to be killed at the stations, not to travel by road.

8299. At present you say there is a good deal of of evasion of the orders in Newcastle?—There has sprung up within the last week or two some little evasion of them.

8300. Do you think there has been any check to the importation of foreign cattle from the restrictions that have been placed upon them?—The restriction has robbed us of the dairy cows from Denmark entirely; that is, stopped. Of course we have none from Rotterdam.

8301. Do you think that the fact of having to slaughter them within four days of their arrival has checked the importation of foreign cattle?—I do not know what effect it may have had. The German war has been somewhat of a stimulus; there has been more sent over on that account.

8302. They have sent them over to prevent them being taken?—Yes, I think so.

8303. Mr. Norwood.] Have you seen cattle conveyed in railway trucks?—I have inspected the whole of the cattle that has come to the Newcastle market for some time.

8304. Are they sometimes over-crowded?—Occasionally.

8305. I suppose you would advocate Parliamentary interference with the stowage of cattle in railways as well as in ships?—There is some little interference with the cattle conveyed by railway already, to a certain extent.

8306. With regard to the cubical contents of the truck?—No, they are liable to be brought up for over-crowding them; for cruelty.

8307. Do you know whether there is any specified amount of room given to an animal in railway trucks?—The trucks are calculated to carry so many.

8308. You do not know the basis on which that is done?—No, I do not.

8309. With reference to giving them water in bad weather, that is very difficult. Of course, that difficulty is caused by the weather?—It is a very difficult matter at sea, in bad weather.

8310. Would cattle take water in the case of a severe storm, do you think?—They invariably take water in the holds of these vessels, whenever they can get it.

8311. They would not eat when they are suffering from sea sickness, I suppose?—I never have seen them suffer very much yet.

8312. They do suffer, I believe?—They do suffer a little. I think they suffer more by reaction. They suffer more within 24 hours afterwards than they do at the time.

8314. That is a reason why the fat cattle are generally killed soon after importation, whether there is an Order in Council for it or not?—They always are.

8315. They do slide off somewhat?—They do.

8316. Chairman.] Have you considered whether it is practicable to water animals in railway trucks?—I should scarcely think it would be in a limited space.

8317. Lord Naas.] Do you think it is necessary, except in very long journeys, to water cattle in railway trucks?—I think not.

8318. What is the length of time you think a beast can go without water, in ordinary times, without injury?—Twenty-four hours.

8319. And that, under proper railway management, would be sufficient to take an animal almost from one part of the United Kingdom to another?—Yes; with us there are watering troughs in the stations, and they take them out and put them in again very quickly.

8320. Chairman.] Do you think, in very hot weather, an animal could go twenty-four hours without water?—I was asked "under ordinary circumstances." I should say that in very hot weather they would require water often. Store cattle would travel well enough.

8321. Sir M. W. Ridley.] This paper of the population of the various townships shows above 25,000 persons. Is the whole of that population at the present moment supplied by dead-meat brought in butchers' carts from Newcastle?—Entirely.

8323. Has the price of meat risen in Newcastle since the Act of Parliament was passed on the 20th February?—Very much; we have had it as high as 12*s.*

8324. What was it before that time. Can you give us the price?—It was down to 8*s.*

8325. When was it 8*s.*?—It has been 8*s.* this spring.

8326. Lord Naas.] Is that the retail price, or the carcase price?—That is the carcase price at present.

8327. Chairman.] You say that it has been 8*s.* this spring?—Yes.

8328. And it has been 12*s.*?—It has been 12*s.*, and it was down again to 10*s.*

8329. Can you account for its fall to 10*s.*?—I think it may be accounted for by the extra supply we have had during the last couple of weeks. Three weeks ago there were only 320 animals in Newcastle market, 240 of which were foreign.

8330. And you wanted a thousand?—Our requirements are about a thousand, but there is an immense quantity of cattle sent past the town to different places in consignment.

8331. So that your demands now are not so great as they were?—Not quite; but they object to the system. There is a want of competition, and there is no regularity in prices.

8332. Mr. Dent.] There are a great many cattle bought in Newcastle for Leeds and Wakefield?—Yes; and a good many are bought that are never brought into the market.

8333. I mean in ordinary times?—In ordinary times there are.

Mr. William Davies Stephens, called in; and Examined.

8334. Sir M. W. Ridley.] You are Managing Director of the Tyne Steam Shipping Company?—Yes.

8335. How many boats have you engaged in the import of cattle?—We have two vessels on the Hamburg station, two vessels on the Rotterdam station, and one vessel on the Antwerp station, and one on the Dunkirk station.

Mr. W. D. Stephens.

8336. How many cargoes of cattle do you bring in on the average each week?—We bring in two from Hamburg. We have not brought any from Rotterdam for some time, on account of the stoppage of the cattle; previously to that we used to bring in from Rotterdam.

8337. What is the length of the passage from Hamburg?—About 40 hours from wharf to wharf with our fastest steamers.

8338. We have learnt from the last witness there is no detention of cattle when they arrive, and that you get them without delay?—The vessel cannot arrive at Newcastle, except on the flood tide. We must have water to get up to the wharf.

8339. Do you carry any deck cargo?—Yes, occasionally.

8340. We learn that usually cattle are watered to some extent on the voyage?—Yes.

8341. Are they fed in any way?—They are fed with a quantity of hay, brought on board by the shippers.

8342. Is there any dead meat consigned to you from Hamburg?—No.

8343. Or from any other foreign ports?—No.

8344. Are there any other boats which bring cattle into the Tyne, in addition to yours?—Only one vessel from Denmark.

8345. Is that a smaller vessel than your own?—Very considerably.

8346. Have you been on board of her?—No; I have seen her from the quay, that is all.

8347. You do not know whether the arrangement of that vessel is different from your own ships?—I do not know, except from what I have heard.

8348. Have you seen other vessels engaged in the cattle import trade besides your own?—I have.

8349. Have you visited them, and looked to their construction?—Yes, that is some time ago, not during the last three or four years.

8350. Have you, within that period, made alterations and improvements within the holds of your own vessels to facilitate the trade?—We have. The vessels that we have on the Hamburg station were previously on the London station, and were not adapted for carrying cattle. After they commenced to carry cattle, we put ventilators from the hold, in which the cattle were carried, and down the hatches. We kept the hatches open at sea, as a general rule; we had what we call a "windsail" slung over towards the wind, from which the wind gets down into the hold, and thus the ventilation is carried on. In some of the vessels we have two ventilators of 12 inches; in some of them we have one ventilator of 18 inches diameter in the fore part of the main hold. The vessels that were put on the station were put upon it with the substantial view of carrying cattle, from the position of the boiler. The "Admiral," a vessel of 625 tons gross, and 120 horse power, is a very fast steamer. She steams 11 knots under steam alone, and her boiler is situated 12 feet from the bulkhead; the back of the boiler is towards the engines; consequently the cattle that are put into the after hold are a considerable distance from the boiler. In the "Sentinel" the positions are just the same; the engines are placed with the back of the boiler towards them, consequently between the front of the boiler and the bulkhead there is a considerable space, and the cattle are carried in the hold free from the heat.

8351. Lord Naas.] Are there any fans to the ventilators?—No, we have none, but the holds are large holds, I can give you the sizes if you would like to have them, and the measurements. I have prepared myself with a few measurements on the subject. In the "Admiral" we have them 44 feet long and 25 feet beam; in the 'twixt decks 6½ feet; in the lower deck 7½ feet. Of course we have stanchions running fore and aft to keep the cattle from rolling against each other in case of bad weather.

8352. Mr. Norwood.] What are the 'tween decks?—Six feet six and about seven feet six below. In the "Sentinel" we have 40 feet by 23; and six feet above and six below. In the "Lord Raglan" we have 40 feet by 26 by seven, both above and below. Would you like the contents in feet?

8353. Yes?—There are 15,000 feet in the main hold of the "Admiral;" 11,000 in the "Sentinel;" 14,000 in the "Lord Raglan."

8354. Sir M. W. Ridley.] Having given us the dimensions, can you give us the number of cattle that are lodged in that space?—Do you mean the largest number that we have ever carried?

8355. Yes?—I never heard of more than 140 or 142; but if I said 150, I should certainly be outside the mark.

8356. Mr. Norwood.] Is that in one hold?—Yes, and in one ship too. We rarely carry them in the fore-hold.

8357. You only have two holds?—Yes; the engines are right aft.

8358. Then, you have a large main hold?—We have a large main hold and fore-hold, in which we put any cargo we have, such as butter, cheese, and sugar, from Holland.

8359. It would appear as if there were 100 cubic feet to each animal?—There are just about 100 cubic feet. The "Admiral" is about the largest, 15,000; that makes about 100 cubic feet to each animal; in the "Sentinel," we never have more than 100 or 110 cattle, which gives about 100 cubic feet again.

8360. Chairman.] Should you object to any Government regulation as to the number of cattle to be carried on board the ship?—No, we should rather prefer it for the general good.

8361. Have you any idea what space ought to be allotted to a bullock?—After the questions you asked Mr. Wilkinson, I was referring to it in my own mind, and I thought 100 cubic feet each would be a very good rule.

8362. With regard to the space that is to be allotted to them laterally?—As to that, in a great measure, you must allow the shipowner to arrange his own space.

8363. You would not have any regulations about that?—No.

8364. You would require 100 cubic feet for each beast?—I should think so.

8365. How much for a sheep?—I should think you would calculate five sheep to a beast.

8366. And pigs the same?—I should think so. Pigs are generally carried on deck. We very rarely carry a sheep on deck. We have occasionally, but very rarely, done so.

8367. Do you think there should be any regulations lations as to the ventilation?—Yes; that is the most important of all.

8368. No vessel should be allowed to carry without proper regulations for ventilation and watering?—No. There is always a small perquisite of 1 s. a head allowed to the captain from the shipper, which, to a certain extent, guarantees a great deal of care being taken of the cattle.

8369. That is paid by the shipper?—That is paid by the shipper. It is a sum of 1 s. each paid to the master. I can give you the number of cattle we have carried.

8370. Lord Naas.] I suppose the great difference between the size of the cattle would prevent any restriction as to absolute numbers being enforced?—I think so; I think you might average them better at so much per head, than you would according to size. I think it would be very difficult to carry out. From Hamburg we generally have one class of cattle.

8371. Have the people in your ships ever had occasion to throw cattle overboard?—Never.

8372. Have you had any actions brought against you for losses?—Never. I never heard of such a thing; I never heard of any complaint, scarcely. The passage is very short; from Rotterdam the passage is only about 30 hours, and from Hamburg, the vessels we have now make the passage within 40 hours. At one time, when I first knew it, it was from 48 to 60 hours; the consequence is, they are kept comparatively in good condition.

8373. Is there any inspection of cattle when they are imported?—Yes, they are inspected both at Hamburg and Rotterdam.

8374. Who inspects them?—I do not know; I cannot tell that.

8375. You do not know whether the regulations are strictly enforced or not?—Yes; I believe they are strictly enforced.

8376. Mr. Norwood.] Had you not certificates given you in the Dutch trade, especially before the restrictions?—Not that I know of.

8377. I myself have seen those certificates?—I never saw them; I cannot speak to that. I never saw them, or heard of them.

8378. With regard to the storing of the beasts, I think the previous witness said you put their heads to the sides of the vessels?—Yes.

8379. That is not the plan we adopt in Hull; we generally put their heads in the centre, and there is considerable advantage in that, because there is a vacant space by which they can more easily water them?—Yes, that would be better. I shall be very glad to carry out that suggestion.

8380. Have you seen foreign cattle with rinderpest?—No, never.

8381. Did you ever know a case of rinderpest in foreign cattle?—No, never; I never saw any.

8382. I asked the question, because I never knew anybody who had seen foreign cattle with rinderpest?—I never saw any. We have steam cranes on board our vessels, so that we can land any number of cattle that they can bring within the river.

8383. Do you sling them?—Yes.

8384. That is not a good plan, is it?—I never heard of such a thing as a complaint; people give us credit for carrying cattle in a remarkably good manner.

8385. Do you sling cows?—Yes.

8386. Chairman.] Do you sling cows that are heavy in calf?—I do not know that we ever have them heavy in calf to my knowledge. I never heard of such a case; it is a large sling, a broad sling, which reaches from their fore-quarters right to their hind legs. The sheep we lift in large square boxes, which lift about a dozen at a time, with an end to move like the after part of a cart, and so let them walk out.

Mr. CHARLES HUNT, called in; and Examined.

8387. Chairman.] YOU are the Comptroller of the Out-door Department of the Customs?—Yes.

8388. The Committee require information as to the powers under which you act now?—We have Orders of the Privy Council under which we act.

8389. Have you a copy with you?—No.

8390. I believe you gave evidence before the Committee on the "Cattle Diseases Prevention Bill," and you handed in some papers at that time?—Yes.

8391. There have been some fresh Orders since that?—Yes, several.

8392. You have not brought them with you? No. We are merely the executive of the Privy Council to see that their Orders are carried out.

8393. You have no information to give us beyond what we could obtain from those Orders?—Not any.

8394. Your authority is derived solely from those Orders?—Yes; purely.

8395. Who issues those Orders to you?—The clerk of the Privy Council. They come to us from the clerk of the Privy Council.

8396. You never get Orders from the Board of Trade?—No.

8397. I shall ask you to hand in a copy of the Orders now in force under which you act; perhaps you will let the Committee clerk have them?—Yes. From what date would the Committee like them.

8398. You had better send us the Orders that have taken place since those that you handed in two years ago. I do not know whether you remember what those were?—I can easily refer to them. We have had several since then.

8399. The last Order seems to be one dated in 1856?—There have been a great number of Orders since that time. They are principally Orders affecting the embarkation of cattle; they are not Orders affecting the practice to be pursued with regard to the examination or delivery.

8400. Principally with reference to importation? —Principally with regard to importation. There have been some few orders, but they have been principally with regard to regulations for importations.

8401. I suppose you can hand us copies without any expense?—Yes, I can hand you copies that have been sent to us.

8402. Lord Naas.] Has there been any alteration made in the duties of the out-door officers of the Customs with regard to the importation of cattle?—Not any.

8403. Chairman.] Can you give us any opinion upon the matters we have been asking about, as to the licensing of vessels for carrying cattle, and only allowing them to carry a certain number.

Mr. C. Hunt.
2 July 1866.

Will you give us your opinion as to the desirability of having any regulation of that sort?—I think it would be difficult to enforce any regulation of the kind. It would meet with opposition on the part of shipowners in London.

8404. Do you say the same with regard to ventilation?—I do not think so with regard to ventilation.

8405. There would be no difficulty with regard to the space of cubic feet for each animal?—Yes, there would be great difficulty there, because of the size of each animal.

8406. Do you think you could strike an average?—I think you could do it, but it would lead to many disputes; as to every cargo landed you would have a dispute as to the number of animals landed and the cubic feet of space. You would have to compel some person or other to define what was a fat animal and what was a lean one. It would lead to endless disputes.

8407. Could you not strike an average, and say a certain number of cubic feet for every head of fat stock, large or small?—You might do that.

8408. But would there be any difficulty about it?—I think so. You must have a staff to enforce it, in the first instance; some person appointed by the Board of Trade to measure these vessels; and then you must see that the number of animals carried in them does not exceed the measurement; and all that must be calculated before you can deliver any of these beasts.

8409. Could it not be done in this way, that the vessels which were previously measured, might be licensed to carry so many beasts or so many sheep; and could you not make so many sheep represent a certain amount of space. Then the ship's papers would show you the number actually carried?—Yes.

8410. There would be no great difficulty about that?—There would not be any great difficulty.

8411. With regard to ventilation, do you think there would be any difficulty about that?—I do not think the ship-owners would object to any system of ventilation. I think they do all they can in that matter now.

8412. We have had evidence that in some cases cargoes of cattle have come in in great distress?—No doubt.

8413. If there was a regulation as to ventilation that would be avoided?—It would alleviate it to a certain extent; but I imagine the distress has principally arisen from bad weather.

8414. Bad weather, with a crowded hold?—Yes; occasionally the vessels are overcrowded, but, I think, as a rule, not very often.

8415. Lord Naas.] Do you see the cattle as they come in?—Very frequently; not always.

8416. Do they arrive in better condition than they used to arrive in some years ago?—Do you mean as far as the stowage on board the vessel is concerned?

8417. Yes?—I do not think they do; because formerly the importations were not so large. They arrive in a more healthy condition.

8418. Are the steamers a better class of steamers?—Yes, much larger.

8419. Chairman.] It is stated that the animals suffer more in their passage up the river than they do at sea?—I should very much doubt that.

8420. It is said they do not obtain the same amount of ventilation coming up the river?—There may be less ventilation, but I should think the animals do not suffer so much coming up the river; the water is much smoother.

8421. Do they suffer much from heat in the river?—I should think they do not; particularly in the case of vessels which discharge so low down the river as Thames Haven.

8422. It has been stated that those which are landed at Thames Haven do not suffer so much as those which come to Blackwall?—I think there is very little difference.

8423. Are you acquainted with Thames Haven?—Well.

8424. Do they discharge many cargoes of cattle there?—Not many; the trade was principally confined to Rotterdam; since the regulations, very little.

8425–6. Do you think it would be desirable that you should require the cattle to be discharged at Thames Haven and other places?—I think it would be desirable under certain circumstances, but it is rather a difficult question. I think there are many places in London in which they discharge which do not possess sufficient accommodation under existing circumstances.

8428. You think, at present, there is not sufficient accommodation?—During the prevalence of the disease I do not think there is; there would be sufficient accommodation if every animal was landed in a perfectly healthy state, and was merely required to be passed across the wharf.

8429. But where they have to undergo a careful inspection there is not sufficient space?—There is not. At the same time our veterinary surgeons, who are responsible for passing the cattle, think there is. It is a matter of opinion, but at some of the wharves, in my opinion, there is not sufficient space.

8430. Are the inspectors whom we have examined here under your orders?—Only to a limited extent. They are professional men, and have simply to examine the cattle as regards their healthfulness. They are only under my orders as having to convey to them the orders I receive from the Privy Council from time to time. I could not tell them to pass cattle, nor could I order them to detain them. They are entirely responsible for that.

8431. Do they make a return to you of the animals that are stopped by them?—They make a return of the animals that are stopped once a year, giving the reasons for the detention.

8432. Is there any appeal to you from their decision?—Not any.

8433. Mr. Dent.] Are they virtually responsible?—Their decision is final. The trade have the option of appealing against it by requesting a third party may be called in.

8434. Chairman.] What are your duties with regard to the importation of cattle?—Simply as the organ of communication between my own Board and these veterinary inspectors, for the purpose of conveying to them the Orders issued by the Privy Council.

8435. Mr. Norwood.] Under the control of the water-guard?

water-guard?—Yes; the water-guard and the out-door department is in one now.

8436. Lord Naas.] There were some statements made here with regard to the inconvenience of landing cattle, in consequence of the hours at which the Custom-house officers inspect the cattle; do you think there is anything to complain of in that respect?—They are inspected at any time during daylight.

8437. In winter?—Yes; in winter it would be dark at four o'clock; the veterinary surgeons could not examine cattle, with regard to the state of their health, in the dark; that is impossible; they must have daylight for their duty.

8438. In point of fact, the hours in the middle of winter at which cattle can be landed are very few?—They can be landed at any hour; but they can only be examined by the veterinary surgeons during daylight.

8439. They can be landed at any hour?—Yes; immediately the vessels come alongside we allow the cattle to be landed; there is no delay.

8440. There is no restriction from revenue causes on the landing of cattle?—Not at all, not any; on the contrary, the great object is to get them out as quickly as possible.

8441. As regards the dead meat, are there any restrictions by the revenue as regards landing dead meat?—No; they land it during daylight at any time; they have the additional advantage of landing it before they pass the entry. In strictness, no goods should be allowed to land before the entry is passed; but the exception is allowed to be made in the case of dead meat, from its being perishable.

8442. Can dead meat be landed on Sunday?—Not at any time. On Sunday, in summer time, it is allowed to be landed up to nine o'clock in the morning.

8443. There is some arrangement made with regard to dead meat in its favour?—Yes; everything is done in favour of perishable articles that can possibly be granted to them.

8444. Mr. Dent.] There is no restriction at present as to the ports at which cattle can be imported?—No, I think not.

8445. Would the Board of Customs suggest that the importation of cattle should be restricted to certain ports?—I do not know whether they would do that.

8446. Do you think their attention has ever been directed to that question?—I think it is likely it has, but I do not know of my own knowledge.

8447. You do not know whether they have formed any opinion upon that subject?—I should say they have not.

8448. Do not you think it would be a means of preventing the importation of disease, if particular ports were selected as the ports of import?—I do, as a matter of my own opinion.

8449. We do not take this officially, but as your own opinion?—Yes.

8450. You would be enabled, then, to have better inspection, and better accommodation for the animals?—Yes.

8451. You do not think there would be so many officers required to inspect?—I do not think it would make any difference with regard to the number of officers; because you must have a sufficient number of ports approved for the landing of cattle to supply those districts in which those ports are situated.

8452. You could not give us any idea of what ports could be selected so as to be sufficient for them?—It must depend upon the accommodation that the ports would supply.

8453. There would be the accommodation of the ports, and the districts which would require to be supplied with food?—Yes, it would be dependent entirely upon that.

8454. Have you any means in the Board of Customs of knowing where disease is existing on the Continent?—Only by the communications which we get from the Privy Council.

8455. I think the Board of Customs made some suggestion to the Royal Commission to inquire into the cattle plague as to improvements which they thought might be carried out; did they not?—I do not think any of them were examined upon the question.

8456. I imagine they made some suggestion by letter to the secretary?—It is possible. I do not know.

8457. Could you, as an officer of customs, suggest any improvements that could be made for the prevention of the importation of diseased cattle?—The only improvements you could make would be in a system of quarantine, if it was thought desirable to enforce it. It is difficult to carry it out in London.

8458. In London, the importation of foreign cattle is very small?—Yes.

8459. They are mostly imported for immediate slaughter?—They are mostly intended for immediate slaughter.

8460. There would not be a necessity for a quarantine of animals that were intended to be slaughtered?—Not at all.

8461. Chairman.] There are many milch cows imported into London?—Yes, a great number.

8462. Mr. Dent.] You consider that at present there is a great want of accommodation at some of the landing-places in London?—Yes; I think every place should possess means for the purpose of detaining the cattle as long as it is considered necessary, and also ample accommodation for cleansing, if it is desirable to do so.

8463. Chairman.] Do you think it desirable that all animals should remain for a few hours at the river side before they pass the inspection?—The inspectors have the power of keeping them as long as they see fit.

8464. Do you think it is desirable, under all the circumstances, that they should rest a few hours before inspection?—I should think it would be. There would be some difficulty, because the importations into London are so large, and the accommodation is so small, that you would have to keep the vessels standing a long time till other vessels were removed from the wharf.

8465. With the present arrangements?—Yes.

8466. You would recommend much greater accommodation?—Unquestionably.

8467. Can you suggest any place for that purpose?—Down the river; either at Thames Haven or at Dagenham. The objection to Thames Haven is, that in very bad weather there might be a difficulty in vessels lying alongside; but I do not think that would apply to Dagenham. Vessels would be there in any weather. It has been urged that if you increase the landing at those places in consequence of the ground being pasturage, you would perpetuate disease in consequence of the diseased animals being brought there.

8468. What do you say to that?—I say I do not think so.

8469. If you had a regulation requiring animals to undergo quarantine the result would probably be that they would be very careful what animals they sent?—Yes.

8470. The more severe the ordeal here is, the more likely they are to take precautions not to send diseased animals?—Quite so. The restrictions placed upon the importation of cattle have already had that effect. We get much more healthy cattle now taken generally than before.

8471. Mr. Dent.] The per centage of disease in foreign cattle is not very large?—Very small.

8472. Even before the restrictions it was very small?—Very small.

8473. As a rule, it would not pay the foreign importer to send 100 head of cattle?—It would pay an unscrupulous man, because he could get it at a low price, and if he could get them in here he might get a large price for them.

8474. Mr. Norwood.] Do you know into how many ports in England cattle come now?—No.

8475. There are not a great many?—Not many.

8476. Mr. Dent.] I thought they could come into any they liked?—No; the ports must be approved for the landing of cattle.

8477. Chairman.] Is that by Order in Council?—By the order of the Board of Customs. The Board of Customs have power to approve of any port for the landing of cattle.

8478. Mr. Dent.] That is under the present restriction?—Yes; you cannot land cattle anywhere you please.

8479. Chairman.] Then, if there is that restriction, you can give us a list of places upon referring to documents, I suppose?—Yes; I can send you a list of the ports at which cattle can be landed.

8480. You had better do so, if you please?—I will.

8481. Mr. Norwood.] Did you ever see a foreign beast affected with rinderpest?—Yes, I have.

8482. Did you ever hear from anybody of any foreign cattle affected with it?—Yes; I have heard from all our veterinary surgeons, of whom we have three, that they have seen foreign beasts with rinderpest.

MEMORIAL praying for an Investigation into the Regulations now in Force in respect to the Importation of Foreign Cattle. App. No. 1.

The Memorial of the Foreign Cattle Trade Association, to the Lords of the Privy Council,

Sheweth,

1. THAT the regulations to prevent the introduction of diseased cattle into this country, as at present carried out, greatly interfere with the legitimate trade in healthy cattle, and that if such regulations continue to be enforced the importation of stock from the more distant countries must eventually be abandoned, by reason of the heavy losses thereby entailed upon the owners.

2. That the complaint known as foot and mouth disease attacks at certain periods all cattle that travel by railway, road, or sea, and are sold in markets, its appearance being only a question of time, and that no system having for its object the detention of certain animals that contract the complaint before their arrival in London, can have any influence upon the general existence of the disease.

3. That the detention of cattle at the wharves during the past fortnight, has occasioned a ruinous loss to the owners, over and above the depreciation that has taken place in the market value of fat stock; that such extra loss has been occasioned by the impossibility of feeding and tending the large numbers of cattle detained and kept without shelter at the wharves; the want of accommodation for slaughtering which prevents buyers from attending; and lastly, the depreciation of price, resulting from large quantities of meat being forced, without any alternative, upon the markets for absolute sale; that under these circumstances upwards of 1,000 head of cattle have been disposed of in the aforesaid space of time, at a reduction of 4*l.* a head under the price obtained in the Metropolitan Market.

4. That the detention at the wharves occasions great suffering to the cattle from exposure to weather and want of food, water, space, and rest; that owing to the exhaustion produced by these causes, the weaker animals are frequently trampled upon and greatly damaged, and that such state of suffering is lengthened by reason of the accommodation for slaughtering at the wharves being totally inadequate to perform the amount of business required.

5. That the detention of a large proportion of imported cattle at the wharves on account of foot and mouth disease does not act as a preventive to the spread of the complaint, and that a mode of procedure with apthous cattle might be adopted at debarcation (if necessary), that would relieve the trade from a portion of the loss occasioned by the regulations now in force without subjecting other cattle to infection.

6. That the approach of warmer weather much increases the risk that importers of cattle labour under, and threatens them under adverse circumstances with an almost total loss of their property, as the flesh of animals subjected to such treatment as the existing regulations necessarily occasion, will frequently be unfit for food within 24 hours after slaughter.

Your Memorialists therefore humbly pray your Lordships that the working of the regulations now in force in respect to imported cattle, may be fully investigated; that if necessary such other regulations as the case may require, may be adopted, having for their aim the establishment of the trade in foreign cattle upon equable and satisfactory foundations, and that to that end a deputation of the trade may be received to confer upon the existing grievances, and the measures calculated to remove them.

And your Memorialists will ever pray.

LETTER from Commissioners of Customs to Colonel Harness, R. E., C. B., forwarding Reports of Inspectors.

Custom House,
Sir, 23 April 1866.

HAVING laid before the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Customs your letter of the 9th instant, transmitting for their observations, by desire of the Lords of the Council, the accompanying memorial of the Foreign Cattle Trade Association, relative to the regulations affecting the importation of cattle suffering from foot and mouth diseases,

I am directed to transmit to you, for their Lordships' information, copies of the reports of the two veterinary surgeons employed by this department to inspect foreign cattle, to whom the memorial has been referred; and I am desired to state that the points involved being of a professional character the Board do not feel competent to offer any opinion thereon.

I am, &c.
(signed) Geo. Dickins.

Colonel Harness, R. E., C. B.,
&c. &c. &c.

Honourable Sirs,

REFERRING to the accompanying Petition from the Cattle Importers, I have to report—

1. The regulations for the examination of foreign cattle have been greatly modified since 1864 in favour of the importers, as up to that time, from the period of my being first appointed, now more than 21 years, when any one animal forming part of a cargo was found affected with eczema, or foot and mouth disease, the whole of the animals were slaughtered, and consequently these regulations were much more satisfactory to the inspecting veterinary surgeons, as there was little or no risk of the disease being propagated; or the animals were kept in quarantine until recovered, at the option of the consignees, which never did occur as the animals were invariably slaughtered or died, whereas, under the present regulation, only the animals positively affected with eczema are stopped, those apparently healthy being at once delivered.

2. It is quite true that eczema does attack more or less all cattle travelling by railway and steamers, but that arises in a great measure from the poor animals being deprived of food, water, and rest during their journey, and the disease being in the initiative state previous to their starting is sure to show itself; but it is egregiously wrong to state that, allowing such diseased animals to pass through the streets and into sheds, will not have any influence upon the spread of the disease, as some of the animals arriving are so much affected that the hoofs are dropping off, and their tongues foul; when the slightest friction is applied on the inspection of them, and in fact are past recovery.

3. Seeing that the detention of cattle at the wharves takes place after a voyage by sea of the animals, of from 16 to 48 hours, a period of time quite insufficient to produce the disease in the malignant form in which it is frequently seen, it appears to me a question entirely for the importers, whether it would not be for their interests to have the animals properly examined previous to their being shipped, which is now represented to be the case; but from the state in which the animals arrive, it must be very superficial, and of no use, when those found suffering might be detained at the port of embarkation until cured, so that they would be sure to arrive here in a more healthy condition, and so save the consignees the loss of which they now complain.

4. Seeing there is ample space at Brown's and the Brunswick Wharves, Blackwall, for the detention, with free liberty of space, for all the cattle that have been detained at any one period up to the present time, the question of food, water, &c., must rest with the consignees, until power be given to the veterinary surgeon to order such food, water, &c., to be supplied, and it is not a point which can in any way bear upon the detention of diseased animals so far as the public interests are concerned.

5. The detention of a large number of animals affected with so catching a disease, must surely, in a great degree, act as a preventive to the spread of the disease, as after such diseased animals have been driven through the streets, should any sound and healthy ones follow, some of the latter would be sure to take it. Although the memorialists state that a mode of procedure might be adopted at the place of debarcation with apthous cattle, but do not give any particulars of such mode, and therefore it is quite impossible to give any opinion on it.

6. This is also a question for the consignees of the cattle, seeing they are not compelled to kill any animals detained, within a given period, and therefore can wait until the animals are recovered before selling them, or until the dead meat-market shall be favourable to their being slaughtered.

The fact is that in warm weather, when there is plenty of grass and cool food for the animals, the cases of eczema are much fewer, although the importation of animals is much larger in number.

Seeing that the existing regulations are not more stringent than the interests of the public demand, more especially under the present serious malady of rinderpest prevailing among cattle, and that to relax them would tend to increase the number and virulence of the diseases with which foreign cattle might be affected, and that eczema is one of the most contagious and infectious of those diseases, I would most earnestly advise that on no account should these regulations be in any way relaxed or departed from, as the remedies for the almost total prevention of eczema in animals arriving by sea from foreign ports rest entirely with the importers themselves and their agents at the ports of shipment, and can be easily adopted with very little cost.

(signed) W. Simmonds.

London, 18 April 1866.

252, Old Kent-road,
Honourable Sirs, 19 April 1866.

In reference to Mr. Hicks' memorial to the Lords of the Privy Council, complaining of the practice adopted at the wharves with diseased cattle, I beg to state that it is extremely probable that these regulations may interfere with the trade to some extent, but that it is unavoidable at times when large numbers of diseased cattle arrive at the same time and place with healthy ones.

With regard to the foot and mouth disease, I am well aware that there is much difference of opinion as to the propriety of detaining cattle affected with it, or not, and I regret to state that this difference of opinion exists between my colleague, Mr. Simmonds, and myself, and is the reason for this most unusual circumstance of our reporting separately upon the paper referred to us.

I by no means attach the importance to the disease that Mr. Simmonds does; it rarely being a fatal one, admits in most cases of being easily cured, and never of itself impairs the fitness of the flesh of the animal affected by it for human food.

It is a disease which at certain periods of the year prevails to as great an extent among the cattle of this country, as among those abroad, the same causes (generally considered to be atmospheric ones) doubtlessly being in operation for its production; and my experience has taught me that at times when it is prevalent, that it is almost impossible to move cattle in the spring which have been stall-fed during the winter, without their becoming more or less affected by it, the exertion required of them being probably the exciting cause.

I have attended the Metropolitan Market for the purpose of satisfying myself on this point; and upon two visits to the Christmas cattle show at Islington, I observed that several of the animals sent there for the purpose of exhibition and competition for valuable prizes, were affected with it.

These are a few of the reasons I have for thus unfortunately differing with my colleague, and I could enlarge upon them considerably, if needful; but this difference of opinion has in no way caused any difference in the course pursued by us with regard to the disease, as we perfectly agree as to its contagious character, and also as to the object of one appointment which is to prevent the introduction into this country of foreign cattle affected with any contagious disease, and it would therefore be impossible for us (consistently with our integrity) to give the certificates required by your Honors, that all cattle passed by us are free from contagious or infectious disease, in cases where the foot and mouth complaint exists.

It is simply, therefore, a question whether this disease might not, without any danger to the cattle of this country, be exempted from the regulations affecting imported cattle; and I am aware of many difficulties connected with it, such as constituting a bad precedent, &c.; but it is one which I have, under all the circumstances, felt it my duty to submit to your Honors.

I have done so after the most careful consideration and study of the subject, and I must confess with much reluctance, as I believe it to be the only professional subject upon which my friend, Mr. Simmonds, and myself differ, and after many endeavours to reconcile our ideas on this matter.

If the extinction of the disease could be in any way brought about by stopping foreign cattle affected with it, I would by all means stop them, but I do not believe that it is diminished in the least by doing so, as the cattle imported are almost all for immediate slaughter, and have but little, if any, opportunity of spreading the disease. With regard to milch cows and store cattle, an exception might probably be made; but it is a question in my mind whether any good would arise even from this, as at times I believe there is scarcely a farm or dairy in the country in which the complaint does not exist.

It is true that many of the cases we meet with in foreign cattle are much worse than we find at home, but I believe this to be explained by the fact of their having been confined in a standing position in railway trucks and on board ship for several days, subjected to privations of food and water, exposure to weather and other hardships, reasons I think certainly sufficient to aggravate diseases, and probably enough of themselves to produce them.

I would wish it to be distinctly understood that my observations apply to the foot and mouth disease alone, there being other diseases which it would be unwise in the extreme to treat otherwise than with the greatest stringency; and even if it be thought right that this malady, "Eczema," be continued under existing regulations, I would urge the propriety of going back to the custom of stopping the whole cargo rather than passing those not actually affected at the time of examination, as this would at least have the effect of causing unanimity of proceeding, if not of opinion, among inspectors, and of insuring the stoppage of all cattle affected with it, which the present system does not, as I have frequently seen cattle the day after their arrival, which at the time of their being inspected presented no outward signs of the disease, equally as bad as those of their fellows which had been stopped, thus showing the absurdity of the practice as a means of stopping the introduction of contagious disease from abroad. But I must repeat my opinion, that no practical good whatever arises from detaining animals for this disease, while it tends to place unnecessary obstacles in the way of the trade.

With regard to the loss said to have been recently sustained by the owners of cattle detained at the wharves, I believe it to have been caused more by the glut of dead meat in the market than by the detention. As to the remaining portions of Mr. Hicks' memorial, relating to the animals suffering from want of food, exposure, &c., I conceive the remedy for these evils to be in the hands of the wharfingers and others concerned, by providing more ample accommodation, either at the present landing places, or procuring additional or fresh ones, as the inconveniences complained of would apply to rinderpest or any other disease for which it might be necessary to detain cattle, as well as the disease in question; and it would be no justification for us neglecting our duty by passing diseased cattle, because of the inconvenience occasioned by the detention of them.

Indeed, it would be monstrous that a question of such importance should be made secondary to the interests of any trade whatever. Better be it that the importation of live foreign cattle be even entirely prohibited, if no better method could be devised, rather than our own cattle, second to none in the world, be devastated as they have recently been, as I have no doubt that the deficiency of food which would be caused by such prohibition would now be supplied by the importation of dead meat.

Therefore, while concurring with Mr. Hicks, with the views expressed by him as regards the foot and mouth complaint, I can but think that in the other paragraphs of his memorial he has lost sight of every interest save that of himself and fellow foreign cattle salesmen. It may be thought by your Honors that the opinion I have now expressed differs from that which I have frequently before expressed in conjunction with my colleagues; and as far as regards the disease "Eczema," I frankly admit it does; but I trust I may be credited when I state that the change of opinion has been brought about by the numerous opportunities I have had of testing the operation of the regulations which I have been engaged in carrying out during the time I have had the honour of being employed by your Honors (between eight and nine years), and of thereby acquiring experience which has wrought upon me the conviction that while even more stringent measures, such as quarantine, &c., are necessary for some diseases, no good is effected by the present regulations being applied to the foot and mouth disease.

I have, &c.

Appendix, No. 3.

APPENDIX to Dr. Letheby's Evidence, 31 May 1866.

EXTRACT from REPORT on the CATTLE PLAGUE in England in 1865, by Dr. H. Letheby, Medical Officer of Health for the City of London.

App. No. 3.

THE last point for consideration is, whether the flesh of the diseased animal is unfit for human food. In deciding this question we have first to look at the fact that the disease arises from a specific poison, and that this poison is largely reproduced in the bodies of infected animals, and that the chief manifestation of the disease is an acute fever. At first sight it would therefore seem that the flesh of animals in such a condition must be unwholesome, and that if it did not immediately prove injurious to health, it might do so after a continued use of it. As far back as the years 1514 and 1599, when the disease was in Italy, the Council of Venice forbad the use of beef and veal, on account of the danger from eating it; and last year, when the malady was at Coburg, some people died from the effects of the diseased flesh. It is said, too, that dogs have been made ill by it in Russia; and that pigs have refused to drink the milk from infected cows. But on the other hand, it is very positively declared by good authorities that the meat is not at any time injurious to health. Professor Brücke, of Vienna, has stated that two years ago, when the cattle plague was in Bohemia, the authorities, according to their practice, had the diseased animals slaughtered and buried; but as fast as they were thus disposed of, the populace dug them up and ate them, and no injury to health resulted from it. The writings of Parent du Châtelet, Michael Lévy, Tardieu, Chevallier, and others, abound with examples of the apparent innocuousness of such meat; and it is very probable that in the early stage of the disorder, before the more decided symptoms of fever have shown themselves, the flesh may not be unfit for human food; but I think it would be very dangerous to permit the unrestricted sale of such meat in all stages of the disease. In fact, notwithstanding all the experience and authority alluded to, it is still the practice on the Continent to forbid the use of such meat; and the most stringent measures are adopted to prevent the sale of it; indeed, the regulations which are in force for the sale of butchers' meat generally are far more severe and precise than with us. Here there are no special rules for the condemnation of bad meat, but merely a general provision that the medical officer of health, or the inspector of slaughter-houses, or the inspector of nuisances may at all reasonable times inspect and examine any animal, carcass, meat, poultry, game, flesh, fish, &c., exposed for sale, or deposited in any place for the purpose of sale, or in preparation for sale, or intended for the food of man; and in case it appears to the medical officer or inspector to be diseased, or unsound, or unwholesome, or unfit for the food of man, it shall be lawful for him to seize the same, and for a justice to order it to be destroyed. In this regulation there is no particular description of the kind of food which is unwholesome, or of the circumstances which render it so, and therefore much is left to the discretion of the officer who examines the food, as to whether it is unsound or not. The practice in the City of London is to condemn the flesh of animals infected with certain parasites, and of animals suffering from fever or other acute inflammatory affections, or from lingering disease, as well as of animals that have died from natural causes, and all meat in a high state of putrefaction, and meat tainted with physic.

Some such practice as this is followed all over the world; indeed, very early in the history of legislation it was found necessary to make rules for the preservation of the public health from the effects of unsound meat. The regulations of the Jews for the slaughtering of animals, and for the examination of the flesh, are of pre-historic date. They are partly founded on the written law of Moses, as set forth in the books of Leviticus and Deuteronomy, and partly on very ancient tradition. They refer, not only to the conditions which render the meat wholesome or unwholesome, but also to the mode of slaughter, the place of slaughter, and to the qualifications of the persons who perform it. The chief circumstance which indicates that the meat is unwholesome is the presence of disease in the lungs, as tubercles, abscesses, ulcers, consolidations, or adhesions; and no animal is permitted to be used as food that has died from accident or disease. The duty of examining the meat is confided to a responsible officer, who is called the searcher, and who is bound by religious obligations to see that all the rules and regulations of the Dinim or law are faithfully observed, and no meat is allowed to be for food which has not been marked with the proper seal.

In ancient Rome the practice of examining the meat in the public markets before it was sold was constantly observed, and the butchers were often fined for selling meat that had not been inspected by the overseers.

At the present time the regulations which are in force on the Continent are, for the most part, very stringent, and it may be interesting to review them.

App. No. 3.

Austria.

A system of cattle and meat inspection has long been in force in Austria, to insure that none but healthy cattle shall be slaughtered, and none but sound meat sold. Regulations on this subject, in modern times, were passed in Lower Austria in June 1838, and October 1850; in Upper Austria, June 1830, and October 1831; in Steiermark in December 1776; in Illyria in May 1820, and August 1822; in Corinthia in March 1841; in Bohemia in May 1770, and December 1810; in Moravia in November 1827; in Gallacia in June 1802; in the Lombardo-Venetian Provinces in August 1817, in March 1821, and in December 1832; in Dalmatia in March 1827; in Siebenbürgen in June 1851, &c.

According to these regulations, a sufficient number of cattle and meat inspectors are appointed in every place, and bound by oath to the faithful execution of their duties.

These persons have to examine into the state of the animal's health, as well as the good condition of the slaughtered beast. They must be present at the slaughtering, and at the taking off the skin, as well as at the opening of the carcass; and they must possess ample knowledge of the appearances of unsound and of healthy meat.

Any person trading in fresh meat, or selling meat in any way, prepared or cooked, who purchases cattle not duly inspected according to regulation, shall, for the first offence, in addition to forfeiting the meat or the money received for its sale, be fined from 25 to 200 florins; for the second offence the fine shall be doubled; and for the third offence he shall be deprived of his license, and be declared incapable of ever again exercising an occupation of the kind.

The meat of animals suffering from inflammation of the spleen, or from the cattle murrain, or which have been bitten by a mad dog, or any other mad animal, as well as the flesh of measly pigs, must not, on any account, be exposed for sale. Inspectors generally, indeed, must only permit the slaughter of healthy beasts. It will of course be understood, however, that fractured limbs, and other external injuries, form no obstacle to slaughtering.

It is also prohibited to sell the meat of animals near the time of bringing forth their young, as well as of all very young animals, especially of calves under three weeks old, or weighing less than 40 pounds.

The regulation of the 8th of January 1789, contains a detailed description of the various cattle diseases which either render meat entirely or partially unsound, or which offer no obstacle to its healthy use.

If the animal be suspected of an illness, the infallible tokens of which may reasonably be expected to appear on slaughtering, the owner may request to have it slaughtered in the presence of the inspector, on his own responsibility; and, provided the animal proves sound, the inspector has then to furnish the owner with the certificate.

If on inspection, at or before slaughtering, an animal shows evident unsoundness, or if the owner decline to take the slaughter of a doubtful beast on his own responsibility, the inspector has to give notice of the fact, to prevent its being slaughtered in secret, and the meat used as food.

The certificate received from the inspector authorises the sale of fresh meat only, within a certain period, consisting of three days after the certificate is issued, during the months of May, June, July, and August; and four days during other months.

If meat, or slaughtered cattle, be sent for sale from other places, the local tribunals and meat inspectors have to see that the seller can show the inspection certificate from the place of slaughtering, according to the above regulations.

Especial care is also taken that the flesh of animals dying from natural causes as well as putrid meat, shall not be sold for food.

The better to attain the object of cattle and meat inspection, all meat hawking and secret slaughtering, are entirely prohibited.

Public flayers are strictly forbidden to keep or feed pigs; they must neither deliver carrion to menageries, nor use it for pig feeding. They are likewise interdicted from smoking tongues.

Bavaria.

In every circuit there is to be elected by the local police officials for the inspection of cattle and meat; and, where veterinary surgeons are to be found, they are to be elected by preference, and they are to have the supervision of the sub-inspectors.

The inspectors have the examination of all animals before they are slaughtered, and of the carcasses when they are killed.

All animals destined for human food, as oxen, pigs, sheep, goats, and horses, whether in towns, boroughs, or villages, must be examined in a living state, and after they are slaughtered; and for this purpose notice must be given to the inspector 12 hours before the slaughtering of any animal.

The inspector not only decides whether the animal is sound, and the meat good for food, but he also determines the class to which it belongs, there being three classes of food, differing in value.

When the meat of a diseased animal is unfit for food, it rests with the inspector or veterinary surgeon to decide whether it shall be wholly destroyed, or whether certain parts of it, as the fat, skin, and bones, can be used for technical purposes.

In all cases of difficulty or dispute, the sub-inspectors refer the matter to the veterinary surgeon, who decides definitively.

The sub-inspectors have also the duty of looking after the condition of the markets and public slaughter-houses.

Prussia (Berlin).

In every market, whether for the sale of cattle or meat, there is a police official, charged with the direction of the market in all matters relating to the sale of sound meat or cattle. The stall where the officer is to be found is to be distinguished by a flag.

It is the duty of this official to examine everything in the market for sale as food, and to seize and confiscate all unsound food; and to report the offender to the police agents, who summon him before the magistrates to answer to the charge against him.

At every cattle market there is an experienced veterinary surgeon, who inspects the cattle sent there for sale.

In

In Berlin, as in the whole of Prussia, there exists what are called slaughterer's districts, where there is a slaughterer appointed to seize and destroy all animals in a diseased condition. The skin of these animals is the perquisite of the slaughterer, and the other parts are buried. If the owner of a diseased animal gives notice to the slaughterer that he wishes to have the animal slaughtered, and to keep the skin, he gives the slaughterer compensation.

All the results of inspection and slaughtering are properly entered in a book, and no meat can be sold except by persons who are licensed to deal in it.

Switzerland (Berne).

All slaughtering must take place in the public slaughter-houses or in licensed places.

Cases of urgency excepted, it is not allowed to kill an animal until the appointed inspector has examined it; and, in case of accident, when the animal must be immediately killed, and before the inspector can come to see it, the slaughtering must be in the presence of two respectable witnesses; but the animal must not be cut up until the inspector arrives.

No meat is to be sold until it has been examined by the inspector and certified to.

In case of dispute between the inspector and the owner of the meat, the latter can demand the assistance of two experts, taken, if possible, from among the licensed veterinary surgeons, who are to decide definitively whether the animal can be killed, and whether the meat can be sold, and in what condition.

It is forbidden to kill animals of less than 14 days' old. It is also forbidden to kill animals which have been overdriven, before they have time to rest themselves and recover.

It is forbidden to sell putrid meat.

The hawking of meat is forbidden, and so also is the sending of meat from one commune to another, except with the consent of the police.

The inspectors are to take care that the greatest cleanliness is observed in the slaughter-houses, in the butcher's shops, and in the scalding and pork shops.

They are to take care that no diseased meat is sold, salted, or smoked, or made into sausages.

They are to note the condition of the animal before slaughtering, and of the carcass after slaughtering; and rules are given for the principal matters to be noted.

The following are the diseases which render the meat of an animal more or less unfit for food:—

A.—Among Epizootic and Contagious Diseases.

Carbuncle.
The cattle plague.
Gangrenous pneumonia.
The hoof disease, among horned cattle, sheep, and pigs.
Erysipelatous fever among all species of animals.
Glanders among horses (horse flesh is eaten).
Dysentery.
Parasytic diseases of horned cattle.
Hydrophobia among all species of animals.

B.—Among Sporadic Maladies.

All species of dropsy.
All inflammations which result in gangrene.
All cancerous and foul ulcers.

All tubercular softenings of the lungs and liver.
False leprosy of horned cattle.
True leprosy of pigs, and cutaneous erysipelas.
Blennorrhœa of the vagina of cows.
Jaundice.
Poisoning of every kind.
Consumption in general.

Nevertheless, if, after having destroyed the parts affected by the disease, the other parts are sound and wholesome, they can be sold in the following cases, after having been examined and carefully considered by two licensed veterinary surgeons:—

Gangrenous peripneumonia.
Softening of the lungs and liver.
Slight inflammations.
False leprosy.
Blennorrhœa of cows.

In cases of extraordinary symptoms of disease the inspector, if he is not a licensed veterinary surgeon, is to take the opinion and advice of a licensed veterinary surgeon.

The execution of the ordinances relating to this matter rests with the Préfet of Police.

Italy (Florence).

It is forbidden to sell, to furnish, or to make any use whatever of meat prepared, raw or cooked, of animals, as the ox, sheep, goat, and pig, which have died, or have been killed, in a state of disease. They shall be buried immediately.

No animal can be killed for food without having been first examined by the municipal veterinary surgeon, who resides in the public slaughter-house; and his decision is to be in accordance with certain rules made for the purpose. Due notice must be given to the veterinary surgeon of an intention to slaughter an animal.

Meat is divided into three classes, namely:—

Class 1. Meat of the first quality, from animals in a perfectly healthy condition.

Class 2. Meat of animals not in a sound or normal condition, but fit for food.

Class 3. Meat not fit for food, as from animals in a high state of disease.

It is the duty of the inspector to mark each of the first two classes of meat with a particular seal; all putrid meat, as well as the meat of the third class, is confiscated and buried.

The milk of animals suffering from disease, especially from foot-and-mouth disease, is forbidden to be sold; and so also is milk showing signs of containing pus.

All slaughtering must be carried on in the public slaughter-houses; and it is forbidden to send a slaughtered animal into the city without the carcass being entire with the skin upon it and the viscera in it, and it must be conveyed to the public slaughter-house for inspection.

In all cases of infectious disease among cattle the animals must be killed, and their carcasses buried, and the waggons, utensils, &c. used in such cases must be thoroughly washed and disinfected.

Belgium (Brussels).

It is forbidden to slaughter anywhere but in the public slaughter-houses.

There is attached to every public slaughterhouse an inspector in chief, a veterinary surgeon, two expert or skilled inspectors, and a number of other free inspectors.

App. No. 3.

The inspector in chief has not only the general control and management of the slaughter-houses, but he, as well as the expert inspectors, is charged with the examination of the animals entering the slaughter-houses, and also with the examination of the meat before it goes out.

The veterinary surgeon is required to attend at the slaughter-houses on market days, and to assist the inspectors in the examination of the cattle; he is also especially appealed to whenever there is any doubt or difference of opinion among the inspectors as regards the condition of the cattle or of the meat. The veterinary surgeon reports to the college of bourgomasters and sheriffs whenever there is epizootic disease, and also on any facts relating to the public health.

All beasts destined to be killed are first visited by the expert inspectors; and those animals which are known or suspected to be tainted with disease, and to be unfit for food, are put into the pound, in order that they may be disposed of in accordance with the rules relating thereto.

After slaughtering and skinning the animals, they are examined internally by the inspectors, so as to ensure the proper state of the meat; and the viscera removed from the bodies of the animals must be so preserved as not to leave a doubt to which animal it belongs.

All diseased meat, or meat suspected to be diseased, is provisionally seized, and placed in a special locality. It is dressed by the inspectors, and a report is drawn up stating the reason for its seizure, and its condition and quantity. This report is immediately sent to the Commissary of Police.

The meat sent from the slaughter-houses must not be cut up in less than quarters.

All meat seized by the inspectors is buried if it is not claimed in 24 hours; and when it is claimed it is again examined by one of the expert inspectors of the abattoir and two free inspectors, and the meat is either given up or buried according to the decision of the majority of the three experts.

The charges of this examination are paid by the owner if the meat is unfit for food, and by the city if it is not unfit.

When the slaughterer, or his assistants, finds during the killing or dressing of an animal, any signs of disease, he must give immediate information to one of the inspectors; and whenever he finds a fœtus in the animal, he is also to give notice to the inspector, who buries it; for it is forbidden to sell or appropriate a fœtus for food, the skin only being given up to the owner.

There are also regulations as to the time of killing, the mode of scalding pigs, of dressing the tripe, melting the fat, removing the offal, &c., &c.

And, with regard to the management of the cattle market, it is ordered that before the opening of the market the animals shall be examined by the veterinary surgeon attached to the abattoir.

In those cases where the veterinary surgeon considers the animal so diseased that it should be killed, and there is no opposition on the part of the owner, it is killed immediately; but where the owner contests the opinion of the surgeon, he can claim the intervention of the veterinary surgeon of his own selection. If the two surgeons are of a different opinion, a third is called in—the inspector in chief, who decides definitively. The cost of these examinations is to be borne by the party in the wrong.

France (Paris).

By a decree of the 9th of February, 1810, it was resolved to remove all the private slaughter-houses from Paris, and to conduct the business of slaughtering animals in five public slaughter-houses; namely, three on the right bank of the Seine, and two on the left, but they were not opened to the butchers of Paris until the month of September, 1818. From that time to the present there have been many regulations concerning this matter, and all these have been co-ordinated in the grand ordonnance of the 25th of March, 1830. This ordonnance is composed of 301 articles, and it embraces the discipline and commerce of the abattoirs and boucheries of Paris; it is, indeed, a complete code of laws relating to this subject, and is always adopted as the regulations to be applied to new abattoirs in any part of France. These regulations are so nearly like the regulations already described as in force at Brussels, that they need not be reproduced.

The summary of the regulations in force in the chief towns and cities of the Continent is—

1. That all markets are under strict supervision.

2. That cattle sent to the public markets, and to the public slaughter-houses, are carefully examined by the inspectors or officers appointed for that purpose.

3. That diseased cattle are carefully kept from healthy cattle, and are either destroyed or disposed of in such a way as to prevent their communicating disease to other cattle, or their being sold for human food.

4. That in all large cities the slaughtering of animals is either conducted in public slaughter-houses, or is so regulated as to ensure the condemnation of diseased meat.

5. That to guard the public against the mischief which arises from the use or consumption of unwholesome meat, the animals destined for food are examined, not only before they are killed, but also afterwards.

America.

In the city of New York there are very stringent regulations for the inspection and management of slaughter-houses, butchers' shops, and public markets. In the first place, no one is permitted to carry on the business of a butcher, or to slaughter animals, or to deal in meat, without being licensed; and not only are the public markets under the control of the city inspectors, but every place for the sale of meat is appointed by the sanitary authorities. Among the regulations which are in force for the government of these affairs are the following:—

It is not lawful to kill or dress any fresh meat of any description in any market or place licensed as aforesaid or occupied for the sale of meat; but all killing and dressing must be done in the licensed slaughter-houses.

No butcher or other person shall sell, or offer, or expose for sale in any of the public markets, or or in any part of the city of New York, any unwholesome or stale articles of provisions, or any flesh of any animal dead by accident or disease, or known or suspected to be diseased at the killing of the same.

No person shall bring into any market, or the limits thereof, or offer or expose for sale, any blown, plaited, raised, or stuffed meat, or any meagre or back shad, within the city of New York.

The general supervision of these matters is under the direction of the city inspector (as health officer), and the superintendent of sanitary inspection, and the superintendent of markets, whose officers regularly visit and inspect all slaughter-houses, meat shops, butchers' shops, poultry and fish stands, stores, or other places kept for the sale, or exposure for sale, of any kind of meat, poultry, fish, or any articles of provision or food, in any place in the city; and they seize and remove any and all unsound, unhealthy, putrid, or unwholesome veal, beef, pork, fish, poultry, or other article of food; and take all measures for the detection and prevention of the sale of all such unsound, unwholesome articles of food, and secure a strict enforcement of the laws and ordinances relative thereto; and they make full reports of the same to the superintendent

There are also regulations for the cleansing of the markets and slaughter-houses, and for the removal of blood, offal, and garbage from the latter directly after slaughtering, and for the disposal of all such matters, as well as diseased and unwholesome food by the city contractor. The violation of any of these regulations is punished by heavy penalties.

It would seem, therefore, that in almost every part of the world, the regulations for the sale of meat, the inspection of cattle, and the management of markets and slaughter-houses, are far more stringent and precise than in this metropolis; and it is to be hoped that the experience gained by the present outbreak of disease will lead to reformation in most of these particulars. As far as the City of London is concerned, there is a pressing necessity for the removal of all the slaughter-houses; for, as I have recently reported to you, they are situated in crowded localities, where they are not only in themselves a nuisance, but where they also encourage offensive trades—as bone boiling, fat melting, and gut spinning. There are 58 of these slaughter-houses in the City,* and they receive about 5,400 sheep, 1,800 beasts, 420 pigs, and 400 calves every week. All these animals must be driven through the crowded streets, and the dung, and blood, and offal must afterwards be carried away. The annoyance from this is a frequent subject of complaint, but you have little or no power to deal with it. Outside the walls of the City, the annoyance is still greater, for there the slaughter-houses are but rarely inspected. Often, indeed, they are filthy in the extreme, and no restriction is put on the slaughter and sale of diseased animals; in fact, most of the unwholesome meat that is sold in London, is furnished from those places. Within the City, there is a daily inspection of all the markets and slaughter-houses, and much improper meat is in this manner discovered and condemned; but it in no way represents the amount of diseased and unwholesome meat that finds its way into the other markets. Within the last five years, your officers have condemned 946,944 lbs., or rather more than 420 tons of diseased and putrid meat. It consisted of 4,289 sheep, 1,445 pigs, 272 calves, 6,074 quarters of beef, and 11,424 joints of meat, besides 1,917 head of game, and 13,748 head of poultry. Last year, the amount of meat condemned in the City markets, was 247,827 lbs., and of this 124,614 lbs. were diseased, and 27,393 lbs. were from animals that had died from natural causes. A large proportion of this was condemned during the last quarter, and it consisted for the most part of meat from animals affected with the plague. The appearance of the meat is so remarkable that it is easily distinguished by the inspectors—it is not only wet and sodden, but it is also dark coloured, and looks like the flesh of an animal that has died with the blood in it. The characters by which unsound meat is recognised, are the following:—

Good meat is neither of a pale pinkish colour nor of a deep purple tint. The former is indicative of disease, and the latter is a sign that the animal has died from natural causes.

Good meat has also a marbled appearance from the ramifications of little veins of intercellular fat; and the fat, especially of the internal organs, is hard and suety, and is never wet; whereas that of of diseased meat is soft and watery, often like jelly or sodden parchment.

Again, the touch or feel of healthy meat is firm and elastic, and it hardly moistens the fingers; whereas that of diseased meat is soft and wet—in fact, it is often so wet that serum runs from it, and then it is technically called wet.

Good meat has but little odour, and this is not disagreeable; whereas diseased meat smells faint and cadaverous, and it often has the odour of medicine. This is best observed by cutting it, and smelling the knife, or by pouring a little warm water upon it.

Good meat will bear cooking without shrinking, and without losing very much in weight; but bad meat shrivels up, and it often boils to pieces.

All these effects are due to the presence of a large proportion of serum in the meat, and to the relatively large amount of intercellular or gelatinous tissue; for the fat and true muscular substance are to a greater or less extent deficient.

If, therefore, a hundred grains of the lean or muscular part of good meat are cut up and dried at a temperature of boiling salt and water (224 degrees Fahrenheit), they lose only from 69 to 74 grains of their weight; but if diseased meat is thus treated, it loses from 75 to 80 per cent. of its weight. I find that the average loss of weight with sound and good beef is 72·3 per cent., and of mutton 71·5 per cent., whereas the average loss of diseased beef is 76·1 per cent., and of diseased mutton 78·2 per cent. Even if it be dried at a higher temperature, as at 266 degrees Fahrenheit, when all the moisture is expelled, and when good meat loses from 74 to 80 per cent. of its weight, the proportions of loss in bad meat is equally great.

Other characters of a more refined nature will also serve to distinguish good from bad meat. The juice or serosity of sound flesh is slightly acid, and it contains an excess of potash salts, chiefly the phosphate; whereas diseased meat, from being infiltrated with the serum of blood, is often alkaline, and the salts of soda, especially chloride and phosphate abound in it.

Lastly, when good meat is examined under the microscope, the fibre is clean and well defined, and free from infusorial creatures; but that of diseased meat is sodden, as if it had been soaked in water, and the transverse markings are indistinct and far apart; besides which, there are often minute organisms like infusorial bodies. These are very perceptible in the flesh of animals affected with the cattle plague, and Dr. Beale has described them as entozoa-like objects. They differ altogether from the parasites which constitute the trichina disease, and the measles of pork.

How far the use of diseased meat affects the human constitution is unknown. In those cases where certain parasitic diseases exist in animals, there is no doubt of its injurious nature; for the tape-worm, the trichina, and certain hydated or encysted growths are unquestionably produced by it. Experience also points to the fact, that carbuncle and common boils are, in some degree, referable to the use of the flesh of animals affected with pleuro-pneumonia; and occasionally we witness the most serious diarrhœa and prostration of the vital powers after eating diseased meat. It is, therefore, safest to forbid its use; and it is at all times best to guard against the possibility of injury by having meat well cooked. It should be so cooked that the very centre of the joint should be exposed for some time to the temperature of 212 degrees Fahrenheit. The instructions of Liebig, in this particular, are hardly safe; for, although a temperature below that of boiling water may coagulate albumen, and develop the flavours of cooked meat, it may not ensure the destruction of dangerous parasites. It is, therefore, better to have the meat a little over-cooked than otherwise.

LETTER from the Board of Trade to the Chairman of the Committee.

Office of Committee of Privy Council for Trade, Whitehall,
Sir, 6 June 1866.

I AM directed by the Lords of the Committee of Privy Council for Trade, to transmit, for the consideration of the Committee on Trade in Animals, the enclosed copy of a letter from Mr. Mackie, on the subject, which has been forwarded to this Board by Mr. G. Traill, M. P.

I am, &c.
(signed) J. Emerson Tennent.

The Chairman of the Committee on Trade in Animals.

(Enclosure.)

Sir, Wick, 5 April 1866.

HAVING observed that it is the intention of the President of the Board of Trade, to move for the appointment of a Committee of Inquiry into the treatment of cattle in transmission by sea, to the markets of this country, I am desirous of bringing under your notice, to be used, in connection with that inquiry, as you may judge expedient, the very objectionable manner in which cattle from these northern districts are treated while on their passage to the southern markets.

You are aware, first, that all the cattle and sheep from Caithness, Orkney, and Shetland, intended for the markets of Aberdeen, Edinburgh &c., are conveyed by steamers, the nearest railway station being 80 miles from Wick, and 100 from Thurso; and secondly, that the number of animals so conveyed is very large, and is greatly on the increase, giving employment to two steamers a week; the exports in sheep from Caithness alone being upwards of 40,000 head in a season, and in cattle, from these three northern counties, to the value of fully more than 200,000 l. a year.

Shipments from Shetland are made on Mondays, and the animals so shipped are generally on sea for 40 to 48 hours: from Orkney on Tuesdays, the beasts from that county being from 28 to 40 hours at sea; and from Scrabster and Wick, on Tuesdays and Fridays, the animals shipped at these places being from 15 to 30 hours on board; at times they are longer at sea, and occasionally the animals intended for the Aberdeen market are, in consequence of stress of weather, taken on to Granton.

Previous to shipment, the animals are driven distances of from two to twenty miles. At Wick they are first put on board boats, and by them taken to the bay, where they are shipped on board of the steamers, seldom receiving any food after leaving the farms, and not a drink of water from the time of shipment till they reach the market towns or port of landing.

Here it often happens that the animals have to stand in the quays and harbour approaches for eight or ten hours, waiting the arrival of the steamers, and thus, wearied with the travel, hungry, thirsty, and thoroughly exhausted, they are crowded into a steamer's hold, or cooped on deck, and are left all but totally uncared for until handed over to the consignee at Aberdeen or Granton, in a state which can hardly be imagined.

You will see by the following letter, which I have cut out of an Edinburgh paper of this week, that the poor animals receive treatment which loudly calls for inquiry.

"CATTLE at GRANTON.

"Sir, "2 April 1866.

"I HAVE just been at Granton, and I write to say that the state of the cattle brought there by the North of Scotland boats, on Saturday evening, is so disgraceful as to induce me to request you to bring it before the public.

"If dirt, hunger, and exposure are in any way conducive toward perpetuating rinderpest in the county, our authorities have taken the most effectual method for that end. All the stock at Granton is penned up in open pens, and must have stood out all Saturday night and Sunday's rains. The pens, having no pavement, are worked up into a state of mire, no pretence of bedding is ever made, and the cattle stand deep in mud, and in a most pitiful state from cold. I am certain that the Inspector for the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals would have taken proceedings against the owners of the stock if he had witnessed this abuse. And yet the owners are not to blame; the county authorities have refused to allow cattle to proceed to Edinburgh from either ports of Leith or Granton, a measure characteristic of the times, and therefore certainly a blunder; for what possible contact stock could have with either sheep or cattle on their way from either place to this city, and so what possible harm they could do when they are on their way to be consumed there, no man of sense can tell, and all damage possible during such a short transit exists only in the minds of our sapient authorities.

"I don't speak of the absurdity of this arrangement, nor of the confusion it has caused in the cattle traffic; but I do request all men who have at heart the good of the brute creation, to satisfy themselves whether cattle brought out of warm byres, and courts, should be exposed to the chill and cold of two or more days and nights of storm and and rain, and shut up in a few square yards of well-pounded mud, while ample accommodation for ten times the number so exposed is at hand, though not available for use because our authorities have decreed so.

"I am, &c.
(signed) Eye Witness."

Agriculturists, and every one of humane feelings in the north, are heartily glad that the Government appears alive to the importance of inquiry into the subject, and will be glad indeed, if—

1. Every company having steamers carrying cattle be compelled to have on board, when leaving the last port of shipment, under heavy penalties, a quantity of water, for the use of the stock on board, proportionate to the length of the voyage.

2. Every such steamer shall have for every 50 cattle, one cattle man, whose sole duty shall be to attend to the animals, and give them water once every four hours after being put on board.

3. On landing, and until taken charge of by the consignees, due attention shall be paid to the animals, by supplying them with fresh food and water.

No doubt there will be difficulties thrown in the way of an improvement in the present unsatisfactory and inhuman mode of treating such animals; but I should hope there is influence and spirit enough in the kingdom to carry through some practical scheme for remedying a state of matters which, I greatly fear, has not a little to do with the present alarming decimation of our flocks and herds in various parts of the kingdom.

I am, &c.

Editor of "Northern Ensign."

George Traill, Esq., M. P.

P. S.—Since writing the above I have seen one of the principal farmers of the county, Mr. Donald Mackay, who says, that last year he lost 12 fine cattle on the passage from Scrabster to Granton, and that the only explanation that could be given was, that the animals were placed too near the engine, the heat from which and the want of water killed them.

App. No. 5. FORM of CATTLE PASS alluded to by Mr. Charles Hicks, in his Evidence (translated from the German).

Town Commune and District.—Caslan, in Bohemia.

CATTLE PASS.

MR. THOMAS BECZWAR has sold from his stock at the Caslan sugar manufactory 24 head of fattening oxen to Mr. Sponnholz, of Berlin, and they have been this day delivered to his herdsman to be driven away. They are of Bohemian breed, 18 head red, three red and white, three black and white, without marks, and are going to Berlin.

This is to certify that the above cattle were healthy when they left here, and that there is no pestilence among the horned cattle either here or in the neighbourhood.

LETTER to Messrs. C. Hicks & Co., London.

"Poissy, 24 May 1866.

I HASTEN to reply to your letter of the 19th instant, and will answer all your questions consecutively.

I hope the information will be useful to you.

1. From 6,500 to 7,000 head of cattle are sold weekly in the markets of Sleaux, Poissy, and La Chapelle, of which number cows form barely a fourth part.

2. The market of Sleaux is about five miles distant from Paris, that of Poissy about 16 miles; the market of La Chapelle is held actually in Paris itself, and does not average more than 600 to 700 cows weekly; no oxen are sold there.

3, 4, and 5. It is difficult to specify the number of buyers; it is very considerable, for many butchers come from the country and counties around Paris; they come even from Rouen, Havre, Lille, and all parts of Picardy.

There are in Paris about 1,500 butchers, including those who sell in the meat markets; of this number barely a third part attends the markets, the others buy their meat of the wholesale butchers in the abattoirs. Of the 500 Paris butchers who purchase in the markets, there are not more than from 60 to 80 who deal wholesale.

6. It would be more beneficial to us if all the butchers of Paris attended the markets; there would be more competition, which would be more advantageous to the interests of the senders who supply the markets than transacting business with wholesale butchers. You must know that business transactions are easier where buyers are plentiful; we prefer selling to retail rather than to wholesale butchers; we get better prices for the goods that are entrusted to us, and consequently we are not amateurs of the wholesale trade.

The wholesale dealers alone take more cattle than all the other butchers of Paris together.

7. As I have said above, we have customers from all counties; the cattle that they purchase they convey to their homes and slaughter there if there are no abattoirs in the neighbourhood.

8. There are seven abattoirs in Paris, Montmartre, and Popincourt, where the wholesale trade is transacted. Villeguif, La Villette, Gronelb, les Balignolles Bellarlb, but at present a large central abattoir is being constructed at La Villette, for the purpose of superseding the above-mentioned seven abattoirs; there are numerous protests against this central abattoir, and the trade of butchers hopes that the administration of Paris will consider their complaint with fairness, and preserve the abattoirs of Villeguif and Gronelb.

9. The butchers of Paris can only slaughter at the abattoirs, but the country butchers slaughter at their homes if there are no abattoirs in the neighbourhood.

10. The inspection of the abattoirs is under the administration of the Prefect of the Police, who appoints officers for the purpose of examining whether the meat is wholesome, and further to maintain order in the abattoirs; if a journeyman butcher is known to be dishonest or to rob his employer, he would be dismissed, and not allowed to work there again; indeed, no butcher would employ him. There is, however, among the journeymen, a want of refinement; they are in general rough men, foul tongued, and apt to be saucy when in bad temper; still they are honest. There are many foremen who represent the wholesale butchers at the abattoirs, and who earn from 70 to 80 francs per week.

To sum up, I am of opinion that in trade like that in cattle, the more competition there is in a market the better it is for the senders.

The wholesale butcher's trade has its utility, but it would be better if it did not exist. In our markets we prefer selling retail to selling wholesale; we obtain better prices thereby, of which our clients are well aware, and they, therefore, always press us to retail as much as possible. App. No. 5.

The administration of the city of Paris endeavours by every possible means to have meat cheap, but until now it has adopted a wrong course; it will not take advice of competent persons, and this occasions it to commit errors in every attempt. (Practice is better than theory).

Remain, &c.
Portout ainé.

P.S.—Large quantities of dead meat arrive daily from all parts of France, and are sold by auction, under inspection of the administration of the Prefect of the Police; unwholesome meat is seized, and sent to the wild beasts in the Jardin des Plantes."

Appendix, No. 9.

LETTER from Mr. Gebhardt, to Mr. Milner Gibson, M.P. App. No. 9.

Stamford House,
Sir, 344, Camden-road.

As I understand the Committee in the House of Commons does not intend taking any more evidence of cattle salesmen on the Cattle Disease, I shall consider it a great favour if you will lay this letter before the Committee, as I represent a large interest in the foreign cattle trade, and not being able to attend when the other witnesses were examined, I consider it my duty towards my friends abroad to make my views known about this matter to the Committee.

1st. It is my firm opinion that this rinderpest is not introduced in this country from abroad, for the importation of cattle has continued all the time the plague has been here, and still we cannot trace one single instance where cattle have arrived here with this disease, for the simple reason, that the disease does not exist abroad in any part wherefrom cattle are exported to this country, with the exception of Holland, where the disease was introduced from this country, and of course importation is prohibited now from there.

I keep a herd of valuable short-horn stock, some of the best blood in England, all pedigree about 50 head. I have been in the habit for years of sending young bulls and heifers abroad for improving the breed, and since this disease broke out I have not been able to send a single head, as the people abroad are afraid to introduce a pest in their country which they never had.

My farm lays about four miles from the Metropolitan Market in Hornsey. I have, during all the time the rinderpest has been raging in this country, sent foreign beast and sheep to this farm (beast only, till such time when an Order in Council prohibited the removal of any beast). This foreign stock laid in adjoining fields and yards with my own stock, and I have never had one single attack of the rinderpest, which I consider gives a great proof that foreign cattle is wrongly accused of bringing this disease into this country, and would be unjust to put restrictions on the importation of foreign cattle.

2d. Quarantine for foreign cattle is impossible, in fact, if it were enforced, nobody would send their stock here, because the cattle are liable on the journey to get the foot and mouth disease; when this is the case they cannot feed, and would naturally waste away to a frightful extent in a very short time.

3d. To kill cattle at the wharves would be almost almost as injurious as quarantine, for the extra expense of killing there, and the muddled state the beast arrive at the butchers' shops is considered on good authority to be at least 2 l. per ox, and often 3 l. to 4 l. Here is a loss whereby nobody gets the benefit, neither the producer nor the consumer; but if the loss already so great, considering the small number of beast now killed at the wharves, on account of the foot and mouth disease, what would be the loss if all foreign cattle had to be killed there? Supposing the importation of cattle to be as large as at present, there would not be customers enough to buy half the beast; at present a great number of foreign stock are sold to supply the country butchers and government contractors, particularly in the grass season, foreign beast sent all over the country alive; I believe every seaport to the south is supplied from London; a very large number go north, to Birmingham, Wolverhampton, and other manufacturing places.

If the beast were killed at the wharves the meat would be useless for such purposes, because in hot weather it would spoil; the result would be, meat would be very dear in some parts of the country, particularly in the manufacturing districts, where the great consuming part of the population live, and would be worth very little at the wharves where it is killed, and tons would be spoiled; consequently, the importation would diminish to a great extent, and the price of meat made artificially dearer, and the poor man would have to suffer.

4th. To have all the cattle killed at the market is just as bad as killing at the wharves; the same objections would be there as at the wharves; and in one point even worse, for if cattle had to be sent after arrival directly to the market, they would be placed in layers, where there is not one-tenth part of room, and even if they covered the whole vacant space with layers there would not be room enough; the charge is very high, and cattle begin to suffer the moment they enter, particularly grass-fed cattle.

Cattle which arrive now by rail or steamer are put in fields as near the market as any salesman can get land. There the beast get over their journey, rest, and get refreshed till they go to market, which is generally two days after their arrival.

If the cattle are driven to the layers in the market, they lay on bare stones. Straw is not given, a great many put in one pen, and are overcrowded. The cattle keep fighting, riding, falling down, the little hay they get is partly spoiled by being pulled out and trampled on, and when the cattle are shown in the market they look bad, are stiff, lame, and bruised, whilst those which come from the fields look full, well, and healthy.

Another great objection to lay the cattle in the market layers, is the cattle get the foot and mouth complaint; the layers are never free from this disease: it is a notorious fact that English or foreign stock get this disease either on the journey, or for a certainty if they have been in the market or layers; so the moment fresh cattle are put in those market layers, they are liable to catch the foot and mouth complaint; and nine cases out of ten, when cattle arrive on Saturday, and we put in the market layers, they show this disease on Monday, which would not be the case if the cattle were allowed as before to go to grass fields, for every salesman would take care, for his own interest, not to bring any cattle back from the market to his own fields, or stalls; at least I never do so myself.

5th. My opinion, to prevent any disease brought into this country, and to do away with the pretence, and to make it impossible for anybody to assume it might be brought in, is as follows:

1st. The Government to be informed, by their agents abroad, immediately any contagious disease breaks out in any country (except foot and mouth disease), and of course to prohibit the importation of live stock from such country.

2d. To make a law that no store cattle or milch cows should be imported. Every animal should be killed within one week after arrival, under heavy penalty. It is my firm opinion the importation of milch cows and young beast one year or two years old, have done the foreign trade more harm than anything else. I believe such young beast are more liable to diseases, on account of the change of atmosphere; and cows are sent just before or after calving, are in a feverish state put in the hold of the steamer, they suffer from heat, and afterwards, when landed, exposed to cold: to make them show good milkers they are not milked sometimes for some days, and consequently are more liable to disease, particularly lung disease.

3d. All cattle should be compelled to be sold at the market (I of course only refer to London, not being acquainted with other sea-ports), in order that a second inspection may take place in the market, and to pacify the public mind, that in case the inspectors at the wharf had not detected any disease, the market inspector might find it out.

Finally, I believe, if such suggestions are adopted, it would be impossible to ship a diseased animal; it would be further impossible to land one or to show it in a public market for sale; but still, as it is the opinion of some of the professors of veterinary science, who have enlightened the public so much on this disease, and have done so much to stop it (?), the germ of the disease might still remain in the animal undetected, then by adopting the plan to have every animal killed within a week, the disease would not spread, and there would be no danger of allowing foreign cattle to be sold in the market, and to be sent alive to various parts of the country where they may be wanted, and to be killed at the place of their destination.

If such measures were adopted, I believe the interest of the producer and consumer of meat would be equally protected; if any one of the other schemes were attempted, the foreign trade would be crippled, meat would be frightfully dear, particularly in hot weather, in the country where it would be most wanted, in manufacturing districts, and almost valueless sometimes in London.

I am, &c.

Appendix, No. 11.

PAPERS handed in by Mr. Charles Hunt. App. No. 11.

COPIES of ORDERS issued to the CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT by the LORDS of the PRIVY COUNCIL relative to the CATTLE PLAGUE.

Privy Council Office,
Sir, 30 June 1864.

THE Lords of the Council have been informed that an opinion has been expressed by a Committee of the House of Commons, that the regulations under the Order in Council of the 28th July 1856, now in force at the port of London, with respect to the examination and detention of foreign cattle, should in certain respects be relaxed; and that when foreign cattle are imported affected with pleuro-pneumonia, scab, or foot and mouth disease, only the animals actually at the time affected with those diseases should be detained, and that the remainder of the cargo should be allowed to pass without being detained.

Having satisfied themselves, after careful inquiry, that such a modification of the existing practice would not be likely to involve the risk of any injury to the public health, their Lordships are of opinion that the relaxation of the existing regulations recommended by a Committee of the House of Commons may be permitted; and I am instructed by their Lordships to request that you will move the Commissioners of Customs to give the necessary directions for effecting the above-mentioned modification of the regulations, under the Order in Council of the 28th July 1856, now in force at the port of London, taking, of course, especial care that, under the new regulations, the examination of animals arriving at that port shall be so complete as to ensure the detention of any animals actually suffering from either of the diseases specified.

COPY of a MINUTE of the Board of Customs, dated 8 July 1864.

THE Lords of the Committee of Privy Council for Trade, having been pleased by Mr. Helps' letter of the 30th ultimo, to signify their opinion that the regulations now in force at this port, under the Order in Council of the 28th July 1856, with respect to the examination and detention of foreign cattle, may be relaxed, and requested that when foreign cattle are imported affected with pleuro-pneumonia, scab, or foot and mouth disease, directions may be given that only the animals actually at the time affected with those diseases should be detained, and that the remainder of the cargo should be allowed to pass without being detained.

Ordered, that the Comptroller of the Out-Door Department be apprised thereof, and directed to instruct the Veterinary Surgeons to govern themselves accordingly, taking special care that the examination of the animals be so complete as to ensure the detention of any actually suffering from either of the diseases specified.

Council Office, Whitehall.
Sir, 25 July 1865.

I AM directed by the Lord President of the Council to forward to you, for the information of the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Customs, the enclosed copy of an Order of the Lords of the Council, dated 24th July 1865, which has been issued with the view to prevent the spread of an infectious disease now prevailing among cattle within the metropolis and its neighbourhood.

The Lords of the Council have reason to apprehend that cattle affected with this disease may be imported into this country; their Lordships therefore direct me to request that you will move the Commissioners of Customs to instruct their officers at the various out-ports to exercise the greatest care in the examination of all cattle which may be imported into this country; and, in the event of any disease being discovered, to adopt all necessary measures to prevent the introduction and spread of the disease.

I am, &c.

COPY of ORDER in COUNCIL referred to.

At the Council Chamber, Whitehall, the 24th day of July 1865.

By the Lords of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council.

PRESENT:

Lord President.	Sir George Grey, Bart.
Mr. Milner Gibson.

WHEREAS by an Act passed in the Session of the 11th and 12th years of Her present Majesty's reign, intituled "An Act to prevent until the 1st day of September, 1850, and to the end of the then next Session of Parliament, the spreading of Contagious or Infectious Disorders among Sheep, Cattle, and other Animals," and which has since been from time to time continued by divers subsequent Acts, it is (amongst other things) enacted that it shall be lawful for the Lords and others of Her Majesty's Privy Council, or any two or more of them, from time to time to make such Orders and Regulations as to them may seem necessary, for the purpose of prohibiting or regulating the removal to or from such parts or places as they may designate in such Order or Orders, of sheep, cattle, horses, swine, or other animals, or of meat, skins, hides, horns, hoofs, or other part of any animals, or of hay, straw, fodder, or other articles likely to propagate infection; and also for the purpose of purifying any yard, stable, outhouse, or other place, or any waggons, carts, carriages, or other vehicles; and also for the purpose of directing how any animals dying in a diseased state, or any animals, parts of animals, or other things seized under the provisions of this Act, are to be disposed of; and also for the purpose of causing notices to be given of the appearance of any disorder among sheep, cattle, or other animals, and to make any other Orders or Regulations for the purpose of giving effect to the provisions of the said Act, and again to revoke, alter, or vary any such Orders or Regulations; and that all provisions for any of the purposes aforesaid in any such Order or Orders contained, shall have the like force and effect as if the same had been inserted in the said Act; and that all persons offending against the said Act, shall for each and every offence forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding 20 l., or such smaller sum as the said Lords or others of Her Majesty's Privy Council may in any case by such Order direct:

And whereas a contagious or infectious disorder, of which the nature is at present uncertain, has lately appeared, and now prevails among cattle within the metropolis and in the neighbourhood thereof, and it is expedient to take measures for preventing such disorder from spreading:

Now, therefore, the Lords of Her Majesty's Privy Council do hereby, by virtue and in exercise of the powers given by the said recited Act, and by the several Acts continuing the same as aforesaid, order as follows:

1. If at the date of the publication of this Order in the "London Gazette" there shall be any cow, heifer, bull, bullock, or ox labouring under any contagious or infectious disorder in the possession or custody of any cowkeeper, dairyman, or dairywoman, or of any milkman or milkwoman, or vendor or purveyor of milk, or of any dealer in cattle whatsoever within the City of London, or within the limits of the metropolitan police district, or if at any time hereafter, while this present Order shall continue in force and unrevoked, any cow, heifer, bull, bullock, or ox, being in the possession or custody of any such person as aforesaid within the said City of London, or within the metropolitan police district, shall be seized or attacked with, or be found labouring or suffering under, any such contagious or infectious disorder, notice of the existence of such disorder, or of the first appearance of such disorder, in or among the cattle belonging to or in the custody of any such person as aforesaid, shall immediately thereupon be given by the person in whose possession or custody such diseased animals or animal shall be, to the Clerk of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council in waiting at the Office of Her Majesty's Privy Council at Whitehall, in the county of Middlesex; and it shall be lawful for the said Clerk of Her Majesty's Privy Council, and for all such persons as he shall by writing under his hand authorise in that behalf, thereupon, and at all reasonable times thereafter, to inspect and examine all or any such diseased animals or animal, and to report to the Lords of Her Majesty's Privy Council all such information and particulars as to the nature or character of such disorder as may seem to him expedient for the purpose of enabling proper regulations to be made for preventing or checking the further propagation and increase of such disorder.

2. Every person offending against this Order, and omitting to give such notice, or to permit such inspection and examination as aforesaid, shall for every such offence forfeit any sum not exceeding 20 l., which the Justices before whom he or she shall be convicted of such offence may think fit to impose.

(signed) Edmund Harrison.

Privy Council Office,
Whitehall, 11 August 1865.

Sir,

ADVERTING to my letter of the 9th August instant, suggesting the adoption of certain measures, with a view to prevent the importation into this country of diseased cattle, I am directed by the Lords of the Council to acquaint you, for the information of the Commissioners of Customs, that their Lordships are of opinion that it is desirable to suspend, for the present, the authority given in my letter of the 30th June 1864, in conformity with an opinion expressed by a Committee of the House of Commons, to relax some of the regulations relating to the examination and admission of foreign cattle, enforced by the Commissioners of Customs under the provisions of the Order in Council of the 28th July 1856.

I am, therefore, directed by the Lords of the Council to request that you will move the Commissioners of Customs to give the necessary directions to their officers in London and at the various out-ports in the United Kingdom, to ensure the rigid enforcement of the provisions against the admission of diseased cattle, contained in the above-mentioned Order in Council of the 28th July 1856.

COPY of MINUTE of the Board of Customs, dated 12 August 1865.

THE Secretary laid before the Board a letter from Mr. Helps, Clerk of the Council, dated the 11th instant, adverting to his letter of the 9th August instant, in which the adoption of certain measures was suggested, with a view to prevent the importation into this country of diseased cattle, and acquainting the Board that their Lordships are of opinion that it is desirable to suspend, for the present, the authority given in their Lordships' letter of the 30th June 1864, in conformity with an opinion expressed by a Committee of the House of Commons, to relax some of the regulations relating to the examination and admission of foreign cattle, enforced by the Board under the provisions of the Order in Council of the 28th July 1856.

The Lords of the Council, therefore, request that the Board will give the necessary directions to their officers in London, and at the various out-ports in the United Kingdom, to ensure the rigid enforcement of the provisions against the admission of diseased cattle contained in the above-mentioned Order in Council of the 28th July 1856.

Ordered, That the officers in London be informed that the order contained in the letter from the Privy Council of the 30th June 1864, by which the regulations prescribed by the Order in Council of the 28th July 1856, relating to the examination and admission of cattle were relaxed, is suspended for the present, and that the former regulations are again in force; that in case, therefore, of any animal in a cargo being found to be suffering from any contagious or infectious disease, the whole of the animals are to be detained as directed by the Order in Council of 1856, above referred to, for such a time as the inspector employed shall, in the exercise of his discretion, consider to be necessary. And a General Order is to be forthwith issued to the out-ports in accordance with the latter part of Mr. Helps' letter.

Custom House, London,
Sir, 12 August 1865.

WITH reference to the Board's General Order 66—1865, respecting the examination of cattle imported into this country, I am now instructed to direct you, in consequence of a communication from the Lords of the Council dated the 11th instant, to take the necessary steps to insure the rigid enforcement of the provisions against the admission of diseased cattle contained in the Order in Council of the 28th July, 1856, a copy of which accompanied the Board's General Order 74—1856, to which your attention is especially called.

ORDER IN COUNCIL.

AT the Council Chamber, Whitehall, the 25th day of August 1865.

By the Lords of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council.

PRESENT:

Sir George Grey, Bart.
Mr. Secretary Cardwell.

WHEREAS by an Act passed in the Session of the 11th and 12th years of Her present Majesty's reign, intituled "An Act to prevent until the 1st day of September 1850, and to the end of the then next Session of Parliament, the spreading of Contagious or Infectious Disorders among Sheep, Cattle, and other Animals," and which has since been from time to time continued by divers subsequent Acts, it is (amongst other things) enacted that it shall be lawful for the Lords and others of Her Majesty's Privy Council, or any two or more of them, from time to time to make such Orders and Regulations as to them may seem necessary, for the purpose of prohibiting or regulating the removal to or from such parts or places as they may designate in such Order or Orders, of sheep, cattle, horses, swine, or other animals; and to make any other Orders or Regulations for the purpose of giving effect to the provisions of the said Act, and again to revoke, alter, or vary any such Orders or Regulations; and that all provisions for any of the purposes aforesaid in any such Order or Orders contained shall have the like force and effect as if the same had been inserted in the said Act; and that all persons offending against the said Act shall for each and every offence forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding 20 l., or such smaller sum as the said Lords or others of Her Majesty's Privy Council may in any case by such Order direct:

And whereas a contagious or infectious disorder has lately appeared, and now prevails among cattle within that part of the United Kingdom called Great Britain, which is generally designated as the "Cattle Plague:"

And whereas it is expedient to take measures for preventing such disorder from extending to that part of the United Kingdom called Ireland:

Now, therefore, the Lords of Her Majesty's Privy Council do hereby, by virtue and in exercise of the powers given by the said recited Act, and and by the several Acts continuing the same as aforesaid, order as follows:

1. That in this Order the word "cattle" shall be interpreted to mean any cow, heifer, bull, bullock, ox, or calf.

2. That after the date of the publication of this Order in the "London Gazette," it shall not be lawful for any person to remove any cattle from any port or place within that part of the United Kingdom called Great Britain, to any port or place within that part of the United Kingdom called Ireland.

And the Lords of Her Majesty's Treasury are to give such directions herein as may be necessary to ensure due obedience to this Order.

Council Office, Whitehall,
Sir, 26 August 1865.

I HAVE to acquaint you, for the information of the Commissioners of Customs, that Her Majesty's Government have received intelligence from the British Minister at the Hague, that a malady amongst cattle, having a striking resemblance to the disease which now exists in England, and which is called the "Cattle Plague," has broken out in the Netherlands.

I am directed by the Lords of the Council to request that the Commissioners of Customs will make known this fact to their officers at the outports, in order that they may be careful not to relax the vigilance which, as their Lordships are aware, these officers have shown, by strictly enforcing the regulations laid down by your Board in accordance with the letters addressed to the Commissioners by the Privy Council on the 25th of July, and the 11th and 12th August 1865, having for their object to prevent the importation of diseased cattle into this country from any foreign ports.

AT the Council Chamber, Whitehall, the 7th day of September 1865.

By the Lords of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council.

PRESENT:

Lord President. | Viscount Palmerston.

WHEREAS by an Act passed in the Session of the 11th and 12th years of Her present Majesty's reign, intituled "An Act to prevent until the 1st day of September 1850, and to the end of the then next Session of Parliament, the spreading of Contagious or Infectious Disorders among Sheep, Cattle, and other Animals," and which has since been from time to time continued by divers subsequent Acts, it is (amongst other things) enacted that it shall be lawful for the Lords and others of Her Majesty's Privy Council, or any two or more of them, from time to time to make such Orders and Regulations as to them may seem necessary, for the purpose of prohibiting or regulating the removal to or from such parts or places as they may designate in such Order or Orders, of sheep, cattle, horses, swine, or other animals, or of meat, skins, hides, horns, hoofs, or other parts of any animals; and to make any other Orders or Regulations for the purpose of giving effect to the provisions of the said Act, and again to revoke, alter, or vary any such Orders or Regulations; and that all provisions for any of the purposes aforesaid in any such Order or Orders contained shall have the like force and effect as if the same had been inserted in the said Act; and that all persons offending against the said Act shall for each and every offence forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding 20 l. or such smaller sum as the said Lords or others of Her Majesty's Privy Council may in any case by such Order direct:

And whereas a contagious or infectious disorder has lately appeared, and now prevails among cattle within that part of the United Kingdom called Great Britain, which is generally designated as the "Cattle Plague:"

And whereas it was expedient to take measures for preventing such disorder from extending to that part of the United Kingdom called Ireland; and whereas, for such purpose, an Order was duly made in pursuance of the authority of the said Acts, by the Lords of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, dated 25th August 1865; and whereas by such Order, the removal to any port or place in that part of the United Kingdom called Ireland, from any port or place in that part of the United Kingdom called Great Britain, of any cow, heifer, bull, bullock, ox, or calf was prohibited:

And whereas it is apprehended that the said disease, disease, termed "Cattle Plague," may be communicated otherwise than by the removal of the above-named animals:

Now, therefore, the Lords of Her Majesty's Privy Council do hereby, in exercise of the powers given by the said recited Act, and by the several Acts continuing the same as aforesaid, order as follows:

That, after the date of the publication of this Order in the London Gazette, it shall not be lawful for any person to remove any skins, hides, horns, hoofs, or other parts of any of the above-named animals, from any port or place within that part of the United Kingdom called Great Britain, to any port or place within that part of the United Kingdom called Ireland.

And the Lords of Her Majesty's Treasury are to give such directions herein as may be necessary to insure due obedience to this Order.

ORDER in COUNCIL.

AT the Council Chamber, Whitehall, the 13th day of September 1865.

By the Lords of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council.

PRESENT:

Lord President. | Duke of Somerset.

WHEREAS by an Act passed in the Session of the 11th and 12th years of Her present Majesty's reign, intituled "An Act to prevent until the 1st day of September 1850, and to the end of the then next Session of Parliament, the spreading of Contagious or Infectious Disorders among Sheep, Cattle, and other Animals," and which has since been from time to time continued by divers subsequent Acts, it is (amongst other things) enacted that it shall be lawful for the Lords and others of Her Majesty's Privy Council, or any two or more of them, from time to time, to make such Orders and Regulations as to them may seem necessary for the purpose of prohibiting or regulating the removal to or from such parts or places as they may designate in such Order or Orders, of sheep, cattle, horses, swine, or other animals, or of meat, skins, hides, horns, hoofs, or other parts of any animals, and to make any other Orders or Regulations for the purpose of giving effect to the provisions of the said Act, and again to revoke, alter or vary any such Orders or Regulations; and that all provisions for any of the purposes aforesaid in any such Order or Orders contained shall have the like force and effect as if the same had been inserted in the said Act; and that all persons offending against the said Act shall for each and every offence forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding twenty pounds, or such smaller sum as the said Lords or others of Her Majesty's Privy Council may in any case by such Order direct:

And whereas a contagious or infectious disorder has lately appeared, and now prevails among cattle within that part of the United Kingdom called Great Britain, which is generally designated as the "Cattle Plague:"

And whereas it was expedient to take measures for preventing such disorder from extending to that part of the United Kingdom called Ireland; and whereas for such purpose, Orders were duly made in pursuance of the authority of the said Acts, by the Lords of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, dated the 25th of August 1865, and the 7th day of September 1865:

And whereas by the last-mentioned Order the removal to any port or place in that part of the United Kingdom called Ireland, from any port or place in that part of the United Kingdom called Great Britain, of any skins, hides, horns, hoofs, or other parts of any cow, heifer, bull, bullock, ox, or calf, was prohibited:

And whereas it has been represented to the Lords of Her Majesty's Privy Council, that there is annually a large importation into Ireland of skins and hides brought from India, South America, and Australia, which countries are at present free from the disease designated as the "Cattle Plague:"

Now, therefore, the Lords of Her Majesty's Privy Council do hereby, in exercise of the powers given by the said recited Act, and by the several Acts continuing the same as aforesaid, order as follows:—

That, after the date of the publication of this Order in the London Gazette, all hides and skins brought into Great Britain from India, South America, or Australia, and afterwards removed from Great Britain to Ireland, are hereby excepted from the operation of the said Order of the 7th day of September 1865.

And the Lords of Her Majesty's Treasury are to give such directions herein as may be necessary to give due effect to this Order.

Sir, Whitehall, 26 September 1865.

I AM directed by the Lords of the Council to transmit to you, for the information of the Commissioners of Customs, the accompanying copy of an Order of their Lordships, dated the 22d of September 1865, consolidating and amending the previous Orders relating to the Cattle Plague, and containing further provisions in regard to animals suffering from that disease.

I am further to transmit to you a copy of a letter addressed to me by Professor Simonds, containing the result of his inquiry relative to an outbreak of the Cattle Plague in a remote part of the county of Norfolk, supposed to have arisen from cattle having been in contact with some diseased sheep recently brought to the premises.

From this letter it would appear that the fears entertained that the disease in question might be communicated through sheep were not unfounded; and it further shows that the officers of customs are fully justified in detaining the whole cargo where one or more of the animals on board are diseased.

By Order of the Commissioners,
(signed) J. B. Hale.

Professor Simonds has presented the subjoined Report to the Council:

To the Clerk of the Council.

Veterinary Department,
23, New-street, Spring Gardens,
Sir, 25 September 1865.

I BEG to report that, acting on the instructions received from you, to investigate, without loss of time, the statement received at your office relative to an outbreak of the Cattle Plague in a remote part of the county of Norfolk, supposed to have arisen from cattle having been in contact with some diseased sheep recently brought to the premises, I have visited the district in question, and inquired into all the circumstances of the case.

It appears that as far back as the 17th of August, Mr. C. Temple, farmer and merchant, of Blakeney, received on his farm 120 lambs, which he had instructed a dealer to procure for him for feeding purposes. The lambs were bought at Thetford fair on the preceding day, and were immediately sent by rail to Fakenham, from which place they were driven to Blakeney, a distance of about 10 miles. On their arrival they appeared to be fatigued to a greater extent than ordinary, which was, however, attributed to the heat of the weather and the exertion the animals had undergone. In addition to this, the shepherd observed that several of them seemed unwell, and he remarked to his master that they did not appear to be "a very healthy lot," and that he thought it would be better to return them to the dealer. Within a day or two of this time the symptoms of illness were more marked in all the original cases, and many more of the animals had been attacked. On the 24th two of the worst cases were removed from the field to the farm premises, and were placed in a shed for treatment, in which afterwards a cow was put. On the 25th two of the lambs died; and, in consequence of this and of the large number which were now affected, the whole were brought on the morning of the 27th into the same yard where the shed previously alluded to is situated. There is also another shed, separated from this yard only by some old furze faggots, into which the cows were driven night and morning for being milked. The lambs remained in the yard till the morning of the 28th, when, having had some medicine administered to them, they were returned to the field, and never came again near the cows. While in the yard three died, two on the 27th and one on the 28th; and on the following day two others died in the field. From this time the disease went on, so that by Friday last, September 22nd, the day of my visit, 46 had either died or been killed, and 27 were in a very precarious condition. On September 7th, 10 days after the last exposure to the sheep, a cow gave evidence of being affected with the Cattle Plague, this animal being the one which had been put into the shed occupied by the diseased sheep on the 24th August. A second cow was attacked on September 11th, and a third shortly afterwards, which was followed by others, so that by the 16th all the cows—six in number—a heifer, and a calf, were all dead. My examination of the lambs showed that they were unmistakably the subjects of the Plague. The symptoms agreed in almost every particular with those observed in cattle affected with the malady, and the post-mortem appearances were also identical.

With a view to ascertain the true nature of the changes produced in the system prior to death, I had four of the lambs killed, and from these I took some diseased parts, and forwarded them to the Royal Veterinary College, without note or comment. These parts were examined by my colleague, Mr. Varnell, who at once recognised the special changes of structure which are caused by the Cattle Plague.

The whole facts of the case leave not the least doubt of sheep being liable to the disease termed the Cattle Plague, and that, when affected, they can easily communicate the malady to the ox tribe; and, moreover, that when so conveyed, it proves equally as destructive as when propagated from ox to ox in the ordinary manner. The case is also more important from having occurred in a place no less than 14 miles distant from any other where the Cattle Plague exists, thus placing beyond a doubt the fact of the malady being introduced among the cattle by the sheep alone.

I regret to add that this is not a solitary case of sheep being affected by the Cattle Plague. I learned that some sheep were supposed to be similarly affected belonging to Mr. R. J. H. Harvey, M.P., on his estate at Crown Point, near Norwich. This place I also visited, and found a large flock of upwards of 2,000 lambs, among which the malady was prevailing. A large number had been separated from the diseased, and gave no evidence of the malady. Very many, however, had died, and the disease was making rapid progress. I also examined many of the dead, and found the post-mortem appearances to be identical with those seen in the other cases spoken of in this report. In this instance the malady was brought into the estate by the purchase of some cattle which afterwards died from from the disease, and which were unfortunately pastured with the sheep at the time the disease manifested itself.

The whole matter is one of the greatest importance, and which I lose no time submitting to you for the information of the Lords of the Council.

ORDER IN COUNCIL.

At the Council Chamber, Whitehall, the 22nd day of September 1865.

By the Lords of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council.

PRESENT:

Lord President.

Duke of Somerset.	Mr. Secretary Cardwell.
Earl of Clarendon.	Mr. H. A. Bruce.
Earl de Grey and Ripon.

WHEREAS by an Act passed in the Session of the 11th and 12th years of Her present Majesty's reign, c. 107, intituled "An Act to prevent until the 1st day of September 1850, and to the end of the then next Session of Parliament, the spreading of Contagious or Infectious Disorders amongst Sheep, Cattle, and other Animals," and which has since been from time to time continued by divers subsequent Acts, and lastly by an Act passed in the Session of the 28th and 29th years of the reign of Her present Majesty, c. 119, it is (amongst other things) enacted that it shall be lawful for the Lords and others of Her Majesty's Privy Council, or any two or more of them, from time to time, to make such orders and regulations as to them may seem necessary for the purpose of prohibiting or regulating the removal to or from such parts or places as they may designate in such Order or Orders, of sheep, cattle, horses, swine, or other animals, or of meat, skins, hides, horns, hoofs, or other part of any animals, or of hay, straw, fodder, or other articles likely to propagate infection; and also for the purpose of purifying any yard, stable, outhouse, or other place, or any waggons, carts, carriages, or other vehicles; and also for the purpose of directing how any animals dying in a diseased state, or any animals, parts of animals, or other things seized under the provisions of the said Act, are to be disposed of; and also for the purpose of causing notices to be given of the appearance of any disorder among sheep, cattle, or other animals, and to make any other orders or regulations for the purpose of giving effect to the provisions of the said Act, and again to revoke, alter, or vary any such orders or regulations; and that all provisions for any of the purposes aforesaid in any such Order or Orders contained shall have the like force and effect as if the same had been inserted in the said Act; and that all persons offending against the said Act shall for each and every offence forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding 20 l., or such smaller sum as to the said Lords or others of Her Majesty's Privy Council may in any case by such Order direct:

And whereas a contagious or infectious disorder now prevails among the cattle of Great Britain, which is generally designated the "Cattle Plague," and may be recognised by the following symptoms:— App. No. 11.

"Great depression of the vital powers, frequent shivering, staggering gait, cold extremities, quick and short breathing, drooping head, reddened eyes, with a discharge from them, and also from the nostrils, of a mucous nature, raw looking places on the inner side of the lips and roof of the mouth, diarrhœa or dysenteric purging:"

And whereas several Orders, dated respectively the 24th of July, the 11th, 18th, and 26th of August 1865, have been made under the authority of the said Acts by the Lords of Her Majesty's Privy Council, with a view to check the spreading of the said disorder:

And whereas it is expedient to consolidate and amend the said Orders:

Now, therefore, the Lords of Her Majesty's Privy Council do hereby, by virtue of, and in exercise of the powers given by, the said Act, so continued as aforesaid, order as follows:—

1. This Order shall extend to all parts of Great Britain.

2. The said Orders dated respectively the 24th of July, the 11th, 18th, and 26th of August 1865, are revoked, with the exception of so much of the said Order of the 24th of July 1865, as empowers the Clerk of Her Majesty's Privy Council to appoint inspectors within the limits of the metropolitan police district, provided that such revocation shall not affect any appointment made, or any act done, or penalty recoverable, under any Order hereby revoked.

3. In this Order the word "animal" shall mean any cow, heifer, bull, bullock, ox, calf, sheep, lamb, goat, or swine; and the word "Inspector" shall include any inspector appointed under this Order, or under any of the said revoked Orders.

4. Whenever the local authority, as hereinafter defined, shall be satisfied of the existence of the said disorder in, or have reason to apprehend its approach to, the district over which his or their jurisdiction extends, it shall be lawful for such local authority, if he or they shall think fit, from time to time to appoint one or more veterinary surgeon or surgeons, or other duly qualified person or persons, to be an inspector or inspectors, for the purpose of carrying into effect the rules and regulations made by this Order, within the district for which he or they shall have been appointed. And the same authority may, from time to time, revoke such appointment.

5. Subject to the powers herein reserved to the Clerk of Her Majesty's Privy Council, the local authority within the City of London, and the liberties thereof, shall be the Lord Mayor; in any municipal borough in England or Wales, the mayor, in any petty sessional division in England or Wales (exclusive so far as relates to the jurisdiction of the inspector of so much of the said division as lies within the limits of a municipal borough for which an inspector has been appointed), the justices acting in and for such petty sessional division. The local authority in any burgh or town in Scotland which is subject to the jurisdiction of a provost or other principal magistrate, shall be the provost or such principal magistrate; and in any other place in Scotland not within the jurisdiction of such provost or other principal magistrate, the justices of the county in sessions assembled.

6. Every inspector shall from time to time report to the local authority by which he is appointed, the steps taken by him for carrying into effect the regulations prescribed by this Order; and the local authority shall certify, in such manner as may be directed by one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, the number of days that such inspector has actually been engaged in the performance of his duty, and the number of miles travelled by him while thus engaged.

7. Every inspector shall furnish the Lords of the Council with such information in regard to the said disorder, as their Lordships may, from time to time, require.

8. Every person having in his possession, or under his custody, any animal labouring under the said disorder, shall forthwith give notice thereof to the inspector of the district within which such person resides, or if no inspector shall have been appointed for the district within which such person resides, then to the officers hereinafter named, according to the place of residence of the person obliged to give notice; that is to say: within the metropolitan police district, to the said Clerk of the Privy Council; within the City of London and the liberties thereof, to the Lord Mayor; within any other borough, burgh, or town subject to the jurisdiction of a mayor, provost, or other principal magistrate, to such mayor, provost, or other principal magistrate; elsewhere in England, to the Clerk of the Justices acting in and for the petty sessional division; and elsewhere in Scotland, to the Clerk of the Peace of the county.

9. Every inspector shall have power to enter upon and inspect any premises or place in which any animal or animals may be found within the district for which he is appointed, and to examine and inspect, whenever and wherever he may deem it necessary, any animal within such district.

10. Every inspector shall have power within his district to seize and slaughter, or cause to be seized and slaughtered, and to be buried, as hereinafter directed, in any convenient place, any animal labouring under the said disorder.

11. Every inspector shall have power within his district to cause to be cleansed and disinfected, in any manner which he may think proper, any premises in which animals labouring under the said disorder have been, or may be, and to cause to be disinfected, and if necessary destroyed, any fodder, manure, or refuse matter, which he may deem likely to propagate the said disorder. And every owner or occupier of such premises shall obey any order given by such inspector for that purpose.

12. Every inspector shall have power within his district to direct that any animal which he suspects to be labouring under the said disorder, shall be kept separate from animals free from the said disorder. And every person having in his possession, or under his custody, such animal, shall obey any order given by such inspector for that purpose.

13. Every person having in his possession, or under his custody, any animal labouring under the said disorder, shall, as far as practicable, keep such animal separate from all other animals, and shall not, if the animal be within a district for which an inspector has been appointed, remove the same from his land or premises, without the license of the inspector.

14. No person shall send or bring to any fair or market, or expose for sale, or send or carry by any railway, or by any ship or vessel coastwise, or place upon, or drive along, any highway or the sides thereof, any animal labouring under the said disorder.

15. No person in any district for which an inspector has been appointed shall, without the license of the inspector, send or bring to or from market, or remove from his land or premises, any animal which has been in the same shed or stable, or has been in the same herd or flock, or has been in contact, with any animal labouring under the said disorder.

16. No person shall place, or keep, any animal labouring under the said disorder in any common or uninclosed land, or, if the animal be in a district for which an inspector has been appointed, in any field or pasture, where, in the judgment of the inspector, such animal may be likely to propagate the said disorder.

17. All animals having died of the said disorder, or having been slaughtered on account thereof, shall be buried with their skins, and with a sufficient quantity of quick-lime, or other disinfectant, as soon as practicable, and shall be covered with at least five feet of earth, or shall, in districts for which an inspector has been appointed, with the consent of the owner, be otherwise disposed of, in manner directed by the inspector.

18. During the continuance of the "Cattle Plague" within the said City of London, or that part of the metropolitan police district which is under the jurisdiction of the Metropolitan Board of Works, no animal shall be brought or sent to the Metropolitan Cattle Market, or any other market within the said City or the said part of the metropolitan police district, except for the purpose of being there sold for immediate slaughtering; and every such animal, as soon as sold, shall be marked for slaughter, in the manner in which cattle are ordinarily marked for slaughter in the Metropolitan Cattle Market.

19. Whenever any local authority, as hereinbefore defined, declares, by notice published in any newspaper circulating within his or their jurisdiction, that it is expedient that animals, as hereinbefore defined, or some specified description thereof, shall be excluded from any specified market or fair within that jurisdiction, for a time to be specified in such notice, it is hereby ordered, that after the publication of such notice, it shall not be lawful for any person to bring or send such animals or description thereof into such market or fair; provided always, that this clause of this Order shall not, unless renewed by a further Order, be in force after the expiration of three calendar months from the date of this Order.

20. Every person offending against this Order shall, shall, in pursuance of the said Act, for every such offence forfeit any sum not exceeding 20 l., which the justices before whom he or she shall be convicted of such offence may think fit to impose.

ORDER IN COUNCIL.

At the Council Chamber, Whitehall, the 29th day of September 1865.

By the Lords of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council.

PRESENT:

Duke of Somerset.
Mr. Secretary Cardwell.

WHEREAS by an Act passed in the Session of the 11th and 12th years of Her present Majesty's reign, intituled, "An Act to prevent, until the 1st day of September 1850, and to the end of the then next session of Parliament, the spreading of Contagious Disorders among Sheep, Cattle, and other Animals," and which has since been from time to time continued by divers subsequent Acts, it is (amongst other things) enacted that it shall be lawful for the Lords and others of Her Majesty's Privy Council, or any two or more of them, from time to time, to make such Orders and Regulations as to them may seem necessary for the purpose of prohibiting or regulating the removal to or from such parts or places as they may designate in such Order or Orders, of sheep, cattle, horses, swine, or other animals, or of meat, skins, hides, horns, hoofs, or other parts of any animals; and to make any other Orders or Regulations for the purpose of giving effect to the provisions of the said Act, and again to revoke, alter, or vary any such Orders or Regulations; and that all provisions for any of the purposes aforesaid, in any such Order or Orders contained, shall have the like force and effect as if the same had been inserted in the said Act; and that all persons offending against the said Act shall for each and every offence forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding 20 l., or such smaller sum as the said Lords or others of Her Majesty's Privy Council may in any case by such Order direct:

And whereas a contagious or infectious disorder has lately appeared, and now prevails, among cattle within that part of the United Kingdom called Great Britain, which is generally designated as the "Cattle Plague":

And whereas it was expedient to take measures for preventing such disorder from extending to that part of the United Kingdom called Ireland; and whereas, for such purpose, Orders were duly made in pursuance of the authority of the said Acts, by the Lords of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, dated 25th August and 7th and 13th September 1865; and whereas, by such Orders, the removal to any port or place, in that part of the United Kingdom called Ireland, from any port or place in that part of the United Kingdom called Great Britain, of any cow, heifer, bull, bullock, ox, or calf, and, with certain exceptions, of the skins, hides, horns, hoofs, or other parts of any of those animals, was prohibited:

And whereas there is reason to believe that the said disorder has made its appearance among sheep and lambs:

Now, therefore, the Lords of Her Majesty's Privy Council do hereby, in exercise of the powers given by the said recited Act, and by the several Acts continuing the same as aforesaid, order as follows:—

That it shall not be lawful for any person to remove any sheep or lamb, or the skin, or any other part of any sheep or lamb, from any port or place within that part of the United Kingdom called Great Britain, to any port or place within that part of the United Kingdom called Ireland: provided, that this Order shall not extend to skins brought into Great Britain from India, South America, or Australia, and afterwards removed from Great Britain to Ireland:

And the Lords of Her Majesty's Treasury are to give such directions herein as may be necessary to insure due obedience to this Order.

PROCLAMATION by the Lieutenant Governor.

ISLE OF MAN TO WIT.

WHEREAS by certain Proclamations bearing date respectively the 1st, 4th, and 16th days of September 1865, and the 9th instant, certain Orders were issued for the purpose of preventing the introduction and spreading into or from this Island of a disease that now prevails among cattle and sheep in certain parts of the United Kingdom, commonly known as the Cattle Plague.

And whereas it is deemed expedient to extend and vary, and consolidate into one Order the various Orders contained in the above-mentioned Proclamations.

Now, therefore, it is hereby Ordered:

That the several Proclamations bearing date respectively the 1st, 4th, and 16th of September 1865, and 9th October 1865, shall be and the same are hereby revoked.

And whereas by an Act of Tynwald promulgated on the 18th day of October 1865, entitled "The Cattle Diseases Prevention Act, 1865," it is is amongst other things enacted that it shall be lawful for the Governor, by and with the advice and consent of any two Members of the Council, from time to time to make such Orders and Regulations, and to take such measures as may appear to be necessary for preventing or regulating the importation of animals from parts beyond the seas where infectious or contagious diseases prevail, and also for the purpose of prohibiting the exportation from this Isle, or from any particular port or ports thereof, of cattle, horses, sheep, or other animals, and to make any other Orders or Regulations for the purpose of giving effect to the provisions of the said Act, and again to revoke, alter, or vary any such Orders or Regulations; and that all provisions for any of the purposes aforesaid, in any such Order or Orders contained, shall have the like force and effect as if the same had been inserted in the said Act; and that if any animal be imported or introduced, or attempted to be imported or introduced into this Isle, contrary to the provisions of any Order or Orders made in pursuance of the said Act, the same shall be forfeited in like manner as goods prohibited to be imported by any Act relating to the Customs, and for the time being in force in this Isle; and all persons importing or introducing, or exporting or attempting to import or introduce or export, the same shall be liable to such penalties as are imposed on persons importing or exporting, or attempting to import or export, goods prohibited by Acts relating to the Customs, for the time being in force in this Isle; and that for all other offences against the said Act, every person offending shall for each and every offence forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding 20 l., or such smaller sum as the court may award.

Now, therefore, the Lieutenant Governor by and with the advice and consent of two Members of the Council, doth hereby, by virtue and in exercise of the powers given by the said Act,

Order as follows:

1. That from this date no animal, or the skins, hides, horns, or hoofs of any animal, shall be imported into this Isle, or into any particular port or ports thereof, provided that this Order shall not extend to skins and hides brought into Great Britain, from India, South America or Australia.

2. That from this date no animal, or the skins, hides, horns, hoofs, or parts of any animal, shall be exported from this Isle to that part of the United Kingdom called Ireland.

3. That in this Order the word "animal" shall be interpreted to mean any bull, cow, ox, heifer, steer, calf, tup, sheep, wether, or lamb.

ORDER IN COUNCIL.

At the Council Chamber, Whitehall, the 27th day of November 1865.

By the Lords of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council.

PRESENT:

Sir George Grey, Bart. | Mr. Bruce.

WHEREAS by an Act passed in the Session of the 11th and 12th years of Her present Majesty's reign, intituled, "An Act to prevent until the 1st day of September 1850, and to the end of the then next Session of Parliament, the spreading of Contagious or Infectious Disorders amongst Sheep, Cattle, and other Animals," which Act has since been from time to time continued by divers subsequent Acts, it is (amongst other things) enacted that it shall be lawful for the Lords and others of Her Majesty's Privy Council, or any two or more of them, from time to time to make such Orders and Regulations as to them may seem necessary for the purpose of prohibiting or regulating the removal to or from such parts or places, as they may designate in such Order or Orders, of sheep, cattle, horses, swine, or other animals, or of meat, skins, hides, horns, hoofs, or other parts of any animals, and to make any other Orders or Regulations for the purpose of giving effect to the provisions of the said Act, and again to revoke, alter, or vary any such Orders or Regulations; and that all provisions for any of the purposes aforesaid in any such Order or Orders contained, shall have the like force and effect as if the same had been inserted in the said Act; and that all persons offending against the same shall for each and every offence forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding 20 l., or such smaller sum as the said Lords or others of Her Majesty's Privy Council may in any case by such Order direct:

And whereas a contagious or infectious disorder has lately appeared, and now prevails among cattle within that part of the United Kingdom called Great Britain, which is generally designated as the "cattle plague":

And whereas it was expedient to take measures for preventing such disorder from extending to that part of the United Kingdom called Ireland; and whereas for such purpose Orders were duly made in pursuance of the authority of the said Acts, by the Lords of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, dated the 25th day of August 1865, and the 7th and 29th of September 1865:

And whereas by the Order, dated the 7th day of September 1865, the removal to any port or place in that part of the United Kingdom called Ireland, from any port or place in that part of the United Kingdom called Great Britain, of any skins, hides, horns, hoofs, or other parts of any cow, heifer, bull, bullock, ox, or calf, was prohibited:

And whereas by an Order dated the 13th day of September 1865, all hides and skins brought into Great Britain, from India, South America and Australia, and afterwards removed from Great Britain to Ireland, were excepted from the operation of the said Order of the 7th day of September 1865:

And whereas it has been represented to the Lords of Her Majesty's Privy Council, that horns are imported into Ireland from India, South America, and Australia, which countries are at present free from the disease designated as the "cattle plague:"

Now, therefore, the Lords of Her Majesty's Privy Council do hereby, in exercise of the powers given by the said recited Act, and by the several Acts continuing the same as aforesaid, order as follows:

That, after the date of the publication of this Order in the "London Gazette," all horns brought into Great Britain from India, South America, or Australia, and afterwards removed from Great Britain to Ireland, are hereby excepted from the operation of the said Order of the 7th day of September 1865.

And the Lords of Her Majesty's Treasury are to give such directions herein as may be necessary to give due effect to this Order.

The Collector at

ORDER IN COUNCIL.

At the Council Chamber, Whitehall, the 20th day of January 1866.

By the Lords of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council.

PRESENT:

Lord President.	Sir George Grey, Bart.
Lord Privy Seal.	Mr. Milner Gibson.
Earl Russell.	Mr. Bruce.
Lord Stanley of Alderley.	Mr. Göschen.

App. No. 11.

And whereas a contagious or infectious disorder now prevails among cattle within that part of the United Kingdom called Great Britain, which disorder is generally designated as the "Cattle Plague:"

And whereas with a view to check the spreading of the said disorder, an Order, dated the 23rd of November 1865, has been made, under the authority of the said Acts, by the Lords of Her Majesty's Privy Council, consolidating and amending certain Orders previously made for that purpose; and the same has since been altered and amended by a subsequent Order, bearing date the 16th day of December 1865:

And whereas it is expedient to alter and amend the said Orders of the 23rd day of November 1865, and the 16th day of December 1865, respectively: Now, therefore, the Lords of Her Majesty's Privy Council do hereby, in exercise of the powers given by the said Act so continued as aforesaid, order as follows:—

I. The power given by the said Orders to any local authority, as defined by the said Order of the 16th day of December, 1865, to declare by notice published in any newspaper circulating within its jurisdiction, and also by notice published in some newspaper or newspapers circulating within the county or counties bordering upon the county within which the jurisdiction of such local authority is situate, that it is expedient, for a time to be specified in such notice, that animals, as defined by the said Order of the 23rd day of November 1865, or some specified description thereof, shall not, either absolutely, or except under such conditions as such local authority shall think fit to impose with a view to prevent the spreading of the said disorder, be brought from any other part of Great Britain into any place within his or their jurisdiction, shall extend, from and after the day on which this present Order comes into operation, to all raw or untanned hides and skins, and all horns or hoofs of any animals as defined as aforesaid, or of any description thereof to be specified in any such notice, notice, except such hides, skins, horns, or hoofs, as are directly imported into the United Kingdom from India, Australia, South Africa, or America, and to the offal of any such animals as aforesaid, and also to all dung, hay, straw, fodder, or litter likely to propagate infection; and it shall not be lawful for any person, in contravention of any such notice, to bring or send any hide, skin, horn, hoof, offal, or other article as aforesaid, except in accordance with such conditions as aforesaid, from any place in Great Britain beyond such jurisdiction into any place within such jurisdiction; and the copy of any such notice shall be sent forthwith by the local authority by which it is made, to the Clerk of Her Majesty's Privy Council, and shall be published by him in the London Gazette: Provided always that nothing contained in this clause of this Order shall make it unlawful for any person to send or carry any such hides, skins, horns, hoofs, offal, or other articles as aforesaid, by railway, through such jurisdiction; and provided also, that nothing contained in this clause of this Order shall make it unlawful for any person to bring or send, with the license of any two justices acting in and for the jurisdiction to which such notice applies, any such hides, skins, horns, hoofs, offal, or other articles as aforesaid, from any land and premises in his own occupation, and beyond such jurisdiction, to any other land or premises in his own occupation within such jurisdiction, during a time to be specified in such license.

App. No. 11.

II. The power given by the said Order of the 16th day of December 1865, to any local authority as thereby defined, to declare, by notice published in any newspaper circulating within its jurisdiction, that it is expedient, for a time to be specified in such notice, that no cow, heifer, bull, bullock, ox, or calf shall, except under such conditions as such local authority shall think fit to impose with a view to prevent the spreading of the said disorder, be removed from any particular part of the jurisdiction of such local authority to any other part of such jurisdiction; or from any place or places within such jurisdiction, to be specified in such notice, to any other such place or places, also to be so specified; or from place to place generally within such jurisdiction, or within any specified part thereof; shall extend, from and after the day on which this present Order comes into operation, to all animals, as defined by the said Order of the 23rd day of November 1865, or any specified description thereof; and also to all raw or untanned hides and skins, and all horns and hoofs of any animals as defined as aforesaid or of any description thereof to be specified in any such notice, except such hides, skins, horns, or hoofs as are directly imported into the United Kingdom from India, Australia, South Africa, or America, and to the offal of any such animals as aforesaid, and also to all dung, hay, straw, fodder, or litter likely to propagate infection; and it shall not be lawful for any person to remove any animal, or any hide, skin, horn, hoof, offal, or other article as aforesaid, in contravention of any such notice: Provided always, that nothing contained in this clause of this Order shall make it unlawful for any person to send or carry any such animals, or any such hides, skins, horns, hoofs, offal, or other articles as aforesaid, by railway, through such jurisdiction, or to send or carry any such animals, or any such hides, skins, horns, hoofs, offal, or other articles as aforesaid, if brought by sea from any place out of Great Britain into such jurisdiction, to the nearest convenient railway station for the purpose of carrying them through or out of such jurisdiction.

III. The aforesaid Order, bearing date the 16th day of December, is hereby amended by omitting the words "or out of" from the proviso at the end of the fourth clause of the said Order; and the said proviso is to be read as follows, "provided always that nothing contained in this clause of this Order shall make it unlawful to send or carry any such animal by railway through such jurisdiction, or to send or carry any such animal, if brought by sea from any place out of Great Britain into such jurisdiction to the nearest convenient railway station, for the purpose of carrying it through or out of such jurisdiction."

IV. Any notice given by virtue of this present Order may be renewed, revoked, altered, or varied, from time to time, in the manner provided by the said recited Orders, with respect to notices given under and by virtue thereof.

V. This Order shall come into operation on the 25th day of January 1866, and shall be in force thenceforth until the 1st day of March next, and no longer, unless continued by some further Order.

VI. Every person offending against this Order shall, in pursuance of the said Act, for every such offence forfeit any sum not exceeding 20 l., which the justices before whom he or she shall be convicted of such offence, may think fit to impose.

By Order of the Commissioners,

Order in Council.

At the Council Chamber, Whitehall, the 1st day of February 1866.

By the Lords of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council.

PRESENT:

Lord President.	Sir George Grey, Bart.
Lord Privy Seal.	Mr. Bruce.
Duke of Somerset.	Mr. Göschen.
Earl Russell.
Lord Stanley of Alderley.

Whereas by an Act passed in the Session of the 11th and 12th years of Her present Majesty's reign, intituled "An Act to prevent until the 1st day of September 1850, and to the end of the then next Session of Parliament the spreading of Contagious or Infectious Disorders among Sheep, Cattle, and other Animals," and which has since been from time to time continued by divers subsequent Acts, it is (amongst other things) enacted that it shall be lawful for the Lords and others of Her Majesty's Privy Council, or any two or more of them, from time to time to make such Orders and Regulations as to them may seem necessary, for the purpose of prohibiting or regulating the removal to or from such parts or places as they may designate in such Order or Orders, of sheep, cattle, horses, swine, or other animals, or of meat, skins, hides, horns, hoofs, or other parts of any animals; and to make any other Orders or Regulations for the purpose of giving effect to the provisions of the said Act, and again to revoke, alter, or vary any such Orders or Regulations; and that all provisions for any of the purposes aforesaid, in any such Order or Orders contained, shall have the like force and effect as if the same had been inserted in the said Act; and that all persons offending against the said Act shall for each and every offence forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding 20 l., or such smaller sum as the said Lords or others of Her Majesty's Privy Council may in any case by such Order direct:

And whereas a contagious or infectious disorder has lately appeared, and now prevails, among cattle within that part of the United Kingdom called Great Britain, which is generally designated as the "Cattle Plague:"

And whereas it was expedient to take measures for preventing such disorder from extending to that part of the United Kingdom called Ireland; and whereas, for such purpose, Orders were duly made in pursuance of the authority of the said Acts, by the Lords of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, dated 25th August and 7th, 13th, and 29th September, and 27th November 1865; and whereas, by such Orders, the removal to any port or place in that part of the United Kingdom called Ireland, from any port or place in that part of the United Kingdom called Great Britain, of any cow, heifer, bull, bullock, ox, calf, sheep, or lamb, and, with certain exceptions, of the skins, hides, horns, hoofs, or other parts of any of those animals, was prohibited:

And whereas it has been represented to the Lords of Her Majesty's Privy Council that a considerable trade is carried on in Ireland by the manufacture of leather from sheep and lamb pelts brought from Great Britain, and that all risk of infection from such pelts is removed by the process of "liming:"

Now, therefore, the Lords of Her Majesty's Privy Council do hereby, in exercise of the powers given by the said recited Act, and by the several Acts continuing the same as aforesaid, order as follows:—

That from and after the date of the publication of this Order in the "London Gazette," sheep and lamb pelts that have been thoroughly "limed" are hereby excepted from the operation of the said Order of the 29th day of September 1865, provided such pelts are packed in dry hogsheads (not coopered casks), and that the outsides of the hogsheads are whitewashed before being placed on board ship for conveyance to Ireland.

And the Lords of Her Majesty's Treasury are to give such directions herein as may be necessary to insure due obedience to this Order.

Gentlemen, 6 February 1866.

I am desired by the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury to transmit herewith, for your information and guidance, the enclosed copy of a letter from the Under Secretary for Ireland, dated the 5th instant, relative to the suspected illegal importation of live stock into Ireland, and the means to be adopted for its suppression; and I am to desire that instructions may be forthwith issued to your officers in conformity with the wishes of the Irish Government. I am to state that my Lords have caused a copy of the Under Secretary's letter to be forwarded to the Board of Admiralty, with a like request so far as regards the Coastguard.

The Collector at

ORDER IN COUNCIL.

At the Council Chamber, Whitehall, the 20th day of January 1866.

By the Lords of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council.

PRESENT:

Lord President.	Sir George Grey, Bart.
Lord Privy Seal.	Mr. Milner Gibson.
Earl Russell.	Mr. Bruce.
Lord Stanley of Alderley.	Mr. Göschen.

WHEREAS by an Act passed in the Session of the 11th and 12th years of Her present Majesty's reign, intituled "An Act to prevent until the 1st day of September 1850, and to the end of the then Session of Parliament, the spreading of Contagious or Infectious Disorders among Sheep, Cattle, and other Animals," which Act has since been from time to time continued by divers subsequent Acts, and lastly, by an Act passed in the session of the 28th and 29th years of Her present Majesty, it is (amongst other things) enacted that it shall be lawful for the Lords and others of Her Majesty's Privy Council, or any two or more of them, from time to time to make such Orders and Regulations as to them may seem necessary, for the purpose of prohibiting or regulating the removal to or from such parts or places as they may designate in such Order or Orders, of sheep, cattle, horses, swine, or other animals, or of meat, skins, hides, horns, hoofs, or other parts of any animals, and to make other Orders or Regulations for the purpose of giving effect to the provisions of the said Act, and again to revoke, alter, or vary any such Orders or Regulations, and that all provisions for any of the purposes aforesaid in any such Order or Orders contained shall have the like force and effect as if the same had been inserted in the said Act; and that all persons offending against the same should for each and every offence forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding 20 l., or such smaller sum as the said Lords or others of Her Majesty's Privy Council may in any case by such Order direct:

And whereas a contagious or infectious disorder prevails among cattle within those parts of the United Kingdom called England and Scotland, which disorder is generally designated as the "Cattle Plague," or "Rinderpest," and may be recognised by the following symptoms:—"Great depression of the vital powers, frequent shivering, staggering gait, cold extremities, quick and short breathing, drooping head, reddened eyes, with a discharge from them, and also from the nostrils of a mucous nature, raw-looking places on the inner side of the lips and roof of the mouth, diarrhœa or dysenteric purging."

And whereas it is possible that the said disorder may extend to that part of the United Kingdom called Ireland; and it is expedient to make provisions with a view to check the spreading of the said disorder, in case it should so extend:

Now, therefore, the Lords of Her Majesty's Privy Council do hereby, by virtue of, and in exercise of, the powers given by the said Act so continued as aforesaid, order as follows:—

1. This Order shall extend to all parts of that part of the United Kingdom called Ireland.

2. In this Order the word "animal" shall mean any cow, heifer, bull, bullock, ox, calf, sheep, lamb, goat, or swine, and any horse kept in the same field, house, stable, or building with any cattle.

3. In all provisions of this Order to be enforced within the police district of Dublin metropolis, the words "county inspector of constabulary" shall signify one of the Commissioners of the Dublin Metropolitan Police, and "constable" shall signify a superintendent or inspector, or acting inspector of the Dublin Metropolitan Police; and the words "petty sessions court" shall signify any of the offices of the divisional justices of the said district.

4. Every person having in his possession or under his custody any animal labouring under or having symptoms of the said disorder, shall forthwith give notice thereof to the nearest constabulary station of the district within which such animal is, or, if within the Dublin Metropolitan Police District, to one of the superintendents of the Metropolitan Police.

5. Every constable shall have power within his district to enter upon and inspect any premises or place in which he has reason to believe that any animal is labouring under the said disorder, and to examine and inspect, whenever and wherever he may deem it necessary, any animal within such district which he has reason to suspect to be labouring under the disorder; and such constable shall report the fact of every such visit, with its results, to the petty sessions court of the district in which such visit has been made at the next sitting of such court.

6. Whenever

6. Whenever any constable shall receive or obtain information that any animal is labouring under the said disorder, he shall, by the next post, or if possible by telegram, communicate such information to the Chief Secretary or Under Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, who shall immediately order a competent person as inspector to proceed without delay to the place where the animal alleged to be so labouring is, and to inspect the same; and such inspector shall on the same day forward to the said Chief Secretary or Under Secretary, a report stating whether in his opinion the animal is or is not affected with the disorder.

7. Such constable shall communicate also to the nearest magistrate the report which he has transmitted to the Chief Secretary or Under Secretary; and if such magistrate shall satisfy himself that there are reasons for grave suspicion that the animal mentioned in the constable's report is labouring under the said disorder, he shall have power to issue an order (to be in operation for three days, or until such time as the inspector shall finally report that such animal is free from the said disorder, and subject to such conditions as he may think proper), prohibiting the removal of such animal from the land or premises where the said animal shall be, and requiring all other animals to be kept separate and apart from it.

8. On receipt of information to the effect that an animal is labouring under the said disorder, not being within a district already marked out as an infected district as hereinafter provided, the Lord Lieutenant shall send without delay to the place where such animal is, two or more competent persons, who shall mark out a certain line around such place, and lay down the same upon the Ordnance map. The limit of the district enclosed shall be shown by well-defined boundaries, and all the district within such boundaries shall be called "an infected district," and such competent persons shall forthwith forward to the county inspector of constabulary a description of such district, and marked as aforesaid on the Ordnance map.

9. On receipt of such information the county inspector of constabulary shall, without delay, cause to be posted in all public places within ten miles of the infected district, a notice describing the boundaries of the same; and, from the date of the posting of the first of such notices, it shall not be lawful for any person to hold any fair within such "infected district," or to move out of such "infected district" any animal whatsoever; but any animal, if certified by an inspector to be free from disease, may be slaughtered, and the carcase of such animal may be sent out of such infected district, provided that its skin and offal shall be left within the district; and no skin of any animal slaughtered or dying within such district shall be removed without being disinfected, and without the permission of the inspector, provided that this prohibition shall not extend to the carrying any animal through any such district by a railway train.

10. From the date of the posting of such notice, the county inspector of constabulary shall station at all necessary places constables and sub-constables, who shall prevent the egress of all animals from the "infected district," and shall prohibit the transit or passage of all animals by or through any part of the said district, except in railway trains, and shall as far as possible prevent any animal from approaching the boundaries of such district, and shall prevent the carrying out of any forage, litter, or manure therefrom.

11. The constables or sub-constables shall cause all fæcal matter discharged by any animal labouring under the said disorder to be collected, so far as it can be done, and all litter and other refuse, in any house or place in which any such animal may have been located, and all fodder placed before or brought into contact with such animal, to be collected and buried at least four feet under the surface, or to be destroyed by fire, and the ashes thereof buried.

12. From the date of the posting of the first of such notices, all dogs within the infected district at that date shall be kept shut up or chained, or by other sufficient means shall be prevented from passing out of such district.

13. Such "infected district" shall remain and be considered as an infected district, and subject to the regulations herein applicable to an infected district, so long as any case of disorder exists within it, and for a period of 21 days after the last case of death, or recovery, to be certified by the inspector, and until such inspector shall have certified that all proper precautions have been taken for the purposes of disinfection.

14. Every inspector shall have power to require and cause any animal declared and certified by him in writing to be labouring under the said disorder, to be slaughtered without delay and buried six feet deep in the ground and covered with lime, in such a spot as he may select, and in the case of burial being necessary at a distance from the place of death, he shall cause all practicable means to be taken for preventing the carcase from becoming the vehicle of infection before the removal thereof. The carcases of all diseased animals shall be buried unskinned, and the skins thereof shall be scored so as to prevent their being used.

15. No person who may be brought into contact with any diseased animal shall take with him out of such "infected district" any clothes or garment which such person may have worn while in contact with any such animal, either by wearing the same or otherwise, without taking all such precautions against propagating infection by means thereof, as the Lord Lieutenant by any order may direct.

16. No dog accompanying a drover or of the description ordinarily used by drovers or persons in charge of cattle, sheep, or swine, shall be brought into any part of Ireland by any person, if the last place on land from whence such dog shall have been brought shall be any part of Great Britain.

17. This Order shall come into operation on the 25th day of January 1866, and shall continue in force thenceforth until the same shall be revoked by any future Order.

18. Every person offending against this Order shall, in pursuance of the said Act, for every such offence, forfeit any sum not exceeding 20 l., which the justices before whom he or she shall be convicted of such offence may think fit to impose.

Order by the Lord Lieutenant and Privy Council of Ireland.

Wodehouse.

WHEREAS by an Act passed in the Session of the 11th and 12th years of Her present Majesty's reign, c. 107, certain powers were given to make Orders and Regulations to prevent the spreading of contagious and infectious disorders among sheep, cattle, and other animals; and the said Act has since been from time to time continued by divers subsequent statutes:

And whereas by a further Act passed in this the 29th year of Her Majesty's reign, c. 4, it is amongst other things enacted, that the several powers and authorities by the said above mentioned Acts, being the Act of 11th and 12th of Her Majesty, c. 107, and the Acts continuing the same, vested in the Lords and others of Her Majesty's Privy Council, shall and may be exercised by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, by and with the advice of Her Majesty's Privy Council in Ireland, to whom also power is thereby given, from time to time to make such Orders and Regulations as to him or them may seem necessary for the purposes aforesaid, and for the other purposes in the now stating statute mentioned.

Now, we, John Baron Wodehouse, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, by and with the advice of Her Majesty's Privy Council in Ireland, do hereby, in exercise of the powers so given to us as aforesaid, order as follows:

That from and after the date of the publication of this Order in the "Dublin Gazette," it shall not be lawful to import into Ireland, from any port or place within that part of the United Kingdom called Great Britain, any swine or goats, turnips, mangel wurzel, or any dung whatsoever, or any hay, straw, fodder, or litter likely to carry or communicate infection.

ORDER in COUNCIL.

At the Council Chamber, Whitehall, the 17th day of March 1866.

By the Lords of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council.

PRESENT:

Lord President.	Sir George Grey, Bart.
Lord Privy Seal.	Mr. Milner Gibson.
Duke of Somerset.	Mr. Bruce.
Lord Stanley of Alderley.	Mr. Goschen.

WHEREAS by an Act passed in the Session of the 11th and 12th years of Her Majesty's reign, c. 107, intituled "An Act to prevent until the 1st day of September 1850, and to the end of the then Session of Parliament, the spreading of Contagious or Infectious Disorders amongst Sheep, Cattle, and other Animals," and which Act has since been from time to time continued by divers subsequent Acts, and lastly, by an Act passed in the Session of the 28th and 29th years of the reign of Her present Majesty, c. 119, it is (amongst other things) enacted that it shall be lawful for the Lords and others of Her Majesty's Privy Council, or any two or more of them, from time to time to make such Orders and Regulations as to them may seem necessary for the purpose of prohibiting or regulating the removal to or from such parts or places as they may designate in such Order or Orders, of sheep, cattle, horses, swine, or other animals, or of meat, skins, hides, horns, hoofs, or other parts of any animals, or of hay, straw, fodder, or other articles likely to propagate infection; and also for the purpose of purifying any yard, stable, outhouse, or other place, or any waggons, carts, carriages, or other vehicles; and also for the purpose of directing directing how any animals dying in a diseased state, or any animals, parts of animals, or other things seized under the provisions of the said Act, are to be disposed of; and also for the purpose of causing notices to be given of the appearance of any disorder among sheep, cattle, or other animals, and to make any other Orders or Regulations for the purpose of giving effect to the provisions of the said Act, and again to revoke, alter, or vary any such Orders or Regulations; and that all provisions for any of the purposes aforesaid in any such Order or Orders contained shall have the like force and effect as if the same had been inserted in the said Act; and that all persons offending against the said Act shall, for each and every offence forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding twenty pounds, or such smaller sum as the said Lords or others of Her Majesty's Privy Council may in any such case by such Order direct:

And whereas a contagious or infectious disorder now prevails among the cattle of Great Britain, which is generally designated the "Cattle Plague:"

And whereas divers Orders have from time to time been made under the authority of the said Acts by the Lords of Her Majesty's Privy Council, with a view to check the spreading of the said disorder:

And whereas it is expedient to make further provisions with a view to check the spreading of the said disorder:

Now, therefore, the Lords of Her Majesty's Privy Council do hereby, by virtue of and in exercise of the powers given by the said Act, so continued as aforesaid, order as follows:

Every Railway or other Company or person carrying animals for hire within any part of Great Britain shall forthwith thoroughly cleanse and disinfect all pens, carriages, trucks, and boats used by such company or person for holding or carrying animals, by a washing of lime-water, or with the approval of the Board of Trade, by some other process; and until such pen, carriage, truck, or boat has been thoroughly cleansed and disinfected as aforesaid, no animal nor any article shall be placed or carried in any such pen, carriage, truck or boat; and when such pen, carriage, truck, or boat has been thoroughly cleansed and disinfected as aforesaid, such company or person, as aforesaid, using the same on every occasion, after any animal has been taken out of such pen, carriage, truck, or boat, and before any other animal or article is placed therein, shall thoroughly cleanse and disinfect every such pen, carriage, truck, or boat in such manner as the Board of Trade shall from time to time direct; and if any pen, carriage, truck, or boat shall at any time be used in contravention of this Order, the company or person by whom it is so used, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding 5*l.* for every time that such pen, carriage, truck, or boat is so used.

In this Order the expression "animal" shall mean bull, bullock, cow, ox, heifer, calf, sheep, goat, and swine; and the expression "truck" shall include any horse-box, or other vehicle used in the carrying of animals.

ORDER in COUNCIL,

At the Court at Buckingham Palace, the 24th day of March 1866.

PRESENT:

The Queen's Most Excellent Majesty in Council.

WHEREAS it has been represented to Her Majesty, that certain contagious or infectious disorders are now prevalent among cattle in the dominions and territories situated in Europe, belonging to his Majesty the King of the Netherlands, and that there is danger of the said disorders being introduced into this country by means of cattle from such countries or places: Now, therefore, Her Majesty, by and with the advice of Her Privy Council, doth order, and it is hereby ordered, that on and after the 28th day of March instant, no cattle shall be imported or introduced into the United Kingdom, which shall come from or shall have been at any place within the aforesaid territories and dominions, situate in Europe, belonging to His Majesty the King of the Netherlands; and also that on and after the said 28th day of March instant, no cattle shall be imported or introduced into the United Kingdom which shall be, or shall have been, on board any vessels at the same time with any cattle which shall have come from, or shall have been within, the aforesaid territories and dominions.

And Her Majesty, by and with the advice of Her Privy Council, doth hereby further order, that, in the event of any cattle being landed in any portion of the United Kingdom, contrary to the provisions of this Order, all such cattle, the importation or introduction whereof is so hereby prohibited as aforesaid, shall, upon their arrival in this country, be destroyed or otherwise disposed of, as the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Customs may direct.

This Order shall continue in force until revoked by any further Order.

The word "cattle" shall include sheep as well as bulls, cows, oxen, heifers, and calves.

And the Right Honourable the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury are to give the necessary directions herein accordingly.

ORDER IN COUNCIL.

At the Court at Buckingham Palace, the 24th day of March 1866.

PRESENT:

The Queen's Most Excellent Majesty in Council.

WHEREAS by an Act passed in the present Session of Parliament, intituled "An Act to amend the Law relating to Contagious or Infectious Diseases in Cattle and other Animals," it is, amongst other things, enacted that it shall be lawful for Her Majesty, by Order in Council, from time to time to continue, or to renew if expired, all or any of the provisions, in the first part of that Act contained, for such time as shall be specified in such Order:

And whereas it is provided in the second paragraph of the 17th section of the said Act, which section is in the first part thereof, that "no cattle shall be moved on any railway before the 25th day of March 1866:"

And whereas it is expedient that the prohibition of the movement of cattle by railway should be continued beyond the said 25th day of March 1866.

Now, therefore, Her Majesty, in exercise of the power vested in Her by the said Act, and by and with the advice of Her Privy Council, is pleased to order, and it is hereby ordered, that the said recited provision, contained in the second paragraph of the 17th section of the said Act, be continued on and after the said 25th day of March 1866, and that "no cattle shall be moved on any railway" before the 16th day of April 1866.

ORDER IN COUNCIL.

At the Council Chamber, Whitehall, the 24th day of March 1866.

By the Lords of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council.

PRESENT:

Lord President.	Sir George Grey, Bart.
Duke of Somerset.	Mr. Milner Gibson.
Lord Stanley of Alderley.	Mr. Bruce.
	Mr. Goschen.

WHEREAS by an Act passed in the Session of the 11th and 12th years of Her present Majesty's reign, chapter 107, intituled, "An Act to prevent until the 1st day of September 1850, and to the end of the then Session of Parliament, the spreading of Contagious or Infectious Disorders among Sheep, Cattle, and other Animals," and from time to time continued by divers subsequent Acts, and lastly by an Act passed in the Session of the 28th and 29th years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter 119, it is (amongst other things) enacted, that it shall be lawful for the Lords and others of Her Majesty's Privy Council, or any two or more of them, from time to time to make such Orders and Regulations as to them may may seem necessary for the purpose of prohibiting or regulating the removal to or from such parts or places as they may designate in such Order or Orders of sheep, cattle, horses, swine, or other animals, or of meat, skins, hides, horns, hoofs, or other parts of any animals, or of hay, straw, fodder, or other articles likely to propagate infection, and to make any other Orders or Regulations for the purpose of giving effect to the provisions of the said Act, and again to revoke, alter, or vary any such Orders or Regulations; and that all provisions for any of the purposes aforesaid in any such Order or Orders contained, shall have the like force and effect as if the same had been inserted in the said Act.

And whereas a contagious or infectious disorder, generally designated as the "Cattle Plague," has lately appeared, and now prevails, amongst cattle in England and Wales:

And whereas divers Orders have been made by the Lords of the said Council in relation to the cattle plague, and it is expedient to consolidate, amend, and add to the said Orders:

Now, therefore, the Lords of Her Majesty's Privy Council do hereby, in exercise of the powers given under the said Act so continued as aforesaid, order as follows:

Preliminary.

1. Part I. of this Order, with the first schedule hereto, and the Regulations 26 and 27 of Part II. which relate to the isolation of infected places, and the rules with respect to infected places, shall come into operation immediately. The residue of this Order shall not come into operation until the 16th day of April 1866. The whole of this Order shall remain in force from the time of its coming into operation until it is revoked or altered.

2. This Order shall apply to England and Wales only.

PART I.

Definitions.

3. In the construction of this Order the following terms shall have the meanings hereinafter assigned to them; that is to say,

"Person" shall include a body of persons, corporate or unincorporate:

"Cattle" shall mean bull, bullock, cow, ox, heifer, or calf:

"Animal" shall mean cattle as above defined, sheep, lambs, goats, and swine:

"Disease" shall mean the cattle plague:

"Diseased" shall mean affected by the cattle plague:

"England" shall include Wales:

"Privy Council" shall mean the Lords and others of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, or any two of them:

"Borough" shall mean any place for the time being subject to an Act passed in the Session holden in the 5th and 6th years of the reign of King William the Fourth, chapter 76, intituled, "An Act to provide for the regulation of Municipal Corporations in England and Wales:"

"County" shall not include a county of a city or county of a town, but shall include any riding, division, or parts of a county having a separate commission of the peace:

The liberty of St. Alban's, and the liberty of the Isle of Ely, and the soke of Peterborough, shall respectively be deemed to be separate counties, but all other liberties and franchises of counties shall be considered as forming part of the county by which they are surrounded, or if partly surrounded by two or more counties, then as forming part of that county with which they have the longest common boundary:

"The Metropolis" shall include all parishes and places in which the Metropolitan Board of Works have power to levy a main drainage rate, exclusive of the City of London and the liberties thereof.

Every place that is not, according to the foregoing definitions, a borough, a county, or a part of the metropolis, or is not separately mentioned in the first schedule hereunto annexed, shall be deemed to form part of the county, as hereinbefore defined, to the county rate of which it is assessed, or, if not so assessed, of the county within which it is situate.

Local Authority.

4. For the purposes of this Order, "District," "Local Authority," "Local Rate," and "Clerk of Local Authority" shall respectively mean the places, bodies of persons, rate and officer in the first schedule hereto annexed in that behalf mentioned.

5. Any local authority may from time to time form one or more committee or committees consisting wholly of its own members, or partly of its own members and partly of such other persons, being rated occupiers in the district and qualified in such other manner as the local authority may determine, and may delegate, with or without conditions or restrictions, to any committee so formed, all or any powers conferred on the local authority by this Order, and may from time to time revoke, add to, or alter any powers so given to a committee.

A committee may elect a chairman of its meetings. If no chairman is elected, or if the chairman elected is not present at the time appointed for holding a meeting, the members present shall choose one of their number to be chairman of such meeting. A committee may meet and adjourn as it thinks proper. The quorum of a committee shall consist of such number of members as may be prescribed by the local authority that appointed it, or, if no number be prescribed, of three members. Every question at a meeting shall be determined by a majority of votes of the members present, and voting on that question; and in case of an equal division of votes the chairman shall have a second or casting vote.

The proceedings of a committee shall not be invalidated by any vacancy or vacancies amongst its members, or, in case of a committee appointed by the General or Quarter Sessions of a county, by the termination of the Sessions by which it was appointed.

A local authority may from time to time add to or diminish the number of the members or otherwise alter the constitution of any committee formed by it under this Order, and may dissolve any such committee.

Any committee formed under the provisions of "The Cattle Diseases Prevention Act," 1866, shall be be deemed to be a committee of a local authority for the purposes of this Order, within the district of such local authority as defined by this Order.

6. The local authority of any borough which is assessed to the county rate of any county may, with the consent of the local authority of such county, such consent being testified in writing, by a letter signed by the clerk of such last mentioned authority, declare, by notice published in any newspaper circulating within such county, that such borough is annexed to such county for the purposes of this Order, and from the date of the publication of such notice such borough shall, for the purposes of this Order, form part of the district of the local authority of such county.

7. Every local authority shall perform all such duties as are imposed upon it by this Order, and shall make such reports to the Privy Council as the Council may from time to time require.

Appointment of Officers, &c.

8. Every local authority shall from time to time appoint such inspectors or other officers as it thinks necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this Order within its district; it shall assign them such duties and award them such salaries and allowances as it thinks expedient, and may revoke any appointment so made.

9. Every inspector or other officer appointed by a local authority previously to the date of this Order, for any purpose relating to the cattle plague, and holding office at such date, shall be deemed an inspector or officer for the purposes of this Order within the district of such local authority as defined by this Order, and be subject to the provisions thereof, in the same manner as if he had been appointed thereunder.

10. Every inspector shall furnish the Privy Council with such information in regard to the cattle plague as they may from time to time require.

11. Every local authority may provide and supply, without charge, printed copies of any documents or forms requisite for the purposes of this Order.

12. All expenses incurred by a local authority in carrying into effect this Order shall be defrayed out of the local rate.

13. Any person appointed or to be appointed by the Privy Council an inspector for the purposes of this Order shall, throughout the whole of England, have all the powers which an inspector appointed by a local authority has within his district, and any direction of the Privy Council shall, as respects such inspector, be of the same validity as a direction of a local authority in the case of an inspector appointed by it.

Part II.

Diseased Animals.

14. Every person having in his possession or under his charge any diseased animal shall forthwith give notice thereof to such officer as may have been appointed by the local authority of the district to receive such notices; or, if no such officer has been appointed, to a police constable, whose duty it shall be to report without delay to the local authority the fact of such notice having been given to him. Any person failing to comply with this Regulation as to giving notice shall be deemed guilty of an offence against this Order.

15. Every person having in his possession or under his charge any diseased animal shall, as far as practicable, keep such animal separate from animals not diseased. Any person failing to comply with this Regulation shall be deemed guilty of an offence against this Order.

16. No diseased animal, and no animal which has, within the preceding 28 days, been in the same shed or stable, or in the same herd or flock, or in contact with a diseased animal, shall be removed alive from the premises where such animal may be, except with a license from the local authority of the district, which license shall only permit the removal of such animal to some place within the district of such local authority where it can be conveniently slaughtered, or kept apart from all other animals until such local authority is satisfied that there is no reasonable probability of such animal propagating disease; provided that no such license shall authorise such animal to be removed in contravention of the 17th Regulation of this Order.

If any animal is removed in contravention of this Regulation, the person causing, directing, or permitting the removal of such animal, and also the person removing the same, shall respectively be deemed guilty of an offence against this Order.

17. No diseased animal, and no animal that has within the preceding 28 days been in the same shed or stable, or in the same herd or flock, or in contact with a diseased animal, shall—

1. Be placed or kept in any common or unenclosed land, or in any field or other place insufficiently fenced:

2. Be sent or brought to any fair or market, or exposed for public sale:

3. Be driven along or allowed to stray upon any highway or the sides thereof:

4. Be sent or carried by any railway, canal, river, or other inland navigation, or by any coasting or sea-going vessel.

If any animal is dealt with in contravention of this Regulation, the owner of such animal, and also the company or person other than the owner dealing with the same in contravention of this regulation, shall be deemed guilty of an offence against this Order.

18. Where any offence is committed with respect to any animal under the 14th, 15th, 16th, and 17th Regulations of this Order, or any of them, the local authority of the district, and any authority of a fair or market in which such animal may be, may, by themselves or their officers, cause such animal to be slaughtered and buried, and recover from the owner in a summary manner all expenses so incurred.

19. All diseased animals, whether they have been slaughtered or have died of the disease, shall be buried by the owner as soon as practicable in some proper place, with their skins slashed in such a manner as to prevent their being made of any use, and with a sufficient quantity quantity of quicklime or other disinfectant, and shall be covered with at least five feet of earth, or shall be otherwise disposed of in such manner as may be directed by any regulations made by the local authority, and approved by the Privy Council.

If any diseased animal is not buried or otherwise disposed of in pursuance of this Regulation, the owner of such diseased animal shall be deemed guilty of an offence against this Order, and it shall be lawful for the local authority to bury or otherwise dispose of any such animal, and to use any convenient place on the premises of the owner for that purpose.

The local authority may recover from the owner in a summary manner any expenses incurred by it under this Regulation.

20. No person shall dig up any diseased animal, or part of a diseased animal. Any person acting in contravention of this Regulation shall be deemed guilty of an offence against this Order.

21. Every local authority shall within its district, at its own expense, cause the premises in which diseased animals have been to be thoroughly cleansed and disinfected; and the occupier of such premises shall give all facilities for such cleansing and disinfecting. Any occupier of premises failing to give such facilities shall be deemed guilty of an offence against this Order.

22. No fresh animal shall be admitted into any yard, shed, stable, field, or other premises in which a diseased animal has been kept while affected by disease, or has died, or been slaughtered, until the expiration of 30 days after the cleansing and disinfecting of such premises. If any fresh animal is admitted into any yard, shed, stable, field, or other premises, in contravention of this Regulation, the occupier of such yard, shed, stable, field, or other premises shall be deemed guilty of an offence against this Order.

23. The dung of a diseased animal, and all hay, straw, or litter, or any other article that has been in contact with or used about a diseased animal, shall be destroyed, or, with the sanction of the local authority, shall be disinfected and dealt with to the satisfaction of the inspector. If such dung, hay, straw, litter, or any other article is not destroyed or disinfected and dealt with in pursuance of this Regulation, the local authority may cause the same to be destroyed or disinfected, and recover in a summary manner all expenses incurred by it from the occupier of the premises on which such articles were found, and in addition thereto such occupier shall be deemed guilty of an offence against this Order.

24. The dung of a diseased animal, and all hay, straw, or litter, or any other article that has been in contact with or used about a diseased animal, shall not be removed from the premises where such animal has been, except for the purpose of being destroyed or disinfected and dealt with in compliance with this Order, and with a license of an inspector, specifying the place at which it is to be destroyed or disinfected and dealt with, and shall not be removed beyond the limits of the district of the local authority in which the said premises are situated without the consent, in writing, of the local authority into whose district it is moved. If such dung, hay, straw, litter, or other article is removed, in contravention of this Regulation, the occupier of the premises from which it is removed, and also the person removing the same, shall be respectively deemed guilty of an offence against this Order; and it shall be lawful for the local authority to destroy or disinfect any such article, and to recover the expenses of such destruction or disinfection from the said occupier.

25. Every local authority shall direct the disinfecting of clothes of, and the use of due precautions by, inspectors and other officers brought into contact with diseased animals, with a view to prevent such inspectors or officers spreading contagion. Any inspector or officer disobeying the directions of any local authority as to such disinfection and use of due precautions shall be deemed guilty of an offence against this Order.

Infected Places.

26. The authorities hereinafter mentioned, that is to say, any local authority as to any place within its district shall, and the Privy Council as to any place in England may, by Order made at any time after the passing of this Order, and published in manner hereinafter mentioned, declare any place in which disease amongst animals at that time exists, together with such an area, including such place, as to such authority may seem to be required, to be an "infected place," from and after a date to be specified in such Order; and the authority declaring a place to be infected may, at the expiration of one month after the disappearance of disease in that place, by Order published in like manner, declare such place to be free from disease, and after the publication of such last-mentioned Order such place shall cease to be an "infected place" within the meaning of this Order, unless again declared in manner aforesaid to be an "infected place."

Any local authority may include in the area of an "infected place" any adjoining part of the district of another local authority, with the consent of such last-mentioned authority, testified in writing by a letter signed by the clerk of such authority.

The area of an "infected place" may be described by reference to a map deposited at some specified place, or by reference to parishes, townships, farms, or otherwise, as the authority may think expedient.

An Order declaring a place to be an "infected place" shall be published by notice being posted up in or near the "infected place," and, so far as is possible, in all places where notices are usually posted up, within five miles of such "infected place," or in such other manner as the authority declaring the place to be infected may think expedient.

The local authority, on declaring any place infected, shall forthwith report by post to the Privy Council the fact of such declaration having been made.

No objection shall be taken in any legal proceeding in respect of an "infected place" on the ground that due notice has not been given of such place having been declared to be an "infected place."

Any Order made by the Privy Council under this Regulation shall supersede any Order inconsistent with it that may have been made by a local authority.

27. The following rules shall be observed with respect to "infected places," in addition to the other Regulations of this Order with respect to diseased animals; that is to say:

1. No animal shall be moved out of an "infected place."

2. No hides, skins, horns, hoofs, or offal of animals shall be removed out of an "infected place," without the license of some officer of the local authority appointed to issue such licenses, certifying that such articles have not formed part of a diseased animal, and, if necessary, have been properly disinfected:

3. No carcase of, or undressed meat that has formed part of, any bull, bullock, cow, ox, heifer, or calf, shall be moved out of an "infected place," without the license of some officer of the local authority appointed to issue such licenses, certifying that such carcase is not that of a diseased animal, or that such meat has not formed part of a diseased animal:

4. No dung of animals, and no hay, straw, litter, or other articles forming the food of animals, or used for or about animals, shall be removed out of an "infected place" without the license of some officer of the local authority appointed to issue such licenses, certifying that such articles have not been in contact with or used about a diseased animal:

5. A license for the purpose of this Regulation must be in writing, and shall not authorize the removal of any articles beyond the district of the local authority in which the "infected place" is situate without the license of the local authority into whose district it is proposed to move such articles.

If any animal, dung of animals, hide, skin, horn, hoof, offal, meat, hay, straw, litter, or other articles, is or are moved in contravention of this Regulation, the owner of such animal or articles, and also the person moving the same, or causing, directing, or permitting the same to be moved, shall respectively be deemed guilty of an offence against this Order.

All constables and police officers shall enforce the provisions of this Regulation, to the utmost of their power, and may apprehend all persons committing any offence against this Regulation, and may require all animals and articles being moved out of such place in contravention of this Regulation to be forthwith taken back within the limits of such place.

This Regulation shall not apply to any animal or article carried by railway through an "infected place."

Markets and Fairs.

28. No market, fair, auction, exhibition, or sale of cattle shall be held until the 1st day of June 1866, except as hereinafter mentioned; that is to say,

First. Cattle belonging to the owner or occupier of premises that are not situate within the limits of an "infected place," if the cattle are free from disease, and have been in the possession of the owner or occupier not less than 28 days immediately previous to the sale, may be sold on such premises;

Secondly. Markets may be held, with the license of the Privy Council, for the sale of cattle intended for immediate slaughter: Provided that no cattle shall be removed from such market until they have been marked in the manner in which cattle are ordinarily marked for slaughter, according to the custom of such market, or, if there is no such custom, by clipping the hair off the end of the tail; and all cattle required to be marked by this Regulation shall be slaughtered within four days from the date of the holding of such market (if sold) by or by the order of the purchaser, or (if not sold) by or by the order of the owner, and shall in no instance be taken, in the case of cattle brought to the Metropolitan Cattle Market, beyond the limits of the metropolis, including the City of London and the liberties thereof, and in the case of cattle brought to any other market, beyond such limits as may be described in the license of the Privy Council allowing such market, and under such conditions with respect to their movement within such limits as may be imposed by such license.

If any cattle are sold in contravention of this Regulation, both the seller and the purchaser of such cattle shall be deemed guilty of an offence against this Order.

If any cattle required to be marked by this Regulation are not so marked, the persons for the time being in charge of such cattle shall be deemed guilty of an offence against this Order.

If any cattle required to be slaughtered by this Regulation are not so slaughtered, the purchaser or owner of such cattle or his agent (as the case may be) shall be deemed guilty of an offence against this Order.

If any cattle are removed in contravention of this Regulation, the person removing such cattle, and the person causing, directing, or permitting the removal of such cattle, shall respectively be deemed guilty of an offence against this Order.

29. No sheep, lambs, goats, or swine shall be brought into or exposed for sale in any market licensed for the sale of cattle under the last preceding Regulation, except for the purpose of immediate slaughter, and all such sheep, lambs, goats, and swine, when brought into or exposed for sale in any such market, shall be subject to the last preceding Regulation, in the same manner as if they were cattle, except that they shall be marked in such manner as the market authority may direct, instead of in the manner prescribed by the said Regulation.

Foreign Cattle.

30. Until the 1st of June 1866, all cattle brought by sea from any place out of the United Kingdom into any town or place in England shall be marked by clipping the hair off the end of the tail, and no such cattle shall be removed alive from such town or place except by sea.

"Town or place" in this Regulation shall, according to circumstances, mean as follows:

1. The area of the metropolis, including the City of London and the liberties thereof:

2. The area of any borough or such other limits limits as may be defined by the Privy Council in respect of such borough:

3. In the case of any other town or place, such area as may be defined by the Privy Council to constitute such town or place.

Cattle brought by Sea from any part of the United Kingdom into England.

31. No cattle brought by sea from any place in the United Kingdom into any town or place in England shall be removed from such town or place alive, without a certificate from the local authority having jurisdiction in such town or place that such cattle have been examined by some officer, appointed for that purpose by such authority, and that such cattle are free from disease; but such certificate shall not exempt such cattle from any other regulation of this Order with respect to the movement of cattle or otherwise; provided, nevertheless, that, in the case of cattle landed in any place in England from Ireland, the certificate of the local authority, that such cattle are free from disease, shall be accepted, in the case of a fat stock license, by the person authorized to grant the same as sufficient for the purpose of granting such license, and, in the case of a store-stock license, such certificate shall be accepted by the justice as equivalent to the declaration of the owner or his agent and to the certificate of the occupiers required by the form of the said store-stock license.

"Town or place" shall in this regulation have the same meaning as in the preceding regulation.

Special Regulations within the Metropolis.

32. The following additional regulations shall be in force as respects the movement of cattle within the metropolis, inclusive of the City of London and the liberties thereof:

1. No cattle shall be removed from the metropolis, inclusive as aforesaid; provided that where any person occupies a farm situate partly within and partly without the metropolis, inclusive as aforesaid, or any other contiguous premises so situate, he may, with a license from the Commissioner of Police of the metropolis (which license such Commissioner is hereby empowered from time to time to grant, and, if he think fit, to revoke), and for a time not exceeding seven days from the date of such license, move from one part of such premises to another any animal not diseased which has been in his own possession for 28 days immediately previous to the date of such license, and has been marked in such manner as the said Commissioner of Police may direct.

If any cattle are removed from the metropolis, inclusive as aforesaid, in contravention of this regulation, the owner of such cattle, and also the person in charge of the same, shall respectively be deemed guilty of an offence against this Order.

2. No cattle shall be moved along any highway, thoroughfare, or public place within the metropolis, inclusive as aforesaid, except for a distance not exceeding 500 yards from part to part of the same farm or to water, without a license from the said Commissioner of Police; and every such license shall state the number and description of animals licensed to be removed, and the place of their destination, and shall be valid only for 24 hours from the date thereof; provided that this clause of this Order shall not apply to any animals intended for immediate slaughtering which are sent to or from the said Metropolitan Cattle Market.

If any cattle are moved along any highway, thoroughfare, or public place, in contravention of this regulation, the owner of such cattle, and also the person in charge of the same, shall respectively be deemed guilty of an offence against this Order.

General Regulations.

Movement of Cattle.

33. No cattle shall be moved on any highway between sunset and sunrise, except within the limits of the metropolis, inclusive of the City of London and the liberties thereof, or of any other city or town.

No cattle shall be moved by or upon any railway, canal, navigation, river, or highway, or by any vessel coastwise, without a license, except for a distance not exceeding 500 yards from one part of the same farm to the other.

Licenses shall be of two descriptions—

1. A license for cattle intended for immediate slaughter, hereinafter called a fat stock license;

2. A license for other cattle, hereinafter called a store-stock license.

A fat-stock license shall be in the form, and contain the particulars, and be signed in the manner appearing in the form marked A in the second schedule annexed hereto, or as near thereto as circumstances admit.

A store-stock license shall be in the form, and contain the particulars, and be signed in the manner appearing in the form marked B in the said second schedule, or as near thereto as circumstances admit.

No cattle shall be moved as aforesaid out of the district of the local authority in which they are without a license in one of the forms aforesaid, such form being applicable to the class of cattle moved; but where cattle are moved only within the district of a local authority, that local authority may make regulations for granting licenses in such form as it thinks fit, for the movement of such cattle, so that the conditions of such licenses be not more stringent than the conditions of the licenses in the said second schedule.

If any cattle are moved in contravention of this regulation, the owner of such cattle, and the person directing or permitting the removal of the same, and the company or person conveying the same, shall respectively be deemed guilty of an offence against this Order.

Cattle brought by land from Scotland into England may be moved in England with the same licenses that in Scotland authorise their removal from the district of one local authority to another, in pursuance of any Order of the Privy Council in force for the time being.

34. No

App. No. 11.

34. No person shall drive or allow any cattle under his charge to be driven or to stray into any inclosed field, without the consent of the owner or occupier thereof, and any person acting in contravention of this regulation shall be deemed guilty of an offence against this Order.

Movement of Hides and Skins, &c.

35. No hide, skin, horn, or hoof of animals shall be moved by highway, railway, canal, river, or other mode of conveyance unless effectually covered.

If any hides, skins, horns, or hoofs are moved in contravention of this regulation, the person sending the same, and the person moving the same, shall be deemed guilty of an offence against this Order.

36. No regulation of this Order, shall apply to the following hides, skins, horns, and hoofs (that is to say),

(1.) Hides, skins, horns, or hoofs imported into the United Kingdom from India, Australia, South Africa, or America:

(2.) Hides, skins, horns, hoofs, or glue pieces that have been effectually limed for manufacturing purposes.

But the burden of proving that any hides, skins, horns, or hoofs are such as are authorised by this regulation to be removed shall lie upon the person charged with moving the same in contravention of this Order.

Regulations as to Dogs.

37. A local anthority may make such orders as it thinks expedient for preventing the propagation of disease by means of dogs, and may order any stray dogs to be destroyed or otherwise disposed of as it thinks fit.

Cleansing of Pens and Trucks.

38. Every railway or other company or person carrying animals for hire shall, on every occasion after any animal has been taken out of any pen, carriage, truck, or boat used by such company or person, and before any other animal or article is placed therein, thoroughly cleanse and disinfect every such pen, carriage, truck, or boat in such manner as the Board of Trade may from time to time direct.

The expression "truck" shall include any horse-box or other vehicle used in the carrying of animals.

If any pen, carriage, truck, or boat is at any time used in contravention of this regulation, the company or person by whom it is used shall, every time that such pen, truck, or boat is used, be liable to a penalty not exceeding 5 l.

Powers of Officers employed under this Order.

39. Any inspector or other officer empowered to carry this Order into effect, may, if authorised so to do by any general or special order in writing of the local authority, enter any field, stable, cow-shed, or other premises within his district, where he has reasonable grounds for supposing that cattle affected by disease are to be found, or have been, or have been buried, or otherwise disposed of, for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this Order, or enter into the station or premises of any railway or other company or person carrying animals for hire, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the pens, carriages, trucks, boats, or other vehicles used by such company or person have been duly cleansed and disinfected; and if any person refuses admission to, or obstructs, or impedes, or aids in obstructing or impeding any such inspector or other officer, he shall be deemed guilty of an offence against this Order.

40. It shall be lawful for any officer authorised by a local authority so to do, or for any constable or police officer, to inspect any railway truck, cart, boat, or other vehicle by land or by water, in which animals, hay, manure, litter, straw, and other articles used for or about animals, are carried, and to examine the person in charge of the same, with a view to ascertain whether any animals or articles are being moved in contravention of this Order; and such officer may, if he has reasonable grounds for suspecting that such animals or articles are being moved in contravention of this Order, apprehend without warrant the person in charge of the same, and bring him before a justice, who shall inquire into the case in a summary manner; and such justice, if satisfied that there are good grounds for suspecting that such animals or articles were moved in contravention of this Order, may direct, by writing under his hand, such animals or articles to be detained, and the person in charge thereof to be brought before two justices as soon as practicable, and such animals or articles may be detained and the person brought before the justices accordingly.

Upon such person being brought before the two justices, they shall adjudicate on the case in a summary manner, and, if satisfied that the animals or articles were moved in contravention of this Order, may direct the same to be destroyed or otherwise disposed of, as they think most expedient for the prevention of the spreading of disease amongst animals.

The constable or other police officer detaining any animals in pursuance of this Regulation, shall cause them to be supplied with requisite food and water during their detention; and any expenses incurred by such officer in respect of such animals may be recovered in a summary manner from the person in charge, or from the owner of the animals.

41. It shall be lawful for any constable or police officer, or for any officer authorised by a local authority so to do, to stop and detain any animal moved, or which he has reasonable grounds for suspecting is being moved in contravention of this Order, and to apprehend without warrant the person in charge of such animal, and bring him before a justice, who shall inquire into the case in a summary manner; and such justice, if satisfied that such animal was being moved in contravention of this Order, may direct, by writing under his hand, the animal so moved to be detained, and the person in charge thereof to be brought before two justices as soon as practicable, and such animal may be detained and person brought before the justices accordingly.

Upon such person being brought before the two justices, they shall adjudicate on the case in a summary manner, and, if satisfied that the animal was being moved in contravention of this Order, may direct the same to be slaughtered and buried, or to be otherwise disposed of, as they they think most expedient for the prevention of the spreading of disease amongst animals.

Any constable, police, or other officer detaining any animal, shall cause it to be supplied with requisite food and water during its detention; and any expenses incurred by such officer in respect of any animal may be recovered in a summary manner from the person in charge, or from the owner of the animal.

42. If any person having charge of any animal or thing being moved on a highway, railway, canal, navigation, or river, for the moving whereof a license is requisite under this Order, being required by any constable, police officer, or officer authorised by a local authority, to produce the license (if any) for the moving of that animal or thing, fails so to do, he shall be deemed guilty of an offence against this Order.

43. Every person guilty of an offence against this Order shall for each such offence incur a penalty not exceeding 20 l.; and where any such offence is committed with respect to more than four animals, a penalty not exceeding 5 l. for each animal may be imposed instead of the penalty of 20 l. And where any such offence is committed with reference to any dung, offal, hay, litter, straw, or other thing, a further penalty not exceeding 10 l. may be imposed for every half ton in weight of such dung or other thing after the first half ton.

44. Any local authority may appear before any justices, or in any legal proceedings, by its clerk, or by any agent, authorised by it in writing under the hands of two of its members; and any railway company or other body corporate may appear before any justices or in any legal proceedings by their secretary, or by any member of their board of management, or by any agent authorised in writing under the hands of any two members of such board.

Part III.

Repeal of Orders.

45. On and after the 16th of April 1866 there shall be revoked, so far as respects England and Wales, the following Orders, or so much thereof as may be in force; that is to say,—

The Order of July 24th, 1865,
of November 23rd, 1865,
of December 16th, 1865,
of January 20th, 1866,
of February 6th, 1866,
of February 23rd, 1866.

And all notices published by any local authority in pursuance of such Orders shall cease to have any effect, without prejudice nevertheless to the prosecution of any offence that may have been committed against the said Orders or Notices, or any of them, or to the recovery of any penalty in respect of such offence.

ORDER IN COUNCIL.

At the Council Chamber, Whitehall, the 14th day of April 1866.

By the Lords of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council.

PRESENT:

Lord President. | Mr. Bruce.
Sir George Grey, Bart. |

WHEREAS by an Act passed in the Session of the 11th & 12th years of Her present Majesty's reign, chapter 107, intituled "An Act to prevent until the first day of September 1850, and to the end of the then Session of Parliament, the spreading of Contagious or Infectious Disorders among Sheep, Cattle, and other Animals," and from time to time continued by divers subsequent Acts, and lastly by an Act passed in the Session of the 28th & 29th years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter 119, it is (amongst other things) enacted, that it shall be lawful for the Lords and others of Her Majesty's Privy Council, or any two or more of them, from time to time, to make such Orders and Regulations as to them may seem necessary for the purpose of prohibiting or regulating the removal to or from such parts or places as they may designate in such Order or Orders, of sheep, cattle, horses, swine, or other animals, or of meat, skins, hides, horns, hoofs, or other parts of any animals, or of hay, straw, fodder, or other articles, likely to propagate infection, and to make any other Orders or Regulations for the purpose of giving effect to the provisions of the said Act, and again to revoke, alter, or vary any such Orders or Regulations: and that all provisions for any of the purposes aforesaid in any such Order or Orders contained shall have the like force and effect as if the same had been inserted in the said Act.

And whereas a contagious or infectious disorder, generally designated as the "Cattle Plague," has lately appeared, and now prevails, amongst cattle in England and Wales:

And whereas divers Orders have been made by the Lords of the said Council in relation to the cattle plague, which were consolidated and amended, by an Order bearing date the 24th day of March last:

And whereas it is expedient to make a further Order applicable to certain parts of the Kingdom.

Now, therefore, the Lords of Her Majesty's Privy Council do hereby, in exercise of the powers given under the said Act so continued as aforesaid, order as follows:

1. The word "cattle," in this Order, shall mean bull, bullock, cow, ox, heifer, or calf.

2. No cattle shall be brought by land into the district district bounded by the outer boundary of the counties of South Wales and Monmouth, by which that district is separated from the rest of Wales and England.

3. No cattle brought by sea into any part of that district shall leave the place at which they are landed alive, but all such cattle shall be slaughtered within 48 hours from the time that they are placed on shore.

4. South Wales, in this Order, shall signify the counties of Pembroke, Carmarthen, Glamorgan, Brecon, Radnor, and Cardigan.

5. Nothing herein contained shall affect any of the provisions, conditions, and regulations which are contained in the said Order of the 24th ultimo, except so far as the same are inconsistent herewith.

6. This Order shall come into operation immediately, and shall remain in force until it is revoked or altered.

7. Every person guilty of an offence against this Order shall, for each such offence, incur a penalty not exceeding 20 l.; and where any such offence is committed with respect to more than four animals, a penalty not exceeding 5 l., for each animal, may be imposed, instead of the penalty of 20 l.

ORDER.

By the Lord Lieutenant and Privy Council of Ireland.

Wodehouse.

WHEREAS by an Act passed in the Session of the 11th and 12th years of Her present Majesty's reign, c. 107, certain powers were given to make Orders and Regulations to prevent the spreading of contagious or infectious disorders among sheep, cattle, and other animals; and the said Act has since been, from time to time, continued by divers subsequent statutes:

And whereas a contagious or infectious disorder having lately appeared among cattle within that part of the United Kingdom called Great Britain, which disorder is generally designated as "The Cattle Plague," it was deemed expedient to take measures for preventing such disorder from extending to that part of the United Kingdom called Ireland; for which purpose, the Lords of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council have heretofore made certain Orders and Regulations:

And whereas by a further Act passed in this the 29th year of Her said present Majesty's reign, c. 4, it is amongst other things enacted, that the several powers and authorities, by the said recited Acts vested in the Lords and others of Her Majesty's Privy Council, shall and may be exercised by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, by and with the advice of Her Majesty's Privy Council in Ireland, to whom also power is thereby given, from time to time, to make such Orders and Regulations as to him or them may seem necessary for the purposes in the said recited Acts mentioned; and amongst others for the purpose of regulating the embarkation and landing of persons in charge of cattle or sheep, or other animals, and of all other articles likely to carry or communicate infection; and that such Orders and Regulations, when made and published in the "Dublin Gazette," should have the same force as if they had been inserted in the said now stating Act:

Now we, John Baron Wodehouse, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, by and with the advice of Her Majesty's Privy Council in Ireland, do hereby, in exercise of the powers so given to us as aforesaid, Order as follows:—

That from and after Monday the 23rd day of April 1866, there shall be established in every Port in Ireland, from which cattle are shipped for exportation, a registry office for registering and granting certificates of such registry to every person leaving Ireland in charge of cattle, or known to be a drover or dealer in cattle frequenting markets; such registry office to be under the direction and control of, in Dublin and Kingstown, the commissioners of Metropolitan Police; and in all other ports the principal officer of constabulary at such port.

Every person leaving Ireland in charge of cattle, or known to be a drover or dealer in cattle frequenting markets, shall, before leaving Ireland, be registered, and obtain a certificate of such registry. And every such person so registered, shall, upon his return, or on board ship before the completion of the journey, if required, produce his certificate to the proper officer appointed to receive or sign it, and shall submit to such disinfecting process as may be ordered, unless he shall satisfy the said officer that he is not wearing or bringing into Ireland clothes which have been worn by him in an infected district or locality while in Great Britain or elsewhere.

It shall not be lawful for any such person as aforesaid to bring on shore in Ireland, from any port or place in Great Britain any clothing, sheets, rugs, halters, or ropes which may have been used for covering or securing cattle, nor any articles of personal clothing which have been worn in an infected fected district, place, or locality, and which have not been disinfected since they were so worn in manner aforesaid.

In this Order the word "cattle" shall mean any cow, heifer, bull, bullock, ox, calf, sheep, lamb, goat, or swine.

ORDER.

By the Lord Lieutenant and Privy Council of Ireland.

Wodehouse.

WHEREAS, in pursuance of the authority of the Statute 11 and 12 of the Queen, and divers subsequent Acts continuing the same, certain Orders have been made by the Lords of Her Majesty's Privy Council for preventing the spreading of contagious or infectious disorders among sheep, cattle, and other animals.

And whereas by one of said Orders, bearing date the 29th day of September 1865, the removal to any port or place in Ireland from any port or place in Great Britain of any sheep or lamb, or the skin or any other part of any sheep or lamb, was prohibited, excepting however out of such prohibition skins brought into Great Britain from India, South America, or Australia, and afterwards removed from Great Britain to Ireland.

And whereas it is expedient that such exception as aforesaid should be further extended as hereinafter mentioned.

Now, we, John Baron Wodehouse, Lord Lieutenant General and General Governor of Ireland, by and with the advice of Her Majesty's Privy Council in Ireland, under the powers given to us by the Cattle Disease Act (Ireland) 1866, and all other powers enabling, do hereby order as follows:

That from and after the date of the publication of this Order in the "Dublin Gazette," all wool brought into Great Britain from India, South America, or Australia, and afterwards removed from Great Britain into Ireland, is hereby and shall be excepted from the prohibition in said Order of the 29th day of September 1865, contained.

Given at the Council Chamber, Dublin Castle, this 27th day of April 1866.

COPY of ORDER in COUNCIL referred to.

At the Court at Windsor, the 9th day of May 1866.

PRESENT:

The Queen's Most Excellent Majesty in Council.

WHEREAS by an Act passed in the present Session of Parliament, intituled "An Act to amend the Law relating to Contagious or Infectious Diseases in Cattle and other Animals," it is, amongst other things, enacted, that it shall be lawful for Her Majesty, by Order in Council, from time to time to continue, or to renew if expired, all or any of the provisions in the first part of that Act contained, for such time as shall be specified in such Order:

And whereas it is provided in the 11th section of the said Act, which section is in the first part thereof, that Part I. of the said Act shall continue in force until the 15th day of April 1866, and no longer, unless continued or renewed by Order of Her Majesty in Council:

And whereas it is provided in the 12th, 13th, 14th, 15th, and 16th sections of the first part of the said Act as follows:

"Slaughter of Diseased Animals.

"12. Every local authority shall cause all animals affected with the cattle plague within its district to be slaughtered, and shall, by way of compensation for every animal so slaughtered, pay to the owner thereof such sum not exceeding 20 l., and not exceeding one half of the value of the animal immediately before it was affected with the cattle plague, as to such local authority may seem fit.

"13. Every local authority shall cause every animal that has died of cattle plague, or has been slaughtered in consequence of being affected with cattle plague, within its district, to be buried as soon as possible in its skin in some proper place, and to be covered with a sufficient quantity of quicklime or other disinfectant, and with not less than six feet of earth.

"14. Every local authority shall within its district cause the yard, shed, stable, field, or other premises in which any animal affected with cattle plague has been kept while affected by the disease, or has died or been slaughtered, to be thoroughly cleansed or disinfected, and all hay, straw, litter, dung, or other articles that have been used in or about any such animal to be burnt or otherwise destroyed; and no fresh animal shall be admitted into any yard, shed, stable, field, or other premises in which any animal affected with cattle plague has been kept while affected by the disease, or has died or been slaughtered, until the expiration of 30 days after the cleansing and disinfecting of such premises in pursuance of this Act; and every local authority shall direct the disinfecting the clothes of and the use of due precautions by inspectors, cattle overseers, and others in contact with animals affected by the cattle plague, with a view to prevent the spreading of contagion.

"15. A local authority may, if it thinks fit, cause to be slaughtered any animal that has been in the same shed or stable, or in the same herd or flock, or in contact with any animal affected with cattle plague within its district; and the owner of any animal so slaughtered may either dispose of the carcase on his own account, with a license from some officer appointed in that behalf by a local authority, or may require the local authority to dispose of the same, in which case such local authority shall pay to the owner thereof, by way of compensation, such sum, not exceeding 25 l., as may equal three-fourths of the value of the animal slaughtered: Provided always, that the Lords of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, or any two or more of them, may reserve animals (ordered to be slaughtered as aforesaid) for the purpose of experimental treatment.

"16. The local authority may require the value of any animal slaughtered under this Act to be ascertained by officers of the local authority or by arbitration, and generally may impose conditions as to evidence of the slaughter and value of the animals slaughtered: Provided that no compensation shall in any case be paid in respect of any animal found affected with cattle plague in a market or on a highway, or in respect of any animal which has been moved or otherwise dealt with in contravention of this Act, or any Order of a local authority made in pursuance thereof."

And whereas by an Order of Her Majesty in Council, bearing date the 9th day of April 1866, the provisions of the above-recited sections of the first part of the said Act were continued in force beyond the said 15th day of April 1866, and until the 10th day of May 1866; and whereas it is considered expedient that the same be further continued:

Now, therefore, Her Majesty, in exercise of the power vested in Her by the said Act, and by and with the advice of Her Privy Council, is pleased to order, and it is hereby ordered, that the said recited provisions contained in the 12th, 13th, 14th, 15th, and 16th sections of the first part of the said Act shall continue in force on and after the said 10th day of May 1866, until the 30th day of June 1866.

COPY of ORDERS in COUNCIL referred to.

AT the Council Chamber, Whitehall, the 26th day of May 1866.

By the Lords of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council.

PRESENT:

Lord President.	Mr. Milner Gibson.
Lord Privy Seal.	Mr. Bruce.
Sir George Grey, Bart.

WHEREAS by an Act passed in the Session of the 11th & 12th years of Her present Majesty's reign, c. 107, intituled "An Act to prevent until the 1st day of September 1850, and to the end of the then Session of Parliament, the spreading of Contagious or Infectious Disorders amongst Sheep, Cattle, and other Animals," and from time to time continued by divers subsequent Acts, and lastly, by an Act passed in the Session of the 28th & 29th years of the reign of Her present Majesty, c. 119, it is (amongst other things) enacted that it shall be lawful for the Lords and others of Her Majesty's Privy Council, or any two or more of them, from time to time to make such Orders and Regulations as to them may seem necessary for the purpose of prohibiting or regulating the removal to or from such parts or places as they may designate in such Order or Orders, of sheep, cattle, horses, swine, or other animals, or of hay, straw, fodder or other articles likely to propagate infection; and to make any other Orders or Regulations for the purpose of giving effect to the provisions of the said Act, and again to revoke, alter, or vary any such Orders or Regulations; and that all provisions for any of the purposes aforesaid in any such Order or Orders contained shall have the like force and effect as if the same had been inserted in the said Act:

And whereas the said Act has been amended and explained by an Act passed in the 29th year of Her present Majesty's reign, intituled "An Act to amend the Act of the 11th & 12th years of Her present Majesty, c. 107, to prevent the spreading of Contagious or Infectious Disorders among Sheep, Cattle, and other Animals."

And whereas a contagious or infectious disorder, generally designated as the "Cattle Plague," has lately appeared, and now prevails, amongst cattle in England and Wales:

And whereas divers Orders in pursuance of the said recited Act have been made by the Lords of the said Council in relation to the said cattle plague, which were consolidated and amended by Orders bearing date the 24th day of March, and the 11th day of April 1866, and such last Orders have been since altered and extended by other Orders of the Council since duly issued, one of which, bearing date the 14th day of April 1866, relates to South Wales:

App. No. 11.

And whereas some of the Regulations contained in the said Orders will cease on the first day of June next following, and it is expedient that the same should be continued, and that farther regulations should be made in regard to the landing of foreign cattle, the movement of cattle, and the cleansing of pens and the movement of hay and straw as herein provided.

Now, therefore, the Lords of the said Council do hereby order as follows, that is to say:

Art. 1. All the regulations contained in the said Orders above referred to, which, if this Order had not been made, would have ceased and determined on the 1st day of June next shall be continued and be in force until the Lords of the said Council shall hereafter otherwise order.

Art. 2. All cattle brought by sea from any place out of the United Kingdom, except the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man, and landed at any place in the United Kingdom, shall be taken forthwith to the market held and duly licensed by the Lords of the Council for the sale of cattle, for immediate slaughter, if any such there be within the said place, which shall be held within four days from the landing of such cattle; and if there be no such market duly licensed within such place, or if the market duly licensed shall not be held within four days from the landing of such cattle, such cattle shall be slaughtered at such place before the expiration of such four days.

Art. 3. All lambs, sheep, goats, and swine brought by sea from any place out of the United Kingdom into any town or place in the United Kingdom, in the same vessel with any foreign cattle, shall be dealt with in all respects as such foreign cattle, and shall be subject to all the regulations applicable to such foreign cattle brought by sea into any such town or place.

Art. 4. The local authority shall, with the view of preventing the spread of the said disorder, with all convenient speed after the issuing of this Order, make regulations with respect to the movement of commonable animals on, to, from and through the commons and wastes within its jurisdiction, whereon there shall exist any right of common, and the despasturing, or for the prohibition of the despasturing of such commonable animals thereon, and shall publish such regulations by notice in some newspaper circulating in the neighbourhood of the commons or wastes to which they relate, and after the lapse of four days from such publication no animal shall be moved on, to, from, or through, or be despastured on such common or waste in contravention of such regulation.

Art. 5. Notwithstanding anything in the said Orders otherwise provided, it shall be sufficient if the pen which shall be used for any animal shall be thoroughly cleansed and disinfected in the manner directed by the Board of Trade once in every 24 hours during the time when it shall be used for any such animal, and at such other times as the said Board of Trade shall require.

Art. 6. The regulations in the said Orders contained relating to the movement of hay and straw out of infected places, shall not apply to hay or straw used in the packing and storing of goods where the owner, seller, or purchaser of such goods who shall pack or store the goods, or shall cause the same to be packed or stored, shall prove upon any inquiry to the satisfaction of the local authority of the district out of which and into which such goods shall be brought respectively, or of some person employed by them in this behalf, that such hay or straw is not infected, and has not been in contact with any diseased animal, or with any matter or thing which has been in such contact during the period of 28 days previous to the day when the same is so being used.

Art. 7. The local authority in the counties of Pembroke, Cardigan, and Carmarthen respectively, may grant licenses for the holding of fairs whereat cattle may be sold, so that a separate license be granted for every fair, and that the same may be made revocable at the discretion of the said local authority, which license shall be in writing and in such form as the local authority shall deem to be expedient.

Art. 8. This Order shall be construed in like manner as the said Orders of the 24th day of March and the 11th day of April, and all the provisions of such last-mentioned Orders now in force shall apply to this Order respectively, except so far as they may be inconsistent with anything herein contained.

At the Council Chamber, Whitehall, the 26th day of May 1866.

By the Lords of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council.

Present:

Lord President.	Mr. Milner Gibson.
Lord Privy Seal.	Mr. Bruce.
Sir George Grey, Bart.

Whereas by an Act passed in the Session of Parliament, holden in the 11th & 12th years of Her present Majesty's reign, c. 107, intituled "An Act to prevent until the 1st day of September 1850, and to the end of the then Session of Parliament, the spreading of contagious or infectious disorders among sheep, cattle, and other animals," and from time to time continued by divers subsequent Acts, and lastly by an Act passed in the Session of the 28th & 29th years of the reign of Her present Majesty, c. 119, it is (amongst other things) enacted, that it shall be lawful for the Lords and others of Her Majesty's Privy Council, or any two or more of them, from time to time to make such Orders and Regulations as to them may seem necessary for the purpose of prohibiting or regulating the removal to or from such parts or places as they may designate in such Order or Orders of sheep, cattle, horses, swine, or other animals, or of meat, skins, hides, horns, hoofs, or other parts of any animals, or of hay, straw, fodder, or other articles likely to propagate infection, and to make any other Orders or Regulations for the purpose of giving effect to the provisions of the said Act, and again to revoke, alter, or vary any such Orders or Regulations; and that all provisions for any of the purposes aforesaid in any such Order or Orders contained shall have the like force and effect as if the same had been inserted in the said Act:

And whereas the said Act has been explained and amended by an Act passed in the 29th year of the reign of Her present Majesty, intituled "An Act to amend the Act of the 11th & 12th years of her present Majesty, c. 107, to prevent the spreading of contagious or infectious disorders among sheep, cattle, and other animals:"

And whereas a contagious or infectious disorder, generally designated as the "Cattle Plague," has lately appeared, and now prevails, amongst cattle in England and Wales:

And whereas the Lords of Her Majesty's Privy Council, in exercise of the powers given by the said Act so continued as aforesaid, did, on the 24th day of March now last past, by an Order then made, amongst other things order and direct that, until the 1st day of June 1866, all cattle brought by sea from any place out of the United Kingdom into any town or place in England should be marked by clipping the hair of the end of the tail, and that no such cattle should be removed alive from such town or place except by sea:

And whereas it is expedient to vary the provisions of the said Order of the 24th day of March 1866, so far as relates to cattle brought by sea from the islands of Jersey, Guernsey, Alderney, and Sark (hereinafter called the "Channel Islands"), and the Isle of Man, into any town or place in England:

Now therefore the Lords of Her Majesty's Privy Council do hereby, in exercise of the powers given by the said Act so continued as aforesaid, order as follows:

1. From and after the publication of this Order in the London Gazette, so much of the said Order of the 24th day of March 1866, as requires cattle brought by sea from any place out of the United Kingdom into any town or place in England to be marked by clipping the hair off the end of the tail, and prohibits the removal of such cattle alive from any such town or place, except by sea, shall cease to be applicable to such cows as hereinafter mentioned, but shall in all other respects remain in full force and effect.

2. This Order shall apply only to cows brought into any town or place in England from the Channel Islands or any of them, or from the Isle of Man, in vessels plying or sailing between those islands respectively, or one of them, and England, which shall not have touched since last leaving England at any port or place, except some port or place in the said islands, or one of them, or since last leaving the said islands, or one of them, at some port or place in England, and which shall not have any cattle on board, except cows certified in the manner hereinafter provided to be the produce of and to have been born in the said islands respectively, or one of them, and not to have been previously removed therefrom.

3. In order to entitle any cows or cow so brought into any town or place in England as aforesaid to the benefit of this Order, the master of the vessel in or on board of which the same shall be so brought shall, upon his arrival in such town or place, deliver to such person as shall be appointed by the local authority of such town or place for such purpose, or, (in default of any such appointment) to the officers of Her Majesty's Customs at such town or place, a clearance cocket under under the hands or hand of the principal officer and controller of Her Majesty's Customs at the port or place in one of the said islands from which such cows or cow shall have been exported, describing such cows or cow as being bonâ fide the produce of and as having never previously been removed or exported out of the Channel Islands, or one of them, or the Isle of Man (as the case may be); together with a certificate in writing under the hand of the governor or lieutenant-governor of such island, certifying that the shipper of such cows or cow has made proof before a magistrate within such island, in the manner required by the laws relating to the Customs, that such cows or cow are or is actually the produce of, and were or was born within, the Channel Islands or the Isle of Man (as the case may be), and have or has never previously been removed or exported therefrom; and also a certificate under the hand of some veterinary surgeon practising within such island, and countersigned by a magistrate having authority within the same to the effect that to the best of his knowledge and belief such cows or cow are or is free from the said disorder called the "cattle plague," and from every symptom commonly supposed to indicate the presence or approach of the said disorder, and from contagious disease of any kind, and that to the best of his knowledge and belief the said cattle plague never has existed, and does not, at the time of granting such certificate, exist in such island.

4. No cows or cow brought by sea from the Channel Islands, or any of them, or from the Isle of Man, into any town or place in England as defined by the 30th section of the said Order of the 24th day of March 1866, in such manner and so certified as aforesaid, shall be removed from such town or place alive without a certificate from the local authority having jurisdiction in such town or place that such cows or cow have or has been examined by some officer appointed for that purpose by such authority, and that such cows or cow are or is free from disease: such certificate shall not exempt such cows or cow from any other Regulation of the said Order of the 24th day of March with respect to the movement of cattle or otherwise: provided nevertheless, that in the case of any such cows or cow so certified as aforesaid the certificate of the local authority that such cows or cow are or is free from disease may be accepted in the case of a fat-stock license by the person authorised to grant the same as sufficient for the purpose of granting such license, and in the case of a store-stock license cuch certificate may be accepted by the justice as equivalent to the declaration of the owner or his agent and to the certificate of the occupiers required by the form of the said store-stock license under the said Order of the 24th day of March 1866.

5. Every person guilty of an offence against this Order shall for each such offence incur a penalty not exceeding 20 l.; and where any such offence is committed with respect to more than four animals a penalty not exceeding 5 l. for each animal may be imposed instead of the penalty of 20 l.

(No. 71—1866.) App. No. 11.

Sir, Whitehall, 4 June 1866.

With reference to the concluding paragraph of your letter of the 1st instant, I am directed by the Lords of the Council to transmit to you, for the information of the Commissioners of Customs, the enclosed copy of the Order in Council of the 11th April last, consolidating and amending previous Orders for preventing the spread of cattle plague in Scotland.

I am, &c.
(signed) E. Harrison.

The Secretary, Customs.

Custom House, London.
8 June 1866.

The aforegoing copy of a letter from Mr. Harrison, Deputy Clerk of the Council, with copy of the Order therein referred to, is transmitted to the collector at for his information, with reference to General Order 65—1866.

By Order of the Commissioners,

J. B. Hale.

Copy of Order in Council referred to.

At the Council Chamber, Whitehall, the 11th day of April 1866.

By the Lords of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council.

Present:

Lord President.	Sir George Grey, Bart.
Lord Privy Seal.

Whereas by an Act passed in the Session of the 11th & 12th years of Her present Majesty's reign, c. 107, intituled "An Act to prevent until the 1st day of September 1850, and to the end of the then Session of Parliament, the spreading of Contagious or Infectious Disorders among Sheep, Cattle, and other Animals," and from time to time continued by divers subsequent Acts, and lastly by an Act passed in the Session of the 28th & 29th years of the reign of Her present Majesty, c. 119, it is (amongst other things) enacted, that it shall be lawful for the Lords and others of Her Majesty's Privy Council, or any two or more of them, from time to time, to make such Orders and Regulations as to them may seem necessary for the purpose of prohibiting or regulating the removal to or from such parts or places as they may designate in such Order or Orders, of sheep, cattle, horses, swine, or other animals, or of meat, skins, hides, horns, hoofs, or other parts of any animals, or of hay, straw, fodder, or other articles, likely to propagate infection, and to make any other Orders or Regulations for the purpose of giving effect to the provisions of the said Act, and again to revoke, alter, or vary any such Orders or Regulations; and that all provisions for any of the purposes aforesaid in any such Order or Orders contained shall have the like force and effect as if the same had been inserted in the said Act:

And whereas a contagious or infectious disorder, generally designated as the "Cattle Plague," has lately appeared, and now prevails, amongst cattle in Scotland:

And whereas divers Orders have been made by the Lords of the said Council in relation to the cattle plague, and it is expedient to consolidate, amend, and add to the said Orders.

Now, therefore, the Lords of Her Majesty's Privy Council do hereby, in exercise of the powers given under the said Act so continued as aforesaid, order as follows:

Preliminary.

1. This Order shall come into force on the 16th of April 1866, and shall remain in force until it is revoked or altered.

2. This Order shall apply to Scotland only, subject to the limitation hereinafter expressed.

PART I.

Definitions.

3. In the construction of this Order the following terms shall have the meanings hereinafter assigned to them; that is to say,

"Person" shall include a body of persons, corporate or unincorporate:

"Cattle" shall mean bull, bullock, cow, ox, heifer, or calf:

"Animal" shall mean cattle as above defined, sheep, lambs, goats, and swine:

"Disease" shall mean the cattle plague:

"Diseased" shall mean affected by the cattle plague:

"Privy Council" shall mean the Lords and others of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, or any two of them:

"Burgh" shall mean any town which returns or contributes to return a Member or Members to Parliament:

"County" shall not include a county of a city or county of a town.

Detached parts of counties shall be considered as forming part of the county by which they are surrounded, or if partly surrounded by two or more counties, then as forming part of that county with which they have the longest common boundary.

Every place that is not, according to the foregoing definitions, a burgh or county, shall be deemed to form part of the county, as hereinbefore defined, to the county rate of which it is assessed, or, if not assessed, of the county within which it is situate.

Local Authority.

4. For the purposes of this Order, "District," "Local Authority," Local Rate," and "Clerk of Local Authority," shall respectively mean the places, bodies of persons, rate, and officer in the first schedule hereto annexed in that behalf mentioned.

5. Any local authority may from time to time form one or more committee or committees consisting wholly of its own members or partly of its own members and partly of such other persons, being rated occupiers in the district and qualified in such other manner as the local authority may determine, and may delegate, with or without conditions or restrictions, to any committee so formed, all or any powers conferred on the local authority by this Order, and may from time to time revoke, add to, or alter any powers so given to a committee.

A committee may elect a chairman of its meetings. If no chairman is elected, or if the chairman elected is not present at the time appointed for holding a meeting, the members present shall choose one of their number to be chairman of such meeting. A committee may meet and adjourn as it thinks proper. The quorum of a committee shall consist of such number of members as may be prescribed by the local authority that appointed it, or, if no number be prescribed, of three members. Every question at a meeting shall be determined by a majority of votes of the members present, and voting on that question; and in case of an equal division of votes the chairman shall have a second or casting vote.

The proceedings of a committee shall not be invalidated by any vacancy or vacancies amongst its members.

A local authority may from time to time add to or diminish the number of the members or otherwise alter the constitution of any committee formed by it under this Order, and may dissolve any such committee and form a new one in its place.

Any committee formed under the provisions of the Cattle Diseases Prevention Act, 1866, shall be deemed to be a committee of a local authority for the purposes of this Order, within the district of such local authority as defined by this Order.

6. The local authority of any burgh which is assessed to the police rate of any county may, with the consent of the local authority of such county, such consent being testified in writing, by a letter signed by the clerk of such last-mentioned authority, declare, by notice published in any newspaper circulating within such county, that such burgh is annexed to such county for the purposes of this Order; and from the date of the publication of such notice such burgh shall, for the purposes of this Order, form part of the district of the local authority of such county.

7. Every local authority shall perform all such duties as are imposed upon it by this Order, and shall make such reports to the Privy Council as the Council may from time to time require.

Appointment of Officers, &c.

8. Every local authority shall from time to time appoint such inspectors or other officers as it thinks necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this Order within its district; it shall assign them such duties and award them such salaries and allowances as it thinks expedient, and may revoke any appointment so made.

9. Every inspector or other officer appointed by a local authority previously to the date of this Order, for any purpose relating to the cattle plague, and holding office at such date, shall be deemed an inspector or officer for the purposes of this Order within the district of such local authority as defined by this Order, and be subject to

to the provisions thereof, in the same manner as if he had been appointed thereunder.

10. Every inspector shall furnish the Privy Council with such information, in regard to the cattle plague, as they may from time to time require.

11. Every local authority may provide and supply, without charge, printed copies of any documents or forms requisite for the purposes of this Order.

12. All expenses incurred by a local authority in carrying into effect this Order shall be defrayed out of the local rate.

13. Any person appointed or to be appointed by the Privy Council an inspector for the purposes of this Order shall, throughout the whole of Scotland, have all the powers which an inspector appointed by a local authority has within his district, and any direction of the Privy Council shall, as respects such inspector, be of the same validity as a direction of a local authority in the case of an inspector appointed by it.

Part II.

Diseased Animals.

14. Every person having in his possession or under his charge any diseased animal shall forthwith give notice thereof to such officer as may have been appointed by the local authority of the district to receive such notices; or, if no such officer has been appointed, to a police constable, whose duty it shall be to report without delay to the local authority the fact of such notice having been given to him. Any person failing to comply with this Regulation as to giving notice shall be deemed guilty of an offence against this Order.

15. Every person having in his possession or under his charge any diseased animal shall, as far as practicable, keep such animal separate from animals not diseased. Any person failing to comply with this Regulation shall be deemed guilty of an offence against this Order.

16. No diseased animal, and no animal which has, within the preceeding 28 days, been in the same shed, or stable, or in the same herd or flock, or in contact with a diseased animal, shall be removed alive from the premises where such animal may be, except with a license from the local authority of the district, which license shall only permit the removal of such animal to some place within the district of such local authority where it can be conveniently slaughtered, or kept apart fram all other animals until such local authority is satisfied that there is no reasonable probability of such animal propagating disease; provided that no such license shall authorise such animal to be removed in contravention of the 17th Regulation of this Order.

If any animal is removed in contravention of this Regulation, the person causing, directing, or permitting the removal of such animal, and also the person removing the same, shall respectively be deemed guilty of an offence against this Order.

17. No diseased animal, and no animal that has within the preceding 28 days been in the same shed or stable, or in the same herd or flock, or in contact with a diseased animal, shall—

1. Be placed or kept in any common or uninclosed land, or in any field or other place insufficiently fenced:

2. Be sent or brought to any fair or market, or exposed for public sale:

3. Be driven along or allowed to stray upon any highway or the sides thereof:

4. Be sent or carried by any railway, canal, river, or other inland navigation, or by any coasting or sea-going vessel.

If any animal is dealt with in contravention of this Regulation, the owner of such animal, and also the company or person other than the owner dealing with the same in contravention of this Regulation, shall be deemed guilty of an offence against this Order.

18. When any offence is committed with respect to any animal under the 14th, 15th, 16th, and 17th Regulations of this Order, or any of them, the local authority of the district, and any authority of a fair or market in which such animal may be, may, by themselves or their officers, cause such animal to be slaughtered and buried, and recover from the owner in a summary manner all expenses so incurred.

19. All diseased animals, whether they have been slaughtered or have died of the disease, shall be buried by the owner as soon as practicable in some proper place, with their skins slashed in such a manner as to prevent their being made of any use, and with a sufficient quantity of quicklime or other disinfectant, and shall be covered with at least five feet of earth, or shall be otherwise disposed of in such manner as may be directed by any regulations made by the local authority, and approved by the Privy Council.

If any diseased animal is not buried or otherwise disposed of in pursuance of this Regulation, the owner of such diseased animal shall be deemed guilty of an offence against this Order, and it shall be lawful for the local authority to bury or otherwise dispose of any such animal, and to use any convenient place on the premises of the owner for that purpose.

The local authority may recover from the owner in a summary manner any expenses incurred by it under this Regulation.

20. No person shall dig up any diseased animal, or part of a diseased animal. Any person acting in contravention of this Regulation shall be deemed guilty of an offence against this Order.

21. Every local authority shall, within its district, at its own expense, cause the premises in which diseased animals have been to be thoroughly cleansed and disinfected; and the occupier of such premises shall give all facilities for such cleansing and disinfecting. Any occupier of premises failing to give such facilities shall be deemed guily of an offence against this Order.

vention of this Regulation, the occupier of such yard, shed, stable, field, or other premises shall be deemed guilty of an offence against this Order.

23. The dung of a diseased animal, and all hay, straw, or litter, or any other article that has been in contact with or used about a diseased animal, shall be destroyed, or, with the sanction of the local authority, shall be disinfected and dealt with to the satisfaction of the inspector. If such dung, hay, straw, litter, or any other article is not destroyed or disinfected and dealt with in pursuance of this Regulation, the local authority may cause the same to be destroyed or disinfected, and recover in a summary manner all expenses incurred by it from the occupier of the premises on which such articles were found; and, in addition thereto, such occupier shall be deemed guilty of an offence against this Order.

24. The dung of a diseased animal, and all hay, straw, or litter, or any other article that has been in contact with or used about a diseased animal, shall not be removed from the premises where such animal has been, except for the purpose of being destroyed or disinfected and dealt with in compliance with this Order and with a license of an inspector specifying the place at which it is to be destroyed or disinfected and dealt with, and shall not be removed beyond the limits of the district of the local authority in which the said premises are situated without the consent, in writing, of the local authority into whose district it is moved. If such dung, hay, straw, litter, or other article is removed in contravention of this Regulation, the occupier of the premises from which it is removed, and also the person removing the same, shall be respectively deemed guilty of an offence against this Order; and it shall be lawful for the local authority to destroy or disinfect any such article, and to recover the expenses of such destruction or disinfection from the said occupier.

25. Every local authority shall direct the disinfecting of clothes of, and the use of due precautions by, inspectors and other officers brought into contact with diseased animals, with a view to prevent such inspectors or officers spreading contagion. Any inspector or officer disobeying the directions of any local authority as to such disinfection and use of due precautions shall be deemed guilty of an offence against this Order.

Infected Places.

26. The authorities hereinafter mentioned, that is to say, any local authority as to any place within its district shall, and the Privy Council as to any place in Scotland may, by Order made at any time after the passing of this Order, and published in manner hereinafter mentioned, declare any place in which disease amongst animals at that time exists, together with such an area, including such place, as to such authority may seem to be required, to be an "infected place," from and after a date to be specified in such Order; and the authority declaring the place to be infected may, at the expiration of one month after the disappearance of disease in that place, by Order published in like manner, declare such place to be free from disease, and after the publication of such last-mentioned Order such place shall cease to be an "infected place" within the meaning of this Order, unless again declared in manner aforesaid to be an "infected place."

Any local authority may include in the area of an "infected place" any adjoining part of the district of another local authority, with the consent of such last-mentioned authority, testified in writing by a letter signed by the clerk of such authority.

The area of an "infected place" may be described by reference to a map deposited at some specified place, or by reference to parishes, townships, farms, or otherwise, as the authority may think expedient.

An Order declaring a place to be an "infected place" shall be published by notice being posted up in or near the "infected place," and, so far as is possible, in all places where notices are usually posted up, within five miles of such "infected place," or in such other manner as the authority declaring the place to be infected may think expedient.

The local authority, on declaring any place infected, shall forthwith report by post to the Privy Council the fact of such declaration having been made.

No objection shall be taken in any legal proceeding in respect of an "infected place" on the ground that due notice has not been given of such place having been declared to be an "infected place."

Any Order made by the Privy Council under this Regulation shall supersede any Order inconsistent with it that may have been made by a local authority.

27. The following rules shall be observed with respect to "infected places," in addition to the other regulations of this Order with respect to diseased animals; that is to say:

1. No animal shall be moved out of an "infected place":

2. No hides, skins, horns, hoofs, or offal of animals, shall be moved out of an "infected place," without the license of some officer of the local authority appointed to issue such licenses certifying that such articles have not formed part of a diseased animal, and, if necessary, have been properly disinfected.

3. No carcase of, or undressed meat that has formed part of, any bull, bullock, cow, ox, heifer, or calf, shall be moved out of an "infected place" without the license of some officer of the local authority appointed to issue such licenses certifying that such carcase is not that of a diseased animal, or that such meat has not formed part of a diseased animal:

4. No dung of animals, and no hay, straw, litter, or other articles forming food of animals, or used for or about animals, shall be removed out of an "infected place" without the license of some officer of the local authority appointed to issue such licenses certifying that such articles have not been in contact with or used about a diseased animal:

5. A license for the purpose of this Regulation must be in writing, and shall not authorise the removal of any articles beyond the district of the local authority in which the "infected place" is situate without the the license of the local authority into whose district it is proposed to move such articles.

If any animal, dung of animals, hide, skin, horn, hoof, offal, meat, hay, straw, litter, or other articles, is or are moved in contravention of this Regulation, the owner of such animal or articles, and also the person moving the same, or causing, directing, or permitting the same to be moved, shall respectively be deemed guilty of an offence against this Order.

All constables and police officers shall enforce the provisions of this Regulation, to the utmost of their power, and may apprehend all persons committing any offence against this Regulation, and may require all animals and articles being moved out of such place in contravention of this Regulation to be forthwith taken back within the limits of such place.

This Regulation shall not apply to any animal or article carried by railway through an "infected place."

Markets and Fairs.

28. No market, fair, auction, exhibition, or sale of cattle shall be held until the 1st day of June 1866, except as hereinafter mentioned; that is to say:

First. Cattle belonging to the owner or occupier of premises that are not situate within the limits of an infected place, if the cattle are free from disease, and have been in the possession of the owner or occupier not less than 28 days immediately previous to the sale, may be sold on such premises:

Secondly. Markets may be held, with the license of the Privy Council, for the sale of cattle intended for immediate slaughter: Provided that no cattle shall be removed from such market until they have been marked in the manner in which cattle are ordinarily marked for slaughter according to the custom of such market, or, if there is no such custom, by clipping the hair off the end of the tail; and all cattle required to be marked by this Regulation shall be slaughtered within four days from the date of the holding of such market (if sold) by or by the order of the purchaser, or (if not sold) by or by the order of the owner, and shall in no instance be taken beyond the limits described in the license of the Privy Council allowing such market, and under such conditions with respect to their movement within such limits as may be imposed by such license.

If any cattle are sold in contravention of this Regulation, both the seller and the purchaser of such cattle shall be deemed guilty of an offence against this Order.

If any cattle required to be marked by this Regulation are not so marked, the persons for the time being in charge of such cattle shall be deemed guilty of an offence against this Order.

If any cattle required to be slaughtered by this Regulation are not so slaughtered, the purchaser or owner of such cattle or his agent (as the case may be) shall be deemed guilty of an offence against this Order.

If any cattle are removed in contravention of this Regulation, the person removing such cattle, and the person causing, directing, or permitting the removal of such cattle, shall respectively be deemed guilty of an offence against this Order.

29. No sheep, lambs, goats, or swine shall be brought into or exposed for sale in any market licensed for the sale of cattle under the last preceding Regulation, except for the purpose of immediate slaughter, and all such sheep, lambs, goats, and swine, when brought into or exposed for sale in any such market, shall be subject to the last preceding Regulation, in the same manner as if they were cattle, except that they shall be marked in such manner as the market authority may direct, instead of in the manner prescribed by the said Regulation.

Foreign Cattle.

30. Until the 1st of June 1866, all cattle brought by sea from any place out of the United Kingdom into any town or place in Scotland shall be marked by clipping the hair off the end of the tail, and no such cattle shall be removed alive from such town or place except by sea.

"Town or place" in this Regulation shall, according to circumstances, mean as follows:

1. The area of any burgh or such other limits as may be defined by the Privy Council in respect of such burgh:

2. In the case of any other town or place, such area as may be defined by the Privy Council to constitute such town or place.

Cattle brought by Sea from any part of the United Kingdom into Scotland.

31. No cattle brought by sea from any place in the United Kingdom into any town or place in Scotland shall be removed from such town or place alive, without a certificate from the local authority having jurisdiction in such town or place that such cattle have been examined by some officer appointed for that purpose by such authority, and that such cattle are free from disease; but such certificate shall not exempt such cattle from any other regulation of this Order with respect to the movement of cattle or otherwise: Provided, nevertheless, that, in the case of cattle landed in any place in Scotland from Ireland, the certificate of the local authority, that such cattle are free from disease, shall be accepted, in the case of a fat-stock license, by the person authorised to grant the same as sufficient for the purpose of granting such license, and in the case of a store-stock license such certificate shall be accepted by the local authority as equivalent to the declaration of the owner or his agent, and to the certificate of the occupiers required by the form of the said store-stock license.

"Town or place" shall in this Regulation have the same meaning as in the preceding Regulation.

GENERAL REGULATIONS.

Movement of Cattle.

32. No cattle shall be moved on any highway between sunset and sunrise, except within the limits of a burgh.

No cattle, except as hereinafter provided, shall be moved by or upon any railway, canal, navigation, river, or highway, or by any vessels coastwise, without a license, save for a distance not exceeding 500 yards from one part of the same farm to another.

Licenses shall be of two descriptions—

1. A license for cattle intended for immediate slaughter, hereinafter called a fat-stock license:

2. A license for other cattle, hereinafter called a store stock-license.

A fat-stock license shall be in the form, and contain the particulars, and be signed in the manner appearing in the form marked A. in the second schedule annexed hereto, or as near thereto as circumstances admit.

A store-stock license shall be in the form, and contain the particulars, and be signed in the manner appearing in the form marked B. in the said second schedule, or as near thereto as circumstances admit.

No cattle shall be moved as aforesaid out of the district of the local authority in which they are, without a license in one of the forms aforesaid, such form being applicable to the class of cattle moved; but where cattle are moved only within the district of a local authority, or from one part of a farm beyond such district to another part within it, that local authority may make such regulations for their removal with or without license as it thinks fit, so that the conditions of such licenses when granted be not more stringent than the conditions of the licenses in the said second schedule.

If any cattle are moved in contravention of this regulation, the owner of such cattle, and the person directing or permitting the removal of the same, and the company or person conveying the same shall respectively be deemed guilty of an offence against this Order.

Cattle brought by land from England into Scotland may be moved in Scotland with the same licenses that in England authorise their removal from the district of one local authority to another, in pursuance of any Order of the Privy Council in force for the time being.

33. No person shall drive or allow any cattle under his charge to be driven or to stray into any inclosed field, without the consent of the owner or occupier thereof, and any person acting in contravention of this regulation shall be deemed guilty of an offence against this Order.

Movement of Hides and Skins, &c.

34. No hide, skin, horn, or hoof of animals shall be moved by highway, railway, canal, river, or other mode of conveyance, unless effectually covered.

If any hides, skins, horns, or hoofs are moved in contravention of this regulation, the person sending the same, and the person moving the same, shall be deemed guilty of an offence against this Order.

35. No regulation of this Order shall apply to the following hides, skins, horns, and hoofs (that is to say):

(1.) Hides, skins, horns, or hoofs imported into the United Kingdom from India, Australia, South Africa, or America:

(2.) Hides, skins, horns, hoofs, or glue-pieces that have been effectually limed for manufacturing purposes.

But the burden of proving that any hides, skins, horns, or hoofs are such as are authorised by this Regulation to be removed shall lie upon the person charged with moving the same in contravention of this Order.

Regulations as to Dogs.

36. A local authority may make such orders as it thinks expedient for preventing the propagation of disease by means of dogs, and may order any stray dogs to be destroyed or otherwise disposed of as it thinks fit.

Cleansing of Pens and Trucks.

37. Every railway or other company or person carrying animals for hire shall, on every occasion after any animal has been taken out of any pen, carriage, truck, or boat used by such company or person, and before any other animal or article is placed therein, thoroughly cleanse and disinfect every such pen, carriage, truck, or boat in such manner as the Board of Trade may from time to time direct.

The expression "truck" shall include any horsebox or other vehicle used in the carrying of animals.

If any pen, carriage, truck, or boat is at any time used in contravention of this Regulation, the company or person by whom it is used shall, every time that such pen, truck, or boat is used, be liable to a penalty not exceeding 5 l.

Powers of Officers employed under this Order.

38. Any inspector or other officer empowered to carry this Order into effect may, if authorised so to do by any general or special order, in writing, of the local authority, enter any field, stable, cowshed, or other premises within his district, where he has reasonable grounds for supposing that cattle affected by disease are to be found, or have been, or have been buried, or otherwise disposed of, for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this Order, or enter into the station or premises of any railway or other company or person carrying animals for hire, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the pens, carriages, trucks, boats, or other vehicles used by such company or person have been duly cleansed and disinfected; and if any person refuses admission to, or obstructs or impedes, or aids in obstructing or impeding any such inspector or other officer, he shall be deemed guilty of an offence against this Order.

travention of this Order, may direct, by writing under his hand, such animals or articles to be detained, and the person in charge thereof to be brought before two justices as soon as practicable, and such animals or articles may be detained and the person brought before the justices accordingly.

Upon such person being brought before the two justices they shall adjudicate on the case in a summary manner, and if satisfied that the animals or articles were moved in contravention of this Order, may direct the same to be destroyed or otherwise disposed of, as they think most expedient for the prevention of the spreading of disease amongst animals.

The constable or other police officer detaining any animals in pursuance of this regulation shall cause them to be supplied with requisite food and water during their detention; and any expenses incurred by such officer in respect of such animals may be recovered in a summary manner from the person in charge, or from the owner of the animals.

40. It shall be lawful for any constable or police officer, or for any officer authorised by a local authority so to do, to stop and detain any animal moved, or which he has reasonable grounds for suspecting is being moved in contravention of this Order, and to apprehend without warrant the person in charge of such animal, and bring him before a justice, who shall inquire into the case in a summary manner; and such justice, if satisfied that such animal was being moved in contravention of this Order, may direct, by writing under his hand, the animal so moved to be detained, and the person in charge thereof to be brought before two justices as soon as practicable, and such animal may be detained and person brought before the justices accordingly.

Upon such person being brought before the two justices they shall adjudicate on the case in a summary manner, and, if satisfied that the animal was being moved in contravention of this Order, may direct the same to be slaughtered and buried, or to be otherwise disposed of, as they think most expedient for the prevention of the spreading of disease amongst animals.

Any constable, police, or other officer detaining any animal shall cause it to be supplied with requisite food and water during its detention; and any expenses incurred by such officer in respect of any animal may be recovered in a summary manner from the person in charge, or from the owner of the animal.

41. If any person having charge of any animal or thing being moved on a highway, railway, canal, navigation, or river, for the moving whereof a license is requisite under this Order, being required by any constable, police officer, or officer authorised by a local authority, to produce the license (if any) for the moving of that animal or thing, fails so to do, he shall be deemed guilty of an offence against this Order.

42. Every person guilty of an offence against this Order shall for each such offence incur a penalty not exceeding 20 l.; and where any such offence is committed with respect to more than four animals, a penalty not exceeding 5 l. for each animal may be imposed instead of the penalty of 20 l. And where any such offence is committed with reference to any dung, offal, hay, litter, straw, or other thing, a further penalty not exceeding 10 l. may be imposed for every half ton in weight of such dung or other thing after the first half ton.

43. Any local authority may appear before any justices, or in any legal proceedings, by its clerk or by any agent authorised by it in writing under the hands of two of its members, and any railway company or other body corporate may appear before any justices or in any legal proceedings by their secretary, or by any member of their board of management, or by any agent authorised in writing under the hands of any two members of such board.

Part III.

Repeal of Orders.

44. On and after the 16th of April 1866, there shall be revoked, so far as respects Scotland, the following Orders, or so much thereof as may be in force; that is to say,

The Order of July 24th, 1865,
of November 23rd, 1855,
of December 16th, 1855,
of January 20th, 1866,
of February 6th, 1866,
of February 23rd, 1866.

And all notices published by any local authority in pursuance of such Orders shall cease to have any effect, without prejudice nevertheless to the prosecution of any offence that may have been committed against the said Order or Notices, or any of them, or to the recovery of any penalty in respect of such offence.

45. The foregoing regulations shall not apply to the "North-Western District of Scotland," as defined and described in an Order in Council, dated 3rd November 1865; and in another Order in Council, dated 14th March 1866; and the said north-western district of Scotland shall remain subject to the provisions of the said Orders which, except to the extent hereinafter modified, shall continue in force until revoked or altered.

46. Section 3 of the Order of 14th March 1866, is hereby revoked.

47. Every license for moving sheep into the north-western district of Scotland, or from one district or county to another, shall contain a statement of the place in which such sheep have been wintering, and of the route by which they are to be moved, and no local authority shall sign, or authorise to be signed, any such license, until a certificate, signed by an inspector or other officer appointed for the purpose by the local authority of the county in which such sheep have been wintering, has been produced, certifying that such sheep are free from disease, and that the farm upon which such sheep have been wintering has been free from cattle plague for 28 days, and is not within 10 miles of an infected place, as defined by this Order; and no local authority shall sign, or authorise to be signed, any such license, if the route by which such sheep are to be moved passes through an "infected place," or within 10 miles thereof.

which, in the opinion of such local authority, are likely to propagate disease; and may order any stray dogs, and such of the said articles as are introduced in contravention of the said orders, to be destroyed, or otherwise disposed of, as it thinks fit.

49. No animal shall be removed into any county or district without the license in writing of the local authority of such county or district, or of a person appointed by the local authority to grant such license, and any person obtaining a license shall fulfil all the conditions contained therein.

50. It shall be competent for any local authority within the said north-western district of Scotland to adopt and enforce all or any of the foregoing regulations not at present made applicable to the said north-western district.

THE aforegoing copy of a letter from Mr. Childers, one of the Secretaries to the Lords of the Treasury, with copy of the Order therein referred to, is transmitted to the collector at , for his information and guidance.

By Order of the Commissioners,

J. B. Hale.

COPY of ORDER in COUNCIL referred to.

AT the Council Chamber, Whitehall, the 11th day of June 1866.

By the Lords of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council.

PRESENT:

Lord President.	Mr. Monsell.
Sir George Grey, Bart.	Mr. Bruce.
Mr. Chichester Fortescue.

WHEREAS by an Act passed in the Session of the 11th and 12th years of Her present Majesty's reign, chapter 107, intituled, "An Act to prevent until the 1st day of September 1850, and to the end of the then Session of Parliament, the spreading of Contagious or Infectious Disorders among Sheep, Cattle, and other Animals," and from time to time continued by divers subsequent Acts, and lastly by an Act passed in the Session of the 28th and 29th years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter 119, it is (amongst other things) enacted, that it shall be lawful for the Lords and others of Her Majesty's Privy Council, or any two or more of them, from time to time to make such orders and regulations as to them may seem necessary for the purpose of prohibiting or regulating the removal to or from such parts or places as they may designate in such Order or Orders, of sheep, cattle, horses, swine or other animals, or of meat, skins, hides, horns, hoofs, or other parts of any animals, or of hay, straw, fodder, or other articles likely to propagate infection, and to make any other Orders or Regulations for the purpose of giving effect to the provisions of the said Act, and again to revoke, alter, or vary any such Orders or Regulations; and that all provisions for any of the purposes aforesaid in any such Order or Orders contained shall have the like force and effect as if the same had been inserted in the said Act:

And whereas the said Act has been amended and explained by an Act passed in the 29th year of Her present Majesty's reign, intituled, "An Act to amend the Act of the 11th and 12th years of Her present Majesty, chapter 107, to prevent the spreading of Contagious or Infectious Disorders among Sheep, Cattle, and other Animals:"

And whereas a contagious or infectious disorder, generally designated as the "Cattle Plague," has lately appeared, and now prevails, amongst cattle in England and Wales:

And whereas divers Orders in pursuance of the said first-recited Act have been made by the Lords of the said Council in relation to the Cattle Plague, which were consolidated and amended by Orders bearing date the 24th day of March and 11th day of April 1866:

And whereas certain exceptions are made in such Orders respectively, in regard to cattle brought from Ireland into England or Scotland, and it is now advisable that such exceptions should be rescinded and annulled, in respect of the district hereinafter mentioned.

Now, therefore, the Lords of the Council do hereby rescind and annul, from the 15th day of June instant, so much of the said Orders, whether contained in the articles or in the schedules, as authorizes the acceptance of a certificate from a local authority in respect of cattle landed from Ireland in place of the declaration and certificates, or other evidence or testimony required in respect of cattle brought into or removed from any other place in England or Scotland, in every case where such cattle shall have been moved out of any part of the province of Ulster during a period of 21 days next preceding their being landed in England or Scotland respectively.

And the said Lords do order that any such cattle which may be moved out of the province of Ulster may be landed from Ireland at any place in England and Scotland respectively, and be removed from that place subject to such provisions and conditions as apply to other cattle removed from that place, if the person bringing such cattle from Ireland or seeking to move them produce to the local authority or its appointed officer at such place, a license purporting to be signed by a justice of the peace in Ireland, and dated six days before the landing of such cattle, in the form and accompanied with the certificate and declaration also in the forms following; and if any person shall move any cattle landed from Ireland in England or Scotland, in contravention of this Order, he shall be guilty of an offence, and be liable to the penalty imposed by such Orders respectively.

This Order shall be construed in like manner as the said Orders of the 24th day of March and the 11th day of April, and all the provisions of such last-mentioned Orders now in force shall apply to this Order, except so far as they may be inconsistent with anything herein contained.

(No. 83—1866.)

Custom House, London,
29 June 1866.

Sir,

Herewith you will receive copies of two Orders of Her Majesty in Council, dated the 27th instant:

1st. Authorising cattle, the produce of the provinces of Friesland and Groningen, within the dominions of His Majesty the King of the Netherlands, to be imported into Great Britain from the ports of Harlingen and Delfzyl.

2nd. Prohibiting the importation from the dominions of His Majesty the King of the Netherlands, of any horns, hoofs, raw or wet hides or skins of cattle, other than the produce of the provinces of Friesland and Groningen.

And I am desired by the Board to instruct you, and the several officers under your superintendence, to take care that the directions contained in the above-mentioned Orders be strictly enforced.

I am, &c.,

Copy of Order in Council referred to.

At the Court at Windsor, the 27th day of June 1866.

PRESENT,

The Queen's Most Excellent Majesty in Council.

Whereas Her Majesty, by and with the advice of Her Privy Council, by an Order reciting that, whereas it had been represented to Her Majesty, that certain contagious or infectious disorders were then prevalent among cattle in the dominions and territories situated in Europe, belonging to His Majesty the King of the Netherlands, and that there was danger of the said disorders being introduced into this country by means of cattle from such countries or places, did order, that on and after the 28th day of March then instant, no cattle should be imported or introduced into the United Kingdom, which should come from or should have been at any place within the aforesaid territories and dominions, situate in Europe, belonging to His Majesty the King of the Netherlands; and also that on and after the said 28th day of March then instant, no cattle should be imported or introduced into the United Kingdom which should be, or should have been, on board any vessels at the same time with any cattle which should have come from, or should have been within, the aforesaid territories and dominions.

And Her Majesty, by and with the advice of Her Privy Council, did thereby further order that, in the event of any cattle being landed in any portion of the United Kingdom, contrary to the provisions of that Order, all such cattle, the importation or introduction whereof was thereby prohibited as aforesaid, should, upon their arrival in this country, be destroyed or otherwise disposed of, as the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Customs might direct; and that that Order should continue in force until revoked by any further Order; and that the word "cattle" should include sheep as well as bulls, cows, oxen, heifers, and calves.

And whereas it is advisable that this Order should be revoked to the extent hereinafter set forth.

Now, therefore, Her Majesty, by and with the advice of Her Privy Council, doth hereby revoke so much of the said Order as would apply to cattle the produce of the provinces of Friesland and Groningen, parts of the said dominions belonging to His said Majesty the King of the Netherlands, and doth hereby authorize any such cattle to be imported into any port or place in Great Britain, from the ports of Harlingen, in the province of Friesland, and Delfzyl, in the province of Groningen, only, subject nevertheless to all the regulations heretofore or hereafter to be made by the Lords of the said Council, or by any local authority under the Order of such Lords, applicable to the importation of foreign cattle or sheep into any port or place in Great Britain.

This Order shall be construed as the said recited Order of the 24th day of March last, and shall continue in force until revoked.

And the Right Honourable the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury are to give the necessary directions herein accordingly.

At the Court at Windsor, the 27th day of June 1866.

PRESENT,

The Queen's Most Excellent Majesty in Council.

Whereas Her Majesty, at the Court held at Buckingham Palace, the 24th day of March last, by and with the advice of Her Privy Council, by an Order reciting that whereas it had been represented to Her Majesty that certain contagious or infectious disorders were then prevalent among cattle in the dominions and territories situated in Europe belonging to His Majesty the King of the Netherlands, and that there was danger of the said disorders being introduced into this country by means of cattle from such countries or places, did order that, on and after the 28th day of March then instant, no cattle should be imported or introduced into the United Kingdom which should come from or should have been at any place within the aforesaid territories and dominions situate in Europe, belonging to His Majesty the King of the Netherlands; and also that, on and after the said 28th day of March then instant, no cattle should be imported or introduced into the United Kingdom which should be or should have been on board any vessels at the same time with any cattle which should have come from or should have been within the aforesaid territories and dominions:

And whereas by an Order, bearing even date herewith, Her Majesty, by and with the advice of Her Privy Council, hath revoked so much of the said Order as would apply to cattle the produce of the provinces of Friesland and Groningen, parts of the said dominions belonging to His said Majesty the King of the Netherlands, and authorized any such cattle to be imported into any port or place in Great Britain from the ports of Harlingen, in the province of Friesland, and Delfzyl, in the province of Groningen, only, subject nevertheless to all the regulations heretofore or hereafter to be made by the Lords of the said Council, or by any local authority under the Order of such Lords, applicable to the importation of foreign cattle or sheep into any port or place in Great Britain:

And whereas it has been represented to Her Majesty that it is advisable that certain provisions should be made with reference to the horns, hoofs, and raw or wet hides and skins of cattle to be imported from the dominions and territories aforesaid into the United Kingdom:

Now, therefore, Her Majesty, by and with the advice of Her Privy Council, doth order, and it is hereby ordered, that on and after the first day of July 1866, no horn, hoof, raw or wet hide or skin of any such cattle as aforesaid shall be imported or introduced into the United Kingdom which shall come from, or shall have been at, any place within the aforesaid territories and dominions, situate in Europe, belonging to His Majesty the King of the Netherlands, other than the said provinces of Friesland and Groningen; and also that on and after the said 1st day of July 1866, no horn, hoof, raw or wet hide or skin of any such cattle shall be imported or introduced into the United Kingdom which shall be, or shall have been, on board any vessels at the same time with any cattle which shall have come from, or shall have been within, the aforesaid territories and dominions, other than the said provinces of Friesland and Groningen.

And Her Majesty, by and with the advice of Her Privy Council, doth hereby further order that, in the event of the horn, hoof, raw or wet hide or skin of any cattle being landed in any portion of the United Kingdom, contrary to the provisions of this Order, such horn, hoof, raw or wet hide or skin, the importation or introduction whereof is so hereby prohibited as aforesaid, shall, upon arrival in this country, be destroyed or otherwise disposed of, as the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Customs may direct.

This Order shall continue in force until revoked by any further Order.

The word "cattle" shall include sheep as well as bulls, cows, oxen, heifers, and calves.

And the Right Honourable the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury are to give the necessary directions herein accordingly.

LETTER from Mr. Seymour Clarke to Mr. H. Waddington. App. No. 12.

The Great Northern Railway,
General Manager's Office, King's Cross Station,
London, 11 December 1865.

Sir,

In reply to your letter of the 25th ult., enclosing copy of a letter received by the Under Secretary of State from the City Solicitor, dated 22d November 1865, relative to the carriage of cattle between Scotland and London, I have to state that the average time occupied by cattle, whether carried by ordinary trains or special trains, from Aberdeen to London, a distance of 554 miles, is 36 hours (about 16 miles per hour); but, of course, in a long journey like this, a cattle train is subject to occasional delays and detentions for the passing of other trains, &c.

Cattle, when once placed in the trucks, are not fed or watered until their arrival at their destination, for several reasons:—

First. That the cattle are unaccompanied (in most instances) by persons in charge of them, and therefore the feeding and watering would devolve upon the servants of the several railway companies.

Secondly. That no payment is made for the provender that would have to be given to them.

Thirdly. Because cattle will not feed or drink while in the trucks, and they would have to be unloaded, involving considerable delay, considerable expense, and the probability of mismatching cattle, they being unknown, except by the number of the trucks, to the railway servants; and if once the beasts in any two or more trucks were to get mixed, it would be impossible for them to be re-divided without the almost certainty of error; and any error would involve a loss, as the parties who got better beasts than those intended for them would make no allowance, and the parties getting less valuable animals would be sure to claim on the Railway Company.

Fourthly. There is at present no place throughout the journey where the operation of feeding and watering can be performed.

I readily, Sir, admit that the case is one that wants a remedy, but the remedy does not rest, as I hope you will see from this communication, in the hands of the Railway Companies. There would be no great difficulty, if the senders of the cattle were willing to pay something to remunerate the Companies for finding a place for unloading the beasts, and keeping the contents of the several trucks separate from each other, for finding service and provender; and if the senders were content that the journey should occupy several more hours than is now the case, and which would of course cost the Companies somewhat more for engine power, which would have to be paid by the sender. Further, there must be concurrence on the part of all the senders of cattle, as if the plan were adopted for any, it must be for all.

I am, &c.
Seymour Clarke,
General Manager.

H. Waddington, Esq., Office of Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whitehall.

[N.B.—In this Index the Figures following the Names of the Witnesses refer to the Questions in the Evidence; those following App. to the Pages in the Appendix; and the Numerals following Rep. to the Pages in the Report.]

A.

ABATTOIRS. See Slaughterhouses.

Aberdeen. Use by witness, who is a butcher at Aberdeen, of the Corporation slaughter-house, there being also six private slaughterhouses, Stewart 5848-5851——Difference of about 2 d. per pound between the retail price of meat in Aberdeen, and the wholesale price of the bullock, ib. 5852, 5853——Much more cattle available for killing in Aberdeenshire in the winter and spring than in the summer, Hutcheson 6241-6244; Butler 6327, 6328. 6332, 6333——Discontinuance of the import of foreign cattle to Aberdeen, Butler 6365-6371——Large trade of Aberdeen in preserved meats, ib. 6372-6376.

See also Army Contracts. Dead Meat, 2. 9.

Aldershot. Practice as to the slaughtering and conveyance of the animals supplied by witness to Aldershot under contract; inconvenience and loss from the prohibition upon sending the live animals to the camp, and having it slaughtered there, Baker 4366-4390. 4464, 4465——Liability of the meat supplied daily at Aldershot becoming bad when the atmosphere is in a certain state, ib. 4477-4482.

Aldgate Market. Particulars as to the quantity of diseased and putrid meat in the market in each of the years 1861-65, App. 320.

Antwerp. Prohibition some six months ago of the importation of cattle from Antwerp, Moseley 357——Since the prohibition upon German and Dutch cattle passing through Belgium, only sheep and pigs are now sent from Antwerp to Harwich, Huger 1295-1301 Export of 400 German beasts weekly from Antwerp to Harwich, previously to the present restrictions; prospect of the trade increasing when the restrictions are removed, ib. 1303. 1314-1321.

Arrangements as to inspection at Antwerp; effectual check upon the shipment of diseased animals, Huger 1304-1313. 1342-1348——The steamers began to run from Antwerp to Harwich in August 1864, ib. 1314——Accommodation of the cattle in lairs before shipment, ib. 1323.

Doubt whether the trade from Antwerp would be affected by a requirement that the animals must be killed at the port of arrival in England; that is, unless it be required that they must be killed immediately, Huger 1324-1333——Very good arrangements in the vessels from Antwerp, so that the cattle do not suffer, ib. 1334——Few cattle which used to be shipped from Antwerp to London, ib. 1361, 1362.

Army Contracts. Excellent meat obtained from Aberdeen in large quantities under contract for the army, Torr 7147, 7148.

Aungier, Mark. (Analysis of his Evidence)—Is largely engaged as cattle salesman at Liverpool, 2880-2882——Improved accommodation lately in the Irish cattle ships, further improvements being, however, still required, 2883-2892. 2924-2946——Better conveyance of the animals if the vessels were broader in the beam, and were built less for speed, 2886-2890——Bruised and injured state of the Irish cattle occasionally, 2886. 2891-2895——Better condition in which cattle arrive at Liverpool from Spain than from Ireland, 2896-2902——Very little dead meat traffic between Ireland and Liverpool, 2903-2906.

Very prejudicial effect on the restriction upon the removal of live cattle to any distance from Liverpool; application about to be made to Government on the subject, 2908. 2913-2923——Privilege recently granted to Manchester in regard to the removal of live cattle to towns within a certain distance, 2909-2912——Very bad ventilation and very crowded crowded state, formerly, of the vessels conveying cattle between Ireland and England, some of the steamers still carrying an unduly large number of cattle, 2924–2943.

Protection now afforded on the decks of the vessels from Ireland, so that the cattle arrive in better condition, 2944–2946——Tendency to disease through exposure on deck, 2947–2949——Cleansing of the vessels after the discharge of each cargo, 2953, 2954——Way in which cattle with the lung disease, or the foot and mouth disease, are dealt with, 2956–2963——Increased accommodation required for the cattle before they are sent into the market, 2964–2966——Doubt as to any advantage in separating the market for foreign and English beasts, 2967–2970——Good class and good condition of the cattle from the eastern ports of Ireland, 2972–2976——Large majority of the cattle in the Liverpool market which come from Ireland, 2978–2981.

Austria. Practice in Austria of sending the lean cattle to be fattened at beet root sugar manufactories in Bohemia and Moravia, Hirschler 4130–4137. 4141——Export of the Austrian cattle to England by way of Bremen; particulars hereon as to the route taken, the time occupied, and the arrangements for feeding and watering the animals at Eisenbach and at Bremen, ib. 4131. 4142–4161. 4168–4177. 4242–4244——Information as to the quality and size of the cattle from Hungary and Austria, and the prices obtained for them in the London market, ib. 4136–4140, 4181–4183. 4252–4254.

Very strict regulations in Austria and on the German frontier for the prevention of the cattle plague, Hirschler 4151–4154. 4202–4215. 4239–4241——Total of about 5*l.* per head as the expense per head from Vienna to London, ib. 4165–4167——Loss of about one per cent of the animals from Vienna, ib. 4168–4170. 4180——Very little foot and mouth disease or lung disease in Austria or Hungary, ib. 4184. 4200, 4201——Various parts of the country whence the cattle are brought and exported to England, ib. 4185–4199. 4245–4251.

Impression that there has been no rinderpest in Austria for the last three years, Hirschler 4202. 4229–4233——Prohibition upon imports to England from Holland, so that cattle from Vienna are not now sent through Holland, but only through the Zollverein, ib. 4234–4239.

Extract from Report of Dr. Letheby as to the regulations in force in Austria for the inspection of cattle and dead meat, App. 316.

B.

Baker, Benjamin Bloomfield. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Meat contractor; supplies victualling yards, the army and navy at different places, and several public institutions, 4255–4263——Purchase by witness chiefly of foreign cattle in the shape both of dead meat and live stock, 4264–4278. 4418——Average of about 60 beasts killed weekly by witness, mostly at the same slaughterhouse, 4266–4268.

Convenience of the present slaughterhouses in the metropolis, 4279. 4286–4289. 4414. 4499–4501——Evidence strongly opposed to public slaughterhouses at the Metropolitan Market, which it should be imperative upon contractors and butchers to use exclusively, 4280–4300. 4409–4415. 4472–4477. 4483–4490. 4502–4522. 4538–4558.

Considerable difficulty now experienced from the crowded traffic at Newgate Market, 4301–4305——Instances of mutton killed in Northamptonshire and Yorkshire being tainted when for sale in the London market, more especially in hot weather, 4306–4325——Importance of slaughtering the animals when not excited or feverish, and of letting the meat become properly set before removing it by railway or otherwise, 4326–4334——Increased price of foreign cattle when the transit of live cattle by railway was prevented in February, 4335–4340.

Inconvenience and expense by having separate market for foreign cattle, with slaughterhouses attached, near the river side; injury both to the foreign trade and to the buyer, 4341–4368. 4483–4497——Practice as to the slaughtering and conveyance of the animals supplied by witness to Aldershot under contract; inconvenience and loss through the prohibition upon sending the live animal to the camp and having it slaughtered there, 4366–4390. 4464, 4465——Way in which the offal, hides, &c., of animals slaughtered by witness are now disposed of as compared with the facilities of disposal if there were a public slaughterhouse in a less populous locality, 4394–4408.

Lower price of the foreign meat than of the English meat by about a halfpenny or three farthings a pound, 4416–4421——Decreased supply lately of foreign stock owing to the uncertainty of these being passed on landing, 4422–4424——Witness has not been able to trace the foot and mouth disease in dead meat, and has not lately rejected any animals on account of it, 4425–4429——Recent signature by witness of a memorial to Government for permission to remove live cattle from the Metropolitan Market by railway, 4430–4438.

Difficulty of London contractors supplying the Victualling-yard at Plymouth with dead meat through the restrictions upon railway transit; obstacle to sending the beasts coastwise, 4432. 4439-4446. 4451-4455. 4523-4530——Slaughter by witness at Deptford of all the beasts supplied by him under contract to the Victualling-yard there, 4456-4461——Very little disease found by witness in any foreign cattle, 4466-4471——Liability of the meat supplied daily to Aldershot becoming bad when the atmosphere is in a certain state, 4477-4482.

Importance of a central market for live cattle, whilst centralisation of slaughterhouses is very objectionable, 4489, 4490——Decreased supply of foreign cattle if it were compulsory to slaughter them near the port of landing, 4491-4498——System and number of abattoirs in Paris adverted to; much smaller consumption of meat than in London, 4510-4518. 4550-4553——Supply of the troops at Woolwich with cattle killed in the Government slaughterhouses, 4532-4537——Necessity of public slaughterhouses at several points of the metropolis, or of very extensive accommodation at the Cattle Market, in the event of the private slaughterhouses being abolished, 4538-4558.

Bannister, John. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Retail butcher in the City; purchases entirely in the dead meat markets, 5209-5214——Enhanced prices caused by the prohibition upon the movement of live stock, 5215-5222——Excellent condition of the country-killed meat sold by witness, except in the summer months, when it is not practicable to bring it from a distance, 5223-5227. 5230-5237. 5248, 5249——Effect upon prices when the supply of country-killed meat is stopped, 5227-5229——Suggestions as to the improvements required in the system of ascertaining the prices for quotation in the public newspapers, 5238-5247. 5261. 5296-5302.

Grounds for objecting to its being compulsory to slaughter in public slaughterhouses; inconvenience and injury to the butchers generally who now have private slaughterhouses, 5250-5255. 5268-5295. 5306——Great improvement in the beasts being imported from France; fine condition of some of these, and high prices fetched by them, 5256-5260. 5308-5318——Convenience of a large dead meat market to witness, 5264.

Conclusion as to the discontinuance of the supply from Scotland being owing to the state of the weather, 5265-5267——Satisfactory operation of the large slaughterhouses used by carcase butchers; large quantity of meat supplied thus to retail butchers, 5271-5286——Inspection now applied to slaughterhouses which are for the most part kept clean and wholesome, 5276, 5277. 5303-5307.

Bavaria. Regulations in force in Bavaria as to the inspection of cattle and dead meat, App. 316.——See also Austria.

Belgium. Prohibition now in force in Belgium, as well as in Holland, in regard to the transit of German cattle, Peters 1269-1272——Expected removal shortly of the prohibition upon the transit of German cattle through Belgium, Huger 1301. 1359.

Berlin. Regulations in force in Berlin as to the inspection of cattle and dead meat, App. 316, 317.

Betts, Thomas. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Butcher at Maidstone, 6077——Statement as to the supplies of cattle in Kent being almost exhausted, so that unless the restrictions upon the transit of live stock are removed, great difficulty will be experienced by the butcher, 6078-6119——Impracticability of any satisfactory supply of dead meat to Maidstone and other towns from London, more especially in hot weather, 6081. 6120-6140——Limited advance in prices at Maidstone notwithstanding the short supply, 6084-6110.

Very little cattle grazing in Kent, there being hardly any beasts now in the county, 6101. 6112. 6145——Trifling amount of cattle plague in the county though largely dependent upon the metropolitan market for its supply, 6141-6145——Expediency of the butchers in Kent being allowed to bring live cattle from London or elsewhere, and to slaughter them at home, 6142——Belief as to the limited spread of the cattle plague in Sussex, 6146-6148.

[Second Examination].—Consideration of a statement showing that Kent is not peculiarly badly off in the supply of beasts and milch cows, 6200-6210——Admission as to the large supply of sheep in the county, 6211-6213.

Bohemia. With the cattle coming from Bohemia a certificate or passport is given; explanation hereon, Hicks 4084, 4085. 5319.

Form of cattle pass in Bohemia certifying as to the health of the cattle removed from any locality, App. 324.

See also Austria.

Bonser, William James. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Salesmaster in Newgate Market, 7667——Consignment of dead meat to witness's firm from all parts of England and from abroad as well as from Scotland; great increase in the trade, 7669-7673——Increasing consignment of dead meat from Holland; good condition in which it generally arrives except in very hot weather, 7673-7683——Great inconvenience and loss to the trade if all fat cattle from abroad were obliged to be slaughtered close to the place of debarkation, 7684-7688. 7712-7719——Injury and expense if it were compulsory to use public instead of private slaughterhouses, 7688. 7706-7726.

Various directions to which cattle are now driven from slaughter in addition to their being driven to the Metropolitan Cattle Market, 7689-7692——Frequent instances of live stock being consigned direct to witness; practice as to the disposal and slaughter of these without their going through the market, 7693-7705——Injurious effect upon the foreign trade if it were necessary to incur the increased expense of public slaughter-houses, 7714, 7715.

Difficulty in distinguishing between the carcase butcher and the retail butcher in regard to the retention of private slaughterhouses, 7723-7726——Excellent quality of some of the foreign meat, 7727-7729——Witness pays ready money for all consignments, the business being entirely one of commission, 7730-7732——Diminished consignments from Aberdeen in summer, owing partly to the weather, 7733-7737——Risk of Scotch meat being spoiled if opened and repacked on arrival in London for transmission to Aldershot, &c., 7738-7741.

Very careful manner in which the Scotch meat is packed in cloths, 7742-7744——Disadvantages of the system of packing in the meat vans from Exeter, &c., 7743——Arrangements as to the packing and care of the meat on board the vessels from abroad, 7745-7747——Great inconvenience from the crowded state of Newgate Market, 7748, 7749.

Bradbury, William. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Butcher at Oldham, 956——Very serious inconvenience at Oldham during the restriction upon the movement of cattle by railway, and through the necessity of obtaining supplies from the Liverpool Dead Meat Market, 957 et seq.——Question considered as to the price of meat in Oldham having been affected by the prohibition of railway movement, and the necessity of going to Liverpool and Manchester for dead meat, 966-1003. 1060, 1061——Restriction still in force upon the movement of foreign cattle from markets, 975-983. 991, 992——Recent opening of a live meat market at Oldham for cattle from various parts of England and Scotland, 984-994. 1030-1033.

Sufficiency of the supply at Oldham when the meat was all procured from Liverpool and Manchester, 995, 996. 1003——Bad condition of the meat on arrival at Oldham from Liverpool, the arrangements however having been very imperfect at the latter place, 1004-1012——Belief that Oldham and other towns in the manufacturing districts could never be satisfactorily supplied from a dead meat market in Liverpool; decided dissent hereon from the evidence of Dr. French, 1013-1026. 1042-1053——Continuance of the increased price of meat adverted to with reference to the effect of the cattle plague, and of the Government regulations, 1034-1041.

General feeling of the butchers in Oldham, Macclesfield, &c., that it is most undesirable that those towns should continue to be supplied from dead meat markets, 1042-1053——Better condition in which Spanish cattle arrive than Irish cattle, 1054-1056——Preference given to Scotch beasts over Irish or English ones, 1057-1059——Sources of supply of the butchers in Oldham at the present time, 1062-1067.

Bradford. Establishment of a cattle market at Bradford since the restrictions upon transit of foreign cattle, Swales 5590-5592.

Bremen. Particulars as to the crowded state of the vessels from Bremen to Hull, and as to the frequent injury to the animals from this cause and from being knocked about in stormy weather, Coulson 2077-2093. 2141-2162——Rate of freight from Bremen to Hull, Malcolm 2335——Unsatisfactory accommodation afforded in the Bremen boats, Lockwood 2417-2420.

Very crowded and dirty state formerly of the Bremen boats, the ventilation also having been very bad, and the animals greatly neglected; improvement since last year, Valentine 2603-2608——Overcrowding and ill-usage of fat cattle as well as store cattle in the boats from Bremen to Hull, ib. 2624-2630. 2668.

Character of the vessels in which the cattle are conveyed from Bremen to London; time occupied in the passage, Hirschler 4161-4164——Careful inspection at Bremen in order to prevent the shipment of animals with the foot and mouth disease, ib. 4178, 4179. 4184.

Bristol. Arrangements made in January last for conveying carcases from the country to Bristol over the Bristol and Exeter Railway; successful operation thereof, though opposed by the butchers, Wall 2682-2693. 2719-2721——Reduced price of meat in Bristol through through the system of bringing in carcases by railway for sale at public stores, Wall 2690–2693. 2720, 2721.

There is no importation of foreign cattle at Bristol, Hennessy 8064. 8115, 8116——Good condition in which the cattle arrive from Cork and other Irish ports, ib. 8067–8069—Suffering of the cattle through delay in landing; suggestions hereon, ib. 8070, 8071. 8113——Modes of disposal at Bristol of the Irish fat and store cattle respectively; effect hereon of the restrictions upon removal of live stock from the market, ib. 8077–8097. 8117, 8118——System of inspection of cattle from Ireland, ib. 8119–8122.

Bristol and Exeter Railway. See Bristol. Dead Meat, 4.

Brown's Wharf, Poplar. Details relative to the landing of the cattle at Brown's Wharf from the vessels of the General Steam Navigation Company; accommodation for this purpose, Pratt 3054–3058. 3169–3181. 3265, 3266——Objection to the landing of cattle at Brown's Wharf, Rudkin 6692. 6737–6739.

Brussels. Regulations in force in regard to the sale of dead meat, the system of slaughtering, &c., App. 317, 318.

Buenos Ayres. Very inferior condition of a few cattle sent to Liverpool from Buenos Ayres, Cullen 579–581.

Butchers. Considerable inconvenience and expense caused to butchers living a short distance from town, by the recent Orders in Council as to transit of live stock, Ratcliffe 3639–3642——Very injurious effect upon butchers by the temporary restrictions upon the transit of cattle, Giblett 4584–4587. 4622, 4623——Object of the Butchers' Trade Protection Society, of which witness is a member, Pickworth 4955, 4956.

See also Dead Meat. Foreign Cattle. Kent. Prices. Slaughter Houses, I.

Butler, Joseph. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has for many years been largely engaged in the dead-beef trade between Aberdeen and London, 6293–6297——Decrease in the trade since the cattle plague, there being no foreign cattle purchased by the farmers, 6297–6309——Practice of witness to send dead meat to London by railway daily throughout the year; extent of his losses in hot weather, 6304–6331——Less supply of cattle available in summer, 6327, 6328. 6332, 6333——Disposal by witness of the offal in Aberdeen; particulars hereon, 6336–6342. 6377–6399——The fore quarters are generally disposed of in Aberdeen, 6346, 6347.

Long period for which dead meat has been sent from Aberdeen to London; constant use by witness of the steamers as well as the railway, 6348–6351——Quick passage made by one of the steamers, the freight being cheaper than by railway, 6352. 6358–6360——Arrangement as to the packing of the meat in the railway trucks, the animals being generally killed the day before, 6353–6357——Discontinuance of the import of foreign cattle to Aberdeen, 6365–6371——Large trade of Aberdeen in preserved meats, 6372–6376.

C.

Carcase Butchers. Slaughter by witness of from 80 to 100 oxen weekly at his premises in Aldgate High-street, the carcases being mostly sold on the premises to the East-end retail butchers, Woodley 4864–4871. 4912–4914. 4934–4936——Satisfactory operation of the large slaughter houses used by carcase men; large quantity of meat supplied thus to retail butchers, Bannister 5271–5286——The carcase butcher slaughters for the purpose of selling to retail butchers, Rudkin 6615–6617.

See also Slaughter Houses, I. 6.

Cattle Plague:

Contemplated slaughtering of the whole cargo of cattle, including store cattle, if only one of them had the plague on arrival from abroad, Daniels 189, 190. 204–208; Read 1645——Particulars relative to the introduction of the plague into Cheshire and Lancashire by means of store cattle from Germany, Hall 861, 862. 864–889——Difficulty in detecting rinderpest when lying dormant in the system, Ellis 1403, 1404——Belief as to rinderpest having been decidedly imported, Read 1582. 1640.

There is no proof of the rinderpest having come from abroad; witness is confident it was not brought by the cargo from Revel imported by him, Hönck 1783–1785. 2031–2033——Belief that the cattle plague has never been introduced by any cattle consigned to witness at Hull; he has never seen any case of rinderpest, Coulson 2074, 2075. 2274–2281.

There has never been a case of rinderpest imported at Hull, Lockwood 2442–2444——Doubt as to the origin of the rinderpest; opinion that it broke out in the London cow sheds, ib. 2543–2549——Belief that the plague never came from abroad, ib. 2547.

Very strict regulations of foreign Governments for preventing cattle plague, Robinson 3330, 3331. 3338. 3354——Belief that the plague originated in this country, and was not brought from Holland, ib. 3354.

When any animal, on arrival in the port of London, has the cattle plague the whole of the cargo is slaughtered; instance of this in September last, Simmonds 3424. 3430-3434——Opinion that rinderpest was not introduced into this country by live cattle from abroad, ib. 3472-3475. 3556-3572——Belief that rinderpest is a foreign disease, Holmans 3608, 3609.

Grounds for concluding that the rinderpest did not come to this country from abroad, Hicks 4071-4086. 4090-4102——Period of incubation of the cattle plague adverted to in support of the conclusion that the plague was not introduced from Hungary or Bohemia, ib. 4071-4085——Great difficulty in accounting for the rinderpest, and its appearance in Austria or Hungary, Hirschler 4203-4215.

Liability to the introduction of steppe-murrain or rinderpest unless further precautions are adopted in this country, Simon 5073-5083——Suppression of the former cattle plague in England by a very active system of "stamping" it out, ib. 5092-5094.

Opinion that danger from cattle arises more from English than foreign cattle, Rudkin 6704-6707——Belief as to the cattle plague being owing to the import of foreign animals, Hudson 7432——Tendency of rinderpest to diminish the prevalence of other diseases, Druce 7535, 7536——Witness has never seen any case of rinderpest in foreign cattle at Newcastle, Stephens 8380-8382——Instances of foreign cattle having the rinderpest on being landed in London, Hunt 8481, 8482.

Conclusion of Mr. Gebhardt as to the rinderpest not being introduced from abroad, App. 329.

Orders in Council between June 1864 and June 1866 relative to the importation and treatment of cattle suffering from rinderpest, App. 339-384.

Recommendation by the Committee that the wilful exposure for sale, or conveyance by boat or rail, of any animal suffering from rinderpest be rendered an offence punishable in a summary manner, Rep. v.

Recommended prohibition upon import from countries where there is reason to believe the cattle plague is existing, Rep. vi.

Conclusion as to rinderpest being the only disease for which quarantine appears to be at all reasonable, Rep. vii.

Cheshire. Statement as to the cattle plague having been brought into Cheshire and Lancashire by foreign store cattle, sent in the first instance from Germany to Edinburgh and thence to Liverpool; particulars hereon, Hall 861, 862. 864-889.

Witness, who is a grazier in Cheshire, procures his store cattle from Scotland, Fair 7540——The plague was not propagated in Cheshire by the railway transit of beasts, ib. 7572. 7585, 7586——Statement as to there not being any trade in store stock at the present time, ib. 7573-7578.

Clarke, Seymour. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—General manager of the Great Northern Railway; has complete charge of the cattle traffic, 1460-1462——Very large cattle traffic on the line previously to the cattle plague restrictions, 1463, 1464——Practice, previously to the cattle plague, of sweeping out the trucks and pens after each journey, 1465. 1468, 1469——More effectual cleaning and purification of the trucks since the Orders in Council; impracticability, however, of complying with the strict requirements of the recent Order on the subject, 1465-1469. 1480——Objection to covering the bottom of the trucks with asphalte, 1468. 1545, 1546.

Particulars as to the very expensive arrangements necessary in connection with the conveyance of dead meat by railway, 1470-1473——Very large quantity of dead meat brought to London by the Great Northern line, the quantity having increased since the restrictions on the transit of live stock, 1474-1479——Estimate of 200,000 tons a year as the total consumption of meat in London, 1478. 1555-1558——Partial extent to which the carriage of live cattle by railway has been resumed, the restrictions of the Privy Council being a great check, 1480, 1481——Difficulty anticipated in supplying the grazing districts with store cattle, 1481.

Conclusion as to its being feasible to supply London and other populous towns with dead meat by railway all the year round, 1482-1487——Circumstance of dead meat from Aberdeen having arrived in a better condition in London than the meat of live cattle from Aberdeen slaughtered on arrival in London, 1485-1490——Excited and feverish feverish state of the animals when conveyed by railway, in addition to which they are not fed or watered in the trucks; consequent deterioration when slaughtered in London, both as regards quality and weight, 1488–1501.

Explanation as to the obstacles to watering or feeding the cattle during the transit by railway between Scotland and London; impracticability of feeding and watering them whilst in the trucks, 1490–1497——Comparative statement of the cost of conveyance of live stock and dead meat from different stations on the Great Northern line to London, 1501–1503 ——Return of live stock carried over the line to London in the year ended June 1865; 1501——Considerable claims on the company in respect of detention or wrong delivery of dead meat, 1503. 1505, 1506. 1542–1544——Conveyance only of the sides of the animals, exclusive of the offal, 1504, 1505——Numerous consignments in the case of dead meat from Scotland; great trouble thereby, 1505. 1532–1534.

Defective arrangements in connection with the new dead meat market in Smithfield; want of a much larger area of siding accommodation, 1506–1514. 1559–1566——Statement in support of the conclusion that with one properly arranged central market the whole of London may be supplied with dead meat by railway, even in hot weather, 1515–1517. 1524–1531. 1548–1553——Great inconvenience through the crowded and narrow state of the streets leading to Newgate market, 1518–1520.

Obstacles to much reduction in the rates for conveying dead meat by railway 1521, 1 22——Belief that the best mode of carrying the carcases is by means of hampers; objection to hanging the meat or placing it on shelves, 1523, 1524. 1530, 1531——Large quantity of fish conveyed to London by the Great Northern line; inference that dead meat may be carried all the year round, 1524–1529——Way in which slaughter-houses might be established in country places if there were a general system of dead meat markets, 1536–1539——Great numbers of sheep carried on witness's line, 1552–1554 ——Contemplated continuance of the import of store cattle to London by railway, 1567–1569.

Coasting Trade. Limited cattle trade of the General Steam Navigation Company from Scotland and English ports to London, Pratt 3012–3017.

Condemned Meat. Extracts from report by Dr. Letheby in regard to the practice in former countries relative to the condemnation of unsound meat, App. 316–318.

Particulars in report of Dr. Letheby as to the large quantity of meat condemned in the City, and as to the necessity of increased restrictions in the matter, App. 319——Account of the meat, game, and poultry condemned in the City markets as unfit for human food during the several years 1861–65, ib. 321.

Consumption of Meat (Metropolis). Estimate of 200,000 tons a year as the total consumption of meat in London, Clarke 1478. 1555–1558——Varying consumption in London according to the season and the weather, Pickworth 4985–4990.

Contractors (Supply of Meat.) Witness supplies victualling yards, the army and navy at different places, and several public institutions with meat, Baker 4255–4263——Purchase by witness, as contractor, chiefly of foreign cattle, in the shape both of dead meat and live stock, ib. 4264–4278. 4418——Average of about sixty beasts killed weekly by witness, mostly at the same slaughter-house, ib. 4266–4268——Evidence strongly opposed to its being compulsory upon contractors to kill at public slaughter-houses, ib. 4280–4300. 4409–4415. 4472 et seq.

Coulson, Thomas. (Analysis of his Evidence).—Is a wholesale salesman in the foreign cattle trade at Hull, 2048, 2049——Considerable import of oxen and sheep to Hull from Hamburgh and other German ports; also from Holland until the recent prohibition, 2050–2055——Consignment of both fat stock and store cattle to witness, there being an increasing demand for the latter, 2056–2073 ——Good condition in which the cattle generally arrive, 2074——Belief that the cattle plague has never been introduced by any cattle consigned to witness, he has never seen any case of rinderpest, 2074, 2075. 2274–2281——Import of some cattle with the foot and mouth disease, these having been killed at once and sold to butchers, 2074. 2169–2180.

Particulars as to the crowded state of the vessels at times, more especially from Bremen, and as to the frequent injury to the animals from this cause and from being knocked about in stormy weather, 2077–2093. 2131–2162——Want of improved facilities for landing at Hull, 2094. 2152–2155——Practice in disposing of the cattle and sheep partly by selling them alive in different directions and partly by a dead meat trade with London, Manchester, and other towns, 2095–2124.

Impracticability, in hot weather, of supplying dead meat from Hull to Manchester, London, &c., 2105–2113. 2132–2140——Satisfactory inspection of foreign cattle at Hull, 2114, 2115. 2181–2184——Good condition in which the sheep from Hamburgh arrive, 2116, 2117. 2163–2166——Competent inspection of dead meat at Hull, 2125–

2128——Absence of disease in cattle consigned to witness from Gottenburg, 2129-2131——Injurious effect upon the foreign trade if all cattle were permanently required to be killed on arrival, 2136-2140. 2188-2192. 2196-2204.

Approval of a restriction upon the number of cattle to be carried in the vessels, 2147, 2148. 2156——Import of about 1,000 animals weekly, 2185-2187——Practice of railway transmission of dead meat from Hull to Manchester, 2205-2208——Course pursued by the inspector in the case of animals with the foot and mouth disease, 2209-2213. 2225-2231——Way in which witness disposes of the animals after landing before selling them to jobbers and others, 2214-2224.

Decided objection to a quarantine for either fat stock or lean stock; depreciation of the animals thereby, whilst the effect on the foreign trade would be very injurious, 2232-2253. 2266-2271——Depreciation in the price of animals at Hull since the restrictions upon railway transit; check thereby upon imports, 2254-2256. 2261-2265——The beasts are bought alive from witness, the carcases being removed into the interior by the buyers, 2257-2260.

Quarantine would be no security against the foot and mouth disease, though it would against the cattle plague, 2266. 2272, 2273——There has been no complaint of rinderpest through foreign animals purchased from witness, 2274-2278——Information relative to the cargo of Russian beasts from Revel, which came through witness's hands; he has not been able to trace any case of cattle plague to these animals, 2279-2285. 2289-2293.

Country-killed Meat (Supply of Towns). See Dead Meat.

Cows. Very good and healthy state in which the Dutch cows arrive at Hull, Lockwood 2459-2461——Statement as to three cows in a cargo from Rotterdam to London having been stopped a few months ago as having the cattle plague, the whole cargo having been slaughtered; doubt whether this was really a case of rinderpest at all, Pratt 3024-3031. 3255, 3256——Large import of Dutch cows to London, ib. 3251.

Inconvenience to the inspector when Dutch cows arrive in London too late for market, Robinson 3381, 3382——Objection made some time ago by witness to bringing milch cows from Holland, through fear of their getting the credit of introducing the cattle plague, ib. 3347-3353——Restrictions desirable in regard to the import of milch cows, Hicks 5348——Great liability to the spread of disease by the system in which cows are introduced from abroad to the London cowsheds, Rudkin 6656-6659——Approval of a very close inspection in the case of milch cows from Germany and Holland, Fair 7600.

Cullen, Hugh. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Cattle salesman at Liverpool; is largely interested in the Irish and foreign cattle trade, 493-495——Large consignments of cattle from Oporto to witness's firm; excellent quality of these, and very good condition in which they arrive, 496-509——Very large vessels in which cattle from Oporto are conveyed, every care being taken of the animals during the voyage, 500. 504-507——Arrangements as to the lairs and sheds used by witness's firm for the cattle on arrival until market day, 510-522.

Complaint as to the prejudicial operation of the recent requirement by which all foreign cattle sent to Stanley market in Liverpool must be slaughtered within four days, and the live animals cannot be sent to Manchester, &c., 522 et seq.——Great expense and great risk and injury to the meat by forwarding it in a dead state from Liverpool to Manchester by railway; grounds for this conclusion considered, 523-525. 538. 556-562. 567-572. 622-667——Effect of the present restrictions upon transit by railway in greatly decreasing the importation from Oporto, 526-529. 543. 544. 682-687.

Necessity of submitting to reduced prices if there is at any time a surplus supply of Oporto cattle in the Liverpool market, 530-542. 617-621——Reasons for sending all the cattle to Stanley market instead of forwarding them immediately on arrival to Manchester and other places, 547-553——Very inferior condition of a few cattle sent to Liverpool from Buenos Ayres, 579-581——Large numbers of lean stock which used to come from Ireland to Liverpool, these being at once forwarded to the feeding districts, 582-585——Supply of Irish fat cattle, through Liverpool, to Manchester, Leeds, &c., 586. 588.

Average of from 8 d. to 1 s. a day as the cost of keeping the cattle in Liverpool, 590, 591——High prices fetched by the animals from Oporto, 592, 593——Entire extinction of the Oporto trade if a quarantine were imposed, 594——Further statement as to the character character of the ships and of the accommodation on board in the case of the Oporto cattle, 595–610——Nature of the facilities for conveying Irish cattle to Liverpool; objection to the route viâ Holyhead, 612–616——Relative prices of Irish cattle and of foreign cattle at Liverpool, as affected by the existing restrictions upon transit by rail, 668–681.

Considerable number of fat cattle lately brought from Scotland to Liverpool, 688–691——Very large majority of the cattle sold in Liverpool which come from Ireland, 692——Dissent from the views of Mr. Cawkwell as to the facility of a large traffic in dead meat between Ireland and Liverpool, 693——Less satisfactory condition in which cattle arrive from the eastern ports of Ireland than from the western ports, 694, 695——Ample facilities at Liverpool for landing the cattle, 696——Details as to the boats used in the Irish trade, as to the accommodation on board, the care of the cattle, and their condition on arrival at Liverpool, 697 et seq.

Several towns in the neighbourhood of Manchester which are supplied thence with cattle or dead meat, 722–726——Advantage in the steamers having coverings on deck for the cattle, 730–733——Opinion that it is not necessary to license the vessels for a limited number of cattle, 734–736——Better condition in which the cattle arrive in summer than in winter, 737, 738——Summary of the facilities required by the cattle trade at Liverpool, 739, 740——Way in which sales were carried out at Liverpool and Manchester before the restrictions upon transit, 741–743.

Currie, James. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Steamship owner at Leith, 6857——Objection to a certain proposal that Danish cattle shall all come to the port of Granton; increase of cost if not allowed to be brought in the vessels to Leith, 6858 et seq.——Very little risk of infection on the route from Leith or Granton to Edinburgh, 6862–6869——Approval of every facility being given to the import of cattle from Denmark, there being no disease in that country, 6877–6885——Precautions necessary as regards the railway trucks, &c., if Danish cattle, as well as cattle from infected countries, are landed at Leith, 6886–6890.

Customs Department. The out-door department of the Customs acts under the Orders of the Privy Council as regards the importation of foreign cattle, Hunt 8388, 8389——Facility given by the Customs to the landing of cattle at any hour, their inspection however only taking place during daylight, ib. 8436–8440——Facility also to the landing of foreign dead meat, ib. 8441–8443.

Orders in Council from June 1864 to June 1866, as administered by the Customs Department, App. 339–384.

D.

Daniels, Patrick. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a merchant and shipping agent at Harwich; was for two years agent of the Great Eastern Railway Company as regards the cattle traffic from Holland to Harwich, 1–4——Very large cargoes of cattle in the boats of the Great Eastern Railway Company from Rotterdam to Harwich, 5–8——Discontinuance after a time of a market established at Harwich by witness and his partner, 9–12——Very good condition in which the cattle have generally arrived; comparatively few deaths on the passage from Holland, 13–15. 25.

Way in which the cattle are accommodated on board; check upon overcrowding, 16–48. 80–90——Arrangements as to the care of the animals in Holland before they are shipped; accommodation provided in large stables, it being also required that the animals be fed and watered when conveyed a certain distance by rail, 49–64——Practice as to the slaughtering of cattle at Harwich when they arrive in a disabled state, 65–69——Character of the Government inspection to which the cattle are subjected on landing, 70. 73–79——Practice to feed and water the animals before they are sent on to London by rail, 71, 72. 237.

Objection to limiting the number to be conveyed by the vessels, 82——Regulations as to cleaning the vessels after each voyage, as soon as the cargo is out, 91–97. 166——Large space available at Harwich if the cattle were quarantined, 98, 99——Opinion that in the case of store cattle quarantine should be enforced, 100–112——Greater suffering of the cattle when sent direct to London by sea than when landed at Harwich, 113——Suffering chiefly during the last three or four hours of the passage, the animals being then worn out by fatigue, 113. 234, 235.

Facility with which beasts and sheep might be slaughtered in large numbers at Harwich and sent to London as dead meat; advantages of such arrangement, 114–135. 140–144. 147–153. 186——Rates now paid for the conveyance of neat stock, and of sheep from Rotterdam and Antwerp to London viâ Harwich, 136–139——Doubt as to the import being diminished if it were necessary to slaughter the cattle at the port of arrival, 144. 149, 150——Obstacles to the animals being slaughtered in Holland and sent over as dead meat, 145, 146.

Opinion that sheep need not be required to undergo quarantine, disease in them being easily distinguished, 154, 155. 178–185——Considerations as to the detailed mode of applying quarantine to store cattle at Harwich, 156–193——Proposed slaughtering of fat stock, without quarantining them, 161, 162. 178, 179——Importance of the landing wharves, &c. for the cattle being disinfected; practice hereon at Harwich, 164, 165. 220, 221——Contemplated slaughtering of the whole cargo of cattle, including store cattle, if only one of them had the plague, 189, 190. 204–208——Sheep, if diseased on landing, should at once be slaughtered, 193, 194.

Explanation that the corporation of Harwich have no chartered markets for cattle or live meat, 195–200——Doubt as to the price of meat at Harwich having been affected by the restriction upon railway traffic in cattle, 201–203——Improbability of the importation being decreased through the proposed quarantine and the regulations as to slaughtering, 209–211——Inspection of both live cattle and dead meat on the other side of the channel before they are shipped, 214–219.

Better condition generally in which cattle arrive from Rotterdam than from Antwerp, 224–229—— Single instance of disease in a cargo from Rotterdam to Harwich, 229——Opinion as to its not being necessary to feed and water the animals on the voyage to Harwich, 233–235——Objection to its being required to sling the cattle on board; increased expense thereby, 236.

Danish Cattle. Import in witness's ships of fat cattle from Denmark to London, Robinson 3343–3346——Excellent and healthy condition in which the Danish cattle always arrive at Scotch ports, Swan 5371, 5372——Evidence strongly in favour of Danish cattle being exempted from the present restrictions, ib. 5379 et seq.——Very strict regulations in Denmark for preventing the cattle plague, ib. 5380. 5388.

Proposition that the Danish cattle and home cattle should come to Granton to be sold at a market there, and that facilities be given for their removal by the butchers under certain regulations, Swan 5385 et seq.——Good breed of the Danish sheep, ib. 5448. 5510——Satisfactory arrangements in the transport of cattle from Denmark, ib. 5503–5507——Prices fetched by the Danish cattle at Leith and Granton, ib. 5508.

Objection to all Danish cattle being imported to Granton exclusively, Currie 6858 et seq.——Approval of every facility being given to the export of cattle from Denmark, there being no disease in that country, ib. 6877–6885——Precautions necessary as regards the railway trucks, &c., if Danish cattle as well as cattle from infected countries are landed at Leith, ib. 6886–6890.

Disapproval by the Committee of quarantine being applied in the case of cattle from Denmark, that country being free from rinderpest, Rep. vii.

12. Conclusions of the Committee.

1. Generally as to the Quantity of Dead Meat now brought to London:

Considerable quantity of dead meat now brought to London by the railways and steamboats, Moseley 286–289—— Estimate that more than half the quantity of meat now consumed in London is brought in as dead meat, Clarke 1479——Great increase going on in the supply of dead meat to the metropolis, about one third of the total consumption being now provided in this form, Letheby 3836. 3854, 3855. 3895–3898——About 150,000 tons a year are now sold, ib. 3855. 3896——Doubt whether the supply of dead meat to London has materially increased of late, Rudkin 6760, 6761——Consignment of dead meat to witness's firm from all parts of England and from abroad, as well as from Scotland; great increase in the trade, Bonser 7669–7673.

2. As to the Supply from Scotland to London:

Circumstance of dead meat from Aberdeen having arrived in a better condition in London, than the meat of live cattle from Aberdeen slaughtered on arrival in London, Clarke 1485–1490——Conveyance only of the sides of the animals, exclusive of the offal, ib. 1504, 1505—— Numerous consignments in the case of dead meat from Scotland; great trouble thereby, ib. 1505. 1532–1534.

Large

2. As to the Supply from Scotland to London—continued.

Large dead meat trade formerly between Edinburgh and London by sea, Pratt 3112, 3113——Relative charge per ton for the conveyance of dead meat and of live stock from Edinburgh, Hamburgh, &c. to London, ib. 3115–3118. 3202–3206.

Statement as to witness being supplied chiefly with dead meat from Scotland, both in summer and winter; excellent condition in which this meat generally arives, a great advantage being that the animals are killed when cool and unexcited, Ratcliffe 3684–3706. 3751–3762. 3789–3797——Large quantity of dead meat from Scotland purchased by witness's firm, difficulty as to the supply in hot weather, Slater 5145–5165. 5188. 5195–5197——Conclusion as to the discontinuance of the supply from Scotland being owing to the state of the weather, Bannister 5265–5267.

Prime character of the meat sent from Aberdeen to London, Stewart 5727——Interval between the killing of the animal in Aberdeen and the sale of the meat in London, ib. 5728, 5729——Diminished trade in the summer months it being stopped in very hot weather, ib. 5730–5734. 5794–5798——Practice for many years to send meat from Aberdeen to London by steamboats, ib. 5747–5750——Expense of conveyance by boat and railway respectively; difference between the cost of conveyance of the dead meat and of the live animal, ib. 5751–5763. 5837.

Practice of the farmers as well as of the Aberdeen butchers to consign meat to the London market, Stewart 5764–5773——Very little mutton sent from Aberdeen to London, ib. 5774, 5775——Very few complaints of the condition of the meat on arrival, ib. 5799–5802——Similar quantity of meat forwarded whether as dead meat or as live cattle, ib. 5821–5825——Very little loss of meat through being spoilt on the journey, ib. 5844–5847.

Conveyance of the meat from Inverary to London by railway in about thirty-eight hours, Hutcheson 6222, 6223.——Practice of sending the meat throughout the year, though at a considerable risk when the weather is hot, ib. 6224–6230——Less supply of cattle available in summer, Hutcheson 6241–6244. Butler 6327, 6328. 6332, 6333——Limited number of live cattle now sent from Inverary to London, it being more profitable on the whole to send dead meat, Hutcheson 6245. 6271–6278——Use of the telegraph between the salesmen in London and witness in order to regulate the supply, ib. 6246–6248.

Practice of consigning to different salesmen when large quantities are sent, Hutcheson 6249–6251——Custom at Inverury in regard to the purchase of the animals from the farmers instead of at markets, ib. 6258–6269——As a rule the whole of the beast, except the offal, is sent to London, ib. 6270——Considerable trade in dead meat from places north of Inverury to London, ib. 6279–6285——Advantage to the farmers in selling the live animal to the butcher rather than in themselves slaughtering and sending the dead meat to London, ib. 6286–6292.

Decrease in the trade from Aberdeen to London since the cattle plague, there being no foreign cattle purchased by the farmers, Butler 6297–6309——Practice of witness to send dead meat to London by railway daily throughout the year; extent of his losses in hot weather, ib. 6304–6331——The forequarters are generally disposed of in Aberdeen, ib. 6346, 6347——Long period for which dead meat has been sent from Aberdeen to London; constant use by witness of the steamers as well as the railway, ib. 6348–6351——Quick passage made by one of the steamers, the freight being cheaper than by railway, ib. 6352. 6358–6360.

Large supply of mutton to London from the Edinburgh slaughter houses, Strangeways 6985–6987——Diminished consignments from Aberdeen in summer, owing partly to the weather, Bonser 7733–7737——Risk of Scotch meat being spoiled if opened and repacked on arrival in London, ib. 7738–7741.

3. As to the Supply from Hull to various Towns:

Impracticability in hot weather of supplying dead meat from Hull to Manchester, London, &c., Coulson 2105–2113. 2132–2140——Practice as to railway transmission of dead meat from Hull to Manchester, ib. 2205–2208——The beasts are bought alive from witness at Hull, the carcases being removed into the interior by the buyers, ib. 2257–2260.

Supply of large quantities of dead meat from Hull to Manchester and other towns; obstacle to these towns being thus served permanently in hot weather, Valentine 2591–2598. 2650–2663——Practice recently of witness to slaughter the animals at Hull, and to supply the dead meat thence to Wakefield, Huddersfield, and other towns, Dickenson 2790–2799——Considerable difficulty in the supply of dead meat by railway from Hull to the inland towns, more especially in hot weather; difficulty even if the railway facilities were rendered as complete as possible, ib. 2800 et seq.——Lower price, to the extent of 1 d. or 1½ d. per pound, of meat brought dead to Sheffield from Hull, than of meat killed in Sheffield, ib. 2856. 2863–2872.

3. As to the Supply from Hull to various Towns—continued.

Nature of the facilities by railway for the transmission of meat from Hull to Leeds, Bradford, Wakefield, and other towns; there would be no difficulty in conveying any quantity without the meat turning bad, O'Brien 6022–6047. 6056–6060—— Absence of complaint as to the condition of meat on arrival at Leeds, &c., there being some complaints, however, as to detention and loss of market, ib. 6048–6051. 6070, 6071—— Charges for conveying live cattle and dead meat respectively from Hull to Leeds, ib. 6052–6055—— Doubt as to the quantity of meat conveyed by railway to Leeds, Bradford, &c., ib. 6061–6069.

4. As to the Supply from the West of England:

Encouragement given to the carriage of dead meat on the Bristol and Exeter railway, in the belief that it will ultimately be more profitable to the company than the carriage of live cattle; particulars hereon as to the rates and cost in each case, Wall 2693–2697. 2777, 2778. 2784–2787——Statement as to dead meat having been carried all through last summer between Cornwall and London, and being still carried in large quantities, without any complaint of injury or loss; special trains used for the purpose, ib. 2698, 2699. 2724–2734. 2782, 2783——There have been no claims for compensation through injury to the meat, ib. 2703, 2704. 2718. 2775, 2776. 2779——About equal claims for loss of market in the case of live stock and of dead meat, ib. 2705.

Practice as to the slaughtering of the animals, and as to the loading of the carcases in the trucks, Wall 2706–2723. 2779–2781——Increasing construction of meat vans for the Bristol and Exeter Company, ib. 2718——The system does not cause any public complaint, ib. 2718. 2775, 2776——Advantage to cattle owners and graziers, but not to butchers, by the railway traffic in dead meat from the West of England to London, ib. 2735–2740.

Large quantity of dead meat traffic from the West to Bristol and to London, Wall 2741, 2742——Facility of meeting the demand in London, and of arranging the supply with reference thereto, ib. 2743–2748——Satisfactory operation of the system of dead meat traffic on the line further adverted to, ib. 2775–2787.

5. As to the Supply from Ireland:

Impracticability of supplying Liverpool with meat coming already killed from Ireland, &c., Trench 468–470——Dissent from the views of Mr. Cawkwell as to the facility of a large traffic in dead meat between Ireland and Liverpool, Cullen 693——Very little dead meat traffic between Ireland and Liverpool, Aungier 2903–2906——Trade in dead meat from Dublin to Glasgow, but not to Liverpool, Walsh 7833–7837——Difficulties in the way of a dead meat trade from Meath or from Dublin to England, more especially in the hot weather, Garnett 7984–7986——Willingness of the Dublin Steam Packet Company to encourage a dead meat traffic; way in which the meat might be packed on board, Watson 8046. 8055–8060.

6. As to the Foreign Supply:

Obstacles to the animals being slaughtered in Holland and sent over as dead meat, Daniels 145, 146——Objection to cattle being killed in Holland and conveyed all the way to London as dead meat, Moseley 319——Very little dead meat sent from Holland to Harwich since the prohibition in this country on the import of live stock, Peters 1217–1220. 1247. 1278, 1279——Question considered as to the cost of conveyance of dead meat from Germany, &c., to Hull; difficulty in the summer months, Malcolm 2382–2407.

Particulars as to the trade in dead meat from Hamburgh, Hull, &c., to London in the vessels of witness's company; good condition of the meat generally on arrival, Pratt 3079–3098, 3103–3108. 3111–3114. 3184–3194. 3198–3201—— Necessary discontinuance of the dead meat traffic in hot weather, ib. 3085–3090. 3184—— Instance of a quantity of meat having been thrown overboard during the passage from Hamburgh, the voyage having been much prolonged by bad weather, ib. 3104. 3198, 3199. 3210–3216.

Very little dead meat brought in witness's vessels from Holland, Robinson 3307—— Increasing consignment of dead meat from Holland; good condition in which it generally arrives, except in very hot weather, Bonser 7673–7683——Delay in the landing of foreign meat on account of the Custom House regulations, ib. 7712——Excellent quality of some of the foreign meat, ib. 7727–7729.

Facility given by the Customs to the landing of dead meat from abroad, Hunt 8441–8443.

7. Difficulties and Expense of Railway Conveyance:

Increased difficulties and expense of conveying the cattle to London in the form of dead meat, Moseley 270–283——Much greater expense in the conveyance of dead meat by rail than of the live animal, Hall 790–796——Consideration as to the means of improving improving the conveyance of meat by railway from Harwich to London; several difficulties to be encountered, Moseley 1140–1147.

Much greater expense in the carriage of dead meat than of live stock by railway, the meat moreover being liable to deterioration, Salmon 1071–1079. 1090, 1091——Larger claims for compensation against the London and North Western Railway Company in respect of detention of dead meat than of live stock, ib. 1080–1088.

Particulars as to the very expensive arrangements necessary in connection with the conveyance of dead meat by the Great Northern Railway, Clarke 1470–1473——Obstacles to much reduction in the rates for conveying dead meat by railway, ib. 1521, 1522.

Statement as to the unduly heavy charge for the carriage of dead meat between Norwich and London, Read 1613–1621——Great additional expense of the carriage of dead meat as compared with live meat, S. Higgins 5701——Economy feasible in the conveyance of dead meat by railway, Torr 7159–7161.

8. Advantage in the Animals being Killed in the Country:

Deterioration of the meat by sending the animals by rail, and by killing them when they come off the trucks, Hall 797–801. 899–904——Advantage in the slaughtering of the animal in the country when not over-driven or in a febrile state, as in the London slaughter-houses, Letheby 3856——Importance of slaughtering the animals when not excited or feverish, and of letting the meat become properly set before removing it by railway or otherwise, Baker 4326–4334. Bannister 5256, 5257. Stewart 5803–5813. Hutcheson 6249–6251. Torr 7173–7179——Witness prefers country killed meat though it does not look so well as town killed meat, Bannister 5224–5226. 5230–5232.

9. Modes of Packing the Meat for Conveyance by Railway and Steamer:

Belief that the best mode of carrying the carcases by railway is by means of hampers; objection to hanging the meat or placing it on shelves, Clarke 1523, 1524. 1530, 1531——Information relative to the arrangements on the Bristol and Exeter line for conveying the meat, it being sometimes hung in the vans, and sometimes placed in hampers, Wall 2698–2718——Way in which the dead meat is packed and arranged on board the vessels of the General Steam Navigation Company, Pratt 3080–3083. 3092. 3186–3190. 3210–3216.

Importance of careful packing when dead meat is sent by railway, as from Aberdeen, Ratcliffe 3760–3765——Way in which the Aberdeen meat is packed to go by railway, Stewart 5776–5787——The meat from Inverury is sent in sides and is packed in cloths, Hutcheson 6231, 6232.

Arrangement as to the packing of the Scoth meat in the railway trucks, the animals being generally killed the day before, Butler 6353–6357——Very careful manner in which the Scotch meat is packed in cloths, Bonser 7742–7744——Disadvantages of the system of packing in the meat vans from Exeter, &c., ib. 7743——Arrangements as to the packing and care of the meat on board the vessels from abroad, ib. 7745–7747.

10. Evidence favourable on the whole to the Supply of London and other large Towns by means mainly of Dead Meat:

Several disadvantages and sources of expense after the cattle are delivered alive in London, so that on the whole it would be a great advantage if they were slaughtered in the country, and if the dead meat were brought up, Moseley 280 et seq.——Question as to the advantage to butchers in buying the live animal or the dead meat, respectively, Hall 802–809. 827–833. 890–895.

Conclusion as to its being feasible to supply London and other populous towns with dead meat by railway all the year round, Clarke 1482–1487——Statement in support of the conclusion that with one properly arranged central market the whole of London may be supplied with dead meat by railway, even in hot weather, ib. 1515–1517. 1524–1531. 1548–1553.

Concurrence in the opinion as to its being feasible to supply London and other large places with dead meat from the country, Read 1598——Probability of supplying the metropolis from dead-meat markets, if in addition to a large central market there were small markets in outlying places, as at Southall, Croydon, &c., Ratcliffe 3664–3668. 3737–3739.

Opinion that encouragement should be given to the bringing of dead meat rather than of live stock into London, Letheby 3836——Practicability by proper arrangements and by care in packing, of sending meat to London in the hottest weather without putrefaction, ib. 3849. 3854–3856. 3927, 3928. 3997–4012——Opinion as to a live cattle market being necessary in order to meet any uncertainty of fluctuation of supply of dead meat; the supply might however be made very complete and regular, ib. 3929–3931. 4013–4024.

10. Evidence favourable on the whole to the Supply of London, &c.—continued.

Excellent condition of the country-killed meat sold by witness, except in the summer months when it is not practicable to bring it from a distance, Bannister 5223–5227. 5230–5237. 5248, 5249——Convenience of a large dead-meat market to witness, ib. 5264.

Facility of supplying Leeds, Manchester, and other large towns throughout the year with dead meat from Hull and Liverpool, Torr 7129. 7136–7148. 7157–7173——Evidence as to the improvements which might be adopted in the supply of country-killed meat to the towns, witness anticipating that London and the large towns may be supplied throughout the year without the meat being deteriorated, ib. 7136–7148. 7157–7173——Witness contemplates the supplies being ordered beforehand by the butchers in London, ib. 7136, 7137. 7143–7145. 7216–7234. 7272–7281——The dead meat supply to large towns should only be supplementary to live-stock markets, ib. 7142, 7143. 7235–7237——Excellent state in which the meat may be brought by railway, ib. 7166. 7177——Absence of any undue limitation of markets if the butchers in Leeds, Manchester, &c., had to supply themselves largely from the ports in the shape of dead meat, ib. 7216–7225. 7235–7237.

11. Evidence opposed to the foregoing Proposition:

General feeling of the butchers in Oldham, Macclesfield, &c., that it is most undesirable that those towns should continue to be supplied from dead-meat markets, Bradbury 1042–1053——Deterioration of dead meat when sent by railway in hot weather, or when there is not proper ventilation, Ellis 1425–1428——Opposition in Manchester, &c., to the system of dead meat markets, ib. 1438, 1439.

Advantage to the butcher in getting the live meat rather than dead meat, Hönck 1944–1955. 1961–1963——Great irregularity in the meat supply of London if dependent on dead-meat markets, the quality of the meat being also injured by railway transit, ib. 1950–1955. 1961–1963. 2012–2017. 2043–2047.

Decided deterioration of meat when the animal is killed before transmission by railway; large supply of dead meat from Scotland to London adverted to hereon, Dickenson 2810–2828. 2856. 2863–2879——Instances of mutton killed in Yorkshire and Northamptonshire being tainted when for sale in the London market, more especially in hot weather, Baker 4306–4325.

Difficulty in always getting the best meat at the dead-meat market, Giblett 4584. 4719——Absolute necessity of a live cattle market in London, it being impracticable to keep a regular supply of dead meat all through the year, Woodley 4833, 4834——Obstacle to depending entirely on a dead meat supply, Slater 5194–5198.

Discontinuance of the supply of country-killed meat in hot weather, Herbert 5971–5979——Disadvantages of the transmission of dead meat, as compared with live meat, by railway, ib. 6009–6011.

Reasons for objecting to send dead meat to the London market in lieu of the live animals; loss in sending the slaughtered stock whilst there would be no means of disposing of the offal locally, Hudson 7301–7324. 7387–7389. 7398–7406——Disadvantage in sending dead meat, instead of live meat, from the farms in Oxfordshire to the London market, Druce 7477–7484. 7515–7526——Grounds for the statement as to the great loss incurred in connection with the dead meat trade to Manchester, Fair 7556–7569. 7579–7584——In the hot weather the system of a dead meat supply to towns would never answer, ib. 7583——Injury to any meat coming a long distance in hot weather, Bonser 7682, 7683. 7711.

12. Conclusions of the Committee:

Consideration by the Committee of the advantages and disadvantages of supplying London and other large towns with country-killed meat, Rep. iv.——Advantage if London and other large towns could be supplied entirely with meat killed in the country, as the spread of infection would be largely prevented thereby, ib.——Grounds of objection by the trade to a dead meat system, ib.

The Committee conclude that it is not possible at present to dispense with a live meat market in the metropolis and other large towns, Rep. v.——Very small extent to which dead meat can be supplied from foreign parts, ib. iv.

Deptford Victualling Yard. Slaughter, by witness at Deptford, of all the beasts supplied by him under contract to the Victualling Yard there, Baker 4456–4461.

Dickenson, John. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Cattle dealer at Sheffield; has been of necessity a butcher since the prohibition upon the transit of cattle, 2788–2792——Practice recently of witness to slaughter the animals at Hull, and to supply the dead meat thence to Wakefield, Huddersfield, and other towns, 2790–2799——Considerable difficulty in the supply of dead meat by railway from Hull to the inland towns, more especially in hot weather; difficulty even if the railway facilities were rendered as complete as possible, 2800, et seq.

Adequacy generally of the slaughtering accommodation in Hull and Liverpool, 2795-2798. 2845–2849. 2860——Very little accommodation on the North Eastern line for the conveyance of dead meat; several improvements required, 2800–2809——Decided deterioration of meat when the animal is killed before transmission by railway; large supply of dead meat from Scotland to London adverted to hereon, 2810–2828. 2856. 2863–2879.

Increased price of meat in Manchester during the last six months; cause of this advance, 2831–2844. 2850–2855——Tendency of the prohibition upon the transit of foreign live stock in checking importation, 2855–2859——Lower price, to the extent of 1*d.* or 1¼*d.* per pound, of meat brought dead to Sheffield from Hull, than of meat killed in Sheffield, 2856. 2863–2872.

Diseased Meat. Check upon diseased meat being got rid of at Liverpool by being potted and preserved, Trench 486–492——Probability of there being a considerable sale in the metropolis of meat diseased by the presence of parasites, and detrimental to human health, Simon, 5037–5045.

Extract from report by Dr. Letheby upon the question of the fitness for food of the flesh of diseased animals, and the effect thereof upon the constitution, App. 315. 320——Statement by Dr. Letheby as to the indications by which unsound meat may be recognised, ib. 319, 320.

Disinfecting of Railway Trucks and Steamboats. Recommendation by the Committee that it be made imperative upon all railway companies or steamboat proprietors to thoroughly cleanse and disinfect the trucks, steamboats, and pens, after every journey or voyage, Rep. iv. See also Railways 2. Steamers 4.

Drovers (Irish Cattle). Rough treatment of the cattle in Ireland by drovers, Walsh 7813–7816; Rep. iii——Avoidance of the risk of contagion from drovers on return to Ireland, if the cattle were sent from Ireland to England in the shape of dead meat, Hennessy, 8058.

Druce, Joseph. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Occupies about 800 acres of land at Eynsham, in Oxfordshire; is both a breeder and grazier, 7463–7468——Opinion that all foreign animals should be subject to quarantine or be killed at the port, 7469, 7470——Approval of fat cattle landed in London going to the Metropolitan Market, before being slaughtered, but not animals landed at Harwich, Hull, &c., 7471–7474. 7498–7501. 7527, 7528——Home fed animals might go into the country from the Metropolitan Market, 7475——Those animals in each cargo which actually had the foot and mouth disease should alone be stopped, 7476.

Disadvantages in sending dead meat, instead of live cattle, from the farms in Oxfordshire to the London market, 7477–7484. 7515–7526——Advantage in sending to the public market instead of in selling to agents, 7485, 7486. 7504–7508——Difficulty as to watering cattle in the railway trucks, though it is very desirable, 7487–7497——Objection to limiting the number of fairs and markets in the country, 7529–7531——Decrease of the foot and mouth disease in Oxfordshire, more precautions being taken, 7532, 7533——Tendency of rinderpest to diminish the extent of other diseases, 7535, 7536.

Dublin Steam Packet Company. Conveyance by the company of cattle between Dublin and Liverpool, Watson 7989–7992——Every care is taken to prevent overcrowding on board; difficulty in always avoiding this, ib. 7993. 8015–8021——There are from eight to ten vessels devoted to the trade; other cargo besides cattle being conveyed, ib. 7994–7996. 8037——Information relative to the general arrangements and accommodation on board the company's vessels, ib. 7996–8002. 8009, et seq.——Practice of cleansing the vessels without disinfecting them, ib. 8009–8011.

Very slight risk of loss on board, there being hardly any claims for compensation, Watson, 8033–8037——Self-interest of the company to make their vessels safe, ib. 8036. 8038——Responsibility of the company in the event of its being necessary to throw cattle overboard from overcrowding, ib. 8038–8041——Arrangements of the company with English railways for sending cattle through to London, Manchester, &c., ib. 8047–8049.

Dutch Cattle. Arrangements as to the care of the animals in Holland before they are shipped; accommodation provided in large stables, it being also required that the animals be fed and watered when conveyed a certain distance by rail, Daniels 49–64——Prevalence of cattle plague in the south of Holland, but not in Friesland or the northern portions, Peters 1168-1172——Prejudicial effect in Holland of the regulation in this country that the animals must be slaughtered at or near the port of arrival, ib. 1175-1179——Effect of the prohibition in stopping both beasts and sheep from coming to Rotterdam; it has not lowered the price of stock in Holland, ib. 1221-1224. 1247-1250.

Exceptional instance of cattle from Holland having been sent back again because the price in London was not satisfactory, Pratt 3122-3124——Great precautions taken at the port of shipment in Holland to prevent any diseased animals being placed on board; full confidence of witness in the inspectors, Robinson 3282-3291. 3328-3331. 3359-3372.

Conclusion as regards the cattle plague in Holland, that it was taken there by some animals returned from the London market, Holmans 3621-3623. 3631——Instances of a few infected cattle from Holland, the infection having in the first instance been conveyed from the country to Holland in July 1865, Hicks 4085. 4090-4099——Healthy character generally of the Dutch cattle, Woodley 4915-4933——Few cases of lung disease among the Dutch cattle imported, ib. 4920-4925.

Import indirectly of some Dutch beasts at the present time, Herbert 5897-5899——Statement as to the rinderpest having appeared in Holland at various intervals for centuries past, ib. 5934-5940.

Returns showing the different kinds of Dutch cattle brought to England in the year 1865, App. 307-314.

Ellis, John. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Veterinary surgeon: is Government Inspector of cattle at the port of Liverpool, 1389——Careful inspection by witness of all foreign cattle arriving at the port, 1390, 1391. 1454, 1455——Immediate destruction of any animals having rinderpest, or pleuro-pneumonia, 1392——Any cases of foot and mouth disease would be dealt with by quarantine, 1392, 1393——Witness does not inspect the Irish cattle, 1394-1396——Healthy and excellent condition in which the cattle from Oporto arrive at Liverpool; they might, without danger, at once be forwarded into the country, 1397-1404. 1456-1459——Very healthy state of the foreign cattle generally on arrival, 1400. 1429, 1430. 1441-1444.

Probability of the health of Liverpool being injuriously affected by the increased slaughtering of cattle, and by the large number kept in the town between market-day and the day of their being killed, 1405-1418. 1436, 1437——Approval of the live stock going to Manchester, and the other places of their destination, and being there killed within a few days, 1419-1421. 1438-1440——Opinion that transit by railway does not tend to develope disease, 1422——Disadvantage when cattle are crowded in the holds of steamboats, ib.——Good ventilation and careful treatment in the vessels bringing foreign cattle to Liverpool, 1423, 1424——Deterioration of dead meat when sent by railway in hot weather, or when there is not proper ventilation, 1425-1428.

Very little foreign cattle trade in Liverpool for some months past, 1431-1433——Opposition in Manchester, &c. to the system of dead-meat markets, 1438, 1439——Very bad condition of the cow-houses in Liverpool; belief as their being now under inspection, 1445-1451——Death of a great many cows from rinderpest, 1452, 1453.

F.

Fair, William. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a dealer in cattle and a grazier in Cheshire, 7537–7539——Procures his store cattle from Scotland, 7540——Is strongly opposed to the compulsory slaughtering of foreign fat cattle at the ports; impracticability in such case of supplying Manchester and the manufacturing district, 7542–7554. 7556–7569. 7579–7584. 7609——Cattle from uninfected countries, like Spain or Portugal, should have the same facilities of transit as Irish cattle, 7544. 7555. 7598——Live cattle should be allowed to come from Liverpool, &c. to the Manchester market, and should be branded for slaughter within a certain time, 7544–7548. 7594–7597. 7603–7605.

Expediency of its being permitted to bring live cattle from Manchester to adjacent towns for slaughter there, 7549–7554——Approval of inspection and quarantine in the case of foreign store cattle from infected countries, 7555. 7595–7602——Grounds for the statement as to the great loss incurred in connection with the dead meat trade to Manchester, 7556–7569. 7579–7584 —— Sources of supply of the Manchester live market, 7570, 7571——The plague was not propagated in Cheshire by the railway transit of beasts, 7572. 7585, 7586.

Statement as to there not being any trade in store stock in Cheshire at the present time, 7573–7578——Check to the foreign trade by a quarantine, 7590——Injury to the foreign trade and increase of price to the consumer by slaughtering at the port, 7591–7594—— Division between the markets for home and foreign stock at Liverpool, Manchester, &c., 7606–7608.

Fairs and Markets. Danger at present in holding large cattle fairs in Scotland, Swan 5470–5473——Objection to store stock and fat stock in the same market, Strangeways 6997.

Expediency of some restriction in regard to the small markets for live cattle in country towns, these being a fertile source of the spread of disease, Torr 7120–7125. 7134——Way in which the small country markets for live stock operate very injuriously, so that they should be prohibited in the smaller towns, ib. 7254–7258.

Objections to the small local markets being abolished; respects in which they operate very beneficially, Hudson 7450–7460——Disapproval of any limit upon the number of fairs and markets in the country, Druce 7529–7531.

Difficulty as to a satisfactory inspection at fairs and markets in Ireland, with a view to preventing the spread of disease, Walsh 7882–7884; Garnett 7942–7945.

Importance of a system of penalties for sending diseased cattle to fairs and markets, Garnett 7942. 7946–7966.

Summary penalties proposed by the Committee for the wilful exposure for sale of diseased cattle in fairs or market, Rep. v——Advantage in large towns, if practicable, of separating the fat and store cattle markets, ib. vii.

Farmers and Graziers. Objection by graziers to an entirely separate market for foreign cattle, Lovett 6803——Witness would be very sorry to buy foreign stock to graze, ib. 6810——Strong objection to its being required of farmers to kill fat cattle; difficulty in disposing of the offal, ib. 6856.

A large number of carcases are sold by witness locally, the animals being slaughtered by himself, Torr 7114–7116——Statement in favour of butchers in London ordering supplies of country killed meat from the farmers and graziers, ib. 7136 et seq.——Facility for advantageously disposing of the offal in country places, ib. 7137–7140. 7147. 7160, 7161——Loss sometimes sustained by graziers when the markets for fat cattle are not good, ib. 7282–7284.

Sources of witness's supply of lambs and of beasts for grazing: he does not bring any foreign stock, Hudson 7295–7299——Impracticability of disposing of the offal in witness's neighbourhood, if all the animals were slaughtered before transmission to London, ib. 7305–7309. 7320–7324. 7387–7389——Practice of witness to consign the animals from his farm to salesmen at the metropolitan market, ib. 7461, 7462——Advantage in sending to the public market instead of in selling to agents, Druce 7485, 7486. 7504–7508.

Information as to the general course pursued by witness in the purchase and fattening of his stock in the county of Meath, Garnett 7888–7894——Witness feeds about 800 head of cattle, and holds 1,100 acres of land, ib. 7890. 7972——Practice of witness always to consign his fat stock to the same salesmaster in Dublin or Liverpool, ib. 7913–7916. 7925, 7926——Very large scale upon which grazing is conducted by individuals in the county of Meath, &c., ib. 7970–7978.

FOOT AND MOUTH DISEASE:

1. Character of this Disease.
2. Its Prevalence among Foreign and English Cattle respectively.
3. Restrictions now in force as to the Import of Animals or Cargoes having the Disease.
4. Suggestions as to the Restrictions and Regulations desirable in future.

1. Character of this Disease:

The foot and mouth disease is constantly contracted after landing from the steamers at Liverpool, all cattle being subject to it, Cullen 508, 509——Varying duration of the foot and mouth disease, Lockwood 2559–2561. 2567–2569——Witness does not recollect any animal dying from the disease, ib. 2570.

Fearful suffering of some animals from the foot and mouth disease, whilst the animals sometimes die from the excitement, Simmonds 3503–3508——The disease has been known in this country about twenty-four years, ib. 3506, 3507——Modes in which the disease is brought on or is developed, ib. 3508.

Great spread of the foot and mouth disease through means of foreign cattle at the Islington market, Ratcliffe 3669, 3670. 3800–3807. 3832——Witness has not been able to trace the foot and mouth disease in dead meat, and has not lately rejected any animals on account of it, Baker 4425–4429——Reference to the foot and mouth disease, though contagious, as being a curative complaint, Giblett 4617, 4618——Slight importance attached to the foot and mouth disease, the meat not being affected by it, Woodley 4926–4933.

Peculiar prevalence of the disease about Christmas, Hicks 5350, 5351——Opinion as to murrain or eczema being one of the worst diseases imported, Strangeways 6967, 6968 Effect of large fairs in spreading this disease; illustration in Norfolk, Hudson 7335–7337. 7372–7374——Comparatively slight importance attached to the foot and mouth disease, ib. 7394–7397.

Tendency of the conveyance of cattle by sea or rail, to produce the foot and mouth disease, Rep. iv.

2. Its Prevalence among Foreign and English Cattle respectively:

Small number of beasts suffering from the foot and mouth disease on arrival at Antwerp; prohibition upon the export of these, Huger 1343–1347. 1349–1352——The disease is more prevalent in animals from France than from Germany, ib. 1351, 1352 ——Doubt as to the foot and mouth disease having been brought from abroad, Hönck 1786–1788——Very few cattle stopped on arrival in witness's ships; instances in the case of the foot and mouth disease, Robinson 3285–3291. 3355, 3356——The disease was known in this country before the general importation of foreign cattle, Simmonds 3506, 3507.

Opinion that eczema, or the foot and mouth disease, is not entirely a foreign importation, Holmans 3601–3607. 3610–3612——Prevalence of the foot and mouth disease in England, before any foreign cattle were imported, Hicks 5350——Frequency of Scotch cattle suffering from this disease, ib.——Frequency of the foot and mouth disease in the case of cattle from Edinburgh to Scotland, Swan 5371. 5373. 5502——Decrease of the foot and mouth disease in Oxfordshire, more precautions being taken, Druce 7532, 7533.

3. Restrictions now in force as to the Import of Animals or Cargoes having the Disease:

At Liverpool any cases of foot and mouth disease would be dealt with by quarantine, Ellis 1392, 1393——Check to the import into London of animals having the foot and mouth disease, on account of the rigorous inspection exercised, a large number of such animals having been stopped, Hönck 1705–1712 —— Practice in London of slaughtering any animals which have on arrival foot and mouth disease, Pratt 3022, 3023. 3254; Simmonds 3420.

Import by witness at Hull of some cattle with the foot and mouth disease, these having been killed at once and sold to butchers, Coulson 2074. 2169–2180——Course adopted by the inspector at Hull, in the event of the import of store cattle, and of cattle with the foot and mouth disease, Coulson 2209–2213. 2225–2231; Lockwood 2441. 2445. 2532–2528. 2558–2563——Slaughter at Hull of any animals having the foot and mouth disease, the rest of the cargo being allowed to be sold, Valentine 2587, 2588. 2635–2639.

4. Suggestions as to the Restrictions and Regulations desirable in future:

It is very desirable to take stringent measures for preventing any import of the disease, Simmonds 3509——Witness considers that foreign cattle with the foot and mouth disease should be allowed to go into the London market, save in extreme cases when they should at once be slaughtered, Holman 3597-3610——Comment upon the practice in regard to slaughtering animals having the foot and mouth disease when landed; loss suffered on these occasions, Hicks 4123, 4124.

Witness would not stop whole cargoes at the port of landing for the foot and mouth disease, but only those animals which had the disease, Hudson 7335–7342——Those animals in each cargo which had actually had foot and mouth disease should alone be stopped, Druce 7476——Exceedingly contagious and injurious character of the disease, so that penalties should be inflicted on any one sending cattle having the disease to store markets, Garnett 7942. 7946–7966——Restrictions are not required for the foot and mouth disease, Walsh 7800.

Representation or memorial of the Foreign Cattle Trade Association as to the inexpediency of the checks imposed in the case of foreign cattle suffering from the foot and mouth disease, App. 303.

Objection by Mr. Simmons, in report to the Board of Customs, to permitting foreign cattle having the disease to pass through the street and into sheds, App. 304.

Disapproval by Mr. Holmans of the detention of foreign cattle suffering from the disease, App. 305, 306.

Foreign Cattle:

9. Orders in Council regulating the Import and Slaughter of Foreign Cattle.
10. Conclusions and Recommendations of the Committee.

1. As to the Extent and Importance of the Foreign Supply:

Various countries and ports whence cattle are consigned to witness, his trade being chiefly in fat stock for the London market, Hönck 1667–1675——Statistics as to the imports in the vessels of the General Steam Navigation Company in 1865; very large numbers of cattle and sheep, Pratt 2983-2988——Increasing character of witness's trade, Robinson 3326–3327——Increasing demand for live stock from abroad, ib. 3396, 3397——Decreased supply lately of foreign stock, owing to the uncertainty of their being passed on landing, Baker 4422–4424.

Increasing importance of the foreign supply, Giblett 4622——Belief that but for the free supply of foreign cattle it would be practically impossible to feed the metropolis, Rudkin 6634——Growing importance of the foreign supply, ib. 6709–6717——Opinion that during the next three or four years London will be practically supplied with foreign cattle, ib. 6709.

Paper submitted by Mr. Robinson, containing particulars of cattle imported from Holland, &c. during 1865, and showing the numbers landed at each wharf and at Harwich, App. 307–314.

Statement of the number of foreign cattle sold by Mr. Hicks in three months, and the number sold to each class of men, App. 325.

2. Inspection Abroad before Shipment for England:

Inspection of both live cattle and dead meat on the other side of the Channel before they are shipped, Daniels 214–219——Belief as to the very imperfect character of the quarantine and inspection regulations abroad, Read 1652–1655——Inspection now in force at the ports of shipment in Germany and Holland, Hönck 1714–1716——Arrangement on the Continent as to the transmission of cattle from Hungary, &c. to the port of shipment: inspection exercised with reference to the cattle plague, ib. 2034–2042.

Supervision by the authorities abroad, but not by the owners of the vessels in regard to the condition of the animals, Malcolm 2338–2350——Character of the inspection to which the animals are subjected at the port of shipment abroad, Pratt 3018–3020. 3148. 3252, 3253—— The inspectors abroad are appointed either by the local authorities, or by witness's Company in the case of cattle by the Company's ships, ib. 3018–3020——Very careful inspection before the shipment of cattle from Holland to London, Robinson 3282–3291. 3328–3331——Strict inspection of the cattle before they are shipped at Hamburg and Rotterdam for Newcastle, Stephens 8373–8377.

3. Condition of the Cattle on Arrival in this Country:

Very good condition in which the cattle from Rotterdam have generally arrived at Harwich; comparatively few deaths on the passage from Holland, Daniels 13–15. 25——The animals from Rotterdam arrive at Harwich almost always in good condition, Peters 1211, 1212——Very healthy state of the foreign cattle generally on arrival at Liverpool, Ellis 1400. 1429, 1430. 1441–1444——Very good condition in which foreign cattle generally arrive at Hull, Coulson 2074; Lockwood 2412–2416; Valentine 2599–2603; Torr 7249, 7250——Excellent condition in which the animals arrive, by long sea, in London, though they are obliged to stand during the whole voyage, Pratt 3041–3046——The cattle generally arrive in very good condition by witness's ships, Robinson 3308, 3309——Very good condition in which the cattle generally arrive from abroad at the Port of London, Simmonds 3435.

Impression of graziers that diseases of cattle are mostly imported, Ratcliff 3809–3814 Very little disease found by witness in any foreign cattle, Baker 4466–4471——Very few unhealthy animals among the large number of foreign cattle passing through witness's hands, Wordley 4915, 4916.

Better condition of the cattle if landed lower down the river and brought up by railway, Rudkin 6738. 6750–6755——Much more healthy cattle now sent from abroad, Hunt 8417. 8470.

4. Relative Quality of Foreign and Home-fed Meat:

Comparative inferiority of foreign meat, witness selling only home-fed meat, Ratcliff 3673–3678. 3778–3783——Different class of butchers who purchase foreign meat, ib. 3679——Injury to the meat of foreign animals through their treatment on the voyage, and the fatigue and harassment which they undergo before they are killed, ib. 3740–3747. 3751.

Inaccuracy of the statement that foreign fat stock are not bought by the same butchers who buy English stock, Hicks 4061——The first-class butchers do not buy foreign cattle from witness, but all others do, ib. 4087——Lower price of the foreign meat than of the English meat by about a halfpenny or three farthings a pound, Baker 4416–4421——Good and healthy character of the foreign meat, Wordley 4891. 4909–4916.

Purchase by witness chiefly of English cattle, it being very important at times to have a supply of foreign cattle in the market to fall back upon, Pickworth 4961–4964——Witness purchases home-fed meat exclusively, foreign meat not being suited for the West-end trade, Slater 5124–5126——Increasing purchase of foreign cattle by the West-end butchers, the meat, however, being inferior to home-fed meat, and the animals being cheaper, Herbert 5912–5923.

Statement to the effect that foreign cattle are purchased by some of the best butchers, Rudkin 6631, 6632.

5. Statements in favour of a separate Market in London for Foreign Stock, near the River-side:

Opinion that the best plan would be to have a separate market for foreign cattle near the place of landing, with slaughter-houses in connexion with it, Ratcliff 3662, 3663. 3669–3683——Sufficient convenience to buyers, and sufficient competition for foreign stock, if sold at a separate market near the river side, ib. 3663. 3673–3683. 3707–3709. 3778, 3779. 3808——Latent disease frequently in foreign cattle, which cannot be detected by inspection, so that the best means of preventing infection is to have a separate market, ib. 3672. 3766. 3817–3833——Several respects in which a foreign market, with a slaughter-house attached, would be productive of much convenience, and would obviate much nuisance to the public, ib. 3710–3728.

Prevention of the cattle plague, if there had been a separate market for foreign stock, Herbert 5933. 5961——Approval, on the whole, of a separate market at the river side, though less convenient to buyers than the present system, ib. 5941, 5942. 5958–5961.

Suggested separate markets for all foreign stock, Strangeways 6969. 6989–6997——Absence of disadvantage by having a separate market for foreign cattle near the river side, where landed, Hudson 7359–7364.

6. Evidence opposed to the foregoing Proposition:

Loss to the importers if there were separate markets for foreign cattle, as there would not be the same competition as at present; prejudice also to buyers, Hönck 1837–1841. 1903–1907. 1993–1998. 2004–2008——Circumstance of the foreign cattle being largely bought bought by wholesale butchers and by contractors, for whom a market near the river side would probably be more convenient than at Islington, Hönck 1842–1869.

6. Evidence opposed to the foregoing Proposition—continued.

Disapproval of a separate market near the river side for foreign cattle, Pratt 3132–3144——Prejudicial effect upon the foreign trade if there were a separate market in London for foreign cattle exclusively, Simmonds 3543–3548. 3590, 3591.

Removal of several causes of public nuisance if there were large slaughter-houses and a dead-meat market near the place of import of foreign cattle; witness does not, however, advocate a separate market for foreign live stock, Letheby 3903–3918. 3988–3996.

Statement as to the great injury to the foreign trade if the cattle were sold in a separate market near the river side, Hicks 4057–4070——Monopoly of buyers, and depreciation in the price of foreign cattle if no longer sold in the same market with home cattle, ib. 4059–4062. 4087–4089. 4103–4106. 4112–4122——Inconvenience and expense by having a separate market for foreign cattle, with slaughter-houses attached, near the river side; injury both to the foreign trade and to the buyer, Baker 4341–4368. 4483–4497.

Importance of one Metropolitan Market for both home and foreign cattle, in the interests of the public as well as of the buyer and seller, Giblett 4619–4622——Serious evil in having a separate market at the river side for foreign cattle, ib. 4622——Great importance of there being only one market for foreign cattle and home cattle; interference with prices, as well as with the foreign trade, if there were separate markets, Woodley 4833–4844. 4894–4896. 4937–4942——Inconvenience of a separation of the home and foreign markets; that is, in the case of butchers buying in both markets, Slater 5127–5131. 5205–5208.

Importance of but one market in the metropolis for live cattle, both English and foreign; several objections to a separate market for foreign cattle at the river side, Rudkin 6629–6639. 6694–6717. 6772–6783——Great importance of open competition in the same market for all live cattle, ib. 6638, 6639. 6703. 6779, 6780——Material increase of prices if the foreign market were held by itself, ib. 6712–6717.

7. Suggested Division between Foreign and English Cattle in the same Market:

Non-objection to English and foreign cattle being kept distinct in the London market, so long as they are in close contiguity, Rudkin 6708——Suggested division between the English and foreign cattle in the Metropolitan Market, Lovell 6801. 6805——Division between the markets for home and foreign stock at Liverpool, Manchester, &c., Fair 7606–7608.

8. Question of Slaughtering Foreign Cattle at the Port of Arrival:

Contemplated slaughtering, without delay, of all diseased cargoes, Daniels 189, 190. 204–208; Read 1645——Non-objection to compulsory slaughtering at the port of arrival if enforced generally, and if no animals were allowed to be sent alive to the Metropolitan Market, Peters 1211–1216——Opinion that all foreign fat stock should be slaughtered at the port of landing, Read 1573–1604.

Grounds for strongly objecting to the slaughtering of all foreign cattle near the river or place of landing instead of at the Islington Market and the private slaughter-houses; examination in detail hereon, Hönck 1750–1782. 1826–1869, 1898–1908. 2009–2030——Effect of compulsory slaughtering at the river-side in checking the importation, ib. 1758——Instance of depreciation of price at Harwich through the slaughtering of the animals there, ib. 1759–1763——Objection to the foreign cattle being all slaughtered near the river, if there were no market for live cattle at Islington, ib. 2009–2030.

Injurious effect upon the foreign trade if all cattle were permanently required to be killed on arrival, Coulson 2136–2140. 2188–2192. 2196–2204——Sufficiency of the regulation as to fat cattle being killed in four days after their arrival or their being sent to market, Simmonds 3479. 3486–3488. 3591——Decreased supply of foreign cattle if it were compulsory to slaughter them near the port of landing, Baker 4491–4498——Advantage if foreign fat stock were slaughtered near the place of landing, Simon 5079–5081.

Opinion that for the present the import trade should be confined to cattle intended for slaughter within a short time after they were brought, Hicks 5344–5350——Regulation suggested in regard to foreign fat cattle conveyed into the country being killed in a given time, ib. 5350——Objection to the foreign cattle being slaughtered at the place of landing and conveyed as dead meat to Smithfield Market by railway, Rudkin 6634–6639. 6668–6673.

Contemplated slaughtering of fat sheep and beasts from abroad, either at the port of landing or in the towns, within a certain time, Strangeways 6974–6978. 6994–6998——Expediency of all foreign fat stock being slaughtered at the ports, Torr 7126–7130; Hudson 7347. 7350–7358——Approval of fat cattle landed in London going to the Strong objection to compulsory slaughter at the ports, Fair 7542 et seq.——Injury to the foreign trade, and increase of price to the consumer, by slaughtering at the port, ib. 7591-7594——Great inconvenience and loss to the trade if all fat cattle from abroad were obliged to be slaughtered close to the place of debarkation, Bonser 7684-7688. 7712-7719——Depreciation of foreign fat stock if not killed shortly after being landed, Wilkinson 8313-8315.

9. Orders in Council regulating the Import and Slaughter of Foreign Cattle:

Copies of Orders in Council in 1864-66 relative to the importation of foreign cattle and the prevention of the import of diseased cattle, App. 339-384.

10. Conclusions and Recommendations of the Committee:

Several foreign ports whence cattle and sheep are imported into England and Scotland, Rep. iii——Arrival of the sea-borne cattle generally in good condition, ib.——Effect of a journey, whether by sea or rail, in causing cattle to deteriorate in value, ib. iv——Great importance of foreign cattle in order to keep down the price of meat, ib. v.

Consideration of the suggestion that there might be a separate market for foreign fat stock in London; grounds for disapproving of this proposal, Rep. vi.

Several objections to compulsory slaughter of foreign cattle at the port of discharge, Rep. vi.——Recommendation that all imported fat cattle be subject to the same rules as English fat cattle when exposed in a market, ib.

Recommendation as to prohibition upon importation from countries where there is reason to believe the cattle plague is existing, Rep. vi.

Exceedingly contagious and injurious character of foot and mouth disease, so that penalties should be imposed upon any one sending cattle having the disease to store markets, 7942. 7946-7966 — Importance generally of a system of penalties for sending diseased cattle to fairs and markets, 7946-7953——Limited amount of pleuro-pneumonia now in Ireland, whilst the risk of contagion is not very great, 7954, 7955. 7967-7969. 7979-7981——Very large scale upon which grazing is conducted by individuals in the county Meath, &c., 7970-7678——Difficulties in the way of a dead-meat trade from Meath, or from Dublin, to England, more especially in the hot weather, 7984-7986.

Gebhardt, H. Letter from Mr. Gebhardt to the Chairman of the Committee, stating that rinderpest has not been introduced from abroad, that quarantine for foreign cattle is impossible, that the compulsory slaughtering of foreign cattle at the wharves or at the Metropolitan Market would be most objectionable, and offering certain suggestions for preventing the import of diseased cattle, App. 329, 330.

General Steam Navigation Company. Statistics as to the quantity of cattle carried in the vessels of the General Steam Navigation Company in 1865 from various foreign ports to London, Pratt 2983-2988——The largest trade is from Rotterdam, ib. 2985. 2989, 2990 —— Conveyance chiefly of fat cattle from the several foreign ports, ib. 2991-2993—— Effectual cleansing of the vessels after the discharge of each cargo, ib. 3032. 3050-3053. 3166-3168——Conveyance of cattle only in some of the company's vessels, ib. 3033, 3034.

Details as to the general arrangements on board, and as to the accommodation, ventilation, &c.; every care is taken to render these as complete as possible, Pratt 3035 et seq.——There are separate compartments in the holds and on deck admitting five cattle abreast, the space for each being eight feet by two feet, ib. 3035. 3152-3160——The animals are placed athwart ship, with their heads to the sides of the vessel, ib. 3038—— Feeding and watering of the animals during the passage, ib. 3039. 3207-3209——The cattle stand close together during the whole voyage; lateral support thereby, ib. 3041-3045. 3196-3198.

Arrangement for the landing of the animals, and mode of disposal when landed; accommodation for this purpose at Brown's Wharf, Pratt 3054-3058. 3162. 3169-3181. 3247, 3248. 3265, 3266——Details as to the rates from different ports to London, ib. 3059-3064.

Consideration of a comparative statement by Mr. Moseley of the charges from Rotterdam viâ Harwich, and from Rotterdam to London direct; error in Mr. Moseley's calculation, witness showing that the direct sea route is much the cheaper of the two, Pratt 3065-3077. 3098-3102. 3266, 3267.

Practice of charging freight when the meat or animals are landed, no matter in what condition, Pratt 3108, 3109——Actual space given for each animal on board the vessels of the company; its sufficiency, ib. 3145-3147. 3152-3165. 3195-3198——There is no shelter for those carried on deck, ib. 3154, 3155——Improved accommodation in the "Maas" and the more modern vessels of the company, ib. 3217-3226. 3235-3237.

German Cattle. Good condition of the German cattle on arrival at Antwerp, very few having any disease, Huger 1303. 1311-1313. 1343-1347. 1363-1365.

and mouth disease, though contagious, as being a curative complaint, 4611-4616——Prevalence of foot and mouth disease in this country before any foreign cattle were imported, 4617, 4618.

Importance of one metropolitan market for both home and foreign cattle, in the interests of the public as well as of the buyer and seller, 4619-4622——Serious evil in having a separate market at the river side for foreign cattle, 4622——Increasing import from France; increased facilities required, ib.

Great difficulty experienced by butchers in Kent and other parts of the country in obtaining an adequate supply of meat; question hereon as to the price having risen to any marked extent, 4622-4625. 4659-4681——Examination relative to the purchase of some legs of mutton at Newgate Market by a Sevenoaks butcher, through the difficulty in obtaining an adequate supply of live animals; high price paid, though the meat turned out bad by the following morning, 4626-4658——Enhanced prices of meat lately in the London market, 4681. 4809-4815.

Evidence as to the loose and erroneous manner in which the prices quoted in the newspapers are obtained; amendments suggested, 4681-4728——Statement that witness has written to the papers to have the erroneous quotations corrected, but without effect, 4729-4759.

Great difficulty in regard to the supply of beef to Manchester and the adjacent towns on account of the restrictions on the transit of live stock, 4800-4803. 4815-4823——Statement as to the price of meat being dearer in the Manchester district than in London; relative prices of live stock in London and in the country adverted to hereon, 4804-4823——Aggavated expense in some counties where, there being no live stock, it has been necessary to come to London for a supply of dead meat, 4815.

Glasgow. Enhanced price of meat at Glasgow through the foreign cattle not being allowed to pass through from Leith, Swan 5389. 5440. 5450-5453——Information relative to the importation of fat and store cattle to Glasgow from Ireland; scarcity at the present season of the year, ib. 5393-5395. 5454-5469.

Importance of Glasgow, Airdrie, and other towns being supplied by means of live meat removed from Granton, in lieu of the present system of slaughtering at Leith and Granton, and removing the dead meat to the towns, Swan 5398-5409. 5417-5420. 5426. 5433. 5440. 5450-5453——Great injury to the meat when sent to Glasgow, &c. by railway in warm and wet weather, ib. 5426-5432.

Endeavour made last year to combine the three public slaughter-houses in Glasgow in one; inconvenience and expense thereby, Swan 5542-5546.

Gottenburgh. Absence of disease in cattle consigned to witness from Gottenburgh, Coulson 2129-2131.

Granton. Evidence in support of the proposal that Danish cattle and home cattle be allowed to come to Granton, and to be conveyed thence to the towns for slaughter by the local butchers, Swan 5385 et seq.——Excellent accommodation available at Granton, ib. 5386. 5397, 5398.

Objection to the proposal that Danish cattle shall all come to the port of Granton; increase of cost if not allowed to be brought in the vessels to Leith, Currie 6858 et seq.

Careful manner in which the inspection at Granton is conducted by witness, Strangeways 6962-6967——Ample quarantine accommodatien available, ib. 6970.

Graziers. See Farmers and Graziers.

Great Eastern Railway. Very large cattle traffic on the line, including not only fat cattle but store cattle and milch cows, Moseley 240-252——Practice of the company thoroughly to cleanse the cattle trucks after each journey, ib. 256-263——Means of the Great Eastern Company, by using the North London line, for delivering cattle near the Islington market, ib. 320-322.——See also Harwich.

Great Northern Railway. Considerable traffic on the line previously to the cattle plague restrictions, Clarke 1463, 1464——Large quantity of dead meat brought to London by the Great Northern line, the quantity having increased since the restrictions on the transit of live stock, ib. 1474-1479.

Comparative statement of the cost of conveyance of live stock and dead meat from different stations on the Great Northern line to London, Clarke 1501-1503——Return of live stock carried over the line to London in the year ended June 1865, ib. 1501.

Considerable claims on the company in respect of detention or wrong delivery of dead meat, Clarke 1503. 1505, 1506. 1542-1544——Great numbers of sheep carried on the line, ib. 1552-1554.

Hall, Richard. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a wholesale butcher in Liverpool, 744, 745 ——Inconvenience through the deficiency of lairs at Liverpool, 746——Purchase by witness of imported animals almost exclusively, 747–749——Way in which the animals are disposed of after they are purchased in Stanley market, and before they are slaughtered, 750–757——Injurious effect of the overcrowding of the animals previously to their being killed, 757, 758. 772–774——Great inconvenience if all the private slaughter-houses were abolished, and if there were but one slaughter-house near Stanley market, 759.

Nature of the facilities for sending the meat from the slaughter-houses to the railway and to the shipping, 760–771——Good condition in which the cattle from Oporto arrive, the animals being of a valuable class, 775–784——Bad condition in which the Irish cattle arrive, they being much abused during the loading in Ireland, and greatly bruised on the passage, 778. 811–815. 838–841. 954, 955——Means of supplying Manchester with dead meat from Liverpool without any deterioration of the meat, 785–789——Much greater expense in the conveyance of dead meat by rail than of the live animal, 790–796 ——Deterioration of the meat by sending the animals by rail, and by killing them when they come off the truck, 797–801. 899–904.

Question as to the advantage to butchers in buying the live animal or the dead meat respectively, 802–809. 890–895——Slight extent to which a continuance of the prohibition upon transit by rail would be any advantage to the buyer in the Liverpool market, 816–821——Instances of witness having purchased oxen and sheep in London for Liverpool, the latter port not being well situated for the foreign cattle trade, 822–826. 923–926——Import of some dead meat from Scotland; its cost as compared with that of live cattle, 827–833——Disadvantages in the supply of the towns near Manchester depending on the Liverpool dead meat market, 834–837.

Good quality of the Irish cattle, if not injured before import, 838–841——Superior condition in which Scotch cattle come by sea to Liverpool, 842–847——Inconvenience in hot weather in supplying Manchester and other towns with dead meat from Liverpool; absence of difficulty in regard to the towns knowing the precise local demand, 848–857 ——Injury both to store cattle and fat cattle if kept for some days in quarantine, 860–863.

Statement as to the cattle plague having been brought into Cheshire and Lancashire by foreign store cattle, sent in the first instance from Germany to Edinburgh, and thence to Liverpool; particulars hereon, 861, 862. 864–889——Further consideration of the relative advantages and disadvantages of dead-meat markets at Liverpool, &c., and of the transmission of live meat by rail, 896–922——Doubt as to the recent legislation having produced any effect upon the price of meat in Liverpool and in Manchester, &c., 913–922.

Efficient inspection of all cattle now arriving in the port of Liverpool, 927–935—— Great hardship caused by the requirement as to slaughtering within four days; expediency of the limit being extended to a week, and of its being permitted to send the cattle and sheep to fields within a radius of four miles, 935–947——The obligation to slaughter within four days does not enable the purchaser to buy more cheaply, 948–950——Good condition of the foreign sheep coming to Liverpool by way of Hull, 951–953.

Hamburgh. Rate of freight from Hamburgh to Hull, Malcolm 2334——Practice recently adopted at Hamburgh to get a certificate as to the condition of the animals when shipped, ib. 2338——Statement of the imports from Hamburgh to Hull in 1865, as compared with the imports from all sources, ib. 2408.

Satisfactory accommodation on board the Hamburgh steamers, Coulson 2093; Malcolm 2305–2311——In the Hamburgh trade the arrangements and accommodation are excellent, the Hull vessels generally being now of a suitable character, Valentine 2669–2673.

Length of the passage from Hamburgh to Newcastle, there being no delay in landing, Stephens 8337, 8338——Strict inspection of the cattle at Hamburgh before shipment, ib. 8373–8377.

Government inspection to which the cattle are subjected on landing, Daniels 70. 73–79—— Practice to feed and water the animals before they are sent on to London by rail, ib. 71, 72. 237.

Large space available at Harwich if the cattle were quarantined, Daniels 98, 99—— Facility with which beasts and sheep might be slaughtered in large numbers and sent to London as dead meat: advantages of such arrangement, ib. 114–135. 140–144. 147–153. 186——Better condition of the meat by the animal being killed at Harwich than in London, ib. 122. 126, 127. 148——Rates now paid for the conveyance of meat stock and of sheep from Rotterdam and Antwerp to London viâ Harwich, ib. 136–139.

Doubt as to the import being diminished if it were necessary to slaughter the cattle at the port of arrival, Daniels 144. 149, 150. 209–211——Proposed slaughtering of fat stock without quarantining them, ib. 161, 162. 178, 179——Explanation that the corporation of Harwich have no chartered markets for cattle or live meat, ib. 195–200——Doubt as to price of meat at Harwich having been affected by the restriction upon railway traffic in cattle, ib. 201–203.

Return handed in showing the quantity of cattle imported from the continent viâ Harwich from October 1863 to December 1865, Moseley, p. 43, and App. 387——Comparative statement of the cost of transit of oxen from Rotterdam to London with the slaughtering and incidental charges, and of the cost of transit to Harwich, with the slaughtering and the conveyance to London: saving of 2 s. 3 d. per head by the latter route, Moseley 1135–1139, and App. 387.

Particulars in connection with the comparative statements as handed in by witness, of the charges by the direct route from Rotterdam to London and by Harwich, the animals being slaughtered at the latter place and forwarded in the shape of dead meat, Pratt 3065–3077. 3098–3102. 3267——Account showing an excess of 15 s. 3 d. per head of oxen if conveyed by the Harwich route, ib. 3267.

Improved condition of the cattle by landing them at Harwich instead of bringing them to London by sea direct, Rudkin 6755–6759——Fear of infection from the trucks by the cattle being brought alive from Harwich to London by railway, Hudson 7350–7352. 7365–7371——Witness sees no danger in the railway transit of foreign beasts from Harwich to London, Fair 7586. See also Foreign Cattle.

Hennessy, Joseph. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Salesman and importer of Irish cattle at Bristol, 8061–8066——There is no foreign importation, 8064. 8115, 8116——Good condition in which the cattle arrive from Cork and other ports, 8067–8069——Suffering of the cattle through the delay in landing after arrival in the Bristol river; suggestions hereon, 8070, 8071. 8113——Occasional overcrowding of the store cattle in the vessels from Cork, &c., 8072. 8079——Suggested inspection of the vessels at the port of shipment in order to regulate the number of cattle on board; question hereon whether the number might not be prescribed by law with reference to the space available, 8073–8075. 8102–8108. 8126–8130. 8136–8138.

Modes of disposal at Bristol of the Irish store and fat cattle respectively; effect hereon of the restrictions upon removal of live stock from Bristol market, 8077–8097. 8117. 8118——Way in which the cattle are accommodated on board the steamers; practice of feeding and watering the fat cattle but not the store cattle, 8098–8100. 8109–8113. 8131–8133—— System of inspection of Irish cattle at Bristol, 8119–8122——Arrangements for cleansing and disinfecting the vessels, 8122–8125.

Herbert, Robert. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has for many years supplied most of the agricultural newspapers of London with the prices in the cattle and dead-meat markets, 5854–5858——Explanation as to the mode in which witness arrives at the prices; belief as to their fairness generally, 5859 et seq.——Good cause for complaint by the butchers, as to the quotations in some of the newspapers, 5872, 5873——Dissatisfaction of the consignors of cattle to the salesmen, through seeing higher prices quoted than they receive, 5876–5879. 5924–5926.

Statement of the present prices and of the supply of foreign cattle in the market, 5892–5901. 5970——Import indirectly of some Dutch beasts, 5897–5899——Light weight of the Spanish cattle, though very showy looking animals, 5901–5910——Character of the cattle imported from France, 5911. 5988–5997.——Increasing purchase of foreign cattle by the west-end butchers, the meat however being inferior to home-fed meat, and the animals being cheaper, 5912–5923——Doubt whether the prices could be better obtained through a committee of salesmen and butchers, 5927–5932.

Prevention of the cattle plague if there had been a separate market for foreign stock, 5933. 5961——Statement as to the rinderpest having appeared in Holland at various intervals for centuries past, 5934–5940——Approval on the whole of a separate market at the river side, though less convenient to buyers than the present system, 5491, 5942. 5958–5961——Opinion as to there being a decrease every year in the number of English beasts and sheep, 5943–5957. 5980–5983——Very few store cattle or milch cows coming into the London market, 5962–5969——Discontinuance of the supply of country killed meat meat in hot weather, 5971–5979——Further advance in prices but for the large foreign supply, 5984. 6017–6020——Very good foreign sheep which come to the London market, 5985–5987.

Slaughter of the chief quantity of the meat consumed in Paris in the abattoirs within the city, 5998, 5999——Number of cattle slaughtered weekly at Islington Market, and rates charged, 6000, 6001. 6008——Considerable inconvenience if butchers were compelled to use public slaughter-houses, 6002–6009——Disadvantages of the transmission of dead meat, as compared with live meat, by railway, 6009–6011——Total of about 4*s.* 6*d.* as the charge against the grazier in connection with the sale of each bullock in London, 6014–6016.

Hicks, Charles. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is chairman of the Foreign Cattle Trade Association, 4054–4056——Statement as to the great injury to the foreign trade if the cattle were sold in a separate market near the river side, 4057–4070——Monopoly of buyers and depreciation in the price of foreign cattle if no longer sold in the same market with home cattle, 4059–4062. 4087–4089. 4103–4106. 4112–4122——Decided objection to its being imperative to use public slaughter-houses exclusively; injurious monopoly in such case in the hands of the larger buyers, 4062, 4063. 4103–4125.

Unsatisfactory operation of the restrictions in Paris upon the subject of slaughter-houses, 4063–4065. 4107–4110——Grounds for concluding that the rinderpest did not come into this country from abroad, 4071–4086. 4090–4102——Period of incubation of the cattle plague adverted to in support of the conclusion that the plague was not introduced from Hungary or Bohemia, 4071–4085——Instances of a few infected cattle from Holland, the infection having in the first instance been conveyed from this country to Holland, 4085. 4090–4099——Comment upon the practice in regard to the slaughtering of animals having the foot and mouth disease when landed; loss suffered on these occasions, 4123, 4124.

[Second Examination.]—Explanation relative to the passport given with the cattle from Bohemia, 5319——Statement as to the heavy loss suffered upon a cargo of cattle from Sweden in August 1865, through the inspector having reported that two of the animals had rinderpest, so that the whole cargo was quarantined; sound state of the cattle suspected of the disease, 5319–5330. 5341–5343——Difficulty as to the supply of suitable food for fat cattle if they were all quarantined, 5331–5341.

Opinion that for the present the import trade should be confined to cattle intended for slaughter within a short time after they were bought, 5344–5350——Restrictions desirable in regard to the import of milch cows, 5348——Approval of a short quarantine in the case of store cattle, 5348, 5349——Regulation suggested in regard to foreign fat cattle conveyed into the country being killed in a given time, 5350.

Prevalence of the foot and mouth disease in England before any foreign cattle were imported, 5350——Frequency of Scotch cattle suffering from this disease, ib.——Peculiar prevalence of the disease about Christmas, 5350, 5351——Reference to a paper containing information relative to the abattoirs in Paris; their injurious effect upon the retail trade, 5352–5354.

Higgins, James. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is inspector of meat and slaughter-houses at Leeds, 7024–7029——Total of about 130 private slaughter-houses in Leeds, there being also six large slaughter-houses in the centre of the town, 7030–7033——Establishment of a dead-meat market in the town during the restrictions upon the transit of live stock; good supply of this market, 7034–7044——Deficient supply lately, owing to foreign cattle being diverted from Hull to the London live market, whilst the home supply is nearly exhausted, 7045–7065.

Very high price of meat in Leeds at the present time, 7061, 7062. 7070——Purchase of supplies of dead meat in Hull, London, and Liverpool, whilst some butchers have gone to Hamburgh for live cattle; temporary fall in prices through a temporary over supply from these sources, 7066–7069. 7084–7103——Injury to health from private slaughter-houses in large towns, 7071, 7072——Grounds for concluding that butchers in large towns would not suffer if required to use public slaughter-houses, 7072–7083——Any concession, as regards private slaughter-houses, should be in favour of retail butchers rather than of carcase butchers, 7077, 7078.

Higgins, Samuel. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Butcher and cattle dealer at Leeds, 5675——Discontinuance of the transmission of dead meat from Leeds to London, owing to the short supply at the former place, 5676, 5677. 5692——Ample slaughter-house accommodation at Leeds if all the meat used in Leeds and in the adjacent towns were slaughtered there, 5678–5683——Approval of a supply of live cattle from Hull to Wakefield and other towns, as well as to Leeds, 5678. 5703–5709——Failure in the supply of cattle to Leeds from the north, and from Ireland, whilst there are hardly any to be had from the surrounding districts, 5683–5686.

Evidence in support of the proposal that live foreign cattle be permitted to come from Hull to Leeds, there to be slaughtered, 5687 et seq.——Impracticability of supplying

Leeds with dead meat from London or from Hull in hot weather, 5687. 5693-5701——Considerable advance in the price of meat at Leeds, owing to the existing restrictions, 5689-5692. 5710.

Great additional expense of the carriage of dead meat as compared with live meat, 5701——Serious objection to a dead meat supply, as preventing the satisfactory disposal of the offal, ib.——Belief as to there being no risk of infection by allowing cattle landed at Hull to go on to Leeds, 5702, 5703——Contemplated supply of from 200 to 300 foreign cattle weekly, according to the demand, 5711-5714——Approval of slaughtering in public slaughter-houses at Leeds, there being, in fact, hardly any small private slaughter-houses there, 5715-5721.

Hirschler, A. E. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Resides at Vienna; is an exporter of cattle from Austria, 4126-4129——Practice of sending the lean cattle to be fattened at beet-root-sugar manufactories in Bohemia and Moravia, 4130-4137. 4141——Export of the cattle to England by way of Bremen; particulars hereon as to the route taken, the time occupied, and the arrangements for feeding and watering the animals at Eisenbach and at Bremen, 4131. 4142-4161. 4168-4177. 4242-4244——Information as to the quality and size of the cattle from Hungary and Austria, and the prices fetched by them in the London market, 4136-4140. 4181-4183. 4252-4254.

Very strict regulations in Austria and on the German frontier for the prevention of cattle plague, 4151-4154. 4202-4215. 4239-4241——Character of the vessels in which the cattle are conveyed from Bremen; times occupied in the passage to London, 4161-4164——Total of about 5*l.* per head, as the expense per head from Vienna to London, 4165-4167——Loss of about one per cent. of the animals from Vienna, 4168-4170. 4180.

Careful inspection at Bremen in order to prevent the shipment of animals with the foot and mouth disease; very little of this disease in Austria, 4178, 4179. 4184——Various parts of the country whence the cattle are bought, and exported to England, 4185-4199. 4245-4251——Very little lung disease in Austria or Hungary, 4200, 4201——Impression that there has been no rinderpest in Austria for the last three years, 4202. 4229-4233——Great difficulty in accounting for the rinderpest, and its appearance in Austria or Hungary, 4203-4215.

Statement as to private slaughter-houses having been abolished in Vienna, there being public abattoirs close to the cattle market, 4216-4228——Prohibition upon imports to England from Holland, so that cattle from Vienna are not now sent through Holland, but only through the Zollverein, 4234-4239.

Holland. Account submitted by Mr. Robinson showing the number of beasts, calves, pigs, horses, and sheep brought from Holland, &c. to London during the year 1865, App. 307-314.——See also Dead Meat, 6. Dutch Cattle. Rotterdam.

Holmans, Stephen Giles. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is colleague of Mr. Simmonds, as Customs Inspector of foreign cattle in the port of London, 3593-3596——Considers that foreign cattle with the foot and mouth disease should be allowed to go into the London market, save in extreme cases, when they should at once be slaughtered, 3597-3600——Opinion that eczema, or the foot and mouth disease, is not entirely a foreign importation, 3601-3607. 3610-3612——Belief that rinderpest is a foreign disease, 3608, 3609.

Very little room for improvement in the accommodation for cattle on board ship, 3613-3620——Advantage if the cattle could always be fed and watered on board; impracticability of this when there are large numbers close together, 3614-3618——Opinion that save in the case of animals direct from Russia, no necessity has been shown for a quarantine, with reference to the cattle plague, 3621-3631——Conclusion as regards the cattle plague in Holland, that it was taken there by some animals returned from the London market, 3621-3623. 3631.

Holmans, Mr. Report from Mr. Holmans to the Commissioners of Customs, dated 19th April 1866, with reference to the regulations in force as regards foreign cattle, and in disapproval of the detention of animals suffering from the foot and mouth disease, App. 304, 305.

Hönck, John. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is largely concerned as consignee of foreign cattle in the port of London, 1664-1666——Various countries and ports whence cattle are consigned to witness, his trade being chiefly in fat stock for the London market, 1667-1675——Very suitable character of most of the vessels in which the animals are conveyed, so that there is not much suffering or injury, except when the weather is very stormy, 1676-1692——Several wharves at which the cattle brought direct by sea to London are landed, 1693-1695.

Character of the inspection of the animals when landed; belief as to its efficiency, though 1,000 head of oxen and sheep may sometimes be examined in a couple of hours,

1696–1704. 1809–1825. 1875–1892. 1923–1943——Check to the import of animals having the foot and mouth disease on account of the rigorous inspection exercised, a large number of such animals having been stopped, 1705–1712——Witness has had no animal stopped from rinderpest, 1713——Inspection now in force at the ports of shipment in Germany and Holland, 1714–1716.

Care taken in regard to the feeding and watering of the animals during the Continental railway transit, 1717–1720——Opinion as to its being feasible to water and feed the animals in the railway trucks, 1721–1725——Landing of the animals at Blackwall, &c. mostly on Saturdays, 1726, 1727——Route taken in driving the animals from Blackwall to the cattle market; complaints made on this score, 1728–1731——Slaughter of the animals chiefly at private slaughter-houses scattered throughout the metropolis; convenience and economy thereby to the butchers as compared with the use of a public slaughter-house, 1732 et seq. 1944–1955——Prohibition in Paris of the use of private slaughter-houses, 1743–1745.

Facility of inspection of dead meat if there were but one large slaughter-house, 1746–1749——Grounds for strongly objecting to the slaughtering of all foreign cattle near the river or place of landing instead of at the Islington market and the private slaughter-houses; examination in detail hereon, 1750–1782. 1826–1869. 1898–1908. 2009–2030——Effect of compulsory slaughtering at the river side in checking the importation, 1758——Instance of depreciation of price at Harwich through the slaughtering of the animals there, 1759–1763——Limited advantage as regards disposal of the offal, hides, &c. by having one large slaughter-house, 1764–1779.

Belief that there is no proof of the rinderpest having come from abroad; witness is confident it was not brought by the cargo from Revel imported by him, 1783–1785. 2031–2033——Doubt as to the foot and mouth disease having been brought from abroad, 1786–1788——Opinion that the lung disease did not come from abroad, 1789–1796.

Practice of placing foreign cattle in lairs or fields about Bow on their way to the Islington market, 1797–1806——Arrangements as to the inspection of Dutch cows and of fat stock coming together in the vessels of the General Steam Navigation Company to Brown's Wharf; belief that the whole cargo would always have been stopped if one case of rinderpest were detected, 1808–1825——Loss to the importers if there were separate markets for foreign cattle and home cattle, as there would not be the same competition as at present; prejudice also to buyers, 1837–1841. 1903–1907. 1993–1998. 2004–2008——Circumstance of the foreign cattle being largely bought by wholesale butchers and by contractors, for whom a market near the river side would probably be more convenient than at Islington, 1842–1869.

Higher price of English meat than of foreign meat to the extent of about one halfpenny per pound, 1872–1874. 1974——Instances of cargoes being stopped and slaughtered by order of the inspector; great loss in such cases, the meat being sold at a great reduction of price, 1875–1882. 1893–1897——Approval of a Government inspection of all vessels in the cattle trade; interest, however, of the owners to have suitable and well-fitted vessels, 1909–1914. 1999–2003——Exceptional instances of the employment of vessels not properly fitted, 1910. 1982–1992.

As regards the way in which hides are exposed and the horns cut off, at Leadenhall Market, witness is not aware that the public health is likely to be affected thereby, 1915–1922——Oppressive temperature in the holds of some of the vessels; opinion as to the facility, nevertheless, of detecting whether the animals, on leaving the vessels, are diseased or unhealthy, 1927–1935——Advantage to the butcher in getting the live meat rather than dead meat, 1944–1955. 1961–1963——Great irregularity in the meat supply of London, if dependent on dead meat markets, the quality of the meat being also injured by railway transit, 1950–1955. 1961–1963. 2012–2017. 2043–2047.

Good condition in which the cattle from Scotland arrive, both by boat and railway, 1956–1960——Reference to the system of inspection of dead meat in Paris, 1967–1973——Considerable importation recently of some very fine fat cattle from France, 1975–1981——Objection to the foreign cattle being all slaughtered near the river, even if there were no market for live cattle at Islington, 2009–2030——Arrangements on the Continent as to the transmission of cattle from Hungary, &c. to the port of shipment; inspection exercised with reference to the cattle plague, 2034–2042.

Hudson, Thomas. (Analysis of his Evidence).—Farmer and grazier at Castleacre, in Norfolk, 7289–7294——Sources of witness's supply of lambs and of beasts for grazing; he does not buy any foreign stock, 7295–7299——Considerable losses from cattle plague in witness's neighbourhood, 7300——Reasons for objecting to send dead meat to the London market, in lieu of the live animals; loss in sending the slaughtered stock, whilst there would be no means of disposing of the offal locally, 7301–7324. 7387–7389. 7398–7406.

Statement in support of the quarantining of all foreign store cattle; that is, with reference only to rinderpest, 7325–7347. 7375–7380. 7418–7421——Witness would not stop whole cargoes at the port of landing for the foot and mouth disease, but only those animals which had the disease, 7335–7342——Effect of large fairs in spreading this disease; illustration in Norfolk, 7335–7337. 7372–7374——Expediency of all foreign fat stock being slaughtered at the ports, 7347. 7350–7358——Advantage of limiting the number of ports at which foreign cattle should come in, 7347–7349——Fear of infection from the trucks by the cattle being brought alive from Harwich to London by railway, 7350–7352. 7365–7371.

Absence of disadvantage by having a separate market for foreign cattle near the river side, where landed, 7359–7384——Limitation of the supply from Norfolk to London to particular months in the year, 7381–7386——Import of foreign cattle and Irish cattle to Norfolk for feeding, 7390–7393——Comparatively slight importance attached to the foot and mouth disease, 7394–7397——Probability of foreign animals being still sent in equal numbers, if not diseased, even though restrictions in the way of quarantine, &c. should be enforced, 7407–7421.

Reasons for its being impracticable to supply dead meat from witness's locality to London without loss, though it may be done from Hull and Harwich, 7422–7431. 7445–7447——Belief as to the cattle plague being owing to the import of foreign animals, 7432——Objection to the free import of foreign cattle to Ireland; mode in which the disease may have been introduced into Ireland irrespectively of foreign or English cattle, 7432–7443.

Liability of foreign animals to pleuro-pneumonia, 7443——Very little trade in store stock in Norfolk during the spring of the present year, 7448, 7449——Objection to the small local markets being abolished; respects in which they operate very beneficially, 7450–7460——Practice of witness to consign the animals from his farm to salesmen at the Metropolitan Market, 7461, 7462.

Huger, Francois. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is agent for the Great Eastern Railway Company at Antwerp, 1294——Prohibition upon German and Dutch cattle passing through Belgium, so that only sheep and pigs are now sent from Antwerp to Harwich, 1295–1301——Expected removal shortly of the prohibition upon the transit of German cattle through Belgium, 1301. 1359——Export of 400 German beasts weekly from Antwerp to Harwich previously to the present restrictions; prospect of the trade increasing when the restrictions are removed, 1302. 1314–1321.

Good condition of the German cattle on arrival at Antwerp, very few having any disease, 1303. 1311–1313. 1343–1347. 1363–1365——Arrangements as to inspection at Antwerp; effectual check upon the shipment of diseased animals, 1304–1313. 1342–1348——Accommodation of the cattle in lairs before shipment, 1323——Doubt whether the trade from Antwerp would be affected by a requirement that the animals must be killed at the port of arrival in England; that is, unless it be required that they must be killed immediately, 1324–1333.

Very good arrangements in the vessels from Antwerp, so that the cattle do not suffer, 1334——Practice of watering and feeding the cattle in transit from Germany to Antwerp, but not in the railway trucks, 1335–1338——Considerable number of sheep exported from Antwerp; inspection to which subjected, 1339–1342. 1348——Small number of beasts suffering from the foot and mouth disease on arrival at Antwerp; prohibition upon the export of these, 1343–1347. 1349–1352——Removal of the former restriction upon French cattle passing through the Belgium, 1358, 1359——Witness has not seen any cases of pleuro-pneumonia among the French cattle, 1360——Few cattle which used to be shipped from Antwerp to London, 1361, 1362.

Hull. Considerable import of oxen and sheep to Hull from Hamburgh and other German ports; and also from Holland, until the recent prohibition, Coulson 2050–2055——Good condition in which the cattle generally arrive, Coulson 2074; Lockwood 2412–2416; Valentine 2599–2603; Torr 7249, 7250——Want of improved facilities for landing at Hull, Coulson 2094. 2152–2155; Malcolm 2311–2316; Valentine 2620–2623——Practice of disposing of the cattle and sheep partly by selling them alive in different directions, and partly by a dead-meat trade with London, Manchester, and other towns, Coulson 2095–2124.

Satisfactory inspection of foreign cattle at Hull, Coulson 2114, 2115. 2181–2184——Competent inspection of dead meat, ib. 2125–2128——Import of about 1,000 animals weekly, ib. 2185–2187——Way in which witness disposes of the animals after landing before selling them to jobbers and others, ib. 2214–2224.

Statistics of the imports of cattle to Hull from Hamburgh and other ports in the last three years; rapid increase going on, Malcolm 2297–2304——Improvement required in the accommodation after landing; steps being taken on this score, ib. 2317–2328.

Witness inspects for the Customs and for the corporation of Hull all foreign cattle landed at that port, Lockwood 2409–2411——Improved accommodation required for the animals when landed; also in landing them, ib. 2446–2457——Witness has not experienced any inconvenience or nuisance from the Hull slaughter-houses, ib. 2550–2557.

Ample

Hull—continued.

Ample and satisfactory accommodation in the slaughter-houses at Hull; disapproval of their being superseded by a public slaughter-house, Valentine 2573–2583. 2664–2667——Good state of public health in the town, ib. 2584–2586——Very efficient inspection of foreign cattle on arrival, ib. 2587, 2588. 2599–2602——Inspection by witness of all the dead meat; very rare instances of any unfit or condemned meat, ib. 2589–2593. 2647–2661.

Adequacy generally of the slaughtering accommodation in Hull and Liverpool, Dickenson 2795–2798. 2845–2849. 2860——Statement as to there having been no case of cattle plague at Hull for some considerable time, Swales 5581; Higgins 5702.

Hungarian Cattle. Arrival of cattle at Rotterdam from Silesia, and even from Hungary, for export to this country, Peters 1244. 1267, 1268. 1277——Statement as to cattle coming direct from Hungary to the Metropolitan Market, Read 1654, 1655——Grounds for concluding that the cattle plague has not been imported with any beasts from Hungary, Simmonds 3557–3563. 3571, 3572——The Hungarian cattle are particularly healthy, ib. 3571, 3572.——See also Austria.

Hunt, Charles. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is Comptroller of the Out-door Department of the Customs, 8387——The department acts, as regards the importation of foreign cattle, under the Orders of the Privy Council; witness will lay these before the Committee, 8388–8402——Difficulty of enforcing regulations as to the space of cubic feet to be allotted to each animal in the cattle ships; way in which the number carried might, however, be checked, 8403–8410——Means of enforcing proper ventilation, and of alleviating the distress from overcrowding, 8404. 8411–8414——Distress generally from bad weather, rather than from overcrowding or defective ventilation, 8411–8422.

Advantage if the cattle were landed lower down the river, at Dagenham or Thames Haven, there being more accommodation available than at the present landing-places, 8423–8429. 8462–8468——Communication by witness to the veterinary inspectors of the Orders of the Privy Council, the inspectors not being in any way under witness's control, 8430–8435——Facility given by the Customs to the landing of cattle at any hour, their inspection, however, only taking place during daylight, 8436–8440——Facility given also to the landing of dead meat, 8441–8443.

Considerations subject to which it might be desirable to limit the ports at which foreign cattle should be landed, 8444–8453——Effect of quarantine in causing a healthier class of animals to be imported, 8457. 8469, 8470——Quarantine is not necessary for animals intended for immediate slaughter, 8458–8461——Want of better accommodation for inspection at the wharves, 8462–8466——Very small per-centage of disease in foreign cattle, 8470–8473——Necessary approval by the Board of Customs of the ports for the landing of cattle, 8474–8480——Instances of foreign cattle having the rinderpest on being landed, 8481, 8482.

Hutcheson, James. (Analysis of his Evidence).—Butcher at Inverury, near Aberdeen; does business entirely with London, 6214–6221——Conveyance of the meat from Inverury to London by railway in about thirty-eight hours, 6222, 6223——Practice of sending the meat throughout the year, though at a considerable risk when the weather is hot, 6224–6230——The meat is sent in sides and is packed in cloths, 6231, 6232——Disposal of the offal by sending it to Aberdeen and Dundee, the blood being wasted, 6233–6237. 6269——Advantage if there were public slaughter-houses at Inverury, the trade being greatly on the increase, 6237–6240.

Much more cattle available for killing in Aberdeenshire in the winter and spring than in the summer, 6241–6244——Limited number of live cattle now sent from Inverury to London, it being more profitable on the whole to send dead meat, 6245. 6271–6278——Use of the telegraph between the salesman in London and witness, in order to regulate the supply, 6246–6248——Practice of consigning to different salesmen when large quantities are sent, 6249–6251——Arrangement as to the interval between slaughtering the meat and sending it off, 6252–6257.

Custom in regard to the purchase of the animals from the farmers, instead of at markets, 6258–6269——As a rule, the whole of the beast, except the offal, is sent to London, 6270——Considerable trade in dead meat from places north of Inverury to London, 6279–6285——Advantage to the farmers in selling the live animals to the butcher, rather than in themselves slaughtering and sending the dead meat to London, 6286–6292.

INSPECTION:

1. Foreign Cattle on Arrival in London.
2. Slaughter-houses and Dead Meat.

1. Foreign Cattle on Arrival in London:

Character of the inspection of the animals when landed in the port of London; belief as to its efficiency, though 1,000 head of oxen and sheep may sometimes be examined in a couple of hours, Hönck 1696–1704. 1809–1825. 1875. 1892. 1923–1943——Arrangements as to the inspection of Dutch cows, and of fat stock coming together in the vessels of the General Steam Navigation Company to Brown's Wharf; belief that the whole cargo would always have been stopped if one case of rinderpest were detected, ib. 1808–1825——Instances of cargoes being stopped and slaughtered by order of the inspector; great loss in such cases, the meat being sold at a great reduction of price, ib. 1875–1882. 1893–1897——Opinion as to facility of detecting whether the animals on being landed are healthy, notwithstanding the oppressive temperature in the holds of some of the vessels, ib. 1927–1935.

Advantage if fat cattle were kept for twelve hours before inspection, it being very difficult to judge of their real condition just after leaving the holds of the vessels in a hot state, Lockwood 2465–2481. 2504–2509——Independent inspection on arrival in London, irrespectively of the foreign inspection, Pratt 3021——Strict inspection in London for the last three or four years, Robinson 3356–3358.

Witness, who is Customs inspector of foreign cattle in the port of London, inspects each beast separately when landed on the wharf, Simmonds 3415–3420——Practice of keeping back and slaughtering animals having the foot and mouth disease, or the lung disease, the rest of the cargo being allowed to proceed, ib. 3420–3429——Slaughter of the whole cargo when any animal has the cattle plague, ib. 3424. 3430–3434——General character of the inspection by witness and his colleague; obstacle to rendering it more efficient unless the animals are quarantined, ib. 3573–3583.

Communication by witness to the veterinary inspectors of the orders of the Privy Council, the inspectors not being in any way under witness's control, Hunt 8430–8435——Want of better accommodation for inspection at the wharves, ib. 8470–8473.

Conclusion of the Committee as to the effectual manner in which the inspection of foreign cattle is on the whole carried out, Rep. v, vi.

2. Slaughter-houses and Dead Meat:

Facility of inspection of dead meat if there were but one large slaughter-house, Hönck 1746–1749——Very effective supervision which might be exercised over the meat sold in the metropolis if the animals were necessarily slaughtered in public slaughter-houses, Letheby 3859, 3860. 3875.

Character of the inspection by the City of London over the animals at the Metropolitan Market, Letheby 3888, 3889——Importance of an inspection of all dead animals with reference to the detection of disease, ib. 4037–4048——System of inspection of the animal when dead as well as when alive, in Switzerland, Prussia, &c. ib. 4048–4050. 4053.

Important advantage of public slaughter-houses as facilitating a proper inspection of dead meat, Simon 5021–5023. 5051——Character of the twofold inspection formerly of slaughter-houses and of dead meat markets in the City, ib. 5024–5031——The inspection of slaughter-houses in the City is doubtless much better than it used to be, ib. 5070.

Approval of efficient inspection, so as to prevent private slaughter-houses being injurious to health, Slater 5180–5185——Inspection now applied to slaughter-houses, which are for the most part kept clean and wholesome, Bannister 5276, 5277. 5303–5307.

Sundry particulars in report by Dr. Letheby as to the system of inspection of dead meat markets in foreign countries, App. 316–318.

Recommendation by the Committee that the system of inspection at present existing in the City of London be extended to the whole metropolitan district, Rep. v.——Obstacle to an entirely satisfactory inspection of meat until all meat is killed in specified public slaughter-houses, ib.

Inverury.

Inverury. Advantage if there were public slaughter houses at Inverury, the trade being greatly on the increase, Hutcheson 6237-6240——In the year ending 31 March last there were 4,065 beasts killed in the town, ib. 6239.

Ireland. Objection to the free import of foreign cattle to Ireland; mode in which the disease may have been introduced into Ireland irrespectively of foreign or English cattle, Hudson 7432-7443——Opinion that the live stock in the country is larger than usual at the present time, Walsh 7865——Very little import of foreign cattle to Ireland, ib. 7878, 7879——Difficulty in the way of a satisfactory inspection at fairs in Ireland, as a check upon the spread of disease, Walsh 7882-7884; Garnett 7942-7945.

Orders in Council of 25 August and 30 September 1865, prohibiting the removal of cattle from Great Britain to Ireland, App. 341, 342. 347——Order in Council of 20 January 1866, making provisions for checking the spread of the cattle plague to Ireland, ib. 354, 355.

IRISH CATTLE (EXPORT TO ENGLAND):

1. As to the Railway Arrangements in Ireland.
2. Feeding and Watering of the Cattle before Shipment.
3. As to the Accommodation and Treatment in the Steamers.
4. Condition on Arrival in England.
5. Large Export to this Country; Effect hereon of the recent Restrictions upon Transit.
6. Other Details generally.

1. As to the Railway Arrangements in Ireland:

Very bad treatment to which Irish store cattle have been subjected, both on the Irish railways and on board ship, more especially on the railways, Walsh 7768-7774. 7805-7832——Undue detention of the cattle in the railway trucks, whilst they are constantly overcrowded and badly treated by the railway servants, ib. 7768-7771. 7780-7785. 7805-7815. 7824-7132. 7870-7877——Instances of fat cattle not being properly conveyed on the Irish railways, ib. 7861-7871——Doubt as to any great convenience by bringing the cattle in Dublin down to the place of embarkation by railway, Watson 8050-8054.

2. Feeding and Watering of the Cattle before Shipment:

Practice in Dublin of watering and feeding the cattle before they are placed on board, Walsh 7774.

3. As to the Accommodation and Treatment in the Steamers:

Nature of the facilities for conveying Irish cattle to Liverpool; objection to the route viâ Holyhead, Cullen 612-616——Details as to the boats used in the Irish trade, as to the accommodation on board, the care of the cattle, and their condition on arrival at Liverpool, ib. 613. 697 et seq.——Advantage of larger vessels for conveying the cattle, ib. 613——Opinion that it is not necessary to license the vessels for a limited number of cattle, ib. 734-736.

Particulars relative to the conveyance of Irish cattle by sea; good accommodation and careful treatment on board the boats to Holyhead, Salmon 1102-1126——Advantage in sending the Irish cattle by Holyhead instead of by Liverpool, ib. 1111-1114. 1129, 1130——Very bad way in which Irish cattle used to be conveyed across the Channel, Read 1585-1587. 1622, 1623. 1650.

Improved accommodation lately in the Irish cattle ships to Liverpool, further improvements being, however, required, Aungier 2883-2892. 2924-2946——Better conveyance of the animals if the vessels were broader in the beam, and were built less for speed, ib. 2886-2892——Very bad ventilation and very crowded state, formerly, of the vessels conveying cattle between Ireland and England, some of the steamers still carrying an unduly large number of cattle, ib. 2924-2943——Protection now afforded on the deck of the vessels from Ireland, so that the cattle arrive in better condition, ib. 2944-2946——Cleansing of the vessels after the discharge of each cargo, ib. 2953, 2954.

Suggested inspection of the cattle ships between Dublin and England, so as to prevent overcrowding; satisfactory character, however, of the arrangements in most of the Irish cattle vessels, Walsh 7756, 7757. 7764-7767. 7821-7823——Better treatment in the steamers than in the railways, ib. 7821-7824.

Overcrowding of the steamers at times, so that it is very desirable to license them for a limited number of cattle, Garnett 7917. 7920. 7935-7941. 7981-7983.

Details relative to the accommodation on board the cattle vessels between Dublin and Liverpool; due care taken of the animals, Watson 7993 et seq.

Occasional overcrowding of the store cattle, Hennessy 8072. 8076——Suggested inspection of the Irish cattle vessels at the port of shipment in order to regulate the number of cattle on board; question hereon whether the number might not be prescribed by law with reference to the space available, ib. 8073-8075. 8102-8108. 8126-8130. 8136-8138

3. As to the Accommodation and Treatment in the Steamers—continued.

——Way in which the cattle are accommodated on board the steamers; practice of feeding and watering the fat cattle, but not the store cattle, Hennessy 8098–8100. 8109–8113. 8131–8133——Arrangements for cleansing and disinfecting the vessels, ib. 8122–8125.

Instances of defective accommodation and bad treatment of the cattle in the vessels from Ireland, Wilkinson 8205–8213.

Reference by the Committee to the overcrowding, at times, in the vessels from Ireland, Rep. iii——Regulations suggested as to the ventilation, cleansing, &c., of the vessels, ib. iv.

4. Condition on Arrival in England:

Less satisfactory condition in which the cattle arrive at Liverpool from the eastern ports of Ireland than from the western ports, Cullen 694, 695——Better condition in which the cattle arrive in summer than in winter, ib. 737, 738——Bad condition in which the Irish cattle arrive at Liverpool, they being much abused during the loading in Ireland, and greatly bruised on the passage, Hall 778. 811–815. 838–841. 954, 955.

Better state in which cattle arrive in the Irish boats than in the boats from ports of Scotland, Salmon 1120–1125——Satisfactory condition on the whole in which cattle arrive from Ireland, ib. 1127–1134.

Bruised and injured state of the Irish cattle occasionally, Aungier 2886. 2891–2893——Tendency to disease through exposure on deck, ib. 2947–2949.

Good condition in which cattle are imported direct from Ireland to London, Robinson 4405–4407——Very good condition in which witness's cattle arrive in Liverpool, there being almost an entire exemption from loss on the passage, Garnett 7917–7923——Good condition in which the cattle arrive at Bristol, Hennessy 8067–8069.

5. Large Export to this Country; Effect hereon of the recent Restrictions upon Transit:

Considerable number of lean stock which used to come from Ireland to Liverpool, these being at once forwarded to the feeding districts, Cullen 582–585——Supply of Irish fat cattle, through Liverpool to Manchester, Leeds, &c., ib. 586. 588——Large majority of the cattle in the Liverpool market which come from Ireland, Cullen 692; Aungier 2978–2981——In 1865 there were 120,000 from Irish ports, Aungier 2981.

Prejudicial interference with the Irish trade through the restrictions upon the transit of live stock from Liverpool, Walsh 7788–7795; Garnett 7927–7934——Tendency of the restrictions upon transit from Liverpool to diminish the export of fat stock from Ireland, Watson 8005–8008.

6. Other Details generally:

Good quality of the Irish cattle, if not injured before import, Hall 838–841——Restive character of Irish cattle, owing to which they often get bruised in transit, Salmon 1092. 1128——Very fine cattle imported from Ireland, Read 1659, 1660——Good class and good condition of the cattle from the eastern ports of Ireland, Aungier 2972–2976.

Good condition in which the cattle are brought to the port of Dublin for shipment; various ports of Ireland whence they come, Walsh 7758–7761——Some cattle are consigned to salesmen in Dublin, by whom they are sold to dealers, and some go direct to salesmen in Liverpool, ib. 7762, 7763——Good prices fetched by store cattle in Ireland during the spring of the present year, ib. 7775, 7776——Increased price of fat cattle; serious rise recently, ib. 7777–7779. 7786, 7787.

Transmission of grass-fed cattle to England for about seven months in the year, and of stall-fed cattle for the rest of the year, Walsh 7838–7846——Practice generally of consigning the fat cattle to salesmen in Dublin or Liverpool, instead of sending them to fairs, ib. 7847–7855——Way in which the trade in Irish store cattle is carried on; that is irrespectively of salesmen, ib. 7856–7864.

Isle of Grain. Statement as to the several advantages of the Isle of Grain, near Sheerness, as the landing place for foreign cattle, the fat cattle being slaughtered there, and the lean stock being quarantined, Wilson 6400–6438——Superiority of the Isle of Grain over the Plaistow Marshes, Thames Haven, or any other site down the river, for the landing, quarantining, &c., of foreign cattle, ib. 6417–6428.

Isle of Man. Proclamation by the lieutenant governor of the Isle of Man, dated 18 October 1865, prohibiting the importation of cattle, sheep, &c., into the island, and also the exportation of the same to Ireland, App. 348, 349.

J.

Jews. Careful examination by the Jews of the carcases used by them, all animals with the lung disease being rejected, but not animals with the foot and mouth disease, Woodley 4917-4925. 4932, 4933.

Jutland. Import of some very fine beasts from Jutland, Bannister 5258. 5314.

K.

Kent. Great difficulty experienced by butchers in Kent and other parts in obtaining an adequate supply of meat; question hereon as to the local prices having risen to any marked extent, Giblett 4622-4625. 4659-4681.

Statement as to the supplies of cattle in Kent being almost exhausted, so that unless the restrictions upon the transit of live stock are removed, great difficulty will be experienced by the butchers, Betts 6078-6119——Very little cattle-grazing in Kent, there being hardly any beasts now in the county, ib. 6101. 6112. 6145.

Trifling amount of cattle plague in the county, though largely dependent upon the Metropolitan Market for its supply, Betts 6141-6145——Expediency of the butchers in Kent being allowed to bring live cattle from London or elsewhere, and to slaughter them at home, ib. 6142.

Very few beasts now to be bought in Kent from the marsh districts, Wakefield 6197-6199——Consideration of a statement showing that Kent is not peculiarly badly off in the supply of beasts and milch cows, Betts 6200-6210——Admission as to the large supply of sheep in the county, ib. 6211-6213.

L.

Lairs. Practice of placing foreign cattle in lairs or fields about Bow, on their way to the Islington Market, Hönck 1797-1806——Immense lairage required if all the slaughtering were done at the Metropolitan Market, Woodley 4847-4852——Difficulty as regards lairage accommodation at public slaughter-houses, Pickworth 5006-5009——Explanation as to the accommodation in the lairs before the animals are sent into the Metropolitan Market, Rudkin 6456-6459.

Landing of Foreign Cattle. Several wharves at which the cattle brought direct by sea to London are landed, Hönck 1693-1695——Landing of the animals at Blackwall, &c., mostly on Saturdays, ib. 1726, 1727——Particulars relative to the arrangements for the landing of cattle at the wharves used by the General Steam Navigation Company, Pratt 3054-3058. 3169-3181——Advantage if the cattle were landed lower down the river, at Dagenham or Thames Haven, the accommodation at the present landing-places being very insufficient, Hunt 8423-8429. 8462-8468.

Conclusion of the Committee as to the advantage of the cattle being landed lower down the river than at present, and being brought up by rail, Rep. vi.

Leadenhall Market. As regards the way in which hides are exposed and the horns cut off at Leadenhall Market, witness is not aware that the public health is likely to be affected thereby, Hönck 1915-1922——Strong condemnation of the practice in disposing of the hides at Leadenhall Market; witness has frequently complained on this subject, Letheby 3940-3943.

Account of the meat, game, and poultry condemned at the market during the years 1861-65, App. 321.

Return of the tolls levied at the market, and of the produce thereof, in the years 1861-65, App. 328.

Leeds:

1. Limited Supplies of Live Cattle in Leeds Market since the Restrictions on Transit from Hull.
2. Suggestions for the Removal of these Restrictions.
3. Slaughter-house Accommodation.
4. Dead Meat Supply.

1. Limited Supplies of Live Cattle in Leeds Market since the Restrictions on Transit from Hull:

Supply of nearly a million of people from Leeds Cattle Market, Swales 5551, 5552. 5622-5625——Very inadequate supply of live cattle in Leeds since the restrictions upon transit from Hull to Leeds; consequent advance in the price of meat, there being every prospect of a further advance, Swales 5553–5578. 5587. 5600–5603. 5616–5621. 5640–5645—— The cattle now come chiefly from Northumberland and Scotland, ib. 5553, 5554. 5644, 5645——Limited supply obtainable from the grazing districts adjacent to Leeds, ib. 5554. 5558–5563——The normal demand is about 500 cattle a week, the supply being now only from 180 to 190, ib. 5555. 5557. 5640–5643——Circumstance of the supply of Irish cattle in Leeds Market having ceased, ib. 5670–5674.

1. Limited Supplies of Live Cattle in Leeds Market, &c.—continued.

Failure in the supply of cattle to Leeds from the North and from Ireland, whilst there are hardly any to be had from the surrounding districts, S. Higgins 5683–5686—— Considerable advance in the price of meat at Leeds owing to the existing restrictions, ib. 5689–5692. 5710.

Deficient supply lately, owing to foreign cattle being diverted from Hull to the London live market, whilst the home supply is nearly exhausted, J. Higgins 7045–7065——Very high price of meat in Leeds at the present time, ib. 7061, 7062. 7070——The average supply of beasts for the borough should be from 500 to 600, but is now only about 200, ib. 7063–7065.

2. Suggestions for the Removal of these Restrictions:

Witness submits that healthy live cattle should be allowed to come from Hull to Leeds, there to be slaughtered for the supply of Leeds and the adjacent towns, Swales 5579 et seq.——Belief as to there being no risk of infection by allowing cattle landed at Hull to go on to Leeds, Swales 5581; S. Higgins 5702, 5703.

Evidence in support of the proposal that live foreign cattle be permitted to come from Hull to Leeds, there to be slaughtered, S. Higgins 5687 et seq.——Contemplated supply of from 200 to 300 foreign cattle weekly according to the demand, ib. 5711–5714.

3. Slaughter-house Accommodation:

Accommodation in Leeds for slaughtering the cattle: willingness of the local authorities to provide improved facilities if there were a large increase of slaughtering, Swales 5588. 5622–5639. 5666–5669——Approval of public slaughter-houses exclusively in Leeds, if the convenience of the different localities be considered, ib. 5654–5659.

Ample slaughter-house accommodation at Leeds if all the meat used in Leeds and in the adjacent towns were slaughtered there, S. Higgins 5678–5683——Approval of slaughtering in public slaughter-houses at Leeds, there being in fact hardly any small private slaughter-houses there, ib. 5715–5721.

Total of about 130 private slaughter-houses in Leeds, there being also six large slaughter-houses in the centre of the town, J. Higgins 7030–7033.

4. Dead Meat Supply.

Supply of dead meat to Leeds from Hull in order to make up for the deficient supply of live cattle; impracticability of this arrangement during the hot weather, Swales, 5564–5568. 5593–5598. 5604–5608. 5660–5665——Obstacle to supplying Leeds with dead meat from London, Newcastle, &c., in hot weather, ib. 5604–5608. 5615. 5646, 5647—— Arrangements now in force for conveying dead meat from Hull to Leeds, ib. 5660–5665.

Discontinuance of the transmission of dead meat from Leeds to London owing to the short supply at the former place, S. Higgins 5676, 5677. 5692——Impracticability of supplying Leeds with dead meat from London or from Hull in hot weather, ib. 5687. 5693–5701——Better condition in which the meat could be procured from London than from Hull, ib. 5700.

Evidence as to the facilities for the conveyance of dead meat from Hull to Leeds in any weather without the meat being spoiled, O'Brien 6022–6034. 6044–6046. 6056–6060.

Establishment of a dead meat market in the town during the restrictions upon the transit of live stock; good supply of this market, J. Higgins 7034–7044——Purchase of supplies of dead meat in Hull, London, and Liverpool, whilst some butchers have gone to Hamburgh for live cattle: temporary fall in prices through a temporary over supply from these sources, ib. 7066–7069. 7084–7103.

Return of the quantity of meat sent by the North Eastern Railway from Hull to Leeds in each of the five weeks ending 16th June 1866, App 329.

Leith. Very good inspection of foreign cattle at the port of Leith, Swan 5374, 5375—— Lage number of foreign store cattle which used to be imported through Leith, ib. 5376, 5377——Strict regulations in force as to the slaughtering of animals landed at Leith, ib. 5396——Deficient slaughtering accommodation for all the cattle landed, ib. 5397. 5422.

Diminished import through the compulsory slaughtering at the port, Strangeways 6951–6954——Difficulty as to quarantine accommodation, ib. 6970.

Explanation

Leith—continued.

Explanation as to the regulations in force in the case of foreign cattle coming to the port, Lindsey 7611-7614——Importance of a strict check upon the quality or condition of the animals imported; recent comdemnation of some sheep adverted to hereon, ib. 7614-7617. 7644-7648. 7661-7663——Rapidly increasing import of foreign cattle, ib. 7618-7620.

Necessity of the present practice of slaughtering foreign cattle at Leith, so long as there is any fear of the cattle plague being spread, Lindsey 7621-7626. 7652-7660——Large traffic in dead meat from Leith to Edinburgh and Glasgow, ib. 7627-7630. 7665, 7666——Advantage of there being a market for foreign cattle on stated days; want of power in the local authorities to establish such market, ib. 7630-7638——Excellent slaughter-house now in operation at Leith; want of facilities for obtaining land for its extension, ib. 7641-7643. 7664——Very indifferent condition of the foreign cattle on arrival, ib. 7644-7648——Great difficulty in getting rid of the manure of the animals, ib. 7649, 7650.

Letheby, Dr. Henry. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Considers that the collecting of live animals for sale in the Metropolitan Cattle Market need not, if properly regulated, involve any injury to the public health, 3836-3840——Opinion, however, that encouragement should be given to the bringing of dead meat rather than of live stock into London, 3836——Great increase going on in the supply of dead meat to the metropolis, about one-third of the total consumption being now provided in this form, 3836. 3854, 3855. 3895-3898.

Details as to the extremely injurious operation of private slaughter-houses in the metropolis, so that in the interests of the public witness recommends their compulsory abolition, 3841-3848. 3857 et seq.——Evidence strongly in favour of a limited number of public slaughter-houses, or abattoirs, under proper regulations, and with proper appliances for disposing of the offal and manure, 3844. 3859, et seq.

Large quantity of putrid meat condemned in the City, most of which comes from the country, 3849-3854——Practicability, by proper arrangements and by care in packing, of sending meat to London in the hottest weather without putrefaction, 3849. 3854-3856. 3927, 3928. 3997-4012——Advantage in the slaughtering of the animal in the country when not overdriven or in a febrile state, as in the London slaughter-houses, 3856.

Very effective supervision which might be exercised over the meat sold in the metropolis if the animals were necessarily slaughtered in public slaughter-houses, 3859, 3860. 3875——The consumers of meat and the public health would be benefited by the proposed abattoirs, the only difficulty being with the butchers; these should be compensated, 3860-3863. 3877-3881——Very satisfactory operation of the system of abattoirs in Paris, and in various large towns in France, Prussia, &c., 3864-3867. 3890——Efficient regulations in force in Edinburgh relative to the slaughtering of cattle, and the disposal of the offal, &c., 3864. 3867-3870. 3890——Disapproval of restrictions in regard to the disposal of the live animal if not diseased, 3847. 3932-3936.

Expediency of public slaughter-houses, not only in London but in every large town in the kingdom, 3875. 3884-3887. 3979-3983——Comtemplated erection of slaughter-houses by the municipalities, after which they would be self-supporting by the fees, 3876——Fee for slaughtering at the Metropolitan Cattle Market; prejudice of the butchers against the use of these slaughter-houses, 3882, 3883——Character of the inspection by the City of London over the animals at the Metropolitan Market, 3888, 3889.

Conclusion that the trade would soon conform without inconvenience to the regulations in public slaughter-houses, 3890-3894. 3899-3902——Removal of several causes of public nuisance if there were large slaughter-houses and a dead-meat market near the place of import of foreign cattle; witness does not, however, advocate a separate market for foreign live stock, 3903-3918. 3988-3996——Probability of much of the putrid meat seized in the City being the flesh of animals killed in the country in a state of disease; much meat of this kind now escapes detection outside the City, 3919-3926. 3962-3970.

Opinion as to a live cattle market being necessary, in order to meet any uncertainty or fluctuation of supply of dead meat; the supply might, however, be made very complete and regular, 3929-3931. 4013-4024——Cause of the delay in the erection of the new market at Smithfield, 3937, 3938——Strong condemnation of the practice in disposing of the hides at Leadenhall Market; witness has frequently complained on this subject, 3940-3943——Opinion as to the sufficiency of two or three abattoirs for the metropolis, 3944-3946. 3971-3978.

Extent to which putrid meat may be considered injurious to the human system, 3956-3961——Tendency of public slaughter-houses to lower rather than to enhance the price of meat, 3984-3987——Conclusion that as regards the supply of offal to London, no difficulty would after a time arise if the animals were slaughtered in the country, 4025-

4037——Importance of an inspection of all dead animals, with reference to the detection of disease, 4037-4048—— System of inspection of the animal when dead, as well as when alive, in Switzerland, Prussia, &c., 4048-4050. 4053——Impression that meat is generally somewhat cheaper in Paris than in London, 4051, 4052.

Letheby, Dr. Extract from report of Dr. Letheby, on the cattle plague in England in 1865, App. 315-320.

Lincolnshire. Witness, who occupies some 2,000 acres in Lincolnshire, is supplied with grazing stock chiefly from the breeders within the county, Torr 7108-7110. 7269—— The cattle when fat are sent mostly to the markets of Leeds and Wakefield, ib. 7111-7113——Witness has never bought foreign stock to graze, nor are many bought in Lincolnshire, ib. 7131, 7132. 7248——Considerable supply formerly of store cattle from Holland and Germany for Lincolnshire, ib. 7154-7156.

Losses from the cattle plague in Lincolnshire, though witness has fortunately escaped it, Torr 7239-7241——There are still some villages in the county which are treated as infected districts, ib. 7242——Increased price of beef and mutton in witness's district, adverted to with reference to the shortness of the supply, ib. 7243-7247. 7259-7271—— Difficulty at present in the supply of stock for grazing, ib. 7267-7271——Large quantity of fat stock now killed on Lincolnshire farms, without being consigned to the markets, the butchers arranging to take so many per week or month, ib. 7276, 7277. 7287, 7288 ——Different class of sheep sent by witness to Manchester and to London, ib. 7284-7286.

Lindsey, William. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—As Provost of Leith, explains the regulations as to the inspection of foreign cattle coming to the port, 7610-7614——Importance of a strict check upon the quality or condition of the animals imported; recent condemnation of some sheep adverted to hereon, 7614-7617. 7644-7648. 7661-7663—— Rapidly increasing import of foreign cattle to Leith, 7618-7620——Necessity of the present practice of slaughtering foreign cattle at Leith, so long as there is any fear of the cattle plague being spread, 7621-7626. 7652-7660.

Large traffic in dead meat from Leith to Edinburgh and Glasgow, 7627-7630. 7665, 7666——Advantage if there was a market for foreign cattle at Leith on stated days; want of power in the local authorities to establish such market, 7630-7638——Permission granted for the removal of live cattle from the Edinburgh market to Leith, 7638-7640——Excellent slaughter-house now in operation at Leith; want of facilities for obtaining land for its extension, 7641-7643. 7664——Very indifferent condition of the foreign cattle on arrival, 7644-7648——Great difficulty in getting rid of the manure of the animals, 7649, 7650.

There is a Government officer for the inspection of foreign cattle on their landing, there being different inspectors for the Scotch and Irish cattle, Trench 445-447—— Efficient inspection of all cattle now arriving in the port of Liverpool, Hall 927-935—— Careful inspection by witness of all foreign cattle, Ellis 1390, 1391. 1454, 1455—— Immediate destruction of any animals having rinderpest, or pleuro-pneumonia, on arrival at Liverpool, ib. 1392.

2. Facilities for Landing the Cattle:

Ample facilities at Liverpool for landing the cattle, Cullen 696——Very good facilities for debarkation of cattle from Ireland, Watson 8042.

3. Want of increased Lairage Accommodation:

Great inconvenience experienced through there being no lairs for the cattle before they are slaughtered, after leaving Stanley market, Trench 399-414——Arrangements as to the lairs and sheds used by witnes's firm for the cattle on arrival until market day, Cullen 510-522——Inconvenience through the deficiency of lairs, Hall 746——Way in which the animals are disposed of after they are purchased in Stanley market and before they are slaughtered, ib. 750-757——Increased accommodation required for the cattle before they are sent into the market, Aungier 2964-2966.

LIVERPOOL—continued.

4. Markets for Live Stock :

Inconvenience through there being only one cattle market and one market day in the week, Trench 414-418. 423, 424——Doubt as to any advantage in separating the market for foreign and English beasts, Aungier 2967-2970——Question as to the advantage of a market close to the place of landing, Watson 8043-8045.

5. Slaughter-houses :

Information relative to the private slaughter-houses in Liverpool and the public slaughter-house or abattoir; compensation necessary before removing them, Trench 360, 361——Statement as to the excessive mortality, and as to this being partly owing to the slaughter-houses being in the town, and their effect in contaminating the sewers, ib. 362-384. 427-429——Advantage if all the slaughter-houses were removed from the town, and if there were but one abattoir to be erected on corporation land near Stanley market, ib. 385-399. 439-443. 450.

Weekly return of cattle slaughtered in the borough in 1865 and 1866, also of cattle slaughtered at the public abattoir in the first three months of 1865 and 1866, Trench 418——Unduly large amount of work done in the abattoir, Manchester and Salford being largely supplied with dead meat from Liverpool, ib. 418-422——Arrangements as to the removal of manure from the slaughter-houses and cow-houses, ib. 430-434.

Statement as to the corporation not having taken action towards removing the slaughter-houses and cow-houses out of the town, Trench 451-454——Suggestion that the proposed abattoir outside the town be let off to a company instead of being managed by the corporation, ib. 455, 456——Arrangement as to the payment by the Butchers for the use of the present abattoir, ib. 457——Facility of preventing bad meat coming in if there were but one public slaughter-house, ib. 463, 464.

Great inconvenience if all the private slaughter-houses were abolished, and if there were but one slaughter-house near Stanley market, Hall 759——Probability of the health of Liverpool being injuriously affected by the increased slaughtering of cattle and by the large number kept in the town between market day and the day of their being killed, Ellis 1405-1418. 1436, 1437——The slaughter-houses in Liverpool are excellent, Dickenson 2860.

6. Cow-houses :

Great number of cow-houses in Liverpool over which some control is urgently required, Trench 450——Very bad condition of the cow-houses; belief as to their being now under inspection, Ellis 1445-1451——Death of a great many cows from rinderpest, ib. 1452, 1453.

7. Question of Supplying Dead Meat to Manchester and other Towns :

Opinion as to its being feasible to supply not only all Liverpool but Manchester and Salford by means of one large slaughter-house near Liverpool, Trench 477. 479.

Great expense and great risk and injury to the meat by forwarding it in a dead state from Liverpool to Manchester by railway; grounds for this conclusion considered, Cullen 523-525. 538. 556-562. 567-572. 622-667——Consideration of the relative advantages and disadvantages of dead meat markets at Liverpool, &c., and of the transmission of live meat by rail, Hall 896-922——Belief that Oldham and other towns in the manufacturing districts could never be satisfactorily supplied from a dead meat market in Liverpool; decided dissent hereon from the evidence of Dr. Trench, Bradbury 1013-1026. 1042-1053.

8. Complaints as to the Restrictions upon the Movement of Live Stock to Manchester, &c. :

Prejudicial operation of the recent requirement by which all foreign cattle sent to Stanley market, in Liverpool, must be slaughtered within four days, and the live animals cannot be sent to Manchester, &c., Cullen 522 et seq——Necessity of submitting to reduced prices if there is at any time a surplus supply of Oporto cattle in the Liverpool market, ib. 530-542. 617-621——Reasons for sending all the cattle to Stanley market instead of forwarding them immediately on arrival to Manchester and other places, ib. 547-553——Relative prices of Irish cattle and of foreign cattle at Liverpool, as affected by the existing restrictions upon transit by rail, ib. 668-681——Expediency of its being allowed to move sound cattle coming from uninfected districts to the Liverpool market into the manufacturing districts, ib. 739.

If there is no fear of the rinderpest spreading, witness would rather have open markets, Hall 785. 837. 851. 921, 922——Slight extent to which a continuance of the prohibition upon transit by rail would be any advantage to the buyer in the Liverpool market, ib. 816-821——Great hardship caused by the requirement as to slaughtering within four days; expediency of the limit being extended to a week, and of its being permitted to send the cattle and sheep to fields within a radius of four miles, ib. 935-947——The obligation to slaughter within four days does not enable the purchaser to buy more cheaply, ib. 948-950.

LIVERPOOL—continued.

8. Complaints as to the Restrictions upon the Movement of Live Stock, &c.—contd.

Very little foreign cattle trade in Liverpool for some months past, Ellis 1431–1433——Very prejudicial effect of the restriction upon the removal of live cattle to any distance from Liverpool; application about to be made to Government on the subject, Aungier 2908. 2913–2923.

9. Other details generally:

Difficulty in obtaining land at or near Liverpool for placing cattle in quarantine, Trench 425. 437–443——Large quantity of unsound meat condemned every week, the killing butchers not being to blame in this matter, ib. 458–462.

Average of from 8*d.* to 1*s.* a day as the cost of keeping the cattle in Liverpool, Cullen 590, 591——Considerable number of fat cattle lately brought from Scotland, ib. 688–691——Summary of the facilites required by the cattle trade at Liverpool, ib. 739, 740——Way in which sales were carried out at Liverpool and Manchester before the restrictions upon transit, ib. 741–743.

Purchase by witness (as wholesale butcher) of imported animals almost exclusively, Hall 747–749——Injurious effect of the over-crowding of the animals previously to their being killed, ib. 757, 758. 772–774——Nature of the facilities for sending the meat from the slaughter-houses to the railway and to the shipping, ib. 760–771——Instances of witness having purchased oxen and sheep in London for Liverpool, the latter port not being well situated for the foreign cattle trade, ib. 822–826. 923–926——Import at Liverpool of some dead meat from Scotland; its cost as compared with that of live cattle, ib. 827–833

See also Dead Meat, 5. Irish Cattle, 5. Manchester, &c. Spanish Cattle.

Lockwood, Noel James. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Veterinary surgeon at Hull; inspects for the Customs and for the Corporation of Hull all foreign cattle landed at Hull, 2409–2411——Very good condition in which the cattle generally arrive, 2412–2416——Unsatisfactory accommodation in the Bremen boats, 2417–2420——Restriction suggested as to the number of cattle according to the space in each vessel, 2421–2432——Modes of arranging the cattle in the holds; suggestion hereon, 2428–2440.

Course adopted at Hull in the event of the import of store cattle and of cattle with the foot and mouth disease, 2441. 2445. 2522–2528. 2558–2563——There has never been any case of rinderpest imported, 2442–2444——Improved accommodation required for the animals when landed; also in landing them, 2446–2457——Very good and healthy state in which the Dutch cows arrive, 2459–2461——Quarantine arrangements suggested for store and fat cattle respectively, 2462–2492. 2510–2521. 2538–2541.

Advantage if fat stock were kept for twelve hours before inspection, it being very difficult to judge of their real condition just after leaving the holds of the vessels in a hot state, 2465–2481. 2504–2509——Suggested use of disinfectants before a vessel takes any fresh cargo on board, 2493, 2494——Very few drovers with the cattle landed at Hull, 2495–2503——Course adopted at Hull in the event of sheep being imported with the scab, &c., 2529–2534.

Slaughter of any animals having pleuro-pneumonia, 2535–2537. 2564–2566——Doubt as to the origin of the rinderpest; opinion that it broke out in the London cow-sheds, 2543–2549——Witness has not experienced any inconvenience or nuisance from the Hull slaughter-houses, 2550–2557——Varying duration of the foot and mouth disease, 2559–2561. 2567–2569.

Lovell, Thomas. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Farmer and grazier in Northamptonshire; has for many years sent fat cattle to the Metropolitan Market, 6784–6798——Considers that the prices in the market are fairly returned by the sales, 6793, 6794. 6799, 6800. 6846–6851——Suggested division between the English and foreign cattle in the market, 6801–6805——Objection by the graziers to an entirely separate market for foreign cattle, 6803——Expediency of all store cattle from abroad being quarantined, so long as there is disease in foreign countries, 6806–6810. 6832–6835——All fat cattle sent to the Metropolitan Market should be slaughtered in London, 6811–6820.

Circumstance of the plague having been brought into Northamptonshire by foreign cattle sent down from London, 6819, 6820. 6825——Opinion as to the decrease of English bred cattle in the country; sources of witness's supply and increased prices paid by him adverted to hereon, 6826–6830. 6836–6841. 6852–6855——There is no infection in witness's district, 6845——Strong objection to its being required of farmers to kill fat cattle; difficulty in disposing of the offal, 6856.

Lower Classes. Greater cheapness of the dead meat market in London than in the country, especially for the lower classes, owing to the foreign supply, Woodley 4888–4899. 4909–4914——Lower price paid by the working classes through witness being enabled to kill his own meat, instead of being compelled to purchase dead meat, Pickworth 4991–4997. 5004, 5005——Meat would be unobtainable by the lower classes but for the foreign supply, Herbert 6019.

Lung Disease. See Pleuro-pneumonia.

M.

Mackie, John. Letter from Mr. Mackie, dated Wick, 5 April 1866, relative to the objectionable manner in which cattle from the northern districts of Scotland are treated whilst on their passage to the southern markets, App. 322, 323.

Maidstone. Impracticability of any satisfactory supply of dead meat to Maidstone and other towns from London, more especially in hot weather, Betts 6081. 6120–6140—— Limited advance in prices at Maidstone notwithstanding the short supply, ib. 6084–6110.

Frequent complaint made about witness's supply to the troops at Maidstone, since he has been obliged to procure dead meat from Newgate Market, Wakefield 6155–6177—— Amount of contract price for the troops and for the gaol, ib. 6178–6183——Very bad condition in which meat slaughtered in London has arrived at Maidstone in hot weather; mode of packing and of conveyance adverted to hereon, ib. 6181–6193.

Malcolm, John. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is connected with the firm of Brownlow, Browning, Lumsden, & Co., having vessels engaged in the cattle trade with Hamburgh and other ports, 2294–2296——Statistics of the imports of cattle to Hull in the last three years; rapid increase going on, 2297–2304——Particulars as to the accommodation in the cattle vessels of witness's firm, and as to the stowage and care of the animals during the passage from Germany, &c., 2305–2311. 2359–2381——Interest of the firm to bring the cattle without injury or loss on the voyage, 2308–2310. 2347–2349.

Improvement required in the landing accommodation at Hull, 2311–2316——Also in the accommodation after landing; steps being taken on this score, 2317–2328—— Suffering of the animals when the weather is very stormy, but not on ordinary occasions, 2331–2333——Rate of freight from Hamburgh, 2334——Also from Bremen, 2335—— Practice recently at Hamburgh to get a certificate as to the condition of the animals when shipped, 2338——Supervision by the authorities abroad, but not by the owners of the vessels in regard to the condition of the animals, 2338–2350.

Practice of cleansing the vessels after each voyage; approval of its being compulsory to use disinfectants, 2351–2356——Provision as to ventilation in the holds of the vessels, 2371–2373——Question considered as to the cost of conveyance of dead meat from Germany, &c. to Hull; difficulty in the summer months, 2382–2407——Statement of the imports from Hamburgh to Hull in 1865, as compared with the imports from all sources, 2408.

Manchester and Manufacturing District. Very bad slaughter-houses in Manchester, Trench 478——Several towns in the neighbourhood of Manchester, and supplied thence with cattle or dead meat, Cullen 722–726——Means of supplying Manchester with dead meat from Liverpool without any deterioration of the meat, Hall 785–789——Disadvantages in the supply of the towns near Manchester depending on the Liverpool dead meat market, ib. 834–837——Inconvenience in hot weather in supplying Manchester and other towns with dead meat from Liverpool; absence of difficulty in regard to the towns knowing the precise local demand, ib. 848–857.

Increased price of meat in Manchester during the last six months; cause of this advance, Dickenson 2831–2844. 2850–2855——Privilege lately granted to Manchester in regard to the removal of live cattle to towns within a certain distance Aungier 2909–2912——Great difficulty in regard to the supply of beef to Manchester, and the adjacent towns on account of the restrictions in the transit of live stock, Giblett 4800–4803. 4815–4823——Statement as to the price of meat being dearer in the Manchester district than in London; relative prices of live stock in London and in the country adverted to hereon, ib. 4804–4823.

Witness is strongly opposed to the compulsory slaughter of foreign fat cattle at the ports; impracticability in such case of supplying Manchester and the manufacturing district, Fair 7542–7554. 7556–7566. 7579–7584. 7609——Live cattle should be allowed to come from Liverpool to the Manchester market, and should be branded for slaughter within a certain time, ib. 7544–7548. 7594–7597. 7603–7605——Expediency of its being permitted to bring live cattle from Manchester to adjacent towns for slaughter there, ib. 7549–7554——Sources of supply of the Manchester live market at the present time, ib. 7570, 7571.

Meat (Supply of Towns). See Dead Meat.

Metropolitan Cattle Market. Fat stock from the country, but not from abroad, might come into the Metropolitan Market, Read 1602-1604——Recent signature by witness of a memorial to Government for permission to remove live cattle from the Metropolitan Market by railway, Baker 4430-4438.

Suggestion that all animals coming into the Metropolitan Market be branded for slaughter within seven days either in London or the country, Rudkin 6639-6647. 6718-6730. 6741, 6742——Grounds for objecting to any store cattle being sent to the market, ib. 6639-6644. 6648-6653. 6718-6720.

Regulations desirable in order to prevent the spread of infection by means of fat cattle removed from the London market into the country for slaughter; expediency of such removal notwithstanding there may be some risk attached, Rudkin 6660-6686——Statement in support of the proposition that fat cattle sent to the London market should not be allowed to be exposed for sale in any other market subsequently, ib. 6721-6730.

Peculiarly healthy state of the market since the end of February, Rudkin 6763-6767——Total of thirty-seven seizures for rinderpest from 16 November 1865 to 22 February 1866, three-fourths of the animals being English, ib.——Probable danger of infection by allowing cattle from the London market to be conveyed alive into the country for slaughter, ib. 6768-6771.

All fat cattle sent to the Metropolitan Market should be slaughtered in London, Lovell 6811-6820——The graziers look upon the Metropolitan Market as the great focus of infection, ib. 6818——Objection to fat cattle that have been once in the Metropolitan Market going into the country for slaughter, Torr 7180-7187. 7238——Store cattle should be excluded from the Metropolitan Market, ib. 7188-7193.

Foreign beasts have been smuggled into the country by rail from the Metropolitan Market, within the last few months, Hudson 7354-7358——Home-fed animals, but not foreign animals, might go into the country before being slaughtered, Druce 7471-7475.

Return showing the number of animals in the market for eight weeks, commencing from 16th April and ending 10th June 1866, and for the corresponding weeks in 1865——App. 326——Similar return relative to the number of animals in the lairs, ib.

Return showing the number of animals in the market for nine weeks, commencing 12th February and ending 14th April 1866, and for the corresponding weeks of 1865, App. 328.

Recommendation that the Metropolitan Market be confined to cattle intended for immediate slaughter, Rep. v.——Suggestion also that all the cattle be branded and not allowed to be exhibited for sale in any other market, but should be slaughtered within ten days, ib.——Diminished chance of infection if the Metropolitan Market were made exclusively a fat-meat market, ib.

Moseley, Robert. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is traffic manager of the Great Eastern Railway Company, 238, 239——Very large cattle traffic on the line, including not only fat cattle, but store cattle and milch cows, 240-252——Conveyance of the cattle from Holland to Harwich in boats belonging to the company, without the animals suffering much during the passage, 253-255——Practice of the company thoroughly to cleanse the cattle trucks after each journey, 256-263——Objection to the floor of the trucks being covered with tar or asphalte so as to facilitate cleaning, 264-269.

Increased difficulties and expense of conveying the cattle to London in the form of dead meat, 270-283——Several disadvantages and sources of expense after the cattle are delivered alive in London, so that on the whole it would be a great advantage if they were slaughtered in the country, 280 et seq.——Considerable quantity of dead meat now brought to London by the railways and steamboats, 286-289——Competition by road to which the railways are open as regards conveyance of cattle for distances of thirty or forty miles from London; competition also on the part of steamboats, 301-318——Objection to cattle being killed in Holland and conveyed all the way to London as dead meat, 319.

Means

Means of the Great Eastern Company, by using the North London line, for delivering cattle near the Islington Market, 320–322——Great advantage if the Great Eastern and other railways had a direct communication with the Smithfield Dead-Meat Market; obstacle in the case of the Great Eastern line, 323–330. 340–347. 350–356——Undue delay on the part of the Corporation in converting Smithfield into a dead-meat market, 329–334. 352, 353——Inconvenience of a large dead-meat market in the heart of the City, 348–352.

[Second Examination.]—Return handed in showing the quantity of cattle imported from the Continent viâ Harwich, from October 1863 to December 1865; p. 43——Comparative statement of the cost of transit of oxen from Rotterdam to London, with the slaughtering and incidental charges, and of the cost of transit to Harwich, with the slaughtering and the conveyance to London; saving of 2 s. 3 d. per head by the latter route, 1135–1139.

Consideration as to the means of improving the conveyance of meat by railway from Harwich to London; several difficulties to be encountered, 1140–1147——Impracticability of complying with the Privy Council Order of 16 April as to the mode of cleansing the trucks, 1147——Objections further urged against flooring the trucks with asphalte, 1148–1160.

[Third Examination.]—Further evidence on the question of watering cattle during transit in railway trucks; opinion as to this not being necessary between Harwich and London, 1366–1388.

Nelson, Joseph. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Statement as to the several advantages of the Isle of Grain, near Sheerness, as the landing-place for foreign cattle, the fat cattle being slaughtered there, and the lean stock being quarantined, 6400–6438——Superiority of the Isle of Grain over the Plaistow Marshes, Thames Haven, or any other site down the river, for the landing, quarantining, &c. of foreign cattle, 6417–6428.

New York. Very stringent regulations in New York for the inspection and management of slaughterhouses, butchers' shops and public markets, App. 318, 319.

Newcastle-on-Tyne. Very good condition in which the foreign cattle generally arrive in the Tyne, Wilkinson 8156–8161——Large sheds for the cattle when landed, with ample slaughterhouses attached, ib. 8165–8169. 8191——Facility for quarantining the animals, ib. 8170. 8190——Very few store cattle imported, ib. 8171.

Number of cows that have died or been slaughtered on account of rinderpest: the disease was not imported by foreign cows, Wilkinson 8171–8179——Absence of any cases of rinderpest among the cattle in the town since March last, ib. 8179.

Statement in favour of foreign fat stock being allowed to be removed by railway to the towns near Newcastle, Wilkinson 8188, 8189. 8192. 8255–8266. 8298, 8299——Present practice of slaughtering in Newcastle for the towns in the district; inconvenience and injury involved in supplying the dead meat to these places, ib. 8192, 8193. 8264–8287. 8321, 8322——Care taken in cleansing the Newcastle market, as well as the landing-places for the cattle, ib. 8194–8199——Slaughter of the whole of the cargo if there are any cases of pleuro-pneumonia, ib. 8200, 8201——Prompt landing of the cattle, ib. 8202–8204.

Rise of prices in the Newcastle market through the short supply of stock, Wilkinson 8217–8220. 8235, 8236. 8323–8333——Fairness of the quoted prices of dead meat; way in which obtained, ib. 8221–8227——Very satisfactory operation of the public slaughter-houses, ib. 8288–8296——Check to the import trade by the restrictions relative to the cattle plague, ib. 8300–8302.

Return of the number of cattle landed at the port of Tyne in each week, from 5th July 1864 to 26th June 1866, App. 331——Daily return of the arrivals of foreign cattle to the port of Tyne, and weekly returns of foreign cattle computed to each market day, ib. 332–337——Return of stock of various kinds exhibited in Newcastle live cattle market in the twelve months, ended 26th June 1866, ib. 338.

Newgate Market. Entire insufficiency of the dead meat market at Newgate, Moseley 352, 353; Ratcliff 3729–3731; Pickworth 4976–4979——Great inconvenience through the crowded and narrow state of the streets leading to Newgate Market, as well as of the market itself, Clarke 1518–1520; Baker 4301–4305; Bonser 7748, 7749——Utter insufficiency of the arrangements in connection with Newgate Market, Read 1599–1601

——Depreciation to some slight extent through the meat being carted from Newgate Market, instead of being killed on the premises, Pickworth 4980–4984.

Account of the meat, game, and poultry condemned at the market during the years 1861–65, App. 321——Return of the several tolls levied at the market, and of the produce thereof in 1863-65, App. 328.

Northamptonshire. Circumstance of the plague having been brought into Northamptonshire by foreign cattle sent down from London, Lovell 6819, 6320. 6825——Opinion as to the decrease of English bred cattle in the county; sources of witness's supply, and increased prices paid by him adverted to hereon, ib. 6826–6830. 6836-6841. 6852–6855——There is no infection in witness's district, ib. 6845.

O.

O'Brien, Captain William. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is general manager of the North Eastern Railway, 6021——Explains the facilities for the conveyance of dead meat by railway from Hull to Leeds, 6022–6032. 6046, 6047. 6056–6060——Means of supplying Leeds with dead meat from Hull in any weather without the meat being spoiled, 6033, 6034. 6044–6046——Nature of the facilities, by railway, for the transmission of meat from Hull to Bradford, Wakefield, and other towns; there would be no difficulty in conveying any quantity without the meat turning bad, 6035–6045. 6047.

Absence of complaint as to the condition of meat on arrival at Leeds, &c., there being some complaints, however, as to the detention and loss of market, 6048–6051. 6070, 6071——Charges for conveying live cattle and dead meat respectively from Hull to Leeds, 6052–6055——Doubt as to the quantity of meat conveyed by railway to Leeds, Bradford, &c., 6061–6069——There was a tolerably large trade in live cattle between Hull and the West Riding before the restrictions upon transit, 6074——There are no arrangements for watering or feeding the cattle during transit, 6075, 6076.

Offal. Conclusion that as regards the supply of offal to London no difficulty would, after a time, arise if the animals were slaughtered in the country, Letheby 4025–4037——Way in which the offal, hides, &c., of animals slaughtered by witness are now disposed of as compared with the facility of disposal if there were a public slaughter-house in a less populous locality in London, Baker 4394–4408——Practice as to the disposal by witness of the offal and hides, Woodley 4900–4908. 4951, 4952.

With regard to the large quantity of dead meat sent from Aberdeen to London the offal is sold chiefly in Aberdeen; price fetched by it, and mode in which finally disposed of, Stewart 5735–5744——Disposal of the offal of animals killed at Inverury by sending it to Aberdeen and Dundee, the blood being wasted, Hutcheson 6233–6237. 6269——Disposal by witness of the offal in Aberdeen; particulars hereon, Butler 6336–6342. 6377–6399——About similar price of offal in Aberdeen and London, ib. 6377–6380.

Serious objection to a dead-meat supply of London as preventing the satisfactory disposal of the offal, S. Higgins 5701——Difficulty as to the offal being disposed of by farmers or graziers, if they were to slaughter largely, Lovell 6856; Hudson 7305–7309. 7320–7324. 7387–7389.

Opinion as to the facility of advantageously disposing of the offal in country places, Torr 7137–7140. 7147. 7160, 7161.

Conclusion of the Committee as to the difficulty in disposing of the offal if animals are slaughtered in districts thinly peopled, Rep. iv.

the price of stock in Holland, 1221–1224. 1247–1250——Great prevalence of the lung disease among the Dutch cattle, 1231——Practice of killing, at Rotterdam, animals having the cattle plague badly, 1240. 1263, 1264——Arrival of cattle at Rotterdam from Silesia, and even from Hungary, 1244. 1267, 1268. 1277——Prohibition now in force in Belgium, as well as in Holland, in regard to the transit of German cattle, 1269–1272.

Pickworth, Thomas. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a retail butcher near Tottenham Court-road, 4953, 4954——Object of the Butchers' Trade Protection Society, of which witness is a member, 4955, 4956——Convenience and benefit to the public at large, as well as to the butchers, in the latter having private slaughter-houses where they can kill at any moment, according to the demand, or the state of the weather, 4956. 4964–4975. 5011–5015——Number of animals slaughtered weekly by witness; character of his accommodation for the purpose, 4957–4960. 4969–4974. 5006, 5007.

Purchase by witness chiefly of English cattle, it being very important at times to have a supply of foreign cattle in the market to fall back upon, 4961–4964——Decided objection to being compelled to use public slaughter-houses, even though there were several in convenient localities; the wants of the public could not, in fact, be satisfactorily met, 4965–4968. 5008–5015——Very insufficient accommodation at Newgate Market, 4976–4979——Depreciation to some slight extent, through the meat being carted from Newgate, instead of being killed on the premises, 4980–4984.

Varying consumption in London, according to the season and the weather, 4985–4990——Lower price paid by the working classes through witness being enabled to kill his own meat, 4991–4997. 5004, 5005——Varying prices charged by witness accordingly as the meat is cut; list of his present prices, 4998–5003——Difficulty as regards lairage accommodation at public slaughter-houses, 5006–5009——Difficulty also in butchers identifying their own animals, 5009–5011——Clean and wholesome state in which the private slaughter-houses are generally kept, 5015, 5016.

Pigs. Great care necessary in the conveyance of pigs by sea; difficulty in getting them under the decks, Robinson 3398–3404. 3408——Practice, for many years to walk the pigs on and off the vessels from Ireland, ib. 3409–3412——The importation of pigs has almost entirely ceased on account of the higher prices abroad, Bonser 7715.

Account showing the number of pigs imported during the year 1865 into London from Holland, &c., and showing the number landed at the different wharves, App. 307–314.

Returns showing the number of animals in the Metropolitan Cattle Market for the several periods from 12th February to 14th April, and from 16th April to 10th June, in 1865 and 1866 respectively, App. 326. 328.

Pleuro-pneumonia. Great prevalence of the lung disease among the Dutch cattle, Peters 1231——Witness has not seen any cases of pleuro-pneumonia among the French cattle at Antwerp, Huger 1360——Liability of Dutch and other cattle to pleuro-pneumonia in a greater degree than Irish cattle, Read 1582–1585. 1629–1636——Opinion that the lung disease did not come from abroad, Hönck 1789–1796.

Slaughter of any animals having pleuro-pneumonia when landed at Hull, Lockwood 2535–2537. 2564–2566——Condemnation at Hull of any animal with pleuro-pneumonia, the rest of the cargo being allowed to be sold, Valentine 2640–2646——Way in which cattle with the lung disease or the foot and mouth disease are dealt with at Liverpool, Aungier 2956–2963——Practice in the port of London to slaughter all animals having the lung disease, the rest of the cargo being allowed to proceed, Simmonds 3420–3429.

Very little lung disease in Austria or Hungary, Hirschler 4200, 4201——Liability of foreign animals to pleuro-pneumonia, Hudson 7443——Objection to an inspection of Irish cattle at English ports with reference to pleuro-pneumonia or the foot and mouth disease, Walsh 7796–7801. 7880, 7881——Very little lung disease now in Ireland, ib. 7800–7804——Limited amount of pleuro-pneumonia now in Ireland, whilst the risk of contagion is not very great, Garnett 7954, 7955. 7967–7969. 7979–7981.

Plymouth Victualling Yard. Difficulty of London contractors supplying the victualling yard at Plymouth with dead meat through the restrictions upon railway transit; obstacle to sending the beasts coastwise, Baker 4432. 4439–4446. 4451–4455. 4523–4530.

Ports of Landing (Foreign Cattle). Advantage of limiting the number of ports at which foreign cattle should come in, Hudson 7347–7349——Considerations subject to which it might be desirable to limit the ports at which foreign cattle should be landed, Hunt 8444–8453——Necessary approval by the Board of Customs of the ports for the landing of cattle, ib. 8474–8480.

Mention of the chief ports approved of by the Customs for the landing of foreign cattle, Rep. iii.

Several objections to compulsory slaughter of foreign cattle at the port of discharge, Rep. vi.

Pratt, Martin. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is Secretary to the General Steam Navigation Company, 2982——Statistics as to the quantity of cattle carried in the company's vessels in 1865 from various foreign ports to London, 2983–2988——Large trade in fat cattle and sheep from Tonning, this being only a summer trade, 2985. 2989–3000——The largest trade is from Rotterdam, 2985. 2989, 2990——Conveyance chiefly of fat cattle from the several ports, 2991–2993——Number of beasts and of sheep carried from Boulogne; excellent condition of these, 3003–3011——Limited cattle trade of the company from Scotland and English ports to London, 3012–3017.

Inspection to which the animals are subjected at the port of shipment abroad, 3018–3020. 3148. 3252, 3253——Independent inspection on arrival irrespectively of the foreign inspection, 3021——Practice of slaughtering any animals which have on arrival the foot and mouth disease, 3022, 3023. 3254——Statement as to three cows in a cargo from Rotterdam having been stopped a few months ago as having the cattle plague, the whole cargo having been slaughtered; doubt whether this was really a case of rinderpest at all, 3024–3031. 3255, 3256.

Effectual cleansing of the vessels after the discharge of each cargo, 3032. 3050–3053. 3166–3168——Conveyance of cattle only in some of the company's vessels, 3033, 3034——Details as to the general arrangements on board, and as to the accommodation, ventilation, &c.; every care is taken to render these as complete as possible, 3035 et seq.——Feeding and watering of the animals during the passage, 3039. 3207–3209——Length of the passage from different ports, 3040——Excellent condition in which the animals arrive, though they are obliged to stand during the whole voyage, 3041–3046.

Arrangements for the landing of the animals, and mode of disposal when landed; accommodation for this purpose at Brown's Wharf, 3054–3058. 3162. 3169–3181. 3247, 3248. 3265, 3266——Details as to the rates from different ports to London, 3059–3064——Reduction in the rates from Rotterdam in order to meet the competition of the Harwich route, 3065–3068. 3078——Consideration of a comparative statement by Mr. Moseley of the charges from Rotterdam viâ Harwich, and from Rotterdam to London direct; error in Mr. Moseley's calculation, witness showing that the direct sea route is much the cheaper of the two, 3065–3077. 3098–3102. 3266, 3267.

Particulars as to the trade in dead meat from Hamburgh, Hull, &c., to London in the vessels of witness's company; good condition of the meat generally on arrival, 3079–3098. 3103–3108. 3111–3114. 3184–3194. 3198–3201——Way in which the dead meat is packed and is arranged on board, 3080–3083. 3092. 3186–3190. 3210–3216——Necessary discontinuance of the dead-meat traffic in hot weather, 3085–3090. 3184——Instance of a quantity of meat having been thrown overboard during the passage from Hamburgh, the voyage having been much prolonged by bad weather, 3104. 3198, 3199. 3210–3216.

Practice of charging freight when the meat or animals are landed, no matter in what condition, 3108, 3109——Special arrangement by which cattle from Tonning are insured by the company, 3110. 3227–3232——Large dead-meat trade formerly between Edinburgh and London by sea, 3112, 3113——Relative charge per ton for the conveyance of dead meat and of live stock from Edinburgh, Hamburgh, &c., to London, 3115–3118. 3202–3206——Disapproval of a separate market near the river side for foreign cattle, 3132–3144.

Actual space given to each animal on board the vessels of the General Steam Navigation Company; its sufficiency, 3145–3147. 3152–3165. 3195–3198——Improved accommodation in the "Maas" and the more modern vessels of the company, 3217–3226. 3235–3237——Import of cattle to London by other companies, the vessels being chiefly English, 3238–3243——Preference of shippers for paddle-wheel vessels, 3244–3246.

Few store cattle imported by witness's company, 3250——Large import of Dutch cows, 3251——Obstacles to quarantining the animals in order to see there is no latent disease, 3254–3265——Comparative statements of the charges by the direct route from Rotterdam to London, and by Harwich, the animals being slaughtered at the latter place and forwarded in the shape of dead meat, 3267.

7. Conclusions of the Committee on the Subject.

1. Suggestions for Quarantining Store Cattle from Abroad:

Opinion that in the case of store cattle quarantine should be enforced, Daniels 100-112——Considerations as to the detailed mode of applying quarantine to store cattle at Harwich, ib. 156-193——Way in which quarantine should be applied to foreign store cattle; doubt as to the number of these rendering the matter very difficult, Read 1624-1628. 1644-1647——Witness does not propose to quarantine Irish store cattle, but only cattle from abroad, ib. 1629-1636——The quarantine should last for twenty-one days, ib. 1644.

Nature of the quarantine arrangements suggested, Lockwood 2462-2492. 2510-2521. 2538-2541——Necessity of a quarantine of fourteen or twenty-one days in the case of store cattle, in order to be sure that the plague is not latent, Simmonds 3477-3497——Suggestions as to the application of quarantine to store cattle, when they come from infected countries, Simon 5082-5112——Approval of a short quarantine in the case of store cattle, Hicks 5348, 5349.

Approval of a quarantine in the case of store cattle from Germany to Leith, Swan 5379, 5380——Proposed quarantine in the case of all store cattle at the port of landing, with a market attached, Rudkin 6648-6655. 6687-6694. 6749——Expediency of all store cattle from abroad being quarantined, so long as there is disease in foreign countries, Lovell 6806-6810. 6832-6835; Strangeways 6969-6973——Considerations of objections to quarantining foreign store cattle on account of the risk to be incurred by healthy cattle in the quarantine ground, Torr 7197-7215.

Statement in support of the quarantining of all foreign store cattle; that is, with reference only to rinderpest, Hudson 7325-7347. 7375-7380. 7418-7421——Greater care taken abroad if there were a quarantine in this country, Hudson 7328-7331. 7418-7421—— Opinion that all foreign animals should either be subject to quarantine, or be killed at the port, Druce 7469, 7470——Approval of inspection and quarantine in the case of store cattle from infected countries, Fair 7555. 7595-7602; Wilkinson 8184, 8185 —— Necessity of a quarantine of fourteen days in order to make it effectual, Wilkinson 8180-8183.

2. Question of Exemption of Uninfected Countries:

Opinion that store cattle from all foreign countries should be subject to quarantine, inasmuch as they almost all come from districts where some disease constantly prevails, Read 1573-1582. 1624-1647——Countries entirely free from the cattle plague should be exempted from quarantine, Simmonds 3498-3502——Way in which it might be settled as to the countries to be placed under quarantine; discretion advisable in the Privy Council, Simon 5095-5097. 5100-5118.

Expediency of foreign store cattle being quarantined whenever there is disease in the countries whence they come, Lovell 6806-6810. 6832-6835; Strangeways 6969-6973 ——Witness would apply quarantine to all foreign cattle, though some countries may be entirely free from disease, Hudson 7345-7347. 7377-7380——Approval of store cattle being quarantined, unless they come from a country free from disease, Fair 7555. 7595-7602; Wilkinson 8184, 8185.

3. Effect of Quarantine on the Foreign Supply:

Doubt whether a quarantine, if general, would have any injurious effect on the trade in foreign cattle, Peters 1182-1186——Very few store cattle which would come from abroad, if subject to the expense of quarantine of fourteen or twenty-one days, Simmonds 3490-3497. 3520-3524. 3538-3542. 3591, 3592——Probability of foreign animals being still sent in equal numbers if not diseased, even though restrictions in the way of quarantine, &c., should be enforced, Hudson 7407-7421——Check to the foreign trade by a quarantine, Fair 7590.

4. Increased Value and Price of Store Stock, if Quarantined:

Enhanced value and price of store cattle if quarantined, Read 1576, 1577. 1661-1663; Rudkin 6749; Lovell 6808; Torr 7149-7153. 7200. 7207-7213; Hudson 7325, 7326; Wilkinson 8186, 8187——Store cattle, when quarantined, would be worth 1*l.* a head more to the buyer, Read 1661——Effect of quarantine in causing a healthier class of animals to be imported, Hunt 8457. 8469, 8470.

5. Suggested Quarantine for Milch Cows, and Calves:

Importance of quarantining milch cows, and calves under a certain age; how this might be carried out, Simmonds 3497. 3525-3537. 3592——Expediency of quarantining the cows from Holland, Rudkin 6658. 6687-6690——Contemplated quarantine for milch cows, as well as for foreign store stock, Torr 7133. 7135. 7238.

6. Evidence opposed to Quarantine, more especially of Fat Cattle:

Injury both to store cattle and fat cattle, if kept for some days in quarantine, Hall 860-863——Decided objection to a quarantine for either fat stock or lean stock; depreciation of the animals thereby, whilst the effect on the foreign trade would be very injurious, Coulson 2232-2253. 2266-2271——Quarantine would be no security against the foot and mouth disease, though it would against the cattle plague, ib. 2265. 2272, 2273.

Obstacle to quarantining the animals in order to see that there is no latent disease, Pratt 3254-3265—— Decided objection to quarantining fat cattle, Giblett 4608-4611 ——Difficulty as to the supply of suitable food for fat cattle, if they were all quarantined, Hicks 5331-5341——Quarantine is not necessary for animals intended for immediate slaughter, Hunt 8458-8461.

Statement by Mr. Gebhardt as to quarantine for foreign cattle being impossible, App. 329.

7. Conclusions of the Committee on the subject:

Several objections to any system of quarantine; its effect in checking importation, and in raising the price to the purchaser, Rep. vii——Conclusion that the only disease for which quarantine appears at all reasonable is the rinderpest, ib.——Objection to quarantine being applied to counties which, like Spain or Denmark, are free from rinderpest, and are not a channel for the exportation of cattle from infected inland countries, ib.—— Suggested permanent department in the Council Office for making inquiries relative to cattle plague abroad, and for recommending quarantine or other restrictions, ib.

RAILWAYS:

1. Watering and Feeding the Cattle during Railway Transit.
2. Cleansing and Disinfecting of the Railway Trucks.
3. Feeding and Watering on Foreign Railways.
4. Loading and Overcrowding of the Trucks.
5. Other details generally.

1. Watering and Feeding the Cattle during Railway Transit:

Obstacles to the cattle being watered and fed in the railway trucks, Salmon 1099–1101——Evidence on the question of watering cattle during transit in railway trucks; opinion as to this not being necessary between Harwich and London, Moseley 1366–1388——Explanation as to the obstacles to watering or feeding the cattle during the transit by railway between Scotland and London; impracticability of feeding and watering them while in the trucks, Clarke 1490–1497——The Great Northern route between Aberdeen and London occupies about thirty-six hours, the cattle not being fed or watered during the journey, ib. 1541.

Impracticability of feeding and watering Irish or Scotch cattle in the trucks, though this way may be very possible with cattle abroad, Reed 1589–1593——Suggestion that it be imperative to water cattle from Scotland at the commencement and end of the journey, ib. 1594–1597——Opinion as to its being feasible to water and feed the animals in the railway trucks, Hönck 1721–1725——Expediency of some hay and water being supplied to the animals during railway conveyance from Scotland, Giblett 4588–4599——There are no arrangements for watering or feeding the cattle during transit from Hull to Leeds, &c., O'Brien 6075, 6076.

Suggestions for watering the animals in the railway trucks between Aberdeen and London, Strangeways 7020–7023——Tendency to febrile diseases when the animals are long without water, ib. 7023——Obstacles to watering cattle in the trucks, though it is very desirable, Torr 7251–7253; Druce 7487–7497; Walsh 7882, 7883——Difficulty in supplying water in the trucks, it not being necessary, however, to water the cattle unless the journey is very long, or the weather very hot, Wilkinson 8316–8320.

Communication from the general manager of the Great Northern Railway, dated 11th December 1865, with reference to the feeding and watering of cattle in transit by rail from Scotland to London, App. 385.

Instances of cattle being conveyed on railways without being fed or watered for from thirty-six to forty-eight hours, Rep. iv——Serious evils consequent upon cattle in transit not being properly watered, ib.

2. Cleansing and Disinfecting of the Railway Trucks:

Impracticability of complying with the Privy Council Order of 16th April as to the mode of cleansing the trucks, Moseley 1147——Practice, previously to the cattle plague, of sweeping out the trucks and pens after each journey on the Great Northern Railway, Clarke 1465. 1468, 1469——More effectual cleaning and purification of the trucks since the Orders in Council; impracticability, however, of complying with the strict requirements of the recent Order on the subject, ib. 1465–1469. 1480.

Practice of cleaning the trucks on the Bristol and Exeter line previously to the cattle plague, disinfectants not having been used till prescribed by the Orders in Council, Wall 2679–2681——Further particulars as to the practice of cleansing and disinfecting the trucks on witness's line; effectual manner in which carried out, ib. 2758–2764. 2768–2274.

Care bestowed upon the cleansing of the cattle trucks since the recent Orders in Council, Rep. iv——Recommendation that it be made imperative upon railway companies to thoroughly cleanse and disinfect the trucks after each journey, ib.

3. Feeding and Watering on Foreign Railways:

Information relative to the practice as to watering and feeding the cattle in the trucks, and as to the arrangements generally during transit by railway from Germany, and from the interior of Holland to Rotterdam, Peters 1187–1205. 1265–1268. 1286, 1287——Practice of watering and feeding the cattle in transit from Germany to Antwerp, but not in the railway trucks, Huger 1335–1338——Care taken in regard to the feeding and watering of the animals during the continental railway transit, Hönck 1717–1720——Practice of taking the animals from Austria out of the trucks, in order to water and feed them, Hirschler 4171–4176.

4. Loading and Overcrowding of the Trucks:

Practice as to the loading of the trucks on the London and North Western Line, and the number of beasts put into each, Salmon 1094–1098——The number of cattle in railway trucks should be limited, Read 1588——Undue crowding of the trucks by the jobbers, Torr 7253——Suggested restriction upon the number in each truck, Walsh 7772. 7826–7832.

Very injurious crowding and detention of the cattle on the Irish railways, so that witness drives or walks his beasts as much as possible, Garnett 7905–7912. 7981–7983——Overcrowding of cattle in the railway trucks generally, Wilkinson 8303–8308.

Frequent overcrowding and bad treatment of cattle on the railways, especially in Ireland, Rep. iv.

5. Other details generally:

Concurrence in the objection to covering the bottom of the trucks with asphalte, Moseley 264–269. 1148–1160; Clarke 1468. 1545, 1546; Wall 2765–2767——Competition by road to which the railways are open as regards conveyance of cattle for distances of thirty or forty miles from London; competition also on the part of steamboats, Moseley 301–318——Deterioration of live meat when conveyed a long distance by railway, Salmon 1092–1094——Opinion that transit by railway does not tend to develope disease, Ellis 1422.

Partial extent to which the carriage of live cattle by the Great Northern Railway has been resumed, the restrictions of the Privy Council being a great check, Clarke 1480, 1481——Excited and feverish state of the animals when conveyed by railway, in addition to which, they are not fed or watered in the trucks; consequent deterioration, when slaughtered in London, both as regards quality and weight, ib. 1488–1501.

There is a large cattle traffic, both in store beasts and fat beasts, on the Bristol and Exeter Railway, Wall 2674–2678——Limited extent to which cattle traffic on the line has been resumed since the removal of the restrictions on railway transit, ib. 2682. 2748——Expediency of improved arrangements for the conveyance of cattle by railway, Stewart 5830–5834.

Ratcliff, James John. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a butcher, and is supplied chiefly from Newgate Market, 3632–3638——Considerable inconvenience and expense caused to butchers living a short distance from town by the recent Orders in Council as to the transit of live stock, 3639–3642——Belief that the existing restrictions have caused but little if any advance in the price of meat, 3643–3649——Advanced prices paid by witness and the trade generally though not charged by them to the public, 3646–3651——Improper prices given by the salesmen and quoted in the newspapers; suggestion that the quoted prices be settled by six salesmen and six butchers, 3650–3654. 3771–3777.

Inconvenience and loss to butchers beyond a distance of three miles or so if compelled to slaughter at a public slaughter-house; feeling of the trade on this question, 3655–3661. 3733–3736. 3748–3750. 3784–3788——Opinion that the best plan would be to have a separate market for foreign cattle near the place of landing, with slaughter-houses in connection with it, 3662, 3663. 3669–3683——Sufficient convenience to buyers, and sufficient competition for foreign stock, if sold at a separate market near the river side, 3663. 3673–3683. 3707–3709. 3798, 3799. 3808.

Practicability of supplying the metropolis from dead markets, if in addition to a large central market there were small markets in outlying places, as at Southall, Croydon, &c., 3664–3668. 3737–3739——Great spread of the foot and mouth disease through means of foreign cattle at the Islington Market, 3669, 3670. 3800–3807. 3832——Latent disease frequently in foreign cattle, which cannot be detected by inspection, so that the best means of preventing infection is to have a separate market, 3672. 3766. 3817–3833——Comparative inferiority of foreign meat, witness selling only home-fed meat, 3673–3678. 3778–3783.

Statement as to witness being supplied chiefly with dead meat from Scotland, both in summer and in winter; excellent condition in which this meat generally arrives, a great advantage being that the animals are killed when cool and unexcited, 3684–3706. 3751–3762. 3789–3797——Several respects in which a foreign market, with a slaughter-house attached, would be productive of much convenience, and would obviate much nuisance to the public, 3710–3728——Entire insufficiency of the present dead meat markets, 3729–3731——Want of a central meat market, into which the railways should run, 3732. 3737–3739.

Injury to the meat of foreign animals through their treatment on the voyage and the fatigue and harassment which they undergo before they are killed, 3740–3747. 3751——Preferable condition of the meat when the animal has not been over-driven, 3751–3755——Importance ——Importance of careful packing when dead meat is sent by railway, as from Aberdeen, 3760-3765——Impression of graziers, that diseases of cattle are mostly imported, 3809-3814——Instance, recently, of some foreign sheep having been imported with the small-pox, 3814-3816.

Read, Clare Sewell (Member of the House). (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Was one of the Cattle Plague Commissioners; has had considerable experience in grazing, 1570-1572——Opinion that all foreign fat stock should be slaughtered at the port of landing, 1573. 1604——Also that all store cattle from foreign countries should be subject to quarantine, inasmuch as they almost all come from districts where some disease constantly prevails, 1573-1582. 1624-1647——Increased value and price of store cattle when quarantined, 1576, 1577. 1661-1663——Very good fat cattle which come from Spain, there being no store cattle, 1577, 1578. 1656-1658——Belief as to rinderpest having been decidedly imported, 1582. 1640——Liability of Dutch and other cattle to pleuro-pneumonia in a greater degree than Irish cattle, 1582-1585. 1629-1636.

Very bad way in which Irish cattle used to be conveyed across the Channel, 1585-1587. 1622, 1623. 1650——Expediency of vessels being built expressly for the transport of cattle, and of their being limited to a certain number, 1588——The number in railway trucks should also be limited, ib.——Impracticability of feeding and watering Irish or Scotch cattle in the trucks, though this may be very possible with cattle abroad, 1589-1593——Suggestion that it be imperative to water cattle from Scotland at the commencement and end of the journey, 1594-1597.

Opinion as to its being feasible to supply London and other large places with dead meat from the country, 1598——Utter insufficiency of the arrangements in connection with Newgate Market, 1599-1601——Fat stock from the country but not from abroad might come into the Metropolitan Market, 1602-1604——Great advantage if there were a large public slaughter-house attached to the Islington Market, 1605-1612——Statement as to the unduly heavy charge for the carriage of dead meat between Norwich and London, 1613-1621.

Way in which quarantine should be applied to foreign store cattle; doubt as to the number of these rendering the matter very difficult, 1624-1628. 1644-1647——Witness does not propose to quarantine Irish store cattle, but only cattle from abroad, 1629-1636——Contemplated slaughtering, without delay, of all diseased cargoes, 1645——Suitable boats now used for bringing cattle from abroad, 1648-1651——Belief as to the very imperfect character of the quarantine and inspection regulations abroad, 1652-1655——Very fine cattle imported from Ireland, 1659, 1660.

Revel Cargo. See Russian Cattle.

Rinderpest. See Cattle Plague.

Robinson, Anthony George. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Shipowner and shipping agent in London; is largely interested in the import cattle trade, 3268-3278——Considerable quantity of store cattle imported from Holland, 3279, 3280——Conveyance of merchandise as well as cattle in most of the ships in which witness is interested, 3281——Great precautions taken at the port of shipment in Holland, to prevent any diseased animals being placed on board; full confidence of witness in the inspectors, 3282-3291. 3328-3331. 3359-3372——Very few cattle stopped on arrival in witness's ships; instances in the case of the foot and mouth disease, 3285-3291. 3355, 3356.

Mode of disposing of the cattle on arrival in London during the interval before they are sent to market, 3292-3297——Careful cleansing of witness's ships after the discharge of each cargo, 3298-3302. 3332, 3333——Regulations as to the space allowed to each beast, and as to their arrangement on board, 3303-9306. 3314——Very little dead meat brought in witness's vessels, 3307——Excellent condition in which the cattle generally arrive, 3308, 3309——Comparatively little suffering of the animals from Oporto, or from Holland, during the voyage, unless the weather is very severe, 3310-3325——Increasing character of witness's trade, 3326, 3327.

Very strict regulations of foreign Governments for preventing cattle plague, 3330, 3331. 3338. 3354——Belief that there would be no danger in allowing importation to be resumed from Harlingen, 3334-3341——Import in witness's ships of fat cattle only from Denmark, 3343-3346——Objection made, some time ago, by witness, to bringing milch cows from Holland, through fear of their getting the credit of introducing the cattle plague, 3347-3353——Belief that the plague originated in this country, and was not brought from Holland, 3354——Strict inspection in London, for the last three or four years, 3356-3358.

Greater difficulty and expense of a system of quarantine at Rotterdam than in London, 3372-3380——Inconvenience to the importer when Dutch cows arrive too late for market, 3381, 3382——Varying supply of store cattle from Holland, 3384——Careful construction of the vessels in the cattle trade, it being to the interest of the owners to bring the animals in good condition, so that Government regulations on the subject are not required, 3385–3392——Very prejudicial effect upon the import of foreign cattle through the restrictions as to transit, save in the form of dead meat, 3393–3397——Increasing demand for live stock from abroad, 3396, 3397——Large numbers of foreign sheep being introduced into Essex, 3397.

Great care necessary in the conveyance of pigs by sea; difficulty in getting them under the decks, 3398–3404. 3408——Good condition in which cattle are imported direct from Ireland to London, 3405–3407——Practice, for many years, to walk the pigs on and off the vessels from Ireland, 3409–3412——Arrangements as to the ventilation of witness's ships, 3413——Reference to a plan showing the way in which the animals are accommodated on deck, 3414.

Rotterdam. Very good condition in which the cattle generally arrive at Rotterdam from the interior, Peters 1163. 1166. 1265, 1266——Inspection to which the animals are subject on arrival at Rotterdam, those which are diseased being sent back again; doubt as to the proportion rejected, ib. 1163–1165. 1169–1171. 1206–1210. 1225–1240——Arrangements as to the shipment of the cattle at Rotterdam, and as to their accommodation on board, ib. 1173, 1174. 1256–1262. 1276, 1277. 1280–1285——Trade in milch cows and lean stock, as well as fat stock, between Rotterdam and Harwich, ib. 1180, 1181. 1288–1293.

Arrangements as to placing the animals in lairs, or turning them into fields, at Rotterdam, in the interval between their arrival and their shipment; inspection during this period, Peters 1206–1210. 1241–1246. 1251–1255——Practice of killing at Rotterdam animals having the cattle plague badly, ib. 1240. 1263, 1264——The largest number in any vessel, including sheep and beasts, has been about 240, ib. 1256. 1282.

The voyage from Rotterdam to London occupies about twenty hours, Pratt 3040——Reduction of the rates from Rotterdam to London direct, in order to meet the competition of the Harwich route, ib. 3065–3068. 3078——Greater difficulty and expense of a system of quarantine at Rotterdam than in London, Robinson 3372–3380.

Rudkin, Thomas. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is Chairman of the Markets Committee of the City of London; has been on the committee for several years, 6439–6443——Several markets under the control of the committee, by whom bye-laws are framed for their management, 6444–6446——Personal supervision exercised by witness, both at Copenhagen Market and the dead meat markets, 6447–6451.

Reference to returns (App. 326) showing the number of cattle in the Metropolitan Market, and in the lairs attached to the market, in the eight weeks from 16th April to 10th June in 1865 and 1866 respectively, 6452–6461——Explanation as to the accommodation in the lairs before the animals are sent into the market, 6456–6459.

Information relative to the prices of different kinds of meat in the Metropolitan Market, from 16th April to 10th June in 1865 and 1866; 6462–6471, and App. 327——Practice for the clerk of the market to take the opinions of various salesmen as to the prices, 6471–6482——Interest of the salesman to keep down the prices, the consignor in the country having, as regards Newgate Market, no check in the matter, 6482, 6483. 6502–6508——Approval of the prices of dead meat being given by a joint committee of salesmen and butchers, 6484–6487.

Fallacious character of the return of prices for Newgate Market as a guide to consumers, 6488. 6495. 6584, 6585——Great variation in the price of meat in the market according to its quality, 6490–6495. 6501. 6584, 6585——Custom of cattle salesmen at Islington Market, but not of dead meat salesmen at Newgate, to give a sold note to the consignor, showing the name of the buyer; advantage if this practice were extended to the dead meat market, as a check upon salesmen and upon prices, 6496–6519. 6560–6576.

Particulars relative to the tolls, or commuted payments, received by the corporation in respect of Newgate and Leadenhall Markets; unsatisfactory arrangements on this question, 6519–6541. 6545——Improved regulations contemplated in regard to tolls and stallage in the new market in Smithfield, 6533–6542. 6552——Prospect of the new market being opened in the summer of 1868; 6543. 6544.

With regard to an accurate return of prices, witness does not recommend that the salesmen be obliged by Act of Parliament to state the prices for an official return, 6547–6549. 6572–6576——Open question at present whether there is to be an afternoon retail market at Smithfield, 6553, 6554——Periods of the day by which the prices may be obtained in the live market and dead market respectively, 6555–6559. 6579–6583.

Great advantage of abolishing the private slaughter-houses, if it were practicable, 6586–6591——Conclusion that the slaughter-houses of retail butchers cannot be done away with; regulations proposed to be applied to these, 6592–6601——Suggestion that all carcase butchers be required to use the slaughter-houses at the Metropolitan Cattle Market;

Market; grounds for this recommendation, 6595–6627——Several slaughter-houses of carcase butchers in the City and its vicinity, 6618–6627.

Expediency of one central dead meat market for the metropolis, 6628——Importance also of but one market for live cattle, whether English or foreign; several objections to a separate market for foreign cattle at the river side, 6622–6639. 6694–6717. 6772–6783 ——Belief that but for the free supply of foreign cattle it would be practically impossible to feed the metropolis, 6634–6706 ——Objection to the foreign cattle being slaughtered at the place of landing and conveyed as dead meat to Smithfield Market by railway 6634–6639. 6668–6673.

Suggestion that all animals coming into the metropolitan live market be branded for slaughter within seven days, either in London or the country, 6639–6647. 6718–6730. 6741, 6742——Grounds for objecting to any store cattle being sent to the Metropolitan Market, 6639–6644. 6648–6653. 6718–6720——Proposed quarantine in the case of all store cattle at the port of landing, with a market attached, 6648–6655. 6687–6694. 6749 ——Great liability to the spread of disease by the system in which cows are introduced from abroad to the London cowsheds, 6656–6659——Importance of quarantining the cows from Holland, &c., 6658. 6687–6690.

Regulations desirable in order to prevent the spread of infection by means of fat cattle removed from the London market into the country for slaughter; expediency of such removal notwithstanding there may be some risk incurred, 6660–6686 —— Suggestions with a view to all foreign cattle being landed at Thames Haven; facilities for a quarantine and market in this locality for store cattle, 6687–6694. 6731–6740. 6750–6755——Opinion that danger from cattle plague arises more from English than foreign cattle, 6704–6707——Non-objection to the foreign and English cattle being kept distinct in the market, so long as they are in close contiguity, 6708——Growing importance of the foreign supply, 6709–6717.

Statement in support of the proposition that fat cattle sent to the Metropolitan market should not be allowed to be exposed for sale in any other market, 6721–6730——Better condition of the cattle if landed lower down the river and brought up by railway, 6738. 6750–6755——Obstacle to any improvement in the practice as to the animals being driven through the streets, 6743–6748——Improved condition of the cattle by landing them at Harwich instead of bringing them by sea direct, 6755–6759——Doubt whether the supply of dead meat to London has materially increased of late, 6760, 6761.

Total of thirty-seven seizures for rinderpest in the Metropolitan Market from 16th November 1865 to 22nd February 1866, three-fourths of the animals being English, 6763–6767——Peculiarly healthy state of the market since the end of February, 6763–6767 ——Probable danger of infection by allowing cattle from the London market to be conveyed alive into the country for slaughter, 6768–6771——Objections to markets outside the metropolis for supplying Kent and other adjacent districts, the competition by means of one central market for live stock being very desirable in the public interests, 6772–6783.

Russian Cattle. Witness is satisfied the cattle plague was not introduced into this country by the cargo of beasts from Revel, Hönck 2031–2033——Information relative to the cargo of Russian beasts from Revel which came through witness's hands; he has not been able to trace any case of cattle plague to these animals, Coulson 2279–2285. 2289–2293——Very wild character of these cattle, ib. 2285——Poor and lean character of the Revel cargo, ib. 2285–2293——Good accommodation and ventilation in the vessel which brought these cattle, ib. 2290.

Conclusion as to the plague not having been introduced by the cargo from Revel, Simmonds 3475, 3476. 3556–3570——Opinion that, except in the case of animals direct from Russia, no necessity has been shown for a quarantine with reference to the cattle plague, Holmans 3621–3631——If rinderpest was imported at all, and witness has very little doubt on the subject, it came direct from Russia, ib. 3621—— Witness never had any faith in the statement that the disease was imported by the cargo from Revel, Rudkin 6707.

Sale of Diseased Cattle. Summary punishment suggested in the event of the wilful exposure of diseased cattle for sale, Rep. v.

Salesmen. Total of about 4 s. 6 d. as the charge against the grazier in connection with the sale of each bullock in London, Herbert 6014–6016——Witness, as salemaster in Newgate Market, pays ready money for all consignments, the business being entirely one of commission, Bonser 7730–7732.

Salmon, Frederick. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is manager of the cattle traffic of the London and North Western Railway, 1068–1070——Much greater expense in the carriage of dead meat than of live stock by railway, the meat moreover being liable to deterioration, 1071–1079. 1090, 1091——Larger claims for compensation against the railway company in respect of detention of dead meat than of live stock, 1080–1088——Deterioration of live meat when conveyed a long distance by railway, 1092–1094——Restive character of Irish cattle, owing to which they often get bruised in transit, 1092. 1128——Practice as to the loading of the trucks, and the number of beasts put into each, 1094–1098——Objections to the cattle being watered and fed in the railway trucks, 1099–1101.

Particulars relative to the conveyance of Irish cattle by sea; good accommodation and careful treatment on board the boats to Holyhead, 1102–1126——Advantage in sending the Irish cattle by Holyhead instead of by Liverpool, 1111–1114. 1129, 1130——Better state in which cattle arrive in the Irish boats than in the boats from parts of Scotland, 1120–1125——Satisfactory condition on the whole in which cattle arrive from Ireland, 1127–1134.

Scotch Cattle. Superior condition in which Scotch cattle come by sea to Liverpool, Hall 842–847——Preference given to Scotch beasts over Irish or English ones, Bradbury 1057–1059——Good condition in which the cattle from Scotland arrive in London, both by boat and railway, Hönck 1956–1960.

Scotland:

Very large quantity of cattle from Denmark and Germany consigned to witness's firm at the ports of Granton and Leith, Swan 5357–5362——Sale of the cattle at the ports where they are slaughtered before removal, ib. 5363–5365——Transmission of the cattle alive to Edinburgh, Glasgow, &c. until the restrictions upon transit in consequence of the plague, ib. 5366, 5367——Dealings of witness's firm in both store and fat cattle from Ireland, ib. 5368–5370.

Great loss to the farmers and graziers in Scotland through the present restrictions, it being most desirable to exempt cattle and sheep from Denmark from these restrictions, Swan 5379 et seq.——Large area of land in Scotland now not stocked, ib. 5379. 5448, 5449——Proposition in regard to Danish cattle and home cattle coming to Granton, ib. 5385 et seq.——German cattle should come to Leith, and should for the present be slaughtered there or at Edinburgh, ib. 5385. 5387, 5388. 5406, 5407. 5453.

Limited import of foreign cattle to Edinburgh since the present restrictions, Swan 5390–5392. 5433–5445——Increasing demand for meat in Scotland; large supplies sent to London adverted to hereon, ib. 5410–5416——Proposal that store cattle should be kept out of the fat cattle market at Edinburgh and Glasgow, on account of the foot and and mouth disease being very prevalent in those markets; the same objection does not apply to fat cattle being sent to the store markets, ib. 5474–5500.

Satement as to the cattle plague having been introduced into Scotland by some cows from the Metropolitan Market, Swan 5515, 5516. 5521–5525——Summary measures proposed by witness on the first appearance of the plague in Scotland; advantage in the infected animals being at once slaughtered, compensation being given to the owners, ib. 5525. 5529–5537.

Very healthy character of the cattle landed at Leith and Granton, so that every facility should be granted to their import, Strangeways 6937–6956——Increased import to Scotland if the cattle were allowed to be taken to the interior for slaughter, ib. 6951–6954——Check to the import of store stock to Scotland from abroad, ib. 6954.

Order in Council of 3 November 1865, regulating the removal of cattle to and from the north western district of Scotland, App. 349, 350.

Order in Council of 11 April 1866, consolidating and amending previous orders for preventing the spread of cattle plague in Scotland, App. 373–380.

Reference by the Committee to the injurious effect upon Scotch farmers through the regulation as to the compulsory slaughter of foreign cattle at the port of discharge, Rep. vi.

Sevenoaks (Kent). Examination relative to the purchase of some legs of mutton at Newgate Market by a Sevenoaks butcher, through the difficulty of obtaining locally an adequate supply of live animals; high price paid, though the meat turned out bad by the following morning, Giblett 4626–4658.

Sheep. Conclusion as to it not being necessary to apply quarantine to sheep, disease being easily detected in their case, Daniels 154, 155. 178–185——Sheep, if diseased on landing, should at once be slaughtered, ib. 193, 194——Good condition of the foreign sheep coming to Liverpool by way of Hull, Hall 951–953——Large trade in the export of of sheep from Rotterdam, until the recent prohibition by Order in Council, Peters 1249, 1250——Considerable number of sheep exported from Antwerp: inspection to which subjected, Huger 1339-1342. 1348.

Good condition in which the sheep from Hamburgh arrive at Hull, Coulson 2116, 2117. 2163-2166——Course pursued at Hull in the event of sheep being imported with the scab, Lockwood 2529-2534——Large number of foreign sheep introduced into Essex, Robinson 3397——Instance recently, of some foreign sheep having been imported with the small-pox, Ratcliffe 3814-3816.

Opinion that sheep should not be stopped from any foreign part at the present time, Swan 5510, 5511——Information relative to the general kinds of disease in sheep, ib. 5511-5514. 5517-5520——Very good foreign sheep which come to the London market, Herbert 5985-5987——Sale by witness of all his sheep in Dublin, without sending any direct to Liverpool, Garnett 7924-7926——Healthy condition in which foreign sheep are landed at Newcastle, Wilkinson 8215, 8216.

Paper furnished by Mr. Robinson showing the number of sheep brought in from Holland, &c., during the year 1865, App. 307-314.

Returns showing the number of sheep in the Metropolitan Cattle Market for the several periods from 12th February to 14th April, and from 16th April to 10th June in 1865 and 1866 respectively, App. 326. 328.

Simmonds, William. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Veterinary surgeon; is Customs inspector of foreign cattle in the port of London, 3415-3417——Inspection by witness of each beast separately when landed on the wharf, 3418-3420——Practice of keeping back and slaughtering animals having the foot and mouth disease, or the lung disease, the rest of the cargo being allowed to proceed, 3420-3429——When any animal has the cattle plague, the whole of the cargo is slaughtered; instance of this in September last, 3424. 3430-3434.

Very good condition in which the cattle generally arrive from abroad, 3435——Occasional injury and suffering from overcrowding, so that witness suggests that it be imperative to allow a certain space to each animal, 3435-3457. 3466-3471——Suggestion also that it be compulsory to provide water and hay during the voyage, 3458-3460 3510-3519——Expediency of each vessel being thoroughly cleaned and disinfected after each voyage; this is now very generally done, 3461-3463. 3584-3589——Due care already taken by shipowners in the matter of ventilation, no expense being spared for the purpose, 3464, 3465. 3518.

Opinion that rinderpest was not introduced into this country by live cattle from abroad, 3472-3475. 3556-3572——Conclusion as to the plague not having been introduced by the cargo from Revel, 3475, 3476. 3556-3570——Necessity of a quarantine of fourteen or twenty-one days in the case of store cattle, in order to be sure that the plague is not latent, 3477-3497——Sufficiency of the regulation as to fat cattle being killed in four days after their arrival or their being sent to market, 3479. 3486-3488. 3591——Very few store cattle which would come from abroad, if subject to the expense of quarantine of fourteen or twenty-one days, 3490-3497. 3520-3524. 3538-3542. 3591, 3592——Importance of quarantining milch cows and calves under a certain age; how this might be carried out, 3497. 3525-3537. 3592.

Countries entirely free from the cattle plague should be exempted from quarantine, 3498-3502——Fearful suffering of some animals from the foot and mouth disease; expediency of a strict check upon its introduction from abroad, 3502-3509——Prejudicial effect upon the foreign trade, if there were a separate market in London for foreign cattle exclusively, 3543-3548. 3590, 3591.

Advantage if it were compulsory to supply hay and water on short passages as well as on the longer voyages, 3549-3555——Grounds for concluding that the cattle plague has not been imported with any beasts from Hungary, 3557-3563. 3571, 3572——General character of the inspection by witness and his colleague; obstacle to rendering it more efficient unless the animals are quarantined, 3573-3583.

Simmonds, Mr. Report from Mr. Simmonds to the Commissioners of Customs, dated 18th April 1866, relative to the restrictions applied in the case of foreign cattle, and disapproving of any relaxation thereof, App. 304.

Simon, John. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is medical officer of the Privy Council; was formerly officer of health for the City of London, 5017, 5018——Considers that the private slaughter-houses in the City, when under witness's inspection, were decidedly a nuisance, and were more or less injurious to the public health, 5018-5020. 5061-5070——Important advantage of public slaughtering as facilitating a proper inspection of dead meat, 5021-5023. 5051——Character of the twofold inspection formerly of slaughter houses, and of dead markets in the City, 5024-5031.

Doubt as to much meat in a putrid state being consumed in the metropolis, so as to be seriously prejudicial to public health, 5029–5036——Probability of there being a considerable sale in the metropolis of meat diseased by the presence of parasites and detrimental to human health, 5037–5045——Insufficiency of the present system of inpection for preventing the sale of trichinous pork, 5046–5050.

Expediency of regulations relative to the accommodation and treatment of cattle on board ship, 5054–5060——Liability to the introduction of steppe-murrain or rinderpest, unless further precautions are adopted in this country, 5073–5083——Advantage if foreign fat stock were slaughtered near the place of landing, 5079–5081——Suggestions as to the application of quarantine to store cattle, when they come from infected countries, 5082–5112——Way in which it might be settled as to the countries to be placed under quarantine; discretion advisable in the Privy Council, 5095–5097. 5100–5118.

Slater, William. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Butcher in Jermyn-street; purchases largely in the dead-meat market, and also slaughters at Kensington, 5119–5121——Difficulty of supply when the prohibition upon the movement of cattle was in force, 5122, 5123——Purchase by witness of home-fed meat exclusively, foreign meat not being suited for the West-end trade, 5124–5126——Inconvenience of a separation of the home and foreign markets; that is, in the case of butchers buying in both markets, 5127–5131. 5205–5208.

Imperfect manner in which the prices quoted in the newspapers are obtained, the quotations being too low; amended practice suggested, 5129. 5132–5144——Large quantity of dead meat from Scotland purchased by witness's firm; difficulty as to the supply in hot weather, 5145–5165. 5188. 5195–5197——Statement as to the importance of butchers having private slaughter-houses under their personal supervision, 5166–5179. 5199–5204——Approval of efficient inspection so as to prevent private slaughter-houses being injurious to health, 5180–5185——Various parts of the country whence beasts are brought by witness's firm; increased price paid for them of late, 5189–5193——Obstacle to depending entirely on a dead meat supply, 5194–5198——Considerable quantities of prime roasting beef supplied to witness's firm from private slaughter-houses, 5199–5202.

I. In the Metropolis:

1. Evidence in Condemnation of Private Slaughter-houses:

Details as to the extremely injurious operation of private slaughter-houses in the Metropolis, so that in the interests of the public witness recommends their compulsory abolition, Letheby 3841–3848. 3857 et seq.——Very objectionable way which the offal, fat, and blood are now very frequently disposed of, ib. 3842–3848. 3858. 3871. 3915–3917. 3953——There are fifty-eight slaughter-houses in the City, and they are all more or less a nuisance to the neighbourhood, ib. 3907.

Witness considers that the private slaughter-houses in the City, when under witness's inspection, were decidedly a nuisance, and were more or less injurious to the public health, Simon 5018–5020. 5061–5070——Great advantage of abolishing the private slaughter-houses if it were practicable, Rudkin 6586–6591.

Pressing necessity for the removol of all the slaughter-houses in the City of London, App. 319——List of slaughter-houses in the City, ib.

SLAUGHTER-HOUSES—continued.

I. In the Metropolis—continued.

2. Defence of the Private Slaughter-houses:

Slaughter of the animals chiefly at private slaughter-houses scattered throughout the Metropolis: convenience and economy thereby to the butchers as compared with the use of a public slaughter-house, Hönck 1732 et seq, 1944–1955——General feeling of the trade in favour of private slaughter-houses, Ratcliff 3748–3750. 3784–3788——Convenience of the present slaughter-houses in the Metropolis, Baker 4279. 4286–4289. 4414. 4499–4501.

Conclusion that oxen are worth more by 30*s*. a head, and sheep by 3*s*. a head, to the butcher, when killed at a private slaughter-house, than when killed at a public slaughter-house; data for this conclusion considered, Giblett 4568. 4763–4799——Excellent manner in which the butchers generally manage the work in their own slaughter-houses; great importance of their personal inspection, ib.——More cleanly treatment, and more satisfactory disposal of the offal, through there being private slaughter-houses, ib. 4568. 4779–4788.

Convenience and advantage of the present system whereby the cattle from the Metropolitan Market are distributed among numerous private slaughter-houses, and are killed under the butchers' personal inspection, Woodley 4855–4863——Importance to the butchers of the control and security under the present system, ib. 4858–4863——Limited nuisance arising from the slaughter-houses as compared with the evils to be created by their abolition, ib. 4943–4952.

Convenience and benefit to the public at large, as well as to the butchers, in the latter having private slaughter-houses where they can kill at any moment, according to the demand or the state of the weather, Pickworth 4956. 4965–4975. 5011–5015——Number of animals slaughtered weekly by witness: character of his accommodation for the purpose, ib. 4957–4960. 4969–4974. 5006, 5007——Clean and wholesome state in which the private slaughter-houses are generally kept, ib. 5015, 5016.

Statement as to the importance of butchers having private slaughter-houses under their personal supervision, Slater 5166–5179. 5199–5204——Considerable quantities of prime roasting beef supplied to witness's firm from private slaughter-houses, ib. 5199–5202——Frequent instances of live stock being consigned direct to witness: practice as to the disposal and slaughter of these, without their going through the market, Bonser 7693–7705.

3. Evidence in favour of Public Slaughter-houses or Abattoirs exclusively:

Great advantage if there were a large public slaughter-house attached to the Islington Market, Read 1605–1612——Evidence strongly in favour of a limited number of public slaughter-houses, or abattoirs, under proper regulations, and with proper appliances for disposing of the offal manure, Letheby 3844. 3859 et seq.——The consumers of meat and the public health would be benefited by the proposed abattoirs, the only difficulty being with the butchers: these should be compensated, ib. 3860–3863. 3877–3881——Very satisfactory operation of the system of abattoirs in Paris, and in various large towns in France, Prussia, &c., ib. 3864–3867. 3890.

Conclusion that the trade would soon conform without inconvenience to the regulations in public slaughter-houses, Letheby 3890–3894. 3899–3902——Opinion as to the sufficiency of two or three abattoirs for the Metropolis, ib. 3944–3946. 3971–3978——Tendency of public slaughter-houses to lower rather than to enhance the price of meat, ib. 3984–3987.

Approval of a system of public slaughter-houses in London, if a sufficient number be provided, Swan 5546–5548——Grounds for concluding that butchers in large towns would not suffer if required to use public slaughter-houses, J. Higgins 7072–7083.

4. Objections to the foregoing Proposition:

Limited advantage as regards disposal of the offal, hides, &c., by having one large slaughter-house, Hönck 1764–1779——Inconvenience and loss to butchers beyond a distance of three miles or so, if compelled to slaughter at a public slaughter-house; feeling of the trade on this question, Ratcliff 3655–3661. 3733–3736. 3748–3750. 3784–3788——Decided objection to its being imperative to use public slaughter-houses exclusively; injurious monopoly in such case in the hands of the larger buyers, Hicks 4062, 4063. 4103–4125.

Evidence strongly opposed to public slaughter-houses at the Metropolitan Cattle Market, which it should be imperative upon contractors and butchers to use exclusively, Baker 4280–4300. 4409–4415. 4472–4477. 4483–4490. 4502–4522. 4538–4558——Great inconvenience to butchers, as well as contractors, if compelled to use a public slaughter-house, ib. 4409–4415. 4472–4477. 4502–4509——Importance of a central market for live cattle, whilst a centralization of slaughter-houses is very objectionable, ib. 4489, 4490——Necessity of public slaughter-houses at several points of the metropolis, or of very very extensive accommodation at the Cattle Market, in the event of the private slaughter-houses being abolished, Baker 4538–4558——Difficulty in hot weather in distributing the meat to all parts of London from a central slaughter-house, Baker 4538–4546. 4558; Giblett 4566, 4567.

I. In the Metropolis—4. Objections to the foregoing Proposition—continued.

Impracticability, without increased expense, of slaughtering all live cattle in London in public slaughter-houses at the Metropolitan Market, Giblett 4566-4568. 4581——Serious loss through the fat being largely purloined when the slaughtering takes place at the slaughter-house at the Islington Market, ib. 4568. 4789-4799——It would be a confiscation of property if the butchers were deprived of the power of killing the meat on their own premises, ib. 4568——With regard to the system of abattoirs in Edinburgh, witness has a decided objection to its application to London, even if there were power in the butchers to hire the abattoirs, and if there were two or three, instead of only one, at the cattle market, ib. 4571–4584.

Conclusion as to the impracticability of all the slaughtering in the Metropolis being carried on at public slaughter-houses at the Islington Market, Woodley 4845–4854. 4861——Decided objection to being compelled to use public slaughter-houses, even though there were several in convenient localities: the wants of the public could not in fact be satisfactorily met, Pickworth 4965–4968. 5008–5015—— Difficulty in the butchers identifying their own animals at public slaughter-houses, ib. 5009-5011.

Ground for objecting to its being compulsory to slaughter in public slaughter-houses: inconvenience and injury to the butchers generally, who now have private slaughter-houses, Bannister 5250–5255. 5268–5295. 5006——Butchers would be largely robbed in public slaughter-houses, ib. 5253. 5269——Considerable inconvenience if butchers were compelled to use public slaughter-houses, Herbert 6002-6009.

Injury and expense if it were compulsory to use public instead of private slaughter-houses, Bonser 7688. 7706–7726——Injurious effect upon the foreign trade, if it were necessary to incur the increased expense of public slaughter-houses, ib. 7714, 7715.

5. Suggested Regulations for Private Slaughter-houses:

Conclusion that the slaughter-houses of retail butchers cannot be done away with; regulations proposed to be applied to these, Rudkin 6592–6601.

Conclusions of Dr. Letheby as to the great importance of increased checks upon slaughter-houses in the Metropolis, App. 319.

6. Question of compelling Carcase Butchers to use Abattoirs:

Suggestion that all carcase butchers be required to use the slaughter-houses at Islington Market: grounds for this recommendation, Rudkin 6595–6627——About half the slaughtering in London is done by carcase butchers, ib. 6603, 6604——Several slaughter-houses of carcase butchers in the City and its vicinity, ib. 6618–6627.

Any concession, as regards private slaughter-houses, should be in favour of retail butchers, rather than of carcase butchers, J. Higgins 7077, 7078——Difficulty in distinguishing between the carcase butcher and the retail butcher, in regard to the retention of private slaughter-houses, Bonser 7723–7726.

7. Fees at the Islington Slaughter-houses; extent to which these are used:

Amount of fees for slaughtering at the Metropolitan Cattle Market; prejudice of the butchers against the use of these slaughter-houses, Letheby 3882, 3883——Number of cattle slaughtered weekly at Islington Market, and rates charged, Herbert 6000, 6001. 6008.

8. Discontinuance of Slaughtering at the Dead Meat Markets.

Slaughter-houses for oxen are no longer used at Newgate or Leadenhall Markets, the dead meat being supplied to those markets, and to Aldgate Market, from other slaughter-houses in London, or from the country, Woodley 4872–4882.

II. In the Country and in Large Towns:

Way in which slaughter-houses might be established in country places, if there were a general system of dead-meat markets, Clarke 1536–1539.

Expediency of public slaughter-houses not only in London but in every large town in the kingdom, Letheby 3875. 3884–3887. 3978–3983 —— Contemplated erection of slaughter-houses by the municipalities, after which they would be self supporting by the fees, ib. 3876——The regulations and control should rest with the municipal bodies or local board of health, ib. 3954, 3955——Injury to health from private slaughter-houses in large towns, J. Higgins 7071, 7072——Advantage of slaughter-houses near the railway stations in the country, Fair 7162–7166.

III. In Foreign Countries:

Particulars in report by Dr. Letheby relative to the regulations and instructions in foreign countries on the subject of slaughter-houses, App. 316–318.

IV. Conclusions and Recommendations of the Committee:

Great inconvenience of cattle driving in the streets of London through the animals being driven to private slaughter-houses; suggestion hereon, Rep. v.——Statement as to slaughter-houses if properly kept not being unhealthy, ib.——Advantage if the slaughtering by carcase butchers were carried on at a public slaughter-house adjoining the live market, ib.——Great hardship by abolishing the slaughter houses of the retail butchers, ib.

Advantage to the public interests by adopting as far as practicable a system of public slaughter-houses, Rep. v——Expediency of slaughter-houses being placed under regulations and proper inspection, ib.——Suggested power in local authorities to acquire land for the erection of slaughter-houses, ib.

Slinging (Embarkation and Landing of Cattle). Objection to its being required to sling the cattle on board; increased expense thereby, Daniels 236——Injury to the store beasts when landed in slings, Valentine 2608. 2617–2619——Arrangements in the Tyne cattle ships as to slinging the cattle in landing them, Stephens 8382–8386.

Abandonment, to a great extent, of the practice of slinging, the animals being chiefly made to walk on and off board, Rep. iii.

Smithfield Market. Great advantage if the Great Eastern and other railways had a direct communication with the Smithfield dead meat market; obstacle in the case of the Great Eastern line, Moseley 323–333. 340–347. 350–356——Undue delay on the part of the corporation in converting Smithfield into a dead meat market, ib. 329–334. 352, 353——Inconvenience of a large dead meat market in the heart of the City, ib. 348–352——Defective arrangements in connection with the new dead meat market in Smithfield; want of a much larger area of siding accommodation, Clarke 1506–1514. 1559–1566——Want of a central meat market, into which the railways should run, Ratcliff 3732. 3737–3739.

Cause of the delay in the erection of the new market at Smithfield, Letheby 3937, 3938——Improved regulations contemplated as regards tolls and stallage in the new market, Rudkin 6533–6542. 6552——Prospect of the new market being opened in the summer of 1868, ib. 6543, 6544——Open question at present whether there is to be an afternoon retail market, ib. 6553, 6554——The tolls of the new market will be required to pay the bonds, ib. 6762.

Spanish Cattle. Large consignments of cattle from Oporto to witness's firm at Liverpool; excellent quality of these, and very good condition in which they arrive, Cullen 496–509——Very large vessels in which cattle from Oporto are conveyed, every care being taken of the animals during the voyage, ib. 500. 504–507. 595–610——Effect of the present restrictions upon transit by railway in greatly decreasing the importation from Oporto to Liverpool, ib. 526–529. 543, 544. 682–687——High prices fetched by the animals, ib. 592, 593——Entire extinction of the Oporto trade if a quarantine were imposed, ib. 594.

Good condition in which the cattle from Oporto arrived at Liverpool, the animals being of a valuable class, Hall 775–784——Better condition in which Spanish cattle arrive than Irish cattle, Bradbury 1054–1056——Healthy and excellent condition in which the cattle from Oporto arrive at Liverpool; they might, without danger, at once be forwarded into the country, Ellis 1397–1404. 1456–1459——Very good fat cattle which come from Spain, there being no store cattle, Read 1577, 1578. 1656–1658——Better condition in which cattle arrive at Liverpool from Spain than from Ireland, Aungier 2896–2902.

Stop to the import of animals from Oporto to London, through the Government restrictions, Robinson 3393–3396 ——The cattle from Spain have been very healthy, Holmans 3621——Light weight of the Spanish cattle, though very showy looking animals, Herbert 5901–5910—— Cattle from uninfected countries, like Spain or Portugal, should have the same facilities of transit as Irish cattle, Fair 7544. 7555. 7598.

Better condition in which cattle arrive from Oporto than from Ireland, Rep. iii—— Practice in the vessels from Oporto as to each animal being allowed space to lie down, and being fed with compressed food, and watered, ib.——Objection to quarantine being applied to cattle from Spain, as not only being free from rinderpest, but not being a channel for the exportation of cattle from infected inland countries, ib. vii.

STEAMERS (SEA PASSAGE):

1. Accommodation in the Cattle Vessels to London, Harwich, Hull, &c.
2. Question of Feeding and Watering the Cattle during the Passage.
3. Suggested Regulations as to the Number of Cattle in each Steamer, and the means of Ventilation.
4. Practice as to Cleansing the Vessels after each Voyage.
5. Condition of the Animals during the Passage, and on Arrival.

1. Accommodation in the Cattle Vessels to London, Harwich, Hull, &c.:

Way in which the cattle are accommodated on board the vessels from Rotterdam to Harwich: check upon overcrowding, Daniels 16–48. 80–90——The vessels of the Great Eastern Railway Company are exceedingly well adapted for the purpose of conveying cattle, ib. 18. 31——Objection to limiting the number to be conveyed by the vessels from Rotterdam to Harwich, ib. 82——Statement as to the character of the ships and of the accommodation on board in the case of the Oporto cattle; due care taken of the animals during the voyage to Liverpool, Cullen 500. 504–507. 595–610——Advantage in the steamers having coverings on deck for the cattle, ib. 730–733.

Disadvantage when cattle are crowded in the holds of steamboats, Ellis 1422——Good ventilation and careful treatment in the vessels bringing foreign cattle to Liverpool, ib. 1423, 1424——Suitable boats now used for bringing cattle from abroad, Read 1648–1651 ——Very suitable character of most of the vessels in which the animals are conveyed to London, so that there is not much suffering or injury except when the weather is very stormy, Hönck 1676–1692——Exceptional instances of the employment of vessels not properly fitted, ib. 1910. 1982–1992.

Particulars as to the accommodation in the cattle vessels of witness's firm, and as to the stowage and care of the animals during the passage from Germany, &c. to Hull, Malcolm 2305–2311. 2359–2381——Interest of the firm to bring the cattle without injury or loss on the voyage, ib. 2308–2310. 2347–2349——Provision as to ventilation in the holds of the vessels, ib. 2371–2373——Modes of arranging the cattle in the holds; suggestion hereon, Lockwood 2428–2440——Very few drovers with the cattle landed at Hull, ib. 2495–2503.

Conveyance of merchandise as well as cattle in most of the ships in which witness is interested, Robinson 3281——Regulations as to the space allowed to each beast, and as to the arrangements on board, ib. 3303–3306, 3414——Careful construction of the vessels in the cattle trade, it being the interest of the owners to bring the animals in good condition, so that Government regulations on the subject are not required, ib. 3385–3392 ——Arrangements as to the ventilation of witness's ships, ib. 3413——Reference to a plan showing the way in which the animals are accommodated on deck, ib. 3414.

Due care already taken by shipowners in the matter of ventilation, no expense being spared for the purpose, Simmonds 3464, 3465. 3518——Very little room for improvement in the accommodation for cattle on board ship, Holmans 3613–3620.

Excellent accommodation in the cattle vessels coming into the Tyne; very little overcrowding or injury on board, Wilkinson 8158–8161. 8229——Details relative to the accommodation, ventilation, &c., in the vessels from Hamburgh, &c., to the Tyne, Stephens 8344–8359. 8378, 8379.

Conclusion of the Committee, that with the exception of some cases in the Irish and Bremen trade, the vessels do not appear to be overcrowded, Rep. iii.——Statement as to the vessels being, with some exceptions, specially fitted up, and having means to secure ventilation, ib.

2. Question of Feeding and Watering the Cattle during the Passage:

Opinion as to its not being necessary to feed and water the animals on the voyage to Harwich, Daniels 233–235——Suggestion that it be compulsory to provide water and hay, during the voyage from abroad, Simmonds 3458–3460. 3510–3519——Advantage if it were compulsory to supply hay and water on short voyages as well as on long voyages, ib. 3549–3555——Advantage if the cattle could always be fed and watered on board; impracticability of this, when there are large numbers close together, Holmans 3614–3618.

2. Question of Feeding and Watering the Cattle during the Passage—continued.

The provision of water and hay on board ship should be rendered compulsory universally, Giblett 4600–4602——Preference of steamers to railways for conveying the live animals from Aberdeen to London, there being no provision of hay or water in the latter case, as in the former, ib. 5828–5837——Importance not only of the ventilation of the vessels being attended to, but of its being compulsory to water the animals on the voyage, Strangeways 7006–7015.

3. Suggested Regulations as to the Number of Cattle in each Steamer, and the means of Ventilation:

Expediency of vessels being built expressly for the transport of cattle, and of their being limited to a certain number, Read 1588——Approval of a Government inspection of all vessels in the cattle trade: interest however of the owners to have suitable and well fitted vessels, Hönch 1909–1914. 1999–2003——Advantage of a restriction upon the number of cattle to be carried in the vessels, Coulson 2147, 2148. 2156; Valentine 2610–2616——Restriction suggested as to the number of cattle, according to the space in each vessel, Lockwood 2421–2432.

Occasional injury and suffering from overcrowding, so that witness suggests that it be imperative to allow a certain space to each animal, Simmonds 3435–3437. 3466–3471——Suggested inspection as to the space to be allotted to the animals on board, Giblett 4603–4607——Expediency of regulations relative to the accommodation and treatment of cattle on board ship, Simon 5054–5060——Recommendation that cattle ships be registered to carry a certain number of cattle, according to the breed or size, Strangeways 6999–7005.

Regulations suggested as to the space to be devoted in the cattle vessels to each animal, as to the means of ventilation, arrangements for watering the animals, &c., Wilkinson 8228, 8229. 8237–8254. 8309–8312——Approval of compulsory regulations as to ventilation, the space to be allotted to the animals, &c., Stephens 8360–8376——Difficulty of enforcing regulations as to the space of cubic feet to be allotted to each animal in the cattle ships; way in which the number carried might, however be checked, Hunt 8403–8410——Means of enforcing proper ventilation, and of alleviating the distress from overcrowding, ib. 8404. 8411–8414.

Recommendation that provision be made under Government inspection, for the proper ventilation of all vessels employed in carrying cattle by sea, Rep. iv.

4. Practice as to Cleansing the Vessels after each Voyage:

Regulations as to cleaning the vessels from Rotterdam to Harwich after each Voyage, as soon as the cargo is out, Daniels 91–97. 166——Practice of cleaning the vessels of witness's firm each voyage; approval of its being compulsory to use disinfectants, Malcolm 2351–2356——Suggested use of disinfectants before a vessel takes any fresh cargo on board, Lockwood 2493, 2494——Practice as to cleaning the vessels conveying cattle to Hull, Valentine 2631–2634.

Careful cleaning of witness's ships after the discharge of each cargo, Robinson 3298–3302. 3332, 3333——Expediency of each vessel being thoroughly cleansed and disinfected after each voyage; this is now generally done, Simmonds 3461–3463. 3584–3589——Disinfection of the vessels to Granton and Leith after each passage, Strangeways 7019——Thorough cleansing of the Tyne vessels after each voyage, Wilkinson 8162–8164.

5. Condition of the Animals during the Passage and on Arrival:

Suffering chiefly during the last three or four hours of the passage from Rotterdam, &c., the animals being then worn out by fatigue, Daniels 113. 234, 235——Greater suffering of the cattle when sent direct to London by sea, than when landed at Harwich, ib. 113——Better condition generally in which cattle arrive at Harwich from Rotterdam than from Antwerp, ib. 229——Conveyance of the cattle from Holland to Harwich in boats belonging to the Great Eastern Company without the animals suffering much during the passage, Moseley 253–255.

Suffering of the animals imported at Hull, when the weather is very stormy, but not on ordinary occasions, Malcolm 2331–2333——Length of the passage from different parts to London, Pratt 3040——Comparatively little suffering of the animals from Oporto, or from Holland during the voyage, unless the weather is very severe, Robinson 3310–3325.

Frequency of accidents on board from fractured limbs, Strangeways 7016–7018——Wretched state in which witness has seen some foreign cargoes arrive at Blackwall, Wilkinson 8229–8234——Distress generally from bad weather, rather than from overcrowding or defective ventilation, Hunt 8411–8422——Opinion that the animals do not suffer more when coming up the river than when at sea, ib. 8419–8422.

Stephens, William Davies. (Analysis of his Evidence).—Is managing director of the Tyne Steam Shipping Company, 8334——Total of Six vessels employed by the Company in the import of cattle to Newcastle, 8335, 8336——Length of the passage from Hamburg, there being no delay in landing, 8337, 8338——Practice of feeding and watering the cattle on board, 8340, 8341——Details relative to the accommodation in the Tyne cattle boats, the arrangements for ventilation, the space between decks, &c., 8344–8359. 8378, 8379.

Approval of compulsory regulations as to ventilation, the space to be allotted to the animals, &c., 8360–8370——Almost entire absence of complaint as to the condition in which the cattle arrive, 8371, 8372——Strict inspection of the cattle before they are shipped at Hamburg and Rotterdam, 8373–8377——Witness has never seen any case of rinderpest in foreign cattle, 8380–8382——Arrangement in the Tyne ships as to slinging the cattle in landing them, 8382–8386.

Steppe Murrain. See Cattle Plague.

Stewart, James. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Butcher at Aberdeen; has been long engaged in sending dead meat to the London market, 5722–5725——Prime character of the meat sent from Aberdeen to London, 5727——Interval between the killing of the animal in Aberdeen and the sale of the meat in London, 5728, 5729——Diminished trade in the summer months, it being sometimes stopped in very hot weather, 5730–5734. 5794–5798——Sale of the offal chiefly in Aberdeen; price fetched by it, and mode in which finally disposed of, 5735–5744——Practice for many years to send meat to London by steamboats, 5747–5750.

Expense of conveyance by boat and railway respectively: difference between the cost of conveyance of the dead meat and of the live animal, 5751–5763. 5837——Practice of the farmers as well as of the Aberdeen butchers, to consign meat to the London market, 5764–5773——Very little mutton sent from Aberdeen to London, 5774–5775——Way in which the meat is packed to go by railway, 5776–5787——Very few complaints of the condition of the meat on arrival, 5799–5802——Advantage in the animals being killed in a cool and quiet state, and of the meat being allowed to set before it is placed in the trucks, 5803–5813.

Similar quality of meat forwarded whether as dead meat or as live cattle, 5821–5825——Preference of steamers to railways for conveying the live animals, there being no provision of hay or water in the latter case, 5828–5837——Expediency of improved arrangements by railway, 5830–5834——Very little loss of meat through being spoilt on the journey, 5844–5847——Use by witness of the corporation slaughter house, there being also six private slaughter houses, 5848–5851——Difference of about 2 d. per pound between the retail price of meat, and the wholesale price of the bullock, 5852, 5853.

Store Cattle. Difficulty anticipated in supplying the grazing districts with store cattle, Clarke 1481——Contemplated continuance of the import of store cattle to London by railway, ib. 1567–1569——Very few store cattle from France, whilst there are not any from Spain or Portugal, Read 1577, 1578—— Consignment of both fat stock and store cattle to witness at Hull, there being an increasing demand for the latter, Coulson 2056–2073——Few store cattle imported by witness's company direct to London, Pratt 3250.

Considerable quantity of store cattle imported from Holland, Robinson 3268–3280——Witness would like to see the stores done away with altogether, Simmonds 3591——Very few store cattle or milch cows coming into the London market, Herbert 5962–5969——Increased prices of store cattle as compared with their price a year ago, Torr 7193–7196.

Detriment to the Scotch farmers by the recent regulation as to the compulsory slaughter of all foreign cattle at the port of discharge, thus preventing the importation of any store cattle or sheep, Rep. vi.——Advantage in large towns of separating the markets for store cattle, and for fat cattle, ib. vi, vii.

Very healthy character of the cattle landed at Leith and Granton, so that every facility should be granted to their import, 6937-6956——Increased import to Scotland if the cattle were allowed to be taken to the interior for slaughter, 6951-6954——Check to the import of store stock, 6954——Statement as to the rinderpest having been brought to Edinburgh by some milch cows from the Metropolitan Market, 6956-6961——Careful manner in which the inspection at Granton is conducted by witness, 6962-6967——Opinion as to murrain or eczema being one of the worst diseases imported, 6967, 6968.

Expediency of foreign store cattle being quarantined whenever there is disease in the countries whence they came, 6969-6973——Suggested separate markets for all foreign stock, 6969. 6989-6997——Contemplated slaughtering of fat sheep and beasts from abroad, either at the port of landing or in the towns, within a certain time, 6974-6978. 6994-6998——Large supply of mutton to London from the Edinburgh slaughter-houses, 6985-6987——Objection to store stock and fat stock in the same market, 6997.

Recommendation that cattle ships be registered to carry a certain number of cattle, according to the breed or size, 6999-7005——Importance of the ventilation of the vessels being attended to, and of its being compulsory to water the animals on the voyage, 7006-7015——Frequency of accidents on board from fractured limbs, 7016-7018——Disinfection of the vessels to Granton and Leith after each passage, 7019——Suggestions for watering the animals in the railway trucks between Aberdeen and London, 7020-7023.

Streets (Driving of Cattle). Route taken in driving the animals from Blackwall to the Cattle Market; complaints made on this score, Hönck 1728-1731——Importance, more especially with reference to driving the cattle through the streets, of abolishing the private slaughter-houses as far as possible, Rudkin 6589-6591——Obstacle to any improvement in the practice as to the animals being driven through the streets, ib. 6743-6748——Regulation that the animals are not to be driven through the streets between the hours of twelve and seven in the day, ib. 6746-6748——Various directions to which cattle are now driven from slaughter, in addition to their being driven to the Metropolitan Cattle Market, Bonser 7689-7692.

Recommendations by the Committee with reference to the evils arising from cattle driving through the streets, Rep. v.

Supply of Cattle. Difficulty of supply in the London market when the prohibition upon the movement of cattle by railway was in force, Slater 5122, 5123——Opinion as to there being a decrease every year in the number of English beasts and sheep, Herbert 5943-5957. 5980-5983——Reference to return (App. 326) showing the number of cattle in the Metropolitan Market, and in the lairs attached to the market, in the eight weeks from 16th April to 10th June in 1865 and 1866 respectively, Rudkin 6452-6461——Conclusion as to the great falling off in the English supply, ib. 6709-6711.

5371, 5372——Frequency of the foot and mouth disease in the case of cattle from Hamburgh, 5371. 5373. 5502.

Very good inspection of foreign cattle at the port of Leith, 5374, 5375——Large number of foreign store cattle which used to be imported through Leith, 5376, 5377——Approval of a quarantine in the case of store cattle from Germany, 5379, 5380——Great loss to the farmers and graziers in Scotland, through the present restrictions, it being most desirable to exempt cattle and sheep from Denmark from these restrictions, 5379 et seq.——Large area of land in Scotland now not stocked, 5379. 5448, 5449——Very strict regulations in Denmarrk for preventing the plague, 5380. 5388.

Proposition that the Danish cattle and home cattle should come to Granton, to be sold at a market there, and that facilities be given for their removal by the butchers, under certain regulations, 5385 et seq.——German cattle should come to Leith, and should for the present be slaughtered there or at Edinburgh, 5385. 5387, 5388. 5406, 5407. 5453——Excellent accommodation available at Granton, 5386. 5397, 5398——Enhanced price of meat at Glasgow, through the foreign cattle not being allowed to pass through from Leith, 5389. 5440. 5450–5453——Limited import of foreign cattle to Edinburgh since the present restrictions, 5390–5392. 5433–5445.

Information relative to the importation of fat and store cattle to Glasgow from Ireland; scarcity at the present season of the year, 5393–5395. 5454–5469——Strict regulations in force as to the slaughtering of animals landed at Leith, 5396——Deficient slaughtering accommodation at Leith for all the cattle landed, 5397. 5422——Importance of Glasgow, Airdrie, and other towns being supplied by means of live meat received from Granton, in lieu of the present system of slaughtering at Leith and Granton, and removing the dead meat to the towns, 5398–5409. 5417–5420. 5426–5433. 5440. 5450–5453.

Increasing demand for meat in Scotland; large supplies sent to London adverted to hereon, 5410–5416——Great injury to the meat when sent to Glasgow, &c., by railway in warm and wet weather, 5426–5432——Very satisfactory operation of the public slaughter-houses in Edinburgh and Leith, 5442, 5443. 5538–5542——Good breed of the Danish sheep, 5448. 5510——Danger at present in holding large cattle fairs in Scotland, 5470–5473——Proposal that store cattle should be kept out of the fat cattle market at Edinburgh and Glasgow on account of the foot and mouth disease being very prevalent in those markets; the same objection does not apply to fat cattle being sent to the store markets, 5474–5500.

Satisfactory arrangements in the transport of cattle from Denmark, 5503–5507——Prices fetched by the Danish cattle, 5508——Opinion that sheep should not be stopped from any foreign port at the present time, 5510, 5511——Information relative to the several kinds of disease in sheep, 5511–5514. 5517–5520——Statement as to the cattle plague having been introduced into Scotland by some cows from the Metropolitan Market, 5515, 5516. 5521–5525.

Summary measures proposed by witness on the first appearance of the plague in Scotland; advantage in the infected animals being at once slaughtered, compensation being given to the owners, 5525. 5529–5537——Endeavour made last year to combine the three public slaughter-houses in Glasgow in one; inconvenience and expense thereby, 5542–5546——Approval of a system of public slaughter-houses in London if a sufficient number be provided, 5546–5548.

Swedish Cattle. Very poor character of some cattle from Sweden, Read 1580——Statement as to the heavy loss suffered upon a cargo of cattle from Sweden in August 1865 through the inspector having reported that two of the animals had rinderpest, so that the whole cargo was quarantined; sound state of the cattle suspected of the disease, Hicks 5319–5330. 5341–5343.

Switzerland. Regulations in force as to the inspection of cattle and dead meat, App. 317.

T.

Thames Haven. Objection to Thames Haven, as compared with the Isle of Grain, as the landing place for foreign cattle, Nelson 6424–6428——Suggestions with a view to all foreign cattle being landed at Thames Haven; facilities for a quarantine and market in this locality for store cattle, Rudkin 6687–6694. 6731–6740. 6750–6755.

Tonning. Large trade in fat cattle and sheep from Tonning to London, this being only a summer trade, Pratt 2985. 2989–3000——The voyage from Tonning to London is from forty to forty-four hours, ib. 3040——Special arrangement by which cattle from Tonning are insured by the General Steam Navigation Company, ib. 3110. 3227–3232.

Torr, William. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Occupies more than 2,000 acres of land in Lincolnshire, and is interested largely in both breeding stock and grazing stock, 7104–7107——Is supplied with grazing stock chiefly from the breeders within the county, 7108–

7108-7110——The cattle when fat are sent mostly to the markets of Leeds and Wakefield, 7111-7113——A large number of carcases are also sold by witness locally, the animals being slaughtered by himself, 7114-7116——But few carcases are sent to London on account of the risk of injury, 7117-7119.

Expediency of some restriction in regard to the small markets for live cattle in country towns, these being a fertile source of the spread of disease, 7120-7125. 7134——Opinion that all foreign fat stock should be slaughtered at the port of landing, 7126-7130——Facility of supplying Leeds, Manchester, and other large towns throughout the year with dead meat from Hull and Liverpool, 7129. 7136-7148. 7157 7173——Witness has never bought foreign stock to graze, nor are many bought in Lincolnshire, 7131, 7132. 7248——Contemplated quarantine for all foreign store stock and milch cows, 7133. 7135. 7238.

Evidence as to the improvements which might be adopted in the supply of country-killed meat to the towns, witness anticipating that London and the large towns may be supplied throughout the year, without the meat being deteriorated, 7136-7148. 7157-7173——Witness contemplates the supplies being ordered beforehand by the butchers in London, 7136, 7137. 7143-7145. 7216-7234. 7272-7281——Facility for advantageously disposing of the offal in country places, 7137-7140. 7147. 7160, 7161——The dead meat supply to large towns should only be supplementary to live stock markets, 7142, 7143. 7235-7237——Excellent meat obtained from Aberdeen in large quantities under contract for the army, 7147, 7148.

Enhanced price and value of foreign store cattle, if quarantined, 7149-7153. 7200. 7207-7213——Considerable supply formerly of store cattle from Holland and Germany for Lincolnshire, 7154-7156——Economy feasible in the conveyance of dead meat by railway, 7159-7161——Advantage of slaughter-houses near the railway stations in the country, 7162-7166——Excellent state in which the meat may be brought by railway, 7166-7177——Great advantage in the animal being killed when in a cool state, instead of after long journeys by railway, &c., 7173-7179.

Objection to fat cattle that have been once in the Metropolitan Market going into the country for slaughter, 7180-7187. 7238——Store cattle should be excluded from the Metropolitan Market, 7188-7193——Increased price of store cattle as compared with their price a year ago, 7193-7196——Consideration of objections to quarantining foreign store cattle on account of the risk to be incurred by healthy cattle in the quarantine ground, 7197-7215——Absence of any undue limitation of markets if the butchers in Leeds, Manchester, &c., had to supply themselves largely from the ports in the shape of dead meat, 7216-7225. 7235-7237.

Losses from the cattle plague in Lincolnshire, though witness has fortunately escaped it, 7239-7241——There are still some villages in the county which are treated as infected districts, 7242——Increased price of beef and mutton in witness's district adverted to with reference to the shortness of the supply, 7243-7247. 7259-7271——Improved condition of foreign cattle lately on arrival at Hull, 7249, 7250——Difficulties in the way of watering the animals in the railway trucks, 7251-7253——Way in which the small country markets for live stock operate very injuriously, so that they should be prohibited in the smaller towns, 7254-7258.

Difficulty in the supply of stock for grazing in witness's county, 7267-7271——Large quantity of fat stock now killed on Lincolnshire farms without being consigned to the markets, the butchers arranging to take so many per week or month, 7276, 7277. 7287, 7288——Loss sometimes sustained by graziers when the markets for fat cattle are not good, 7282-7284——Different class of sheep sent by witness to Manchester and to London, 7284-7286.

Transit of Cattle. Restriction still in force upon the movement of foreign cattle from markets, Bradbury 975-983. 991, 992——Approval of live stock going from Liverpool to Manchester and the other places of their destination and being there killed within a few days, Ellis 1419-1421. 1438-1440——Tendency of the prohibition upon the transit of foreign live stock in checking importation, Dickenson 2855-2859——Disapproval of restrictions in regard to the disposal of the live animal if not diseased, Letheby 3874. 3932-3936.

Very prejudicial effect upon the import of foreign cattle through the restrictions as to the transit save in the form of dead meat, Robinson 3993-3997——Evidence in favour of its being permitted to remove cattle from the London market into the country for slaughter, under certain restrictions, Rudkin 6660-6686——Prejudicial operation of the restrictions upon transit from Liverpool as regards the Irish trade, Walsh 7788-7795; Garnett 7927-7934; Watson 8005-8008.

Summary by the Committee of the regulations and practice as to the transit of cattle, &c., and their treatment on board the vessels and on the railways, Rep. iii, iv——Recommendations on the score of cleansing and disinfecting the trucks, steamboats, &c., and Trench, Dr. William Stewart. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is medical officer of the borough of Liverpool, 358, 359——Information relative to the private slaughter-houses in Liverpool and the public slaughter-house or abattoir; compensation necessary before removing them, 360, 361——Statement as to the excessive mortality of Liverpool, and as to this being partly owing to the slaughter-houses being in the town, and their effect in contaminating the sewers, 362–384. 427–429——Great advantage if all the slaughter-houses were removed from the town, and if there were but one abattoir, to be erected on corporation land near Stanley Market, 385–399. 439–443. 450.

Great inconvenience experienced through there being no lairs for the cattle before they are slaughtered, after leaving Stanley Market, 399–414——Inconvenience also through there being only one cattle market and one market day in the week, 414–418. 423, 424——Weekly return of cattle slaughtered in the borough in 1865 and 1866; also of cattle slaughtered at the public abattoir in the first three months of 1865 and 1866; 418——Unduly large amount of work done in the abattoir, Manchester and Salford being largely supplied with dead meat from Liverpool, 418–422.

Difficulty in obtaining land at or near Liverpool for placing cattle in quarantine, 425, 426. 437–443——Arrangements as to the removal of manure from the slaughter-houses and cow-houses, 430–434——Inspection of foreign cattle and of Irish and Scotch cattle on their landing, 445–447——Great number of cow-houses in Liverpool, over which some control is urgently required, 450——Statement as to the corporation not having taken action towards removing the slaughter-houses and cow-houses out of the town, 451–454.

Suggestion that the proposed abattoir outside the town be let off to a company, instead of being managed by the corporation, 455, 456——Arrangement as to the payment by the butchers for the use of the present abattoir, 457——Large quantity of unsound meat condemned every week, the killing butchers not being to blame in this matter, 458–462——Facility of preventing bad meat coming in if there were but one public slaughtr-house, 463, 464——Impracticability of supplying Liverpool with meat coming already killed from Ireland, &c., 468–470.

Doubt as to any disease being traceable to over-kept meat, though it is doubtless unwholesome, 471–476. 480–485——Opinion as to its being feasible to supply not only all Liverpool but Manchester and Salford by means of one large slaughter-house near Liverpool, 477. 479——Very bad slaughter-houses in Manchester, 478——Check upon diseased meat being got rid of by being potted and preserved, 486–492.

Trichina. Insufficiency of the present system of inspection for preventing the sale of trichinous pork, Simon 5046–5050.

Tyne Steam Shipping Company. Total of six vessels employed by the Company in the import of cattle to Newcastle, Stephens 8335, 8336——Practice of feeding and watering the cattle on board, ib. 8340, 8341——Details relative to the accommodation in the Company's boats, the arrangements for ventilation, space between decks, &c., ib. 8344–8359. 8378, 8379——Almost entire absence of complaint as to the condition in which the cattle arrive, ib. 8371, 8372.

Wakefield. Approval of a supply of live cattle from Hull to Wakefield and other towns, as well as to Leeds, S. Higgins 5678. 5703-5709.

Wakefield, George. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Butcher at Maidstone; supplies the troops, and the gaol, &c. by contract, 6149-6154——Frequent complaint made about witness's supply to the troops, since he has been obliged to procure dead meat from Newgate Market, 6155-6177——Amount of contract price for the troops and for the gaol, 6178-6180——Very bad condition in which meat slaughtered in London has arrived at Maidstone in the hot weather; mode of packing and of conveyance adverted to hereon, 6181-6193——Very few beasts now to be brought in Kent from the marsh districts, 6197-6199.

Wall, James Cresswell. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is goods manager of the Bristol and Exeter Railway, on which line there is a large cattle traffic both in store beasts and fat beasts, 2674-2678——Practice of cleansing the trucks on the line previously to the cattle plague, disinfectants not having been used till prescribed by the Orders in Council, 2679-2681——Limited extent to which cattle traffic on the line has been resumed since the removal of the restrictions on railway transit, 2682. 2748——Arrangements made in January last for conveying carcases from the country to Bristol; successful operation thereof though opposed by the butchers, 2682-2693. 2719-2721.

Encouragement given to the carriage of dead meat over the Bristol and Exeter Railway in the belief that it will ultimately be more profitable to the company than the carriage of live cattle; particulars hereon as to the rates and cost in each case, 2693-2697. 2777, 2778. 2784-2787——Information relative to the arrangements for conveying the meat, it being sometimes hung in the vans, and sometimes placed in hampers, 2698-2718——Statement as to dead meat having been carried all through last summer between Cornwall and London, and being still carried in large quantities, without any complaint of injury or loss; special trains used for the purpose, 2698, 2699. 2724-2734. 2782, 2783.

There have been no claims for compensation through injury to the meat, 2703, 2704. 2718. 2775, 2776. 2779——About equal claims for loss of market in the case of live stock as of dead meat, 2705——Practice as to the slaughtering of the animals, and as to the loading of the carcases in the trucks, 2706-2723. 2779-2781——Increasing construction of meat vans for the Bristol and Exeter Company, 2718——The system does not cause any public complaint, 2718. 2775, 2776——Advantage to cattle owners and graziers, but not to butchers, by the railway traffic in dead meat from the West of England to London, 2735-2740——Large quantity of dead meat traffic from the west of Bristol and to London, 2741, 2742.

Facility of meeting the demand in London, and of arranging the supply with reference thereto, 2743-2748——Injury to owners and graziers in the West of England through the restriction upon transit of live stock by rail, 2749-2754——Practice as to cleansing and disinfecting the trucks on witness's line; effectual manner in which carried out, 2758-2764. 2768-2774——Difficulty as to flooring the trucks with asphalte, 2765-2767——Satisfactory operation of the system of dead meat traffic on the line further adverted to, 2775-2787.

Walsh, Richard. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a cattle salesman and grazier in the counties of Meath and Dublin, 7750–7752——Sells fat cattle exclusively, 7753–7755——Suggested inspection of the cattle ships between Dublin and England, so as to prevent overcrowding; satisfactory character, however, of the arrangements in most of the Irish cattle ships, 7756, 7757. 7764–7767. 7821–7823——Good condition in which the cattle are brought to the port of Dublin for shipment; various parts of Ireland whence they come, 7758–7761——Some cattle are consigned to salesmen in Dublin, by whom they are sold to dealers, and some go direct to salesmen in Liverpool, 7762, 7763.

Very bad treatment to which Irish store cattle have been subjected both on the Irish railways and on board ship, more especially on the railways, 7768–7774. 7805–7832. 7866–7877——Undue detention of the cattle in the railway trucks, whilst they are constantly overcrowded and are badly treated by the railway servants, 7768–7771. 7780–7785. 7805–7815. 7824–7832. 7870–7877——Suggested restriction upon the number in each truck, 7772. 7826–7832——Watering and feeding of the cattle before they are placed on board, 7774.

Good prices fetched by store cattle in Ireland during the spring of the present year, 7775, 7776——Increased price of fat cattle; serious rise recently, 7777–7779. 7786, 7787——Prejudicial interference with the Irish trade through the restrictions upon the transit of live stock from Liverpool, 7788–7795——Objection to an inspection of Irish cattle at English ports with reference to pleuro-pneumonia, or the foot and mouth disease, 7796–7801. 7880, 7881——Very little lung disease now in Ireland, 7800–7804——Restrictions are not required for the foot and mouth disease, 7800.

Rough treatment of the cattle in Ireland by drovers, 7813–7816——Better treatment in the steamers than on the railways, 7821–7824——Trade in dead meat from Dublin to Glasgow but not to Liverpool, 7833–7837——Transmission of grass-fed cattle to England for about seven months in the year, and of stall-fed cattle for the rest of the year, 7838–7846——Practice generally of consigning the fat cattle to salesmen in Dublin or Liverpool instead of sending them to fairs, 7847–7855——Way in which the trade in Irish store cattle is carried on; that is, irrespectively of salesmen, 7856–7864.

Opinion that the live stock in the country is larger than usual at the present time, 7865——Instances of fat cattle not being properly conveyed on the Irish railways, 7861–7871——Obstacle to watering the cattle in the trucks, 7872, 7873——Very little import of foreign cattle to Ireland, 7878, 7879——Difficulty as to a satisfactory inspection of fairs and markets in Ireland, with a view to preventing the spread of disease, 7882–7884.

Watering and Feeding of Cattle during Transit. See Railways, 1. 3. Steamers, 2.

Watson, William. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is managing director of the Dublin Steam Packet Company, 7988——Conveyance by the company of cattle between Dublin and Liverpool only, 7989–7992——Every care is taken to prevent overcrowding; difficulty in always avoiding this, 7993. 8015–8021——Conveyance of other cargo besides cattle, there being ten vessels devoted to the trade, 7994–7996. 8037——Information relative to the general accommodation and arrangements on board, 7996–8002. 8009 et seq.

Effect of the restrictions upon transit from Liverpool in regard to the export of fat stock from Ireland, 8005–8008——Practice of cleansing the vessels without disinfecting them, 8009–8011——Very slight risk of loss on board, there being hardly any claims for compensation, 8033–8037——Self-interest of the company to make the vessels safe, 8036. 8038——Responsibility of the company in the event of its being necessary to throw cattle overboard from overcrowding, 8038–8041.

Very good facilities for debarkation at Liverpool, 8042——Doubt as to the advantage of a market at Liverpool close to the place of landing, 8043–8045——Willingness of the company to encourage a dead-meat traffic; way in which the meat might be packed on board, 8046. 8055–8060——Arrangements of the company with English railways for sending cattle thus to London, Manchester, &c., 8047–8049——Doubt as to any great convenience by bringing the Irish railways down to the place of embarkation, 8050–8054.

Excellent accommodation in the cattle vessels coming to Newcastle; very little overcrowding or injury on board, 8158–8161. 8229——Thorough cleansing of the vessels after each voyage, 8162–8164.

Large shedding accommodation for the cattle when landed, with ample slaughter-houses attached, 8165–8169. 8191——Facility for quarantining the animals at the sheds, 8170. 8190——Very few store animals imported, 8171——Number of cows that have died or been slaughtered on account of the rinderpest; the disease was not imported by foreign cows, 8171–8177——Absence of any cases of rinderpest among the cattle in the town since March last, 8179——Necessity of a quarantine of fourteen days in order to make it effectual, 8180–8183——Approval of store cattle being quarantined unless they come from a country free from disease, 8184, 8185——Enhanced price of store cattle if quarantined, 8186, 8187.

Statement in favour of foreign fat stock being allowed to be removed by railway to the towns near Newcastle, 8188, 8189. 8192. 8255–8266. 8298, 8299——Present practice of slaughtering in Newcastle for the towns in the district; inconvenience and injury involved in supplying the dead meat to these places, 8192, 8193. 8264–8287. 8321, 8322——Care taken in cleansing the cattle market at Newcastle, as well as the landing-places for the cattle, 8194–8199——Slaughter of the whole of the cargo if there are any cases of pleuro-pneumonia, 8200, 8201——Prompt landing of the cattle, 8202–8204.

Defective accommodation and bad treatment of the cattle in the vessels from Ireland to England, 8205–8213——Healthy condition in which sheep are landed in Newcastle, 8215, 8216——Rise of prices in the Newcastle market through the short supply of stock, 8217–8220. 8235, 8236. 8323–8333——Fairness of the quoted prices of dead meat in the market; way in which ascertained, 8221–8227——Regulations suggested as to the space to be devoted in the cattle vessels to each animal, as to the means of ventilation, the arrangements for watering the animals, &c., 8228, 8229. 8237–8254. 8309–8312——Wretched state in which witness has seen some foreign cargoes arrive at Blackwall, 8229–8234.

Very satisfactory operation of the public-slaughter-houses in Newcastle, 8288–8296——Check to the import trade at Newcastle by the restrictions relative to the cattle plague, 8300–8302——Overcrowding of cattle in the railway trucks, 8303–8308——Depreciation of foreign fat stock if not killed shortly after being landed, 8313–8315——Difficulty in supplying water in the railway trucks, it not being necessary however to water the cattle unless the journey is very long, or the weather very hot, 8316–8320.

Woodley, Thomas. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a wholesale carcase butcher in the City; is well acquainted with the wholesale meat trade of London, 4826–4832——Absolute necessity of a live cattle market in London, it being impracticable to keep up a regular supply of dead meat all through the year, 4833, 4834——Great importance of there being but one market for foreign cattle and home cattle; interference with prices, as well as with the foreign trade, if there were separate markets, 4833–4844. 4894–4896. 4937–4942.

Conclusion as to the impracticability of all the slaughtering in the metropolis being carried on at public slaughter-houses at the Islington market, 4845–4854. 4861——Convenience and advantage of the present system whereby the cattle from the Metropolitan Market are distributed among numerous private slaughter-houses and are killed under the butchers' personal inspection, 4855–4863——Slaughter by witness of from 80 to 100 oxen weekly at his premises in Aldgate High-street, the carcases being sold on the premises to the East End retail butchers, 4864–4871. 4912–4914. 4934–4936.

Discontinuance of slaughter-houses for oxen at Newgate or Leadenhall markets, the dead meat being supplied to those markets and to Aldgate market from other slaughter-houses in London or from the country, 4872–4882——Way in which the prices are regulated, there being three different markets for dead meat, 4881–4887——Greater cheapness of the dead market in London than in the country, especially for the lower classes, owing to the foreign supply, 4888–4899. 4909–4914——Good and healthy character of the foreign meat, 4891. 4909–4916——Practice as to the disposal by witness of the offal and hides, 4900–4908. 4951, 4952.

Very few unhealthy animals among the large number of foreign cattle passing through witness's hands, 4915, 4916——Healthy character generally of the Dutch cattle, 4915–4933——Careful examination by the Jews of the carcases used by them, all animals with the lung disease being rejected, but not animals with the foot and mouth disease, 4917–4925. 4932, 4933——Slight importance attached to the foot and mouth disease, the meat not being affected by it, 4926–4933——Limited nuisance arising from the private slaughter-houses as compared with the evils to be created by their abolition, 4943–4952.
